 [DITTON (HUMPHREY*), an eminent Mathematician, was born at Saliſbury, on the 29th of May, 1675, being the fourteenth of that name in a direct line. His father was a gentleman poſſeſſed of a ſmall eſtate in the county of Wilts. His mother was of the family of the Luttrells of Dunſter-caſtle, near Taunton, in Somerſetſhire, whoſe fortune made a conſiderable increaſe to the family income. Mr. Ditton's father being of the ſect of Nonconformiſts, and extremely tenacious of his opinions, entered much into the religious controverſies of thoſe times, and in ſupporting ſuch contentions impaired his fortune, almoſt to the ruin of his family.

* For this communication we are indebted to Mr. Newton, of New Ormond Street.

Mr. Humphrey Ditton was the only ſon; and his father, obſerving in him an extraordinary good capacity, was deſirous that he ſhould not want the advantage of a good education. Accordingly, he placed him in a private academy, under the direction of Dr. Olive, a Clergyman of the Eſtabliſhed Church, who, notwithſtanding his religious ſentiments were different from thoſe of Mr. Ditton's family, was much eſteemed by them for his candour and moderation in thoſe troubleſome times.

When Mr. Ditton had finiſhed his ſtudies under Dr. Olive, he, at the deſire of his father, although contrary to his own inclination, engaged in the profeſſion of Divinity, and began to exerciſe his function at Tunbridge in the county of Kent, where he continued to preach ſome years; during which time he married Miſs Ball, a lady at that place.

He was ſo indefatigable and aſſiduous in the exerciſe of his calling that he very much impaired his health; ſo that ſeveral of his friends, foreſeeing it would ſhorten his life, adviſed him to relinquiſh a profeſſion which the weakneſs of his conſtitution could not ſupport. Theſe circumſtances, together with the death of his father, which happened about the ſame time, determined him to quit the profeſſion of Divinity; and at the perſuaſion of Dr. Harris and Mr. Whiſton, both eminent Mathematicians, he engaged in the ſtudy of Mathematics, to which he had always a great propenſity.

In the proſecution of this ſcience he was much encouraged by the ſucceſs and applauſe he received. He was highly eſteemed by Sir Iſaac Newton, by whoſe intereſt and recommendation he was elected Maſter of the new Mathematical School in Chriſt's Hoſpital; in which office he remained during his life.

Mr. Ditton publiſhed many mathematical and other tracts, of which the following is an account:

His firſt work was a treatiſe on Spherical Catoptrics, which was publiſhed in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions," in the year 1705. It was written in the Latin language, and was ſo highly approved, that it was republiſhed in a foreign periodical work, called the "Acta Eruditorum," in the year 1707; and was afterwards printed in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris."

In 1706 he publiſhed a treatiſe, intituled, "An Inſtitution of Fluxions, containing "the firſt Principles, Operations, and Applications, of that admirable Method, as invented by Sir Iſaac Newton." This work, with additions and alterations, was again publiſhed by Mr. John Clarke, in the year 1726, ſome years after Mr. Ditton's death.

The ſame year, 1706, Mr. Ditton alſo publiſhed a treatiſe on the Laws of Nature and Motion. Of this the celebrated Wolfius makes mention, and aſſerts, that it illuſtrates and renders eaſy the writings of Galileo, Huygens, and the "Principia" of Sir Iſaac Newton. It is alſo noticed by De la Roche, in "The Mémoires de Litérature," vol. VIII. p. 46.

In 1709 he publiſhed the "Synopſis Algebraicum" of John Alexander Bernatus Helvetius; with many additions and corrections.

His treatiſe on Perſpective was publiſhed in 1712. In this work he explained the principles of that art mathematically; and beſides teaching the methods then generally practiſed, gave the firſt hints of the new method afterward enlarged upon and improved by Dr. Brook Taylor; and which was publiſhed in the year 1715.

Several publications of Mr. Ditton's appeared in the year 1714; one of which was a Diſcourſe upon the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt; the truth of which he here endeavoured to demonſtrate. This work went through four editions, and was tranſlated into ſeveral of the modern languages. Tindal, Collins, and ſome other authors, oppoſed it, and endeavoured to confute the reaſoning; to whom Ditton had begun an anſwer, but died before it was finiſhed; and his friends, upon reviſing it, found it too incomplete to hazard its publication.

Another of his works that appeared in the ſame year was "The new Law of Fluids; "or, a Diſcourſe concerning the Aſcent of Liquids, in exact geometrical Figures, be"tween two nearly contiguous ſurfaces." To this was annexed a tract, to demonſtrate the impoſſibility of thinking or perception being the reſult of any combination of the parts of matter and motion: a ſubject much agitated in thoſe days by the Free-Thinkers and their opponents. There was alſo adjoined to this work an advertiſement from him and Mr. Whiſton, concerning a method for diſcovering the Longitude; which, it appears, they had publiſhed about half a year before. This attempt probably coſt Mr. Ditton his life; for although it was approved and countenanced by Sir Iſaac Newton previouſly to its being preſented to the Board of Longitude, and the method has been ſince ſucceſsfully put in practice, in finding the longitude between Paris and Vienna, yet that Board then determined againſt it: ſo that the diſappointment, together with the public ridicule incurred thereby (particularly in a poem written by Dean Swift), affected his health, and he died the enſuing year, 1715, in the fortieth year of his age, much regretted by the Philoſophical Literati of that time, who expected from his aſſiduity, learning, and penetrating genius, many uſeful and ingenious diſcoveries.

In an account of Mr. Ditton, prefixed to the German tranſlation of his Diſcourſe on the Reſurrection, it is ſaid, that he had publiſhed, in his own name only, another method for finding the Longitude; but which Mr. Whiſton denied. However, Raphael Levi, a learned Jew, who had ſtudied under Leibnitz, informed the German editor, that he well knew that Ditton and Leibnitz had correſponded upon the ſubject; and that Ditton had ſent to Leibnitz a delineation of a machine he had invented for that purpoſe; which was a piece of mechaniſm conſtructed with many wheels like a clock, and which Leibnitz highly approved of for land uſe; but doubted whether it would anſwer on ſhipboard, on account of the motion of the ſhip.

Mr. Ditton was buried in the cloiſters of Chriſt's-Hoſpital, on the North ſide of the quadrangle, and near the paſſage at its Eaſt end. A large blue graveſtone, with a Latin inſcription cut in it, was laid over the grave. The ſtone yet remains; but the inſcription is entirely effaced.

His ſon, the Rev. John Ditton, was many years lecturer of St. Mary's, Iſlington; where he died March 16, 1776 (1).

 Previouſly to Mr. Ditton's publication of his Spherical Catoptrics in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, he had publiſhed, in the twenty-third volume of the ſame Tranſactions, a paper on the Tangents of Curves deduced immediately from the Theory of Maxima and Minima. How well his Treatiſe upon the Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt was received, is apparent from its having gone through four editions, and from its having been tranſlated into ſeveral modern languages. It deſerved this diſtinction, being a work of great value. According to the faſhion of the times, it is written in the mathematical form, which, perhaps, gives it too abſtract an appearance; but it would well reward a diligent peruſal. As is the caſe with many other good books, the memory of it is almoſt overwhelmed by the ſucceſſion of new publications. A perſon who ſhould apply himſelf to the ſtudy of the Logic of probabilities, would find his account in reading Mr. Ditton's performance.] K.

 [DOBSON (WILLIAM), a Painter of great merit, was born in St Andrew's pariſh, in Holborn, in the year 1610 (a). His family had been gentlemen of good rank at St. Alban's; but having fallen into decay, he was put apprentice to Robert Peake, who was both a painter and a dealer in pictures (b) [A]. His maſter was not a very able artiſt; but he received inſtructions, not from him only, but from Francis Cleyn [B]; though he owed his principal improvement to his copying a few excellent pictures,

[A] Both a painter and a dealer in pictures.] Robert Peake was originally a picture-ſeller by Holborne-bridge. He ſold prints as well as paintings, and was maſter to the celebrated Faithorne. In the Civil War he took up arms in ſupport of the royal cauſe, and was made a lieutenant-colonel. He was knighted by King Charles I. and had a command in Baſing-houſe when it was beſieged, and was there taken priſoner. He painted portraits in oil-colours (1).

(1) Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting in England, vol. II. p. 20.

[B] From Francis Cleyn.] 'This artiſt,' Mr. Walpole ſays, 'was born at Roſtock, and retained in the 'ſervice of Chriſtian IV. King of Denmark; but 'the excellence of his genius prompted him to the 'ſearch of better models than he found in that Nor-'thern climate. He traveled to Italy, and ſtaid there 'four years. It was at Rome, I ſuppoſe, he learned 'thoſe beautiful groteſques, in which he afterwards 'ſhone. At Venice, he became known to Sir Henry 'Wotton, and Sir Robert Anſtruther recommended 'him to Prince Charles. He arrived while the Prince 'was in Spain; but notwithſtanding was graciouſly 'received by King James, who mentions that cir-'cumſtance in a Latin letter that he wrote to the 'King of Denmark, deſiring leave to detain Cleyn in 'England, though with a permiſſion to return firſt to 'Copenhagen, and finiſh a work he had begun there, 'and promiſing to pay the expence of his journey. 'The letter is preſerved by Fuller (2). The requeſt 'was granted, and Cleyn returned to London at the 'end of the Summer. The King had juſt then given 'two thouſand pounds towards Sir Francis Crane's 'new manufacture at Mortlack. They had worked 'only after old patterns; Cleyn was placed there, 'and gave deſigns both in hiſtory and groteſque, 'which carried thoſe works to ſingular perfection. It 'appears by King Charles's Catalogue, that five of 'the Cartoons were ſent thither to be copied by him 'in tapeſtry. His penſion is recorded by Rymer (3): "Know ye, that we do give and grant unto Francis "Cleyn a certain annuity of one hundred pounds by "the year, during his natural life." He enjoyed this 'ſalary till the Civil War; and was in ſuch favour 'with the King, and in ſuch reputation, that on a 'ſmall drawing of him in Indian ink, about ſix inches 'ſquare, which Vertue ſaw, he is called, Il famoſiſſi-'mo pittore Franceſco Cleyn, miracolo del ſecolo, et 'molto ſtimato del re Carlo della Gran Eritania, 1646. 'Cleyn was not employed ſolely in the works at 'Mortlack; he had a houſe near the church in Co-'vent-Garden, and did ſeveral other things for the 'King and Nobility. At Somerſet-houſe he painted 'a cieling of a room near the gallery with hiſtories 'and compartments in gold. The outſide of Wim-'bledon-houſe he painted in freſco. Bolſover in 'Nottinghamſhire, Stone-park in Northamptonſhire, 'and Carew-houſe at Parſon's Green (ſince Lord Peter-'borough's), were ornamented by him. There is ſtill 'extant a beautiful chamber adorned by him at Hol-'land-houſe, with a cieling in groteſque, and ſmall 'compartments on the chimnies, in the ſtyle and 'not unworthy of Parmegiano. Two chairs, carved 'and gilt, with large ſhells for backs, belonging to 'the ſame room, were undoubtedly from his deſigns; 'and are evidences of his taſte. A letter from Lord 'Cottington to Lord Strafford, deſcribing the former's 'houſe at Hanworth, mentions Cleyn, though not 'by name: "There is a certain large low room made "under the building with a fountain in it, and other "rare devices, and the open gallery is all painted by "the hand of a ſecond Titian. Aug. 1629." In 'King pictures, procured by his master, particularly some of Titian and Vandyck; and the manner of those two masters he in some measure always retained (c). He applied himself so assiduously to improve himself in his art, that he soon arrived at great excellence; so that a picture which he had drawn being exposed in the window of a shop on Snow-hill, and being seen by the celebrated Vandyck, who happened to be passing that way, he was much struck with it. He enquired after the artist, and found him at work in a poor garret. Vandyck soon delivered him from a situation so unworthy of his merit, and generously furnished him with every thing requisite for his appearance in a character suitable to his talents. He afterwards recommended him to the notice of King Charles I. who took him into his service, and is said to have styled him, "The "English Tintoret." On the death of Vandyck, Dobson was appointed Serjeant-painter, and Groom of the Privy-chamber. He attended the King to Oxford, and lodged in the High-street, almost over-against St. Mary's church, in a house where some of his works were remaining within these few years. At Oxford, his Majesty, Prince Rupert, and several of the Nobility, sat to him; and he came into great business [C]. But the decline of the King's affairs was unfavourable to his interest, and his course of life appears to have been irregular and imprudent. He was attached to his pleasures, and negligent of his expences; in consequence of which he was involved in debts, and thrown into prison. He was, however, released out of confinement by the friendship of Mr. Vaughan of the Exchequer, whose picture he drew, and thought it the best of his portraits. But he enjoyed this release for a short time only; for he died at his house in St. Martin's-lane, at the age of thirty-six; and was interred in that parish on the 28th of October, 1646 (d).

This, as Mr. Walpole observes, was "a short life, in which he had promised much "excellence. His pictures are thought the best imitations of Vandyck: they are un-"doubtedly very faithful transcripts of nature. He painted history as well as portrait, "and even the latter generally containing more than a single figure, rise almost above "that denomination (e)." In his person, he is said to have been "a fair middle-sized man;" and it is added, that he was "of a ready wit, and pleasing conversation (f)." Mr. Pilkington says, "Undoubtedly he was one of the most eminent painters of his "time; and an equal honour to the art, and to his native country. His manner is "bold, and free, and, at the same time, has abundance of sweetness, with a charming "tone of colour; and although he was inferior to Vandyck in the gracefulness of his "figures, yet he gave life, dignity, and sentiment, to his portraits: and for truth, "character, and resemblance, few have surpassed him (g)." It has also been remarked by Mr. Graham, that "had his education been answerable to his genius, England "might justly have been as proud of her Dobson, at Venice of her Titian, or Flanders "of her Vandyck (h)."

At Wilton is a painting of the decollation of John the Baptist by Dobson; of which Mr. Walpole says, that "it is in a good style, but the colouring is raw. The idea of "St. John is said to have been taken from the face of Prince Rupert." At Chatsworth is a picture by him, said to be General Monk, his child, and Anne Clarges, who was afterwards Dutchess of Albemarle. At Albury, in Surrey, the seat of the Earl of Arundel, Mr. Walpole informs us, "was a picture, by Dobson, of the woman caught "in adultery, with several figures; the heads taken from persons then living, among "whom was the poet Cowley. At Chippenham, in Cambridgeshire, formerly the seat "of Russel, Earl of Orford, in one piece are Prince Rupert, Colonel John Russel, "and Mr. William Murray, drinking and dipping their favour-ribbands in the wine. "At Blenheim is a family, by some said to be that of Francis Carter, an architect and "scholar of Inigo Jones; by others of Lilly, the astrologer, whom Vertue thought it "resembled. The man holds a pair of compasses."—"I have seen nothing of Dob-"son," says Mr. Walpole, "preferable to this: there is the utmost truth in it. At "Devonshire-house is another family-piece of Sir Thomas Browne, author of "Religio "Medici," his wife, two sons, and as many daughters. Mr. Willet, merchant in "Thames-street, has a small family-piece of Dr. Hibbard, physician, his wife, and five "children. The father and mother are particularly well painted."—"A whole-length

'King Charles's catalogue is mention of four patterns 'for the great Seal, drawings on blue paper by Cleyn. 'He made designs for various artists, particularly for 'several of Hollar's plates to Virgil and Æsop: for 'these he received fifty shillings a-piece.'—'Mr. English, a painter, who died at Mortlack in 1718, had 'a picture of Cleyn and his wife, and several of his 'designs for tapestries; all which came to Mr. Crawley of Hempsted, Hertfordshire (4).' Cleyn died about the year 1658. He had several children, and two of his sons became eminent in his own art. On a small print of the father, etched by one of his sons, Mr. Evelyn wrote, "A most pious man, father of "two sons, who were incomparable painters in mi-"niature; all died in London (5)."

[C] He came into great business.] Mr. Walpole takes notice, that 'the author of the "Abrégé de la Vie 'des plus fameux Peintres," says, that Dobson being 'overwhelmed with business, thought of a lucky 'way to check it. It was, obliging persons who sat 'to him to pay half the price down; and that he was 'the first who used this practice. By the swarms of 'portraits that are left on the hands of his successors, 'this method is either neglected, or has very little 'effect (6).'

" of Sir William Compton is in the poſſeſſion of the family. At the Lord Byron's is " a portrait of Sir Charles Lucas; and at Drayton in Northamptonſhire, Henry Mor- " daunt, Earl of Peterborough, in armour, with a page holding his horſe, and an " angel giving him his helmet. A head of the Marquis of Montroſe was taken for the " hand of Vandyck: in a corner, in ſtone-colour, is a ſtatue of Peace, on the other ſide, " his helmet. At Mr. Skinner's (Mr. Walker's collection) is a large piece of Prince " Charles in armour, drawn about 1638, Mr. Wyndham, a youth, holding his hel- " met; at bottom are arms and trophies." Mr. Walpole likewiſe takes notice, that there is an admirable head of Vanderdort, by Dobſon, at Houghton; and alſo gives the following farther account of pieces by him: " Dobſon's wife, by him, is on the ſtairs " of the Aſhmolean Muſeum at Oxford; and his own head is at Earl Paulett's: the " hands were added long ſince by Gibſon, as he himſelf told Vertue. Charles, Duke " of Somerſet, had a picture of an old man ſitting, and his ſon behind him. On this " picture was written the following epigram, publiſhed by John Elſum, among his " epigrams on painting:

" Perceiving ſomebody behind his chair,
" He turns about with a becoming air:
" His head is rais'd, and looking o'er his ſhoulder
" So round and ſtrong, you never ſaw a bolder.
" Here you ſee nature th'roughly underſtood;
" A portrait not like paint, but fleſh and blood;
" And, not to praiſe Dobſon below his merit,
" This fleſh and blood is quickened by a ſpirit."

" At Northumberland-houſe is a triple-portrait of Sir Charles Cotterel, embraced by " Dobſon, and Sir Balthazar Gerbier in a white waiſtcoat. Sir Charles was a great " friend and patron of Dobſon. At Rouſham, in Oxfordſhire, the ſeat of the Cotterels, " are ſeveral good portraits by him. Sir Charles Cotterel, when at Oxford with the " King, was engaged by his Majeſty to tranſlate Davila's Hiſtory of the Civil Wars of " France: the frontiſpiece, deſigned by Sir Charles himſelf, was drawn by Dobſon. " It repreſented Francis II. Charles IX. Henry III. and IV. with two dogs, a Popiſh " and Proteſtant cur, fighting before them. This ſketch is ſtill preſerved in the family, " and in 1729 was engraved in London for the Hiſtory of Thuanus. He etched his " own portrait. In a collection of poems called " Calanthe," is an elegy on our pain- " ter (i).'] T.

 [DODDRIDGE (PHILIP), an eminent Divine and Tutor among the Proteſtant Diſſenters, was deſcended from a family which appears to have been originally ſettled in Devonſhire. No memoirs of it, however, are capable of being traced farther back than to his great-grandfather, whoſe name was Richard, and who was an eminent merchant at Barnſtaple, in that county. Of his great-grandfather we are not told whether he was a gentleman who lived upon his eſtate, or whether he was of any particular profeſſion. That the family was ancient, is evinced by its arms; and that it was of ſome conſequence, is apparent from the liberal education, and the reſpectable ſituations, of ſuch of the members of it as have not been conſigned to oblivion. John Doddridge, brother of the Doctor's great-grandfather, was of no ſmall diſtinction in the law; paſſed through ſeveral eminent ſtages of it, in the reign of King James the Firſt; received the honour of knighthood; and at length roſe to be one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench. An account of him will be given below [A].

Another

[A] An account of him will be given below.] This John Doddridge, one of the ſons of the Richard Doddridge above-mentioned, was born at Barnſtaple, in the year 1555. In 1572 he was entered of Exeter College, Oxford, where he ſtudied four years; after which he was removed to the Middle Temple, London, where he became a great proficient in the law, and a noted counſellor. In the forty-fifth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, he was Lent Reader of that houſe; and on the twentieth of January, 1603-4, he was called to the degree of Serjeant at Law. At the ſame time he had the honour of being appointed Serjeant to Henry Prince of Wales. From this employment he was raiſed, in the ſucceeding year, to be Solicitor-General to the King; though his name does not occur, under that capacity, in Mr. Beatſon's Political Index. On the twenty-fifth of June, 1607, he was conſtituted his Majeſty's Principal Serjeant at Law, and was knighted on the fifth of July following. In February, 1612-13, he was created Maſter of Arts, at his chambers in Serjeants Inn by the Vice Chancellor, the two Proctors, and five other members of the Univerſity of Oxford. This peculiar honour was conferred upon him in gratitude for the great ſervice he had done to the Univerſity in ſeveral law-ſuits depending between the city of Oxford and the ſaid Univerſity. On the twenty-ſecond of April, 1613, Sir John Doddridge was appointed one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, in which office he continued till his death. In this ſtation he appears to have conducted himſelf with great integrity as well as ability. However, in April, 1628, he and the other Judges of the Court were called upon to aſſign their reaſons in the Houſe of Lords, for having given judgment againſt admitting five gentlemen to bail, who had been impriſoned for refuſing the loan which had lately been demanded by the Crown. Sir Nicholas Hyde, Lord Chief Juſtice, Sir John Doddridge Mr.

Juſtice

Another John Doddridge (whether a ſon, or only a near relation of the Judge, cannot now be aſcertained) was likewiſe brought up to the ſame profeſſion; and became a Counſellor of the Middle Temple, Recorder of Barnſtaple, and a Member of the long Parliament. From a circumſtance related concerning him, of his being ſecluded from the houſe, with ſome other members, in December, 1648, becauſe certain matters were to be debated concerning them, there is reaſon to believe that he might be obnoxious to the then ruling party, on account of his not being willing to concur with them in all their meaſures (a). Philip Doddridge, an uncle of the Doctor's, was alſo bred to the law, and diſcharged, for many years, the important truſt of Steward to the noble and wealthy family of Ruſſel, under William the fifth Earl, and firſt Duke of Bedford. Our author's grandfather, whoſe name was John, was educated for the Church, in the Univerſity of Oxford, and was poſſeſſed of the rectory of Sheperton, in the county of Middleſex, from which he was ejected on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, 1662, in conſequence of the act of uniformity. At that time he had ten children unprovided for; notwithſtanding which, he quitted a benefice that was worth two hundred pounds a-year, rather than he would violate his conſcience, by ſubmitting to the ſubſcriptions and declarations required, and the uſages impoſed by that act. Dr. Calamy has recorded concerning him, that he was an ingenious man, a ſcholar, an acceptable preacher, and a very peaceable divine. From his funeral ſermon, it appears that he had preached, in the latter part of his life, to a congregation at or near Brentford, and that he died ſuddenly, in 1689, much reſpected and beloved by his people (b).

Daniel Doddridge, the Doctor's father, was brought up to trade, and ſettled as an oilman, in the city of London. Being the eldeſt ſurviving branch of the family, he was heir at law to the large eſtate of the Judge (about two thouſand pounds a year), and was often urged by his friends to purſue the recovery of it; but he choſe to decline doing it, from an apprehenſion of the hazard and expence that would attend the attempt. He had a great number of children, all of whom died young, excepting one daughter and our author. The Doctor was the laſt and twentieth child of his father's marriage. His mother was the daughter of the Reverend Mr. John Bauman, of Prague, in Bohemia; who, in conſequence of the troubles which followed the expulſion of Frederic, Elector Palatine, left his native country about the year 1626. Such was his adherence to the Proteſtant Religion, that, for the ſake of enjoying the free exerciſe of it, he quitted all his friends, and the poſſeſſion of a conſiderable eſtate. He withdrew, on foot, in the habit of a peaſant, carrying with him nothing but a hundred broad pieces of gold, plaited in a leathern girdle [B], and a Bible of Luther's tranſlation. Having ſpent ſome

Juſtice Jones, and Mr. Juſtice Whitlocke, each of them ſpoke upon the occaſion, and made the beſt defence which the nature of the caſe would admit. If they were guilty of a miſtake, which cannot now reaſonably be doubted, they ſeem to have been led into it in the ſincerity of their hearts, from the high notions they entertained of regal power. Sir John Doddridge, in his ſpeech, aſſerts the purity of his own character in the following terms: "It is no more fit for a Judge "to decline to give an account of his doings, than "for a Chriſtian of his faith. God knoweth I have "endeavoured always to keep a good conſcience; for "a troubled one who can bear? I have now ſat in "this Court fifteen years, and I ſhould know ſome-"ſomething. Surely, if I had gone in a mill ſo long, "duſt would cleave to my clothes. I am old, and "have one foot in the grave; therefore I will look to "the better part as near as I can. But omnia habere "in memoriâ, et in nullo errare, divinum potius eſt "quam humanum." Sir John Doddridge departed this life on the thirteenth day of September, 1628, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, and was buried in the ambulatory before the door of the library formerly called Lady Mary's Chapel, in the cathedral church of Exeter. Within that library is a very ſumptuous monument erected to his memory, containing his figure and that of his wife, cut in alabaſter, under a ſtately arch ſupported by marble pillars. This learned Judge, by his happy education, accompanied with excellent natural parts and unremitted induſtry, became ſo general a ſcholar, that it was ſaid of him, that it was difficult to determine whether he were the better Artiſt, Divine, Civil or Common Lawyer. Among his other ſtudies, he was a great lover of antiquities, and attained to ſuch an eminence of knowledge and ſkill in that department of literature, that he was regarded as one of the ableſt members of the famous Society of Antiquaries, which may be ſaid to have begun in 1571, but which more particularly flouriſhed from 1590 to 1614. The following works were written by Sir John Doddridge: 1. "The Lawyer's Light; or, "due Direction for the Study of the Law." London, 1629, quarto. 2. "A complete Parſon, or a De-"ſcription of Advowſons and Church Livings, de-"livered in ſeveral Readings, in an Inn of Chancery "called the New Inn." Printed 1602, 1603. 1630. quarto. 3. "The Hiſtory of the Ancient and Mo-"dern Eſtate of the Principality of Wales, Duchy of "Cornwall, and Earldom of Cheſter." 1630, quarto. 4. "The Engliſh Lawyer, a Treatiſe deſcribing a "Method for the managing of the Laws of this Land, "and expreſſing the beſt Qualities requiſite in the "Student, Practiſer, Judges, &c." London, 1631, quarto. 5. "Opinion touching the Antiquity, Pow-"er, Order, State, Manner, Perſons, and Proceed-"ings, of the High Courts of Parliament in Eng-"land." London, 1658, octavo. 6. "A Treatiſe "of particular Eſtates." London, 1677, duodecimo. Printed at the end of the fourth edition of William Noy's Works, entituled, "The Ground and Maxims "of the Law." 7. "A true Repreſentation of fore-"paſſed Parliaments to the View of the preſent Times "and Poſterity." This ſtill remains in manuſcript. Sir John Doddridge alſo enlarged a book called the "Magazine of Honour." London, 1642. The ſame book was afterwards publiſhed under his name by the title of "The Law of Nobility and Peerage." Lond. 1657, 1658, octavo. In the Collection of curious Diſcourſes written by eminent Antiquaries, are two Diſſertations by our Judge; one of which is on the Dimenſions of the Land of England, and the other on the Office and Duty of Heralds in this country (1).

[B] Plaited in a leathern girdle.] Mr. Bauman, the firſt night after he commenced his journey, left his girdle behind him at the inn in which he lay; and not being uſed to ſuch a cincture, he did not miſs it till he came to another inn the next evening. Upon this he immediately went back to his former lodgings, with ſome time at Saxe Gotha, and in other parts of Germany, he came to England, in what year is uncertain, with ample teſtimonials from many of the principal German divines. Being thus ſtrongly recommended, he was made Maſter of the Free-School at Kingſton-upon-Thames, at which place he died, leaving behind him one only child, the daughter before-mentioned, then very young.

Dr. Philip Doddridge was born in London, on the twenty-ſixth of June, 1702. So deſtitute was he, at his birth, of the ſigns of life, that he was thrown aſide as dead. One, however, of the attendants, thinking that ſhe perceived ſome motion or breath in him, cheriſhed with ſuch aſſiduous care the almoſt expiring flame of exiſtence, that it was happily preſerved, for the benefit of the world. From his infancy young Doddridge had an infirm conſtitution, and a thin conſumptive habit, which rendered both himſelf and his friends apprehenſive that his life would be ſhort. He frequently was accuſtomed therefore, eſpecially on the returns of his birth-day, to expreſs his wonder and gratitude that his years were ſo long continued. His parents, whoſe character was worthy of their birth and education, brought him up in the early knowledge of religion. Before he could read, his mother taught him the hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, by the aſſiſtance of ſome Dutch tiles in the chimney of the room where they uſually ſat; and accompanied her inſtructions with ſuch wiſe and pious reflections, as made ſtrong and laſting impreſſions upon his heart. His firſt initiation in the learned languages was under Mr. Stott, a miniſter, who kept a private ſchool in London. In 1712, when he was ten years of age, he was removed to Kingſton-upon-Thames, and placed at the ſchool which had been taught by his grandfather Bauman. Here he continued till 1715, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his piety and his diligent application to literature. On the ſeventeenth of July, in the ſame year, he had the unhappineſs of loſing his father; and he had been deprived of his mother ſome time before. This circumſtance, of his being left an orphan, excited in him very ſerious reflections, which, however, were not wholly of a gloomy nature; for he expreſſed a devout, and even a cheerful truſt in the protection of the GOD of Mercies, the univerſal Parent of Mankind.

About the time of his father's death, Mr. Doddridge quitted Kingſton, and was removed to a private ſchool at St. Alban's, under the care of a worthy and learned maſter, Mr. Nathaniel Wood. At this town he had not only the advantage of receiving excellent inſtruction, but was peculiarly happy in forming an acquaintance with a gentleman to whom he owed the higheſt obligations, and who behaved to him with the kindneſs of a parent. The gentleman we ſpeak of was Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Samuel Clark, the diſſenting miniſter of the place. What rendered Mr. Clark's regard and protection particularly ſeaſonable, was a calamity that befell Mr. Doddridge, with reſpect to his private fortune. By the miſmanagement of the perſon into whoſe hands the care of his affairs had been entruſted after his father's death, he loſt the whole of his ſubſtance. In this melancholy ſituation, he found a ready benefactor in Mr. Clark; and had not Providence raiſed him up ſuch a generous friend, he could not have proceeded in the courſe of his ſtudies.

During Mr. Doddridge's reſidence at St. Alban's, he began to keep a diary of his life; from which it appears how diligently he improved his time, and how anxious he was to be daily advancing in knowledge, piety, virtue, and uſefulneſs. As he had the Chriſtian miniſtry in view, beſides his application to the languages, he read, every morning and evening, portions of Scripture, with ſome commentary upon them; and it was very ſeldom indeed that he permitted either his ſchool-buſineſs, or any avocations or amuſements, to divert him from this courſe. He recorded the ſubſtance and deſign of the ſermons he heard, together with the impreſſions which they made upon him, and particularly noted what was moſt worthy of imitation in the preacher. In theſe important concerns he had the ſingular felicity of enjoying the direction of ſo kind and experienced a friend as Mr. Clark. Under the inſtructions, and by the encouragement, of the ſame gentleman, he was admitted to the Lord's-ſupper; and his own reflections on the occaſion, preſerved in his diary, amply ſhew the ſerioufneſs of his ſpirit in that early part of life.

with the united painful apprehenſion of being met by purſuers, and of not having the good fortune to recover his ſubſtance. When he arrived at the inn, he enquired of the chambermaid if ſhe had ſeen a girdle which he had left in his chamber. She informed him that ſhe had ſeen it, but that, imagining it to be of no value, ſhe had thrown it away, and could not recollect where. After having told her that he had a great value for his old belt, that it would be very uſeful to him in the long journey he had before him, and that he would handſomely reward her for finding it, ſhe ſearched diligently, and at length found it in a hole under the ſtairs, where the family uſed to throw their worn-out uſeleſs furniture. The good man received his girdle with great joy, and purſued his journey with thankfulneſs to Providence for the recovery. This event he often ſpoke of to his friends, as an extraordinary and ſeaſonable mercy (2).

In

In the year 1718, Mr. Doddridge left the ſchool at St. Alban's, and retired for a time to his ſiſter's houſe [C], with a view of conſidering his future profeſſion. Strong as the bent of his inclination was to the miniſtry, he had little proſpect, from the narrowneſs of his circumſtances, of being able to carry his wiſhes into execution. Whilſt he was in this ſtate of ſuſpenſe, the Ducheſs of Bedford, who had a regard for his family, hearing of his ſituation and character, and of his warm inclination to ſtudy, made him an offer, that, if he choſe to be educated for the Church of England, and would go to either of the Univerſities, ſhe would ſupport the expences of his education, and afterwards provide for him, if ſhe ſhould live till he had taken orders. This propoſal he received with the higheſt gratitude, but declined it in the moſt reſpectful manner, as he could not ſatisfy his conſcience in complying with the terms of miniſterial conformity. In the diſtreſs of his mind, from an apprehenſion that he ſhould not be able to accompliſh what was ſo near to his heart, he waited upon Dr. Edmund Calamy, a divine of great eminence among the Diſſenters at that period, and entreated his advice and aſſiſtance towards his being brought up for the miniſtry. But in this application he met with no encouragement: for the Doctor endeavoured to diſſuade him from his deſign, and urged him to betake himſelf to ſome other profeſſion. Diſheartened by ſo many obſtructions and difficulties, he at length entertained thoughts of entering upon the ſtudy of the law, in which deſign he was encouraged by Mr. Horſeman, a celebrated conveyancer, who recommended him to Mr. Eyre, a counſellor, from whom he received ſuch good propoſals, that he was upon the point of complying with them. However, previouſly to his final determination, he devoted one morning ſolemnly to ſeek to God for direction; and whilſt he was actually engaged in this pious exerciſe, the poſtman knocked at the door with a letter from Mr. Clark, containing an offer to take him under his care, if he choſe the miniſtry upon Chriſtian principles. With what thankfulneſs he embraced the offer, will appear from his own words in his diary. "This," ſays he, "I look upon almoſt as an anſwer from Heaven; and, while I live, ſhall always adore "ſo ſeaſonable an interpoſition of Divine Providence. I have ſought God's direction "in all this matter, and I hope I have had it. My only view in my choice hath been "that of more extenſive ſervice; and I beg God would make me an inſtrument of doing "much good in the world (c)."

(c) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 4—12.

Mr. Doddridge returned to St. Alban's, in conſequence of Mr. Clark's propoſal, and continued ſome months at the houſe of that generous friend, who directed him in his ſtudies, furniſhed him with proper books, and laboured to cheriſh religious diſpoſitions and views in his heart. In October 1719, he was placed under the tuition of the Reverend John Jennings, who kept an academy at Kibworth, in Leiceſterſhire, and was a gentleman of great learning, piety, and uſefulneſs. Mr. Jennings was the author of "Two Diſcourſes on Preaching Chriſt, and particular and experimental Preaching," firſt printed in 1723, which were ſo much eſteemed that they were recommended by two Biſhops at their viſitations of their clergy, and tranſlated into the German language, by order of Dr. Frank, Profeſſor of Divinity at Hall, in Saxony. A ſecond edition of them appeared in 1736, under the care of Mr. Jennings's brother, Dr. David Jennings, who was for many years an eminent miniſter and tutor in London. Mr. John Jennings publiſhed likewiſe, "A genealogical Table of the Kings of England, Scotland, and France, for the Space of nine hundred Years." Under the tuition of this gentleman, for whom Mr. Doddridge had the higheſt veneration and reſpect, he proſecuted his ſtudies with the greateſt ardour and diligence. Beſides attending and ſtudying the academical lectures, and reading the particular parts of the authors to whom his tutor referred his pupils for the farther illuſtration of the ſubjects treated upon, he had in one half year read ſixty books, and about as many more afterwards in the ſame proportion of time. Some of theſe were large volumes, ſuch as Patrick's Commentaries, Tillotſon's Works, and moſt of the ſermons that had been preached at Boyle's Lecture. All the reſt were learned or uſeful treatiſes. Nor was it in a haſty or deſultory manner that theſe books were read by him, but with great attention and cloſe ſtudy. Several of them he abridged; and from others he made extracts, which were inſerted in his common-place book; and when he found, in any of the works peruſed by him, a remarkable interpretation or illuſtration of a text of ſcripture, he transferred it into his interleaved Teſtament or Bible (d).

(d) Ibid. 12—14.

It was of eminent advantage to Mr. Doddridge, that, during the whole of his academical courſe, he enjoyed the correſpondence of Mr. Clark. From ſuch of this gentleman's letters as have ſtill been preſerved, it appears that his advices to his young friend, whether regarding his religious or literary improvements, were ſignally wiſe and judicious (e). It was probably in conformity with the exhortations of Mr. Clark, that (e) Letters to and from the Rev. Philip Doddridge, D.D. p. 1—14.

[C] Retired to his ſiſter's houſe.] His ſiſter was married to Mr. John Nettleton, a diſſenting miniſter at Ongar, in Eſſex. She was a lady diſtinguiſhed by her good ſenſe and piety, and by the patience and tranquillity with which ſhe bore ſome heavy afflictions. Her brother always behaved to her with the utmoſt tenderneſs; and even while at the academy, and in his firſt ſettlement, generouſly contributed all that he could ſpare out of his ſmall ſtock for her aſſiſtance (3).

(3) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 4, note.

Mr. Doddridge made it his buſineſs to increaſe his acquaintance with claſſical learning. The more immediate objects of his attention were the Greek writers. Theſe he not only read with care, but wrote obſervations upon them, for the illuſtration of the authors themſelves, or of the ſcriptures; and he ſelected ſuch paſſages as might be ſerviceable to him in his preparations for the pulpit. His remarks upon Homer, in particular, were ſo numerous, that they would make a conſiderable volume (f). This part of Mr. Doddridge's conduct is juſtly entitled to commendation. By forming his taſte upon the great models of antiquity, to which he added an acquaintance with the polite writers of his own country, he acquired an eaſe and elegance of ſtile which he would not otherwiſe have attained. His merit was the greater in this reſpect, as few of the Diſſenters had hitherto cultivated the graces of compoſition, and perhaps not many of them had excelled even in the perſpicuity and correctneſs of their language. It is deſirable that the cauſe of truth, piety, and virtue, ſhould come recommended with every poſſible advantage.

(f) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 14.

While Mr. Doddridge was thus laying up a large ſtore of ſolid and ornamental knowledge, he was equally intent upon cultivating the excellencies of the Chriſtian character. For this purpoſe he drew up ſome rules for the regulation of his temper and conduct, which he inſerted in the beginning of his interleaved New Teſtament, that, by a frequent review of them, they might have the greater influence on the whole of his behaviour. They are very ſtrict; and perhaps more ſtrict than can ordinarily and univerſally be put into practice; but the effect of them was happy on himſelf, and an attention to them might be ſignally uſeful to others, who have the ſame views in life (g). In the year 1722, Mr. Jennings removed, with his pupils, from Kibworth to Hinckley, at which place Mr. Doddridge, after having been previouſly examined by a committee of miniſters, and received an ample teſtimonial to his qualifications, preached his firſt ſermon. This was on the twenty-ſecond of July in that year. As he was but little more than twenty years of age, his friend Mr. Clark ſeemed rather apprehenſive that he had begun to preach too ſoon; but he acquieſced in the judgment of his tutor, grounded on the maturity of Mr. Doddridge's abilities (h). From his firſt appearance in the pulpit, he was remarkably acceptable in the places where he exerciſed his talents. After continuing to purſue his ſtudies another year, he accepted of an invitation from the congregation of Diſſenters at Kibworth. At the ſame time he had an application from the city of Coventry, to be Aſſiſtant to Mr. Warren. Mr. Clark gave the preference to the laſt offer, for ſeveral judicious reaſons; notwithſtanding which, Mr. Doddridge, upon mature deliberation, made choice of the former ſituation. His principal motives for ſo doing were his youth, and the opportunity of purſuing his ſtudies with little interruption. It was in June 1722, that he ſettled at Kibworth. As the congregation was ſmall, and he lived in an obſcure village, he could devote almoſt his whole time to the farther acquiſition of knowledge and learning; and this he did with indefatigable zeal. Soon after his ſettlement at Kibworth, one of his fellow-pupils having condoled with him, in a letter, on his being buried alive, he returned the following ſenſible and ſpirited anſwer: "Here I ſtick cloſe to thoſe delightful ſtudies "which a favourable Providence has made the buſineſs of my life. One day paſſeth "away after another, and I only know that it paſſeth pleaſantly with me. As for the "world about me, I have very little concern with it. I live almoſt like a tortoiſe, ſhut "up in its ſhell, almoſt always in the ſame town, the ſame houſe, the ſame chamber. "Yet I live like a prince; not indeed in the pomp of greatneſs, but the pride of "liberty; maſter of my books, maſter of my time, and, I hope, I may add, maſter "of myſelf. I can willingly give up the charms of London, the luxury, the company, "and the popularity of it, for the ſecret pleaſures of rational employment and ſelf-"approbation; retired from applauſe and reproach, from envy and contempt, and the "deſtructive baits of avarice and ambition. So that, inſtead of lamenting it as my "misfortune, you ſhould congratulate me upon it as my happineſs, that I am confined "to an obſcure village; ſeeing it gives me ſo many valuable advantages, to the moſt "important purpoſes of devotion and philoſophy; and I hope I may add uſefulneſs "too (i)." It is with peculiar pleaſure that the writer of the preſent narrative has tranſcribed this paſſage; as he thinks that he has reaſon to reflect, with ſome degree of ſatisfaction, that the ſpending of a number of years in retired ſituations may be favourable to the increaſe of knowledge, and the habits of ſtudy.

(i) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 20—22. Doddridge's Letters, p. 10, 11.

Whilſt Mr. Doddridge lived at Kibworth, and during the earlier years of his miniſtry, he was very exact and careful in his preparations for the pulpit. Both his ſermons and expoſitions were the reſult of deep attention and ſtudy; and they were drawn up with exactneſs of method, and correctneſs and elegance of ſtyle. By this means he contracted a habit of delivering his ſentiments uſually with judgment, and always with eaſe and freedom of language, when, afterwards, he was obliged, from the multiplicity of his duties and engagements, principally to have recourſe to extempore ſpeaking. Indeed, excepting when he was called out on particular occaſions, the period I have now ſpecified was the time in which Mr. Doddridge more eſpecially excelled as a preacher.

When

When I was a ſtudent under him, he uſed frequently, on a Saturday evening, to read, in the academy, the ſermons he had made in his younger years; and they were much admired by his pupils, as containing models for their imitation, far ſuperior to thoſe which he could then have leiſure to give in his uſual Sunday diſcourſes. One thing which pleaſed moſt of us was, that theſe ſermons had leſs of the Calviniſtical dreſs of expreſſion than was adopted by him after his ſettlement at Northampton.

Beſides the pains which Mr. Doddridge took to acquaint himſelf with controverſial and critical theology, he was in the continual habit of reading deeply and ſeriouſly the writers of practical divinity. Among theſe, his peculiar favourites were Tillotſon, Howe, and Baxter (k); and undoubtedly they are authors from whom the clergy of every denomination may derive the richeſt ſtores of private improvement and public utility. I remember to have heard him ſpeak of Barrow with great energy of commendation. Many of the divines of the latter part of the laſt century (among whom the Church of England claims the larger number) were incomparably excellent for the high ſpirit of devotion, the fulneſs of ſentiment, and the energy and copiouſneſs of ſtyle: and the neglect of them has been of no advantage to modern times.

(k) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 22.

In the midſt of Mr. Doddridge's ſerious purſuits, he did not diſcontinue his regard to polite literature. Having been early acquainted with the French tongue, he was frequent in the peruſal of the elegant writers of that nation. He thought that many of them were poſſeſſed of very great genius, and he applauded them as intimately acquainted with the antients, thoſe prime maſters of eloquence and poetry. Of all their dramatic poets he met with none whom he admired ſo much as Racine. He was charmed with the pomp, elegance, and harmony of his language, as well as with the majeſty, tenderneſs, and propriety of his ſentiments. His pieces, in general, for the ſtage, he approved, as conducted with a wonderful mixture of grandeur and ſimplicity, which ſufficiently diſtinguiſh him from the dulneſs of ſome tragedians, and the bombaſt of others. Another of Mr. Doddridge's favourite authors was Fenelon, Archbiſhop of Cambray. That writer's Reflections upon Eloquence, in particular, he looked upon as one of the moſt judicious performances he had ever ſeen. Mr. Doddridge was not equally an admirer of the French ſermons. Theſe he judged to be far inferior to thoſe of our Engliſh divines. Bourdaloue's, notwithſtanding the high eſtimation they have been held in, appeared to him to be little better than empty harangues. Many of Chaminais' he eſteemed to be good; but of all which he had then ſeen he gave the preference to the diſcourſes of Mr. Superville, the Proteſtant divine at Rotterdam. "He eſpecially ex-"cels," ſaid Mr. Doddridge, in a letter to an ingenious young friend, "in the beauty "of his imagery, deſcriptions, and ſimiles, and ſome of the moſt pathetic expoſtula-"tions I ever ſaw. In ſhort, I believe he is perfectly to your taſte: only there is one "thing which will diſpleaſe you as much as it did me; which is, that many of his ar-"guments are very inconclufive, though generally as good as high Calviniſm will bear (l)." It is certain that Mr. Doddridge was afterwards particularly pleaſed with Saurin's ſermons, and ſtrongly recommended them to his pupils. Whether he was acquainted with Maſſillon is not recollected.

(l) Letters to and from the Rev. Dr. Doddridge, p. 26, 27.

While Mr. Doddridge was thus ſolicitous to enrich his mind with various knowledge, and to qualify himſelf for appearing with every advantage in the pulpit, he was diligently attentive to the private duties of his ſtation. He would often leave his ſtudy to viſit and inſtruct the people under his care. In his manner of converſation he was careful to adapt himſelf to the capacities of his congregation, which conſiſted chiefly of perſons in the lower ranks of life. This object, likewiſe, he ſeriouſly regarded in his public diſcourſes, which, while they were judicious, and frequently elegant, were, at the ſame time, plain and eaſy to be underſtood. In this happy art he was probably not a little aſſiſted by his intimate acquaintance with the works of the excellent Tillotſon, which, however they may now be neglected by a faſtidious age, will always deſerve to be mentioned with honour, as having eminently contributed to the introduction of a rational and uſeful method of preaching in England. How anxious our young divine was to diſcharge every part of his duty as a Chriſtian miniſter, whether in or out of the pulpit, with the greateſt fidelity and zeal, is evident from the copious extracts which Mr. Orton has given from his diary (m).

(m) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 23—32.

In October, 1725, Mr. Doddridge removed his abode to Market-Harborough, in doing which he did not diſcontinue his relation to the people at Kibworth. He preached to them as before, excepting on ſacrament days, when his place was ſupplied by Mr. Some of Harborough, who had taken upon him the paſtoral care of the ſmall ſociety at Kibworth, in conjunction with his own. This change in Mr. Doddridge's reſidence was very advantageous to him, as it gave him an opportunity of nearer converſe and intimacy with a gentleman, to whom he had been under early obligations, and who, next to Mr. Clark, was, perhaps, the beſt friend he had ever experienced. Mr. Some was a perſon of uncommon piety, zeal, prudence, and ſagacity; and indeed appears to have been the prime ornament among the diſſenting miniſters in that part of the kingdom. For the memory of this excellent man, who died on the twenty-ninth of May, 1737, Mr. Doddridge always maintained the moſt affectionate regard, which he ſtrongly teſtified on ſeveral occaſions. He publiſhed, in particular, ſome years after Mr. Some's deceaſe, a judicious tract that had been written by him on the ſubject of inoculation, for the purpoſe of removing the religious difficulties with which many worthy minds had been embarraſſed in reſpect to that practice. In this view the pamphlet has been of very conſiderable utility. I do not find that Mr. Some ever printed more than two ſermons; one in the year 1729, concerning the proper "Methods "to be taken by Miniſters for the Revival of Religion;" and another in 1736, preached at the funeral of the Reverend Thomas Saunders of Kettering (n).

The abilities and talents of Mr. Doddridge occaſioned him to be ſought for by much more numerous congregations than that in which he firſt ſettled. Even ſo early as in the year 1723, when he had but lately finiſhed his academical ſtudies, he received an invitation to undertake the paſtoral charge of a large ſociety of Diſſenters in the city of London. But he thought himſelf unequal to ſo great a burthen. Beſides this, he was diſcouraged by the unhappy differences which at that time ſubſiſted, between the non-conformiſt miniſters of the metropolis and its neighbourhood, about ſubſcribing or not ſubſcribing to articles of faith, in the words of human device, as a teſt of orthodoxy. In his anſwer to the gentleman who tranſmitted the invitation to him, he diſplayed the liberality of his own mind; for after mentioning ſome other objections to the propoſal, he added as follows: "I might alſo have been required to ſubſcribe; which I am re-"ſolved never to do. We have no diſputes on that matter in theſe parts. A neigh-"bouring gentleman once endeavoured to introduce a ſubſcription; but it was effectually "over-ruled by Mr. Some of Harborough, Mr. Norris of Welford, and Mr. Jennings, "my tutor. I ſhall content myſelf here, with being a benevolent well-wiſher to the "intereſts of liberty and peace (o)."

(o) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 40.

In 1726-7, Mr. Doddridge was recommended by his friend Mr. Clark to a vacant congregation at Hertford; the conſequence of which was, that two perſons were ſent to Kibworth, to hear him. The reſult of this matter, which ſtrongly diſplays the ridiculouſly narrow ſpirit of ſome of the Diſſenters of that period, is thus humourouſly related by Mr. Clark in one of his letters. "Not having any other opportunity, I thought it "neceſſary to ſend you without delay by the poſt, to complain of your keeping in your "place of worſhip ſuch ſtumbling-blocks and ſuperſtitious cuſtoms, as are very offenſive "to your Chriſtian brethren. It is no wonder you are thought a legal preacher, when "you have the ten commandments painted upon the walls of your chapel. Beſides, "you have a clerk, it ſeems, ſo impertinent as to ſay, Amen, with an audible voice. "O tempora! O mores! that ſuch a rag of popery ſhould ever be tolerated in a con-"gregation of Proteſtant Diſſenters; and, to complete all, you, the miniſter, conclude "your prayers with a form called the Lord's Prayer. Do you know what miſchief you "have done? What a blot you have brought upon yourſelf by ſuch offenſive practices? "It may be, you are ſurpriſed at what this means. In a few words then, Mr. Chandler "of Bedford, being on his return home at Mr. Eccles's, defired him upon my motion "to write to Hertford, to recommend you to them in his name, as a very fit man to "be their miniſter. Upon this, two members of that congregation went over the other "day to hear you preach. But no ſooner did they come into the place, but they found "themſelves diſappointed; and what they heard at the cloſe, confirmed them ſo much "in their prejudices, that they thought it needleſs to ſay any thing of their intention to "you. Going to preach laſt Sunday at Ware, I heard all this there, and afterwards at "Hertford. I cannot but pity them for their weakneſs; and do not know but it is "happy for you not to encounter ſuch odd humours (p)." It was indeed happy for Mr. Doddridge, that he had not to encounter with people of ſuch a rigid and capricious diſpoſition. However, it ought to be remembered, that ſome of the Diſſenters at Hertford had ſenſe enough to be angry that two perſons ſhould take upon them to judge for the whole ſociety.

(p) Letters to and from the Rev. Dr. Doddridge, p. 14, 15.

Mr. Doddridge, in the year 1728, received a preſſing invitation from one of the diſſenting congregations at Nottingham, and, a few months after, from the other. There were many circumſtances that tended to recommend both the invitations. The ſocieties were large and reſpectable, the ſalary conſiderable, the town populous and flouriſhing, its ſituation delightful, the converſation agreeable, and the proſpect of uſefulneſs very extenſive. Nevertheleſs, after mature deliberation, Mr. Doddridge determined to adhere to the plan of continuing to purſue his ſchemes of improvement in a more private reſidence. In this determination he did not act without conſulting his wiſeſt friends, and ſeeking for divine direction. In 1729, he was choſen aſſiſtant to Mr. Some at Harborough; the congregation at that place being deſirous to enjoy his labours more frequently than before: the reſult of which choice was, that he preached there and at Kibworth alternately. At this time of his life, though he was but little more than twenty-ſeven years of age, the fame of his abilities and worth was ſo much ſpread abroad, that his ſettlement among them was ſought for by various large ſocieties beſides thoſe already mentioned. But his regard to Mr. Some, his love for the people at Kibworth, and his ſolicitude to have greater leiſure for ſtudy than he could enjoy in a populous town and extenſive connections, ſtill retained their influence in leading him to decline the different propoſals that were made to him for a removal (p).

(p) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 39—41.

When Mr. Doddridge left the academy, Mr. Jennings, a few weeks before his death, which happened in the prime of his days, on the eighth of July, 1723, earneſtly preſſed his pupil to keep in view the improvement of the courſe he had gone through of academical lectures, and to ſtudy that courſe in ſuch a manner as to refer what occurred to him, to the compendiums his tutor had drawn up, that they might be illuſtrated and enriched. Our young divine did not then ſuſpect what was the motive of Mr. Jennings in giving him this advice. But he afterwards was informed, that his tutor had declared it to be his opinion, that, if it ſhould pleaſe God to remove him early in life, Mr. Doddridge was the moſt likely of any of his pupils to purſue the ſchemes which he had formed; and which, indeed, were very far from being complete, as he died about eight years after he had undertaken the conduct of a theological academy. Agreeably to Mr. Jennings's advice, Mr. Doddridge, during his ſettlement at Kibworth, reviewed his courſe of lectures with care. About this time an ingenious young gentleman, Mr. Thomas Benyon, ſon of Dr. Samuel Benyon, a celebrated miniſter and tutor at Shrewſbury, who died in 1708, had entertained thoughts of reviving the ſcheme of his father. Converſing one day with Mr. Doddridge, the diſcourſe turned upon the beſt method of conducting the preparatory ſtudies of youth intended for the miniſtry. In concluſion, Mr. Benyon earneſtly requeſted of his friend, that he would write down his ſentiments upon the ſubject. Mr. Doddridge conſented, and drew up his thoughts in the form of a letter, which grew into a conſiderable volume. But when he had juſt finiſhed the work, Mr. Benyon, for whoſe uſe it was deſigned, died, and the treatiſe remained in the writer's own hands. Mr. Saunders of Kettering, happening to ſee it in his ſtudy, deſired to have the peruſal of it; after which he ſhewed it to Dr. Watts, with whom Mr. Doddridge had then no perſonal acquaintance. The doctor, who was much pleaſed with the plan, made ſome remarks upon it, and communicated it to ſeveral of his friends, who all concurred in opinion, that the perſon who had drawn it up was beſt qualified to carry it into execution. Accordingly, application was made to him for that purpoſe; and Mr. Some was the gentleman principally employed in managing the affair. He knew that Mr. Doddridge had every important and deſirable qualification for the inſtruction of youth; and therefore he not only propoſed his undertaking it, but preſſed the matter upon him in the ſtrongeſt terms. Nor would he by any means allow the validity of his plea of incapacity, but urged that, ſuppoſing him leſs capable than his friends believed, he might improve his time in his retirement, when engaged in ſuch a work with a few pupils, to greater advantage than without them. This was a very proper conſideration; for every man who has ſuſtained the character of a preceptor, if he has diſcharged his duty with a ſuitable degree of attention and fidelity, muſt be ſenſible that the employment has highly contributed to the accuracy and increaſe of his own knowledge. Mr. Some had likewiſe, unknown to Mr. Doddridge, obtained from the relations of ſome young men, the promiſe of putting them under his care, by which another objection that might have ariſen was precluded; and Mr. Saunders offered his brother to be the firſt pupil of the intended academy. It was with great humility and diffidence that Mr. Doddridge hearkened to theſe ſolicitations. He was deeply convinced of the importance and difficulty of the undertaking, and devoutly implored the direction and aſſiſtance of the Supreme Being. Whilſt he was ſtill in doubt with regard to his final determination, he eſteemed it a kind providence that the diſſenting miniſters in the neighbourhood had agreed to meet at Lutterworth, on the tenth of April, 1729, to ſpend a day in humiliation and prayer for the revival of religion. To this aſſembly Mr. Some propoſed the ſcheme that had been concerted for the eſtabliſhment of an academy at Harborough, under the care of his young friend; and it met with the entire approbation of the gentlemen preſent. They unanimouſly concurred in their ſentiments of the propriety and uſefulneſs of the deſign, and Mr. Doddridge's qualifications for conducting it; and they promiſed him all the aſſiſtance and encouragement that were in their power. This had great weight in forming his reſolution. Nevertheleſs, before the matter was abſolutely determined, he thought proper to conſult ſome of his brethren and friends at a diſtance, and eſpecially Mr. Clark, who at firſt heſitated on the ſubject, and, on account of Mr. Doddridge's admirable talents for the pulpit, ſeemed rather to wiſh that he might have a ſettlement in London. However, he ſoon approved of the ſcheme, as did the reſt of the perſons whoſe advice had been ſolicited. Mr. Doddridge conſented, therefore, to the execution of a plan which, on every ſide, was ſo zealouſly and earneſtly recommended. What much encouraged him to enter upon the office of an academical tutor, was the circumſtance of his retreat at Harborough; the paſtoral care of the congregation there, and at Kibworth, being fulfilled by Mr. Some; ſo that he had had little to do as a miniſter, excepting to make one ſermon a week, which, conſidering the vigour and celerity of his mind, was an eaſy taſk.

Mr. Doddridge having, at length, reſolved to comply with the wiſhes of his friends, he immediately reviewed his plan of Academical Studies, with Dr. Watts's remarks, and correſponded with that eminent divine on the ſubject. He read, likewiſe, every valuable book which he could meet with on the education of youth, and made ſuch extracts as he thought might be conducive to the execution of his deſign. Beſides this, he wrote many letters to the miniſters of different denominations, with whom he was acquainted, requeſting their advice in his great undertaking. One Gentleman whom he particularly conſulted was the Rev. Dr. Samuel Wright, of London, who favoured him with his ſentiments at large, eſpecially on the head of divinity lectures. Mr. Clark communicated to him various tranſcripts from the lectures of Mr. Jones, who had been a tutor of diſtinguiſhed ability and learning at Tewkſbury in Gloceſterſhire. With all theſe preparations, Mr. Doddridge thought it his wiſdom to make a trial firſt in a private way, with only two or three ſtudents, declining to receive others that offered. At Midſummer, 1729, he opened his academy. The ſubject of his firſt lecture to his pupils was of a religious kind, ſhewing the nature, reaſonableneſs, and advantages, of their acknowledging God in their ſtudies. In the ſecond, he gave directions for their behaviour to him, to each other, to the family, and all around them; with proper motives to excite their attention to a right conduct in theſe reſpects. After this he proceeded to his ordinary courſe (q). Thus was he led to a ſituation of life which formed the moſt diſtinguiſhed ſcene of his uſefulneſs. The late Rev. Hugh Farmer, ſo well known among the Diſſenters as a moſt excellent preacher, and by the literary world in general for his extenſive learning and valuable publications, was one of Mr. Doddridge's earlieſt ſtudents.

Our young tutor had been employed in his preceptorial capacity but a few months, when he was directed by Providence to a ſituation of greater uſefulneſs as a Chriſtian miniſter. There being a vacancy in the diſſenting congregation at Caſtle-Hill, in Northampton, in conſequence of the removal of Mr. Tingey to London, Mr. Doddridge preached occaſionally to them, as did others of his brethren. In doing this, his ſervices were ſo acceptable to the people, that he was invited and ſtrongly urged by them to become their Paſtor. Some of his friends, and particularly Mr. Some, adviſed his continuance at Harborough. The arguments alledged by them were, that he would have more time to apply to his work as a tutor, than if he had the ſole care of a large ſociety; and that there was another miniſter, who, it was thought, might well ſupply the vacancy, though, perhaps, not in every reſpect equally to the ſatisfaction of the congregation. Theſe conſiderations had ſuch weight with him, that he determined to continue in his preſent ſtation. In purſuance of this view of the caſe, Mr. Some went to Northampton, to perſuade the people to wave their application. But when he came there, and ſaw their zeal and affection in the affair, and heard the motives by which they acted, and the circumſtances in which they ſtood, he was, as he expreſſed it, like Saul among the prophets, and immediately wrote to Mr. Doddridge to preſs his acceptance of the invitation. The ſame thing was ſtrongly urged by his friend Mr. Clark. Still, however, he was averſe, on many accounts, to a change in his ſituation. But, being deſirous of teſtifying his gratitude and regard to the congregation, he made them a viſit, on purpoſe to explain in perſon his reaſons for declining their propoſal. Whilſt he was on this viſit, ſeveral events occurred, which ſtrongly tended to prevail upon him to alter his reſolution. One or two of them, perhaps, may be deemed, by ſome of thoſe who may read Mr. Orton's account of them, to have a tincture of enthuſiaſtic weakneſs; but there was an argument preſented to him, which muſt be allowed to have had very great weight. Before he returned to Harborough, the young perſons of the ſociety came to him in a body; earneſtly entreated his ſettlement among them; and promiſed to ſubmit to all ſuch methods of inſtruction as he ſhould think proper. This laſt circumſtance was the conſideration that turned the ſcales for his going to Northampton, after they had long hovered in uncertainty.

On the twenty-fourth of December, 1729, Mr. Doddridge removed, with his academy, from Harborough to Northampton, and in the ſpace of two or three weeks commenced houſe-keeping. This important change in his ſituation was not ſuffered to paſs without his entering into a ſevere examination of his own mind, and forming the moſt pious and ſacred reſolutions with reſpect to his conduct, both as a maſter of a family and a miniſter of the goſpel. That he might be the better prepared for the large paſtoral work now devolved upon him, he employed part of the time between his ſettlement and his ordination in reading the beſt treatiſes on the qualifications and duties of the miniſterial office. The books particularly ſtudied by him were Chryſoſtom on the Prieſthood, Bowles's Paſtor Evangelicus, Burnet on the Paſtoral Care, and Baxter's Gildas Salvianus. He read, likewiſe, the lives of ſome pious and active miniſters, among which that of the Rev. Mr. Philip Henry afforded him much inſtruction and encouragement.

couragement. Beſides this, he ſelected, from the works which he peruſed, the moſt important advices, reflections, and motives; and made a collection of thoſe maxims of prudence and diſcretion, an attention to which he thought would be calculated to ſecure eſteem and uſefulneſs.

About two months after Mr. Doddridge's ſettlement at Northampton, he was ſeized with a dangerous illneſs, which gave many painful fears to his friends, leſt a life of ſuch diſtinguiſhed excellence, and ſuch promiſing utility, ſhould be ſpeedily cut off. But, through a merciful Providence, he recovered from the diſorder, and, in due time, his health was completely reſtored. While he was yet in a very weak ſtate, the day arrived, which had been fixed upon for his ordination; and it was a day to him of great ſolemnity and importance, and which exerciſed his moſt devout meditations. This event took place on the nineteenth of March, 1729-30. It is but an act of juſtice to record the names of the worthy miniſters who were engaged in ſetting apart for the paſtoral office ſo eminent an inſtrument of ſervice to the church and the world. Mr. Goodrich of Oundle began with prayer and reading the Scriptures. Mr. Dawſon of Hinckley prayed before ſermon. Then Mr. Watſon of Leiceſter preached a diſcourſe from 1 Timothy iii. 1. "This is a true ſaying, if a man deſire the office of a biſhop, he "deſireth a good work." After this, the call of the church was read by Mr. Norris of Welford; and when Mr. Doddridge had declared his acceptance of it, he delivered his confeſſion of faith, which was followed by what is uſually called the ordination prayer. The charge to Mr. Doddridge was given by Mr. Clark of St. Alban's, and the exhortation to the people by Mr. Saunders of Kettering; and the whole ſolemnity was concluded with a prayer by Mr. Mattock of Daventry (r). It is rather ſurpriſing that we do not meet with the name of Mr. Some on this occaſion. Some particular incident, now not known, perhaps a ſudden illneſs, might have deprived Mr. Doddridge of the aſſiſtance of ſo valuable and intimate a friend. That the cauſe ſhould not have been mentioned by Mr. Orton in his Memoirs, or by Mr. Doddridge in his Diary, is an omiſſion that could ſcarcely have been expected.

(r) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 47—55.

It would carry us beyond the limits that muſt be aſſigned to the preſent narrative, to deſcribe, at large, the diligence, zeal, and fervour, with which Mr. Doddridge diſcharged his paſtoral duty. This matter is fully inſiſted upon by Mr. Orton, to whom we muſt refer for a more minute detail of particulars. However, we ſhall inſiſt upon a few leading circumſtances. Mr. Doddridge's firſt care was to know the ſtate of his flock; for which purpoſe he made diligent enquiry into the members and ſtated hearers of which it conſiſted, and entered in a book their names, families, places of abode, connections, and characters. By this he was better enabled to adapt his viſits and advices to their reſpective ſituations, and their religious improvement. With regard to the compoſition of ſermons, his work as a tutor, and the paſtoral inſpection of a very numerous congregation, rendered it next to impoſſible that his diſcourſes for the pulpit ſhould be ſo exact and accurate as they were in the former part of his miniſtry. "Nor was it," ſays Mr. Orton, "needful. Having habituated himſelf, for ſeveral years, to correct "compoſitions, having laid up ſuch a fund of knowledge, eſpecially of the Scriptures, "which was daily increaſing by his ſtudies and lectures, he ſometimes only wrote down "the heads and leading thoughts of his ſermons, and the principal texts of Scripture "he deſigned to introduce. But he was ſo thoroughly maſter of his ſubject, and had "ſuch a ready utterance and ſo warm a heart, that perhaps few miniſters can compoſe "better diſcourſes than he delivered from theſe ſhort hints (s)." This encomium is, I think, to be admitted with ſome ſlight degree of abatement. The ſermons of Dr. Doddridge were different, as he was differently circumſtanced. When he had leiſure to draw out his plan, and the hints of what he propoſed to ſay, to a conſiderable extent, his diſcourſes were often excellent in a high degree. But, at other times, when he could but juſt lay down his ſcheme, with only a very few thoughts under it, his ſermons, eſpecially if he was not in a full flow of ſpirits, were leſs valuable. Once, during my reſidence with him, a number of pupils complained, through the medium of Mr. Orton, that, though their revered tutor's academical lectures were admirable, they had not in him a ſufficiently correct model of pulpit compoſition. The conſequence of the intimation was, that his ſermons became far ſuperior to what they had ſometimes formerly been; for he was the moſt candid of all men to the voice of gentle admonition. When, however, he took the leaſt pains, he was always perſpicuous in his method, and natural and orderly in the arrangement of his ſentiments; and hence he furniſhed an example, from which many of the young men educated under him derived no ſmall benefit in their future labours. I remember a remarkable inſtance of his power in extemporaneous ſpeaking. Akenſide the poet, who in early life was ſettled, for a ſhort time, at Northampton, being viſited by ſome relations from Newcaſtle upon Tyne who were diſſenters, came with them, unexpectedly, one Sunday morning, to Dr. Doddridge's meeting. The ſubject he preached upon was a common orthodox topic, for which he had ſcarcely made any preparation. But he rouſed his faculties on the occaſion, and ſpoke with ſuch energy, variety, and eloquence, as excited my warmeſt admiration, and muſt have impreſſed Dr. Akenſide with a high opinion of his abilities. The ingenious poet and the learned divine were in the habits of conſiderable intimacy while the former reſided at Northampton. A matter of controverſy between them was, how far the ancient heathen philoſophers were acquainted with, and had inculcated, the doctrine of immortality. Akenſide contended for the honour of the philoſophers, and Doddridge for that of the Chriſtian revelation. The ſubject was purſued, in expreſs conferences, for two or three evenings; and both the gentlemen exerted their talents, and collected their literature on the different ſides of the queſtion. Dr. Doddridge, who loved to inform his pupils of whatever he met with which he thought would contribute to their inſtruction and pleaſure, related to us, on the ſucceeding mornings, the arguments that had been produced, and the reſult of the debate.

Without entering into a particular detail of many things which might be ſaid of Dr. Doddridge as a preacher, I cannot help taking notice that he was always warm and affectionate in the applications of his ſermons. His ſentiments on this head he has thus expreſſed: "It is indeed unworthy the character of a man and a Chriſtian, to endeavour "to tranſport men's paſſions, while the underſtanding is left uninformed, and the rea- "ſon unconvinced. But, ſo far as is conſiſtent with a proper regard to this leading power "of our nature, I would ſpeak and write of divine truths with a holy fervency. Nor "can I imagine that it would bode well to the intereſt of religion to endeavour to lay "all theſe paſſions aſleep, which ſurely GOD implanted in our hearts to ſerve the re- "ligious as well as the civil life, and which, after all, will probably be employed to "ſome very excellent or very pernicious purpoſes (t)." This is the language of wiſdom. True eloquence conſiſts in an union of the rational, the forcible, and the pathetic; and to addreſs to the affections, as well as to the reaſon, of mankind, is the dictate of the ſoundeſt philoſophy. The cold and feeble concluſions of many diſcourſes from the pulpit, are as diſguſting to a juſt taſte, as they are unprofitable with regard to religious improvement.

(t) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 61.

It muſt not be omitted, that Mr. Doddridge thought it a part of miniſterial prudence to take public notice of remarkable providential occurrences. He endeavoured, in his ſermons, to deduce leſſons of wiſdom and piety from important tranſactions, affecting the nation, town, or any conſiderable number of his hearers. Nor did he neglect uncommon appearances of nature, or other events, that were the ſubjects of general converſation; to which may be added, the ſeaſons of the year, and eſpecially the mercies of harveſt. From an attention to theſe different circumſtances, his diſcourſes were accompanied with a greater extent of variety and uſefulneſs. He was a friend to funeral ſermons, which, if they be not too frequently exerciſed, or converted to the purpoſes of adulation, conſtitute an inſtructive and an affecting part of compoſitions for the pulpit. In his manner of ſpeaking he had an earneſtneſs and pathos which tended greatly to affect his hearers. By ſome perſons his pronunciation and action were judged to be too ſtrong and vehement; but to thoſe who were acquainted with the vivacity of his temper, and his uſual mode of converſation, it appeared quite natural and unaffected.

With reſpect to his conduct, as a miniſter, out of the pulpit, it muſt ſuffice briefly to obſerve, that he was very exact in the exerciſe of Chriſtian diſcipline, and in ſeparating thoſe from the church who were a reproach to their religious profeſſion; that he had a deep concern and affectionate regard for the riſing generation; and that, in the midſt of his numerous duties and engagements, it was matter of ſurpriſe that he could ſpare ſo much time as he did for paſtoral viſits. It was a grief to him to find, that the children of ſome of his hearers, through the ignorance and poverty of their parents, had never been taught to read; and therefore he perſuaded his people, in 1738, to concur with him in eſtabliſhing a charity ſchool. In this benevolent deſign he met with ſo much encouragement, that a foundation was laid for inſtructing and cloathing twenty boys, who were put under the care of a pious and ſkilful maſter. The doctor himſelf often viſited the ſchool, and examined and exhorted the children; accompanying his exhortations with affectionate prayers for their improvement and welfare. With ſuch diſtinguiſhed abilities of the mind, and with ſuch excellent virtues of the heart, it will not be deemed ſurpriſing that he poſſeſſed, in a very high degree, the eſteem and love of his congregation. In his laſt will he bore this teſtimony to their character, "That "he had ſpent the moſt delightful hours of his life in aſſiſting the devotions of as ſerious, "as grateful, and as deſerving a people, as perhaps any miniſter ever had the happi- "neſs to ſerve (u)." This character was no doubt generally, and indeed almoſt univerſally, true. Nevertheleſs, he was not without his calls for the exerciſe of patience. There were perſons belonging to his ſociety who were narrow bigots, and weak enthuſiaſts; and theſe ſometimes obtruded upon him in a fooliſh and troubleſome manner. He behaved, however, to them with a condeſcenſion and tenderneſs which they ſcarcely deſerved, and of which few miniſters of the Goſpel would be able to ſet an equally ſtriking example.

(u) Ibid. p. 62—73.

In 1730, Mr. Doddridge entered into the matrimonial relation with Mrs. Mercy Maris, a native of Worceſter, and a lady in whom he found every qualification that could render marriage deſirable. She was, indeed, a religious, prudent, and affectionate companion. Her conſtitution was delicate, and her health at times precarious, which often gave her huſband no ſmall cauſe of alarm: but ſhe was happily continued to him through his whole life, and ſurvived him a great number of years (w). Of his affection and tenderneſs for her much might be ſaid, were it neceſſary to enlarge on the ſubject. A better proof of this cannot be afforded than by a copy of verſes which he once wrote to her from London, when abſent on a journey. They are as follows:

(w) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 129.

Tedious moments! ſpeed your flying,
Bring Cordelia to my arms;
Abſent, all in vain I'm trying
Not to languiſh for her charms.

Buſy crowds in vain ſurround me,
Brighteſt beauties ſhine in vain;
Other pleaſures but confound me,
Pleaſures but renew my pain.

What though three whole years are ended
Since the prieſt has join'd our hands,
Every rolling year has tended
Only to endear our bands.

Let the wanton wits deride it,
Huſband is a charming name;
None can ſay, but who has try'd it,
How enjoyment feeds the flame.

Wives our better angels are,
Angels in their lovelieſt dreſs,
Gentle ſoothers of our care,
Smiling guardians of our peace.

Happy ſtate of mortal treaſures,
Circling maze of noble love:
Where the ſenſe's higheſt pleaſures
But the meaneſt bleſſing prove.

Dear Cordelia! hither flying,
Fold thy huſband in thy arms;
While thus t' amuſe myſelf I'm trying,
More I languiſh for thy charms.

Mr. Doddridge, in younger life, afforded various proofs of a poetic turn, moſt of which are in the poſſeſſion of the preſent biographer. The excellent lines which he wrote on the motto to the arms of his family, "Dum vivimus vivamus," have appeared in ſeveral publications. Dr. Johnſon's opinion of theſe lines was, that they conſtituted one of the fineſt epigrams in the Engliſh language (x). Though they are ſo well known, they cannot be omitted in any memoirs of the author's life.

(x) Boſwell's Journal, p. 334.

"Live, while you live," the Epicure would ſay,
"And ſeize the pleaſures of the preſent day."
"Live, while you live," the ſacred Preacher cries,
"And give to God each moment as it flies."
Lord, in my views let both united be;
I live in pleaſure when I live to thee.

Mr. Doddridge had a talent at ſatirical epigrams; an inſtance of which is the following, written on one of his pupils, a weak young man, who thought that he had invented a method of flying to the moon.

And will Volatio leave this world ſo ſoon,
To fly to his own native ſeat, the moon?
'Twill ſtand, however, in ſome little ſtead
That he ſets out with ſuch an empty head.

When Mr. Doddridge removed to Northampton, his academy was only in its infancy; but it ſoon grew into great reputation, and the number of ſtudents increaſed every year. In 1734, he found it neceſſary to have a ſtated aſſiſtant, to whom he aſſigned part of the junior pupils, and the ſuperintendence of the whole of them when he happened to be abſent. He was ſolicitous to maintain the reputation and eſteem of the gentlemen who ſucceſſively ſuſtained this character, by his own behaviour towards them, and the reſpect which he required from the ſtudents to them; "and they "thought themſelves happy in his friendſhip, and the opportunities they had, by his "converſe, inſtructions, and example, to improve themſelves, while they were aſſiſting "in the education of others (y)." In theſe words, which are Mr. Orton's, he ſpoke from his own experience; and every one who acted in the ſame capacity might adopt ſimilar language. Such of them as I have been acquainted with, were very reſpectable for their knowledge; and in the choice of them a particular regard was paid to their ſkill in the Greek and Latin claſſics, as well as to their ability for inſtructing the young men in certain departments of mathematical and philoſophical ſcience. Among Dr. Doddridge's aſſiſtants, beſides Mr. Orton, may be named the late Rev. Dr. Aikin, and the Rev. Mr. James Robertſon, who has been for many years Profeſſor of Oriental Literature in the Univerſity of Edinburgh. Dr. Aikin was afterwards, firſt, claſſical, and then theological tutor at Warrington; and perhaps, as a lecturer, he was never exceeded. This is the teſtimony that has been uniformly given of him by all who had the advantage of being his pupils. What he was as a parental inſtructor, will be judged of from the excellent and elegant productions of his ſon and daughter, Dr. John Aikin and Mrs. Barbauld.

Since Dr. Doddridge's office as a tutor was the moſt important ſtation in which he appeared, it is an eſſential part of a life written of him, to relate, ſomewhat minutely, how he conducted himſelf in that capacity. He choſe to have as many pupils as poſſible in his own family, that they might be more immediately under his own eye and government; and latterly, he had a houſe large and commodious enough to contain all of them, two or three excepted. The orders of the ſeminary were ſuch as ſuited ſtudents of a certain age; being a due medium between the rigour of ſchool-diſcipline and an unlimited indulgence. It was an eſtabliſhed law, that every pupil ſhould riſe at ſix o'clock in the ſummer, and at ſeven in the winter. Each young man, in his turn, ſuſtained the weekly office of monitor, part of whoſe buſineſs was to call up the reſt every morning; and they were to appear in the public room, ſoon after the fixed hour. Thoſe who did not attend were ſubject to a pecuniary penalty; but if any repeatedly indulged to a habit of ſloth, they were obliged to prepare an additional academical exerciſe. The puniſhment of the monitor's neglect, which I never recollect to have happened, was a double fine. Their tutor ſet them an example of diligence by being almoſt univerſally preſent with them at theſe early riſings. After a prayer, which ſeldom laſted more than two or three minutes, the young gentlemen retired to their reſpective cloſets till the time of family-worſhip. That ſervice was begun by the Doctor with a ſhort petition for the divine preſence and bleſſing. Some of the ſtudents then read a chapter of the Old Teſtament from Hebrew into Engliſh, which he critically expounded, and practically improved. After this a pſalm was ſung, and he concluded with a longer prayer than at the beginning. On Sunday mornings ſomething entirely devotional and practical was ſubſtituted in the room of the uſual expoſition. In the evening the worſhip was conducted in the ſame method, with only this difference; that a chapter of the New Teſtament was read by the pupils from Greek into Engliſh, and the ſenior ſtudents prayed in rotation. The Doctor, when preſent, which was generally the caſe, expounded the New Teſtament in the ſame manner as he did the Old (z). It would give me pleaſure, if I could ſay, that ſome of the young men never ſlily placed an Engliſh Bible by the ſide of the Hebrew one. Such of the pupils as were boarded out of the houſe were obliged to attend and take their parts in the domeſtic devotions; and thoſe, whether in or out of the family, who were not preſent, were ſubject to a fine, or, if their abſence was frequent, to public reprehenſion. By the method which Dr. Doddridge purſued, the ſtudents had an opportunity of hearing him expound moſt of the Old Teſtament, and the whole of the New, more than once. The more diligent among them took hints of what was delivered. One piece of advice given them by the Doctor was, to get the Old Teſtament, and Wetſtein's Greek Teſtament, interleaved, in quarto, in order to write in them the moſt conſiderable remarks for the illuſtration of the Scriptures, which either occurred in their tutor's expoſitions, or were derived from their own reading, converſation, and reflections.

(z) Ibid. p. 75, 76.

Soon after breakfaſt, Dr. Doddridge proceeded to the diſcharge of his academical duty. The ſeveral claſſes were taken by him in their proper order, and he lectured to each of them about the ſpace of an hour. His aſſiſtant was at the ſame time engaged in a ſimilar manner. Rich's ſhort-hand was one of the firſt things which he expected his pupils to learn, that they might be able to tranſcribe his own lectures, and make extracts extracts from the books they read and conſulted, with greater eaſe and celerity. Indeed, this was a circumſtance from which they might derive great advantage in future life, as the experience of the preſent writer can teſtify. Care was taken, in the firſt year of the young men's courſe, that they ſhould retain and improve that knowledge of Greek and Latin which they had acquired at ſchool. With regard to the Hebrew language, they were either initiated into it, or, if they had learned it before, were carried on to greater improvement. Uſually the attention to claſſical literature was extended through the ſecond year of the courſe. Of late, the diſſenting academies have exerted a far ſuperior zeal with reſpect to this very important object. Whilſt I was one of the tutors at Hoxton, claſſical inſtruction was continued at leaſt for three years; and at the new college, Hackney, it makes a part of the whole courſe. Beſides what was done in a morning, the Greek and Latin lectures, at Dr. Doddridge's, were read every evening, uſually by the aſſiſtant, though ſometimes by himſelf. If any of the pupils were deficient in the knowledge of the Greek, ſuch of the ſeniors as were beſt ſkilled in that language were appointed to be their inſtructors, at ſeparate hours. Thoſe who choſe it were taught the French tongue. The longer Dr. Doddridge lived, the more was he convinced of the great importance of a learned, as well as a pious education, for the Chriſtian miniſtry. Having found that ſome who came under his care were not competently acquainted with the claſſics, he formed a ſcheme for aſſiſting youths, of a promiſing genius and a ſerious temper, in their preparations for academical ſtudies; and he met with good encouragement in the ſcheme from the contributions of many of his friends. As it commenced only two years before his death, much progreſs could not be made in it; but a ſimilar plan has ſince been adopted by Mr. Coward's truſtees, with ſingular utility. Dr. Doddridge was not, in every inſtance, ſo attentive to the claſſical preparation of the ſtudents received into his ſeminary, as could have been wiſhed. Sometimes he admitted ſerious young men, of perhaps three or four and twenty years of age, who had had very little of that preparation, and who never diſtinguiſhed themſelves, in this reſpect, by their ſubſequent improvement. He thought, however, that they might be uſeful in plain country congregations; which was undoubtedly the caſe. Several of them, though not abounding in learning, ſuſtained the miniſterial character with a decent reputation. The doctor, I believe, towards the cloſe of his life, was of opinion that he had gone far enough in this matter.

Other things which were read to the ſtudents, during the firſt year of their courſe, were ſyſtems of logic, rhetoric, geography, and metaphyſics. The logic was Dr. Watts's, which was very fully purſued. On rhetoric the lectures were ſlender and imperfect, being only a ſlight enlargement of a ſmall compendium that had been drawn up by Mr. Jennings. Geography was better taught; but of metaphyſics there was only given at this time a brief epitome, as the great objects it preſents were afterwards more amply conſidered. Under theſe ſeveral heads the pupils were referred to particular paſſages in ſuch authors as treated upon them. This part of the courſe was accompanied with lectures on the principles of geometry and algebra, which, beſides their intrinſic excellence, were happily calculated to form in the young men a fixedneſs of attention, and a habit of rightly diſcriminating, and properly arranging their conceptions. When theſe branches of ſcience were finiſhed, the ſtudents were introduced to the knowledge of trigonometry, conic-ſections, and celeſtial mechanics; under which laſt term was included a collection of important propoſitions, taken chiefly from Sir Iſaac Newton, and relating eſpecially, though not ſolely, to centripetal and centrifugal forces. A ſyſtem of natural and experimental philoſophy, comprehending mechanics, ſtatics, hydroſtatics, optics, pneumatics, and aſtronomy, was likewiſe read, with references to the beſt authors on theſe ſubjects. Muſchenbroek was made uſe of in my time as a text book, and afterwards Rowning. For the particular objects to which they relate, recourſe was had to Clare on Fluids, and Keill's Aſtronomy. The ſyſtem of natural philoſophy was illuſtrated by a neat and pretty large apparatus. As the pupils proceeded in their courſe, ſome other articles were alſo touched upon. Mr. Orton mentions particularly natural and civil hiſtory; but theſe two objects do not fall under my recollection. At moſt, they were ſcarcely enough conſidered to deſerve a diſtinct ſpecification. Such a view was given of the anatomy of the human body as was entitled to applauſe, and well calculated to inſpire the young men with the ſentiments of veneration and love for the Supreme Artificer. In the latter years of their courſe, a large ſyſtem, drawn by Dr. Doddridge himſelf, was read of Jewiſh antiquities, with references to the principal writers on the ſubject; in order to illuſtrate numberleſs paſſages of Scripture, which could not otherwiſe be ſo well underſtood. In eccleſiaſtical hiſtory the Doctor lectured from Lampe's Epitome. On the various ſects and doctrines of the ancient philoſophers he occaſionally gave ſome inſtruction from Buddæus's Compendium; but this matter was never purſued to any conſiderable extent.

All theſe branches of ſtudy, though of no ſmall conſequence, were, however, ſubordinate to what was the grand object of the attention of the young men, during three years of their courſe; which was Dr. Doddridge's Syſtem of Divinity, in the largeſt

ſenſe of the word; including what is moſt material in pneumatology and ethics. In this work were contained, in as few words as perſpicuity would admit, the principal things which had occured to the author's obſervation, relating to the conſtitution and properties of the human mind, the proofs of the exiſtence and attributes of God, the nature of moral virtue, the various parts of it, the means ſubſervient to it, and the ſanctions by which its precepts, conſidered as the natural law of the Supreme Being, are enforced. Under this head the arguments for a future life, deducible from the light of reaſon, were particularly examined. A ſurvey was added of what is, and generally has been, the ſtate of virtue in the world; whence a tranſition was eaſy to the neceſſity of a revelation, the encouragement to hope for it, and the kind of evidence with which it might probably be attended. Hence the work proceeded to the actual evidence that may be produced in favour of that revelation which is contained in the Scriptures. The genuineneſs, credibility, and inſpiration of the ſacred books were then treated upon at large, and vindicated from the moſt material objections that have been urged againſt them by ſceptical writers. This part of Dr. Doddridge's lectures was, perhaps of all others, the moſt important and uſeful. Having laid a firm foundation in ſo ample a ſtatement of the evidences of Chriſtianity, he entered into a copious detail of what were, or, at leaſt, what appeared to him to be, the doctrines of Scripture. In ſo doing, though he ſtated and maintained his own opinions, which in a conſiderable degree were Calviniſtical, he never aſſumed the character of a dogmatiſt. He repreſented the arguments, and referred to the authorities on both ſides. The ſtudents were left to judge for themſelves; and they did judge for themſelves, with his perfect concurrence and approbation; though, no doubt, it was natural for him to be pleaſed when their ſentiments coincided with his own. Where this was not the caſe, it made no alteration in his affection and kind treatment, as the writer of the preſent narrative can gratefully witneſs. What ſeemed moſt evident to Dr. Doddridge on the ſubjects conſidered by him was digeſted into the form of propoſitions, ſome of which were problematical; and the chief controverſies relative to each head were thrown into ſcholia. For the illuſtration of all of them, a large collection was made of references, in which the ſentiments and reaſonings of the principal authors on the points in queſtion might be ſeen in their own words. It was the buſineſs of the pupils to read and abridge theſe references in the intervals between the lectures. Dr. Doddridge's Syſtem of Divinity was his capital work, as a tutor. Much labour was ſpent by him upon it; and he was continually enriching it with his remarks on any new productions upon the various ſubjects to which it extended. It was tranſcribed by the generality of the ſtudents; and it may be truly obſerved concerning it, that it was well calculated to lead them gradually on, from the firſt principles, to the moſt important and difficult parts of theological knowledge.

Beſides Dr. Doddridge's expoſitions in the family, critical lectures on the New Teſtament were delivered once a week, which the young men were permitted and encouraged to tranſcribe. In theſe were contained his obſervations on the language, meaning, and deſign of the Sacred Writings, and the interpretations and criticiſms of the moſt eminent commentators. Many of theſe obſervations occur in his Family Expoſitor. As a ſet of lectures, they never attained to a very full and perfect form.

Polite literature, if not copiouſly inſiſted upon, was not, however, by any means neglected. No inconſiderable advantage was derived from the Doctor's being himſelf a man of taſte, and a maſter of elegant compoſition. Without much direct inſtruction, the remarks which he occaſionally and frequently made on the beſt writers, ancient and modern, were of great utility. The ſtudents, too, eſpecially thoſe of a claſſical turn, cheriſhed in each other, by their diſcuſſions and debates, the principles of diſcernment with regard to the beauties of authors, whether in proſe or verſe.

In the laſt year of Dr. Doddridge's courſe a ſet of lectures was given on preaching and the paſtoral care. Theſe contained directions concerning the method to be taken by the pupils to fit them for appearing with credit in the pulpit; the character of the chief practical divines and commentators; particular rules for the compoſition, ſtile, arrangement, and delivery of ſermons; and inſtructions relating to public prayer, expoſitions, catechiſing, the adminiſtration of the ſacraments, and viſiting. To theſe were added many general maxims for their converſation and conduct as miniſters, and a variety of prudential hints for their behaviour in the particular circumſtances and connections in which they might be placed. A regard to truth obliges me to obſerve, that, in theſe lectures, the Doctor carried his ideas of condeſcenſion to the weakneſs, and accommodation to the prejudices, of mankind, farther than ſome perſons will entirely approve. But in ſo doing he acted, I doubt not, with the moſt upright views, and from a ſincere deſire to be uſeful. His ſentiments on this head had been early ſtated by him in his "Free Thoughts on the moſt probable Means of reviving the Diſſenting "Intereſt."

"While the ſtudents," ſays Mr. Orton, "were purſuing theſe important ſtudies, "ſome lectures were given them on civil law, the hieroglyphics and mythology of the " ancients, the Engliſh hiſtory, particularly the hiſtory of nonconformity, and the " principles on which a ſeparation from the Church of England is founded." Such lectures might, I doubt not, be occaſionally read; but they made no ſtated and regular part of the academical courſe. None of them, excepting thoſe on nonconformity, were delivered during my reſidence at Northampton. I ſpeak with the greater confidence on the ſubject, as I was never abſent from a ſingle lecture till the laſt month of my courſe, when I was prevented from attending on two or three Mondays, in conſequence of having been engaged at a diſtance as an occaſional preacher. The health which enabled me, and the diligence that led me, to maintain this conſtant attendance, I have reaſon to reflect upon with thankfulneſs and pleaſure.

One day in every week was ſet apart for public exerciſes; at which times the tranſlations and orations of the junior pupils were read and examined. Such of the young men as had entered on the ſtudy of pneumatology and ethics, produced in their turns theſes on the ſeveral ſubjects aſſigned them, which were mutually oppoſed and defended [D]. The ſenior ſtudents brought analyſes of Scripture, the ſchemes of ſermons, and afterwards the ſermons themſelves, which they ſubmitted to the Doctor's examination and correction; and in this part of his work he was very exact, careful, and friendly; for he eſteemed his remarks on their diſcourſes more uſeful to the young preachers than any general rules of compoſition which could be offered them by thoſe who were themſelves moſt eminent in the profeſſion.

It was Dr. Doddridge's care, that his pupils, through the whole ſeries of their ſtudies, might have ſuch a variety of lectures weekly, as, without diſtracting them, would entertain and engage their minds. While they were attending and ſtudying objects of the greateſt importance, ſome of ſmaller moment, though beneficial in themſelves, were ſet before them at proper intervals. It was contrived, that they ſhould have as much to read, between each lecture, as might keep them well employed; due time being allowed for neceſſary relaxations, and the reading of practical writers. The habitual peruſal of ſuch writers was recommended by their tutor with peculiar energy, and ſingular propriety; for few things can more effectually contribute to improve the underſtanding and mend the heart, and to fit a young man for miniſterial duty and uſefulneſs, than a large acquaintance with that moſt valuable part of literature, the great body of Engliſh ſermons, and of compoſitions which have a ſimilar nature and tendency. Dr. Doddridge often examined what books the ſtudents read, beſides thoſe to which they were referred in their lectures, and directed them to ſuch as were beſt ſuited to their age, character, and intended profeſſion. In this reſpect they were very advantageouſly ſituated, as they enjoyed the uſe of a valuable library, conſiſting of ſeveral thouſand volumes. To this library, under ſome prudent regulations, they had acceſs at all times. As their tutor was ſenſible that a numerous collection of books might be a ſnare, rather than a benefit, to the ſtudents, unleſs they had an experienced friend to direct them in the choice of them, and in the proper period for their being peruſed, he was particularly ſolicitous that they might have ſuitable advice on the ſubject. With this view, he ſometimes gave to his pupils lectures on the books in the library; going over the ſeveral ſhelves in order, and informing them of the character of each work, and its author, ſo far as he was known. His obſervations were not only inſtructive but pleaſant; being often intermixed with anecdotes of the writers who were mentioned. It may truly be ſaid of the lectures on the library, that they diſplayed the ſurpriſing extent of the Doctor's reading and knowledge, and that they were uſeful in a variety of reſpects. My mind ſtill retains, with advantage and pleaſure, the impreſſion of many of his remarks.

Dr. Doddridge's manner of lecturing was well adapted to engage the attention and love of his pupils, and to promote their diligent ſtudy of the ſubjects upon which he treated. He expected from them, when they aſſembled in their reſpective claſſes, an account of the reaſonings, demonſtrations, ſcriptures, or facts, conſidered in the former lectures and references; and he allowed and encouraged them to propoſe any objections, which might ariſe in their own minds, or had occurred in the authors they peruſed. If, at any time, their objections were petulant or impertinent, he patiently heard and mildly anſwered them; for he put on no magiſterial airs, but always addreſſed them with the freedom and tenderneſs of a father. He frequently and warmly urged them not to take their ſyſtem of divinity from any man or body of men, but from the Bible. It was the Bible that he always referred and appealed to, upon every point in queſtion, to which it could be ſuppoſed to give any light. The appearances of bigotry and uncharitableneſs were reſolutely checked by him; and he endeavoured to cure thoſe who diſcovered any ſymptoms of this kind, by ſhewing them what might be ſaid in ſupport of the principles they diſliked, and diſplaying the great learning and excellent characters of many by whom they were eſpouſed.

It was Dr. Doddridge's great aim to give his pupils juſt and ſublime views of the Chriſtian miniſtry, and to lead them to direct all their ſtudies ſo as to increaſe their abilities and qualifications for that important office. As he was deſirous that they ſhould be very ſerious preachers, he was particularly anxious that they might have a deep ſenſe of divine things upon their own minds, and be well acquainted with the workings of the human heart with regard to eternal concerns; and he recommended to them, in the choice of the ſubjects upon which they preached, and in the manner of treating them, to have an eſpecial view to the edification of the bulk of the people. Nor did he think this inconſiſtent with a due attention to the elegance of compoſition. That the ſtudents might be qualified to appear with eſteem and honour in the world, and preſide over politer ſocieties with acceptance, he endeavoured to form them to an agreeable addreſs and behaviour. This the œconomy and decorum of his own family was well calculated to produce. He obſerved, likewiſe, their way of ſpeaking, inſtructed them in their proper manner of pronunciation, and laboured to prevent their contracting any unnatural tone or geſture. While he delivered his cautions upon theſe heads, ſuch was his humility, that he warned them not to imitate himſelf in an error of this kind, of which he was ſenſible, but which he could not entirely correct (a).

(a) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 76—90.

Another method taken by Dr. Doddridge, to qualify his pupils for appearing with early advantage in the pulpit, muſt not be forgotten. The ſenior ſtudents, before they began to preach, were accuſtomed, on the Sunday evenings, to viſit the neighbouring villages, and to hold private meetings for religious worſhip in ſome licenſed houſes. It was not uncommon for fifty or ſixty, or perhaps a larger number of people, to aſſemble on theſe occaſions. Two of the young men uſually went together; when a practical ſermon was repeated, and one of them prayed before and the other after it, with proper intervals of ſinging. This cuſtom was eminently uſeful, both in exerciſing the talents of the pupils, and in preparing them to appear with greater courage and freedom when they entered upon the miniſtry. Sometimes diſtinguiſhed abilities, when accompanied with timidity and bathfulneſs, have been greatly obſcured, from the want of ſuch preparatory exerciſes. The cuſtom was otherwiſe in no ſmall degree beneficial, as it tended to remove the prejudices againſt the Diſſenters, and to promote the ends of ſerious religion.

One proof of Dr. Doddridge's zealous concern for the improvement of his pupils was, that he allowed them a free acceſs to him in his own ſtudy, to aſk his advice with regard to any part of their courſe, and to mention to him ſuch difficulties as occurred to them either in their private reading or their lectures. In theſe caſes he treated them with the utmoſt candour and tenderneſs, and pointed out whatever he thought would contribute to their advancement in knowledge. While he was thus ſolicitous to promote their intellectual acquirements, it was his main care, and what he apprehended to be moſt eſſential to their uſefulneſs, that they might be pious and virtuous men. With this view the ſtricteſt regard was paid to their moral characters; and their behaviour, when not employed in their ſtudies or at lecture, was watchfully inſpected. Inquiry was made what houſes they frequented, and what company they kept; and none of the ſtudents were permitted to be from home after ten o'clock at night, under penalty of a conſiderable forfeiture. When any thing was found irregular in their conduct, or there appeared to be a danger of their falling into temptation, the Doctor privately admoniſhed them in the moſt ſerious and affectionate manner. Nor was he ſatisfied with the external decorum of their behaviour, but was anxious to perceive in them the genuine evidences of real religion (b).

(b) Ibid. p. 91—96.

Dr. Doddridge "often expreſſed his wiſh," ſays Mr. Orton, "that different places "of education could be provided for perſons intended for the miniſtry and thoſe for "other profeſſions; as he thought it would be better ſecurity for the religious cha- "racter of the former; and ſome indulgences might be allowed to the others, eſpecially "thoſe of rank and fortune, that were not proper for divinity-ſtudents, as few of them "were likely ever to be affluent in their circumſtances (c)." Much as I revere the memory of my tutor, and ſincere as the reſpect is which I entertain for his judgment on many points, I do not agree with him in this opinion. Perhaps it might be delivered by him at ſeaſons of peculiar difficulty and embarraſſment. It is certain that he did not ſtrictly accord with it in his own practice; for he took young gentlemen of fortune into his houſe to the end of his life; and during the whole of my pupilage, which was at a time when his academy was in a very flouriſhing ſtate, I do not recollect that any of the theological ſtudents were corrupted by the others. There is no poſſibility of forming any plan of education, with regard to which objections may not be made, and inconveniences ſuggeſted. How many diſſertations and treatiſes have been written concerning the queſtion, Which is moſt preferable, a private or a public education? without having hitherto hitherto brought the world to an uniformity of ſentiment upon the ſubject! Different minds, as they are differently conſtituted, and as particular difficulties ſtrike them, will view matters of this kind in a diverſity of lights. For my own part, all the knowledge and experience which I have been able to obtain with reſpect to the point in debate, have convinced me that conſiderable advantages may, and do, ariſe from the connection of lay-pupils with thoſe who are intended for divinity.

So great was Dr. Doddridge's reputation as a tutor, that the number of his ſtudents was large, being one year with another, thirty-four; and the academy was uſually on the increaſe. During the twenty-two years in which he ſuſtained this office, he had about two hundred young men under his care, of whom one hundred and twenty entered upon the miniſtry, and ſome who were deſigned for it died while under his inſtructions. Several of his pupils were from Scotland and Holland. One perſon, who was intended for orders in the Church of England, choſe to ſpend a year or two under his tuition, before he went to the Univerſity. Others, whoſe parents were of that Church, were placed in the Doctor's family, and were readily allowed to attend the eſtabliſhed worſhip; for the conſtitution of his academy was perfectly catholic. Some young divines from Scotland, who had ſtudied and taken the uſual degrees in the Univerſities, and who had even begun to preach, came to attend his divinity lectures, and to receive his inſtructions, before they ſettled with pariſhes in their native country (d). (d) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 102, 103.

Such was the manner in which Dr. Doddridge filled up his difficult and honourable ſtation as a tutor; and from this ſurvey of his conduct, which might have been extended farther, and which is in certain reſpects more copiouſly dwelt upon by Mr. Orton. every pious and judicious reader will acknowledge the wiſdom and goodneſs of Providence, in raiſing up ſo excellent a perſon, and preparing him for ſo large a ſphere of uſefulneſs (e). (e) Ibid. p. 104.

Mr. Orton takes notice, that Dr. Doddridge's method of education bears a near reſemblance to other ſeminaries of the like kind, among the Proteſtant Diſſenters (f). (f) Ibid. p. 74. But it is proper to obſerve, that, of late years, there has been a conſiderable enlargement of the plan upon which ſeveral of them have been conſtructed. The academy at Warrington was formed on the ſcheme of three independent Profeſſors, as they might juſtly be entitled; and when we mention among them (not to name other reſpectable perſons) ſuch men as Dr. Taylor, Dr. Aikin, Dr. Prieſtley, Dr. Reinhold Forſter, Mr. Gilbert Wakefield, and Dr. Enfield, we need not ſay how ably it was in ſucceſſion ſupplied. The inſtitution at Hoxton was on the ſame foundation; Dr. Savage, Dr. Rees, and myſelf, being diſtinct and unſubordinate tutors in the theological, mathematical, and philological departments. A ſimilar arrangement takes place at the ſeminary of our congregational brethren in Homerton. The new College at Hackney has gone upon the plan of a ſtill greater number of preceptors. Though the academy heretofore at Daventry, and ſince removed to Northampton, and that at Mancheſter, retain the form of one principal tutor, there are two ſeparate aſſiſtants for the philoſophical and claſſical ſtudies.

May I be permitted to offer a brief ſketch of theological education? A ſolid foundation ought to be laid in a truly grammatical acquaintance with the Latin and Greek tongues; and the higher claſſical writers ſhould be read, more or leſs, through the whole courſe. Hebrew at leaſt, amongſt the Oriental languages, ſhould by no means be neglected. The different branches of mathematical literature, and of natural philoſophy, will demand a ſerious and diligent attention. Logic, metaphyſics, univerſal grammar, rhetoric, criticiſm, chronology, and hiſtory, are objects an acquaintance with which is not a little deſirable. With reſpect to general divinity, including in that term pneumatology and ethics, I cannot help thinking that Dr. Doddridge's courſe of lectures, with proper additions, improvements, and references to more recent authors, might ſtill be made uſe of with eminent advantage. As it points out, in order, the moſt important objects of ſtudy, and the writers on both ſides of the queſtions diſcuſſed, a young man will know where to apply for future information. Jewiſh antiquities and eccleſiaſtical hiſtory need ſcarcely to be mentioned, as they cannot be forgotten. If the ſyſtems of the ancient philoſophers ſhould be thought to merit much regard during academical ſtudies, ample materials may be collected from Dr. Enfield's late moſt valuable work. A ſeries of lectures on the divine diſpenſations would be peculiarly uſeful. Such a ſet of lectures was begun by Dr. Taylor at Warrington, but he did not live to complete the deſign. His work, ſo far as it was carried, is worthy of approbation, though the diſcourſes are ſometimes rather too declamatory, and perhaps not ſufficiently accurate and critical. They have, however, deſervedly found a place in the Biſhop of Landaff's Collection of Theological Tracts. Another thing of conſequence is a ſeries of obſervations on the times and occaſions on which the books, eſpecially of the New Teſtament, were written, the ancient copies and verſions, and the principal commentators. The objects I particularly allude to are thoſe which are particularly treated of by Michaelis, Lardner, Jones, and Campbell. In addition to all theſe, a ſet of preaching lectures, more improved than thoſe of Dr. Doddridge, and more adapted to preſent circumſtances, would be an important acquiſition. With the beſt inſtruction, it is not to be expected that all young men ſhould be equally accompliſhed. It will be ſufficient for many that they have a competent ſtock of knowledge, united with ſerious diſpoſitions. It is, however, very deſirable that ſome ſhould ſo far riſe above the common rank, as to be able, in their day, to ſupport the honour of Revelation againſt the attacks of its enemies, and to appear as defenders of the true Chriſtian doctrines. It would not be amiſs, if a few, of ſuperior capacities and literature, would, after they quit the ſeminaries of education, ſtudy ſomewhat more ſyſtematically than is frequently done. In that caſe, the Diſſenters would not be at a loſs for tutors in peculiar emergencies. If I have aſſumed too great a liberty in ſuggeſting theſe hints, I hope to be forgiven; as I have written not merely from a regard to the honour and benefit of the denomination of Chriſtians to which I more immediately belong, but with a view to the general intereſts of Religion and Learning.

Since the abilities of Mr. Doddridge were ſuch as called him ſo early in life to the important office of a theological tutor, it was natural to expect, from the ſame talents, that it would not be long before he appeared in the world as an author. His firſt diſtinct publication, which was in 1730, and printed without his name, was entituled, "Free Thoughts on the moſt probable Means of reviving the Diſſenting Intereſt, occaſioned by the late Enquiry into the Cauſes of its Decay." The writer of the Enquiry was for a time ſuppoſed to be ſome lay gentleman; but, in fact, it came from the pen of a young diſſenting miniſter, of the name of Gough, who afterwards conformed to the Church; and who, in 1750, publiſhed a volume of ſermons, which have conſiderable merit as judicious and elegant compoſitions. Mr. Doddridges pamphlet, wherein he materially differed from Mr. Gough with regard to the point in queſtion, is a model of that candour and politeneſs with which remarks may be made on another's writings and opinions. The firſt inſtance in which Mr. Doddridge diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a practical divine was in 1732, when he publiſhed "Sermons on the Education of "Children." Theſe were principally intended for the uſe of his own congregation; and they contain, in a little compaſs, a variety of important advices and affecting motives, tending to aſſiſt and animate parents in the diſchare of ſo momentous a duty. They were accompanied with a recommendatory preface by Mr. Some, and have ſince gone through ſeveral editions. In 1735, Mr. Doddridge's concern for the riſing generation was ſtill farther diſplayed, in "Sermons to Young People;" being ſeven in number, and which have met with equal ſucceſs in the world. A diſcourſe was printed by him in the ſame year, entituled, "The Care of the Soul urged as the One Thing needful." This was followed, in 1735-6, by a Sermon on the "Abſurdity and Iniquity of Perſecution for Conſcience-Sake, in all its Forms and Degrees." It had been preached, I believe, on the preceding fifth of November, and, when it came from the preſs, was recommended to the public, in a ſhort Preface, by Mr. Some, as the beſt he had ever ſeen on the ſubject, in ſo narrow a compaſs. In all reſpects it is indeed an elaborate and excellent diſcourſe, diſplaying with great energy and elegance the grand principles of Toleration and Religious Liberty.

In the year 1736 the two Colleges of the Univerſity of Aberdeen, in Scotland, concurred in conferring upon Mr. Doddridge the degree of Doctor in Divinity; upon which occaſion his pupils thought it a proper piece of reſpect to congratulate him in a body. He was gratified by their compliment; but told them, in anſwer to it, that "their "learning, piety, and zeal, would be more to his honour, and give him a thouſand "times more pleaſure, than his degree, or any other token of public eſteem." In the ſame year he publiſhed "Ten Sermons on the Power and Grace of Chriſt," and "the "Evidences of his glorious Goſpel." The three laſt, on the "Evidences of the Goſ-"pel," were afterwards ſeparately printed, at the particular requeſt of one of the firſt dignitaries of the Church of England. They contain a very judicious ſummary of ſeveral of the principal arguments in ſupport of the Chriſtian revelation, and eſpecially of thoſe which prove the genuineneſs and credibility of the evangelical hiſtory. The author had the great ſatisfaction of knowing that theſe diſcourſes were the means of converting to the belief of our holy religion two gentlemen of liberal education and diſtinguiſhed abilities, who had been ſceptical upon this head. One of them, who had endeavoured to prejudice others againſt the evidences and contents of the Goſpel, became a zealous preacher of Chriſtianity, as well as a ſhining ornament to it in his life and manners (g).

(g) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 98, 112, 117, 118.

Dr. Doddridge's next appearance from the preſs was on an occaſion very melancholy and affecting to himſelf and Mrs. Doddridge. This was the loſs of his eldeſt daughter, a very amiable and hopeful child of nearly five years of age. The ſermon which he preached on this event, and which was publiſhed in 1736-7, is entituled "Submiſſion to Divine Providence on the Death of Children, recommended and enforced." It is an admirable diſcourſe, which diſplays in a very ſtrong and ſtriking light the united piety and tenderneſs of the author's mind. Few ſuperior inſtances of pathetic eloquence are to be met with in the Engliſh language. In 1737 the Doctor engaged in an ordination ſervice at Wiſbeach St. Peter's, in the Iſle of Ely. The part allotted him was the ſermon, which was printed under the title of "The Temper and Conduct of the primitive "Miniſters of the Goſpel illuſtrated and recommended." Mr. William Johnſton, the gentleman ordained, afterwards removed to Harborough, and at length ſettled at Tunbridge-Wells, at which place he died, and where he was well known, and juſtly reſpected, by many conſiderable perſons. He was the author of a pronouncing and ſpelling Dictionary, which appeared in 12mo, in 1764, and which was not, in ſome reſpects, without its utility. It is now, I believe, entirely ſuperſeded by the far more elaborate and perfect works of Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Walker. Dr. Doddridge, in 1737-8, was called to officiate at the funeral of an old and worthy friend, the Rev. Mr. John Norris, of Welford in Northamptonſhire, who had been thirty-eight years diſſenting miniſter at that place. The diſcourſe which the Doctor preached, and printed, on the occaſion, is entitled, "Practical Reflections on the Character and Death of Enoch." On the ninth of November, 1738, a day of faſting and prayer was obſerved at Wellingborough, on account of a dreadful fire which had deſtroyed a conſiderable part of the town; and the ſermon, which was aſſigned to Dr. Doddridge, and was in part delivered extempore, was publiſhed, from the beſt recollection he could make of it, at the earneſt requeſt of the hearers.

In 1739, our author gave to the public the firſt volume, in quarto, of his great work, "The Family Expoſitor; or, a Paraphraſe and Verſion of the New Teſtament: "with Critical Notes, and a practical Improvement of each Section." This volume contained the former part of the Hiſtory of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as recorded in the four Evangeliſts, diſpoſed in the order of an harmony, and was uſhered into the world by a very numerous and honourable liſt of ſubſcribers. The dedication, which was to her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs of Wales, affords one of the fineſt ſpecimens which Dr. Doddridge has given of his talents in elegant compoſition. If the praiſes ſhould be thought ſufficiently copious, they are, at the ſame time, mixed with important hints of inſtruction; and nothing appears to be ſaid but what evidently came from the heart. The ſecond volume of the work was publiſhed in 1740, concluding the evangelical hiſtory. During theſe two years, the Doctor printed only one ſermon, which was "On the "Neceſſity of a general Reformation in order to a well grounded Hope of Succeſs in "War;" and which had been preached by him in Northampton, on the ninth of January, 1739-40, being the day appointed by his Majeſty for public humiliation. It was dedicated to his friend Colonel Gardiner. In 1741, our author was called up to pay a tribute of reſpect to the memory of a worthy Diſſenting Miniſter in London, the Rev. Mr. John Newman, by delivering an oration at his grave, and afterwards committing it to the preſs. Soon after, he publiſhed "The Scripture Doctrine of Salvation by "Grace through Faith, illuſtrated and improved in two Sermons, the ſubſtance of which "was preached at Rowell in Northamptonſhire." But the principal production of Dr. Doddridge, during this year, was a ſet of "Practical Diſcourſes on Regeneration," which had been delivered on Sunday evenings, and attended with remarkable diligence, by many perſons of different perſuaſions, to ſome of whom they were eminently uſeful. The character given of them by a foreign divine, on their being tranſlated into Dutch, among other high encomiums, was, that they united orthodoxy with moderation, zeal with meekneſs, and deep, hidden wiſdom with uncommon clearneſs; that ſimplicity ſhone in them without coldneſs, elegance without painting, and ſublimity without bombaſt (b).

(b) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 118, 119.

The publication of theſe diſcourſes was ſucceeded by that of a ſingle ſermon, entituled, "The Evil and Danger of neglecting the Souls of Men plainly and ſeriouſly repreſented." It had been preached in October, 1741, at a meeting of miniſters, at Kettering in Northamptonſhire. When publiſhed, which was in February, 1741-2, it was dedicated to the aſſociated Proteſtant Diſſenting Miniſters in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, with whom the author had an interview at Denton, in the preceding ſummer, and to whom he had propoſed a ſcheme for the revival of religion, the heads of which are given in the dedication. The only compoſition from the pulpit which was printed by Dr. Doddridge in 1742, was a Charge, delivered in St. Ives, Huntingdonſhire, on the twelfth of Auguſt, at the ordination of Mr. John Jennings, the ſon of the Doctor's former tutor. In the latter end of the ſame year, our author began the publication of the ſole controverſial work in which he could properly ever have been ſaid to have engaged. This was occaſioned by a pamphlet, entituled, "Chriſtianity not founded on Argument," which was much ſpoken of at the time of its appearance, and which, under the form of a zeal for orthodoxy, contained a ſevere attack on our holy religion. Dr. Doddridge's anſwer was compriſed in three letters, the ſecond and third of which were publiſhed in 1743. In the firſt he ſtated the degree of rational evidence for the divine authority of Chriſtianity, to which an illiterate, well-diſpoſed perſon may attain. The ſecond was employed in endeavouring to ſhew the reaſonableneſs of annexing a condemnatory ſentence on unbelievers, as a part of the Chriſtian revelation. In the third the doctrine of divine influences was conſidered (i). Theſe anſwers, which are written with the utmoſt politeneſs and candour, met with a very favourable reception in the world, and the Doctor was thanked for them by ſome men of diſtinguiſhed rank and abilities. The laſt letter in particular was eſteemed by many thinking perſons to contain the beſt illuſtration and the moſt rational and full defence of the influences of the Spirit upon the human heart, which had hitherto been publiſhed (k). Dr. Doddridge's other publications in 1743 were, "The Principles of the Chriſtian Religion, expreſſed in plain and "eaſy Verſe, and divided into ſhort Leſſons, for the Uſe of Children and Youth;" and, "Compaſſion to the Sick recommended and urged," in a Sermon preached at Northampton in favour of a deſign for erecting a county hoſpital. In the firſt of theſe performances, which was drawn up at the requeſt of Dr. Clark, it has juſtly been obſerved, that eaſe, plainneſs, and elegance, are happily united (l). The verſes, in general, are well accommodated to the purpoſe for which they were intended; but they might have had a ſtill wider circulation, and have been more extenſively uſeful, if no doctrine of a diſputable nature had been introduced. There is ſome reaſon to believe that they were made uſe of in the education of the royal children (m). I have a full recollection of the zeal and activity with which Dr. Doddridge entered into the ſcheme of erecting an infirmary for Northamptonſhire. The ſucceſs of the deſign was much owing to his exertions. His diſcourſe in recommendation of it, which was dedicated to the Earl of Halifax, is indeed a moſt excellent one, and was characteriſed by Dr. Oliver, in a letter to the author, as follows: "Horace's obſervation, difficile eſt proprie communia di- "cere, makes your ſermon on the erecting your county infirmary the more valuable. "Public charities have long been ſo trite a ſubject in the pulpit, that we ſcarcely expect "any thing new from the ableſt hands. But you, Sir, have treated this worn-out ſub- "ject in ſo maſterly a manner, that the reader will find many of his ſofteſt paſſions "awakened into tenderneſs and compaſſion towards the ſick and diſtreſſed, which had "ſlept benumbed under the warmeſt influences of the preceding diſcourſes on that affect- "ing topic. You write as if you felt, while ſome others ſeem to deſire that their "brethren ſhould feel what themſelves are inſenſible of. They write from the head, but "you from the heart (n)."

Towards the cloſe of the ſame year, Dr. Doddridge became a member of a Philoſophical Society which was formed at Northampton, conſiſting of ſeveral ingenious and reſpectable gentlemen in that town and its neighbourhood. During the courſe of their meetings in 1744, he exhibited two papers, the one on the doctrine of Pendulums, and the other on the Laws of Communication of Motion, as well in elaſtic as in non-elaſtic bodies. The moſt material propoſitions relating to both were ſet in ſo plain and eaſy a light in theſe papers, that he was requeſted to permit tranſcripts of them to be depoſited among other communications of the gentlemen concerned, ſome of which appear to have been curious and uſeful (o). Our author's name occurs in the Tranſactions of the Royal Society. Three papers were written and communicated by him to that Society, which, if they were not of the firſt conſequence, ſerve to ſhew the activity of his mind, and his attention to different branches of ſcience.

The year 1745 was diſtinguiſhed in Dr. Doddridge's life by the appearance of one of the moſt popular, and one of the moſt uſeful of his practical works. This was "The "Riſe and Progreſs of Religion in the Soul," illuſtrated in a courſe of ſerious addreſſes, ſuited to perſons of every character and circumſtance, with a devout meditation or prayer added to each chapter. Dr. Watts had formed a ſimilar deſign; but having been prevented from the execution of it by his growing infirmities, he recommended it to our author, as the beſt qualified of all his acquaintance for diſcharging it in the manner that would be acceptable and beneficial to the world. It was with ſome reluctance that Dr. Doddridge, amidſt his various other weighty concerns, agreed to comply with the requeſt of his venerable friend; but it was urged with an importunity that he could not reſiſt; and he had afterwards the higheſt reaſon to rejoice in his compliance. When the work was finiſhed, Dr. Watts reviſed as much of it as his health would permit. This book was not only well received by the Diſſenters, but met with an equal reception, and the warmeſt applauſes, from ſeveral perſons of great eminence for rank, learning, and piety, both clergy and laity, in the Eſtabliſhed Church (p). Dr. Ayſcough, formerly preceptor to the children of Frederic Prince of Wales, ſpeaking of it, ſays, "I pre- "ſented your laſt book to her Royal Highneſs, and ought long ago to have acquainted "you with her moſt gracious acceptance of it, and that I was commanded to return "you her thanks for it. There is indeed ſuch a ſpirit of piety in it, as deſerves the "thanks of every good Chriſtian. Pray God grant it may have its proper effect in "awakening this preſent careleſs age, and then I am ſure you will have your end in "publiſhing it (q)." Dr. Thomas Hunt, at that time of Hertford College, but afterwards Canon of Chriſt Church, and Regius Profeſſor of Hebrew in the Univerſity of Oxford, thus expreſſed himſelf concerning the ſame work. "With our thanks for the "favour of your good company, be pleaſed to accept of our moſt hearty acknowledg-

" ments for your kind preſent of your excellent piece on the Riſe and Progreſs of Re" ligion in the Soul: a performance which cannot fail of doing much good in the world,
" as it is judiciouſly contrived to engage the attention, and improve the minds of all ſorts
" of readers; being ſo plain as to be intelligible to the loweſt underſtanding, at the ſame
" time that it is ſo elegant, as to gratify the higheſt. You may aſſure yourſelf, Sir, that " it was not in the power of my moſt preſſing engagements to hinder me from reading
" ſuch a work as this, and I hope I am much the better for having done ſo. Nor would
" it have been kind to my dear Mrs. Hunt, not to have given her an opportunity of " peruſing a book, from which I myſelf had received ſo much benefit. I therefore no
" ſooner laid it out of my own hands, but I put it into her's, where I afterwards often" times found it, and cannot eaſily tell you how much ſhe was affected by it, nor deſcribe
" the gratitude ſhe profeſſes to owe to her worthy inſtructor (r)." The Ducheſs of Somerſet was equally pleaſed with the work. In a letter, written to Dr. Doddridge in 1750, ſhe ſays, " I had not the pleaſure of being acquainted with any of your writings
" till I was at Bath, three years ago, with my poor Lord, when an old acquaintance of " mine, the Dowager Lady Hyndford, recommended me to read the Riſe and Progreſs
" of Religion in the Soul: and I may with truth aſſure you, that I never was ſo
" deeply affected with any thing I ever met with as with that book; and I could not be
" eaſy till I had given one to every ſervant in my houſe, who appeared to be of a ſerious
" turn of mind (s)." A perſon of diſtinguiſhed literature and goodneſs always carried the work with him, declaring that it was every thing on the ſubject of ſerious and practical religion. It ſoon went through many editions, and ſtill continues to be frequently reprinted. Nor has the publication of it been confined to England, but extended to Scotland and America. It has been tranſlated abroad, and the author received many teſtimonies from foreign parts of its acceptance and uſefulneſs (t). If to ſuch a number of encomiums the opinion of a diſſenting miniſter may be ſubjoined, I may give the words of Mr. Barker; " That book ſhould be written in all languages in letters of
" gold (u)."

Not, however, entirely to confine myſelf to the voice of praiſe, I cannot forbear adding ſome ſtrictures that came from the pen of a particular and intimate friend of Dr. Doddridge's, Nathaniel Neal, Eſq. an eminent Solicitor in London, who united the virtues of the heart with a very ſuperior underſtanding and judgment, and who preſerved the ſincereſt fidelity in the midſt of the warmeſt affection. " I am," ſays he, in a letter to the author, " much obliged to you for your kind preſent of the Riſe and
" Progreſs of Religion in the Soul. I read it over with pleaſure; and hope, not without
" ſome advantage from a book, which I truly think is calculated for very conſiderable
" uſefulneſs. The ſerious ſpirit it breathes muſt be acceptable to all who retain any
" ſeeds of piety; and the compaſs of imagination, and force of expreſſion, which diſ-
" tinguiſh themſelves throughout the whole of the performance, ſhow that the beauties
" of the Sacred Writings are not deſpiſed by all the maſters of human eloquence. This " might ſuffice for me to ſay concerning a book that is ſo univerſally admired by thoſe
" to whoſe judgment and piety I pay the greateſt reverence; and all perhaps that in " prudence I ought to ſay; if I merely conſulted the preſerving that credit you have " hitherto been ſo kind as to give to my underſtanding. But, as I had rather deſerve
" your friendſhip than gain your applauſe, and be eſteemed injudicious than inſincere,
" I will venture (ſince you have deſired it) to ſend a remark or two on this perfor" mance.

" Your book propoſes to draw a plan of a religious diſpoſition, or habit, from its
" firſt foundation to its higheſt perfection in the preſent ſtate; and to conſider it in its " various ſtages and circumſtances, agreeably to that variety which there is in the cir-
" cumſtances and attainments of Chriſtians. But is it not a juſt objection to this perfor" mance, if there are many Chriſtians who are conſcious to themſelves that the foun" dation of their religious temper and practice was not laid in thoſe principles and that " view of things which you there deſcribe? Which I ſuppoſe muſt be the caſe of thoſe
" who do not in a good degree embrace the Calviniſtical doctrines, and in ſome meaſure
" of many that do; for I am inclined to think, that different principles do not more va-" rioufly affect and influence the minds of men, than the ſame principles do different " minds, eſpecially young ones, according to the firmneſs or weakneſs of the mind, or
" as the prevailing turn is ſprightly or melancholy. Conſidering, therefore, the ſtate
" of the Chriſtian church univerſally, may it not be reaſonable to allow a greater variety
" in the methods which Divine Wiſdom and Mercy take to bring ſinful men to the love
" and practice of religion? You will obſerve, the objection does not infer, that the " method you preſcribe is not the moſt general, or the beſt adapted to begin and carry " on the Chriſtian life in the ſoul of man, but whether it be the only one.

" If I might venture to add another remark, it ſhould be this: whether your rules
" and directions for promoting the Chriſtian life do not require more time to be ſpent
" in the exerciſe of devotion and in the inſtrumental duties of religion, than is conſiſtent
" with

" with that attention to the affairs of this life, which is neceſſary for the generality of " Chriſtians; and whether the propoſing more to be done than can (from a view of the " capacities and opportunities of Chriſtians in general) be expected ſhould be done, " may not diſcourage ſome not to attempt, and others not to proceed in a courſe of " religion? What is fit to be done by ſome perſons, and in ſome ſpecial circumſtances, " may not be expected from the greater number of Chriſtians: and care ſhould be " taken, that the heights of piety, to which ſome devout ſouls have ſoared, do not be- " come matter of diſcouragement to young Chriſtians, or thoſe of an ordinary rank.

" It is not improbable that I, who read over this book with a view and deſire to diſ- " cover and amend my own faults, and not to find any in that, may not have ſufficiently " attended to ſome paſſages that may ſhow both theſe remarks impertinent; or if there are " not ſuch paſſages in this book, I myſelf can point out to ſome in other of your pieces " (particularly that on Regeneration, if my memory does not greatly fail me) which " guard againſt both theſe objections in very clear and expreſs terms. But whatever " be the fate of my remarks, when I venture to attack the accuracy of your com- " poſitions, I have a ſure and tried retreat in the candour and benevolence of your diſ- " poſition, which conceals all the weakneſſes of your friends; and, I ſpeak it from my " own repeated experience, magnifies any well-intentioned attempt into an act or evi- " dence of conſpicuous wiſdom or virtue (w)."

(w) Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 364—366.

In the ſummer of 1745, Dr. Doddridge printed a Charge which had been delivered in Norwich, at the ordination of the Rev. Mr. Abraham Tozer; and in the month of October, in the ſame year, he was called to the painful and affecting office of preaching a funeral ſermon on the death of his friend, the Hon. Col. James Gardiner, who was ſlain in the battle at Preſton-Pans, on the twenty-firſt of September preceding. The title of the diſcourſe is " The Chriſtian Warrior animated and crowned:" and it was accompanied with a dedication to the Colonel's pious and excellent widow. This ſermon, as might be expected from the peculiar circumſtances by which it was occa- ſioned, had a very extenſive circulation; and it received, at the ſame time, many en- comiums. " I thank you," ſays Mr. Barker, " for your fine ſermon on the lamentable " death of that gallant Chriſtian, as well as ſoldier, Colonel Gardiner. I believe every " body will allow it to be a fine diſcourſe, and grant that your affection has not tranſ- " ported you beyond the bounds of decency and prudence (x)." The applauſe of Dr. Hunt of Oxford was ſtill more ſpecific. " Many thanks to you for your excellent " ſermon on the death of the valiant and worthy Colonel Gardiner. I was moſt ſenſibly " affected with the peruſal of it; nor can I eaſily tell you whether I was more pleaſed " with the ingenuity of the diſcourſe, or moved with the tenderneſs of the application. " Both your lamentation over your dead friend, and your moving epiſtle to his diſcon- " ſolate widow, are plainly formed on Horace's plan, Si vis me flere, &c. and therefore " it is no wonder they ſhould draw tears from your readers, as, I aſſure you, they did " not only from my dear Mrs. Hunt, but myſelf, in great abundance. How mournfully " pleaſing to Lady Frances muſt the honour you have done her gallant conſort be! And " as for the deceaſed hero himſelf, methinks, I hear every brave ſoldier in the Britiſh " army ſaluting his aſhes (thus diſtinguiſhed by your praiſes) in the words of Alexander, " when he ſtood before the tomb of Achilles, and reflected on the honour that had been " done that famous warrior by Homer's verſes, (x) Ibid. p. 100.

" O fortunate Gardinere, qui tuæ virtutis
" Talem præconem inveneris!

" At leaſt, I am ſure theſe would be their ſentiments, were your ſermon put into their " hands, as I could heartily wiſh (for the animating the courage of the troops) it were. " I need not tell you how glad I ſhould be to ſee the remarkable paſſages of a life, the " concluſion of which is ſo glorious (y)."

Dr. Doddridge's next appearance from the preſs was likewiſe in a funeral diſcourſe, which was preached at Northampton, in May, 1746, on occaſion of the death of the Rev. Mr. James Shepherd. Mr. Shepherd was a worthy young miniſter, not quite twenty-two years of age, who died, in conſequence of a ſhort illneſs, ſoon after he had finiſhed his academical ſtudies, and had received an invitation to the paſtoral charge of a Diſſenting congregation at Coggeſhall, in Eſſex. Nine ſermons, the whole which he had ever made, were collected together, and printed in a ſmall volume, in 1748.

In 1747, Dr. Doddridge, agreeably to the promiſe he had before made, publiſhed " Some remarkable Paſſages in the Life of the Hon. Colonel James Gardiner;" a work which has gone through various editions. It was the author's deſign, in this work, not merely to perform a tribute of gratitude to the memory of an invaluable friend, but of duty to God and his fellow-creatures; as he had a cheerful hope that the narrative would, under the divine bleſſing, be the means of ſpreading a warm and lively ſenſe of religion. Several of the Doctor's literary correſpondents thought highly of the performance. "I own," says Mr. Barker, "I was not without my fears, lest your love to "that excellent person should have overcharged some of your passages with panegyric; "and the extraordinary manner of his conversion have given some occasion to the "present age to charge him or you with Enthusiasm. But in reading the book I was "agreeably surprised and exceedingly pleased; and have the satisfaction to acquaint "you, that your friends here are of opinion that you have performed what you have "undertaken in a most excellent manner, and that it is suited to do a great deal of "good (z)." Mr. Neal, who wrote to the author before he had read the whole work, expressed himself in the following terms. "The receipt of Colonel Gardiner's Life "calls upon me for a particular acknowledgment. I have yet only had the pleasure of "reading some part of it; and though I know you would rather see me improved by "it, than hear me commend it, yet as the latter will, I hope, be no obstruction to the "former, I must own that, as far as I have gone, I think it is written in a very in-"structive and entertaining manner; and I was charmed with the dedication, the con-"cluding period of which is worthy the eloquence and politeness of Pliny, and the "piety and energy of St. Paul. But I will say no more till I have perused the whole "piece (a)."

Perhaps it may be thought somewhat remarkable, that the learned Warburton should express the most unqualified approbation of the whole work. "I had the favour," says this eminent writer, "of your letter, and along with it Colonel Gardiner's Life, which "I have just read through with very great pleasure. Nothing can be better or more "judicious than the writing part. Many considerations made the subject of great im-"portance and expediency. The celebration of worthy men who sacrificed themselves "for the service of their country; the tribute paid to private friendship; the example, "particularly to the soldiery, of so much virtue and piety, as well as courage and pa-"triotism; the service done to the survivors of their families; are such important con-"siderations as equally concern the writer and the public. I had a thousand things to "remark in it which gave me pleasure. But I have room but for two or three. The "distinction you settle between piety and enthusiasm in the 78th page, is highly just "and important, and very necessary for these times, when men are apt to fall into the "opposite extremes. Nor am I less pleased with your observations on the mutilated form "of Christianity, in the 130th page: we see the terrible effects of it. The same plea-"sure your 162d and 163d pages afforded me. Your hymns are truly pious and "poetical. The note at the bottom of page 176 is fine. I entirely agree with your "sentiments concerning the extraordinary circumstance of the good man's conversion. "On the whole, the book will do you honour; or, what you like better, will be a blessing "to you by its becoming an instrument of public good (b)."

(b) Ibid, p. 204, 205.

The chief observation that Mr. Orton makes on the work is, that "the author had "the pleasure to hear of some instances in which it had answered his desires and hopes; "though many thought, and perhaps justly, that he too much indulged the emotions "of private friendship and affection in the composition (c)." In the truth of this remark I entirely concur. Colonel Gardiner was indeed a man of a most excellent character; but that character was tinctured with enthusiasm and religious bigotry. His virtues were of the awful kind. I remember well that his aspect was the aspect of dignity; but this dignity was mixed with an austerity of appearance and manner, which was not pre-possessing to the minds of the students belonging to the academy at Northampton. The affection of his eldest son to his father, had, I know, more of fear united with it than is usually desirable in a child towards a parent. Dr. Doddridge undoubtedly went too far, when in his funeral sermon for Colonel Gardiner, he deliberately declared, that it was hard for him to say where, but in the book of God, the Colonel found his example, or where he had left his equal (d). The doctor was himself a superior character. Let it, however, be remembered, that if our author was somewhat extravagant in the praises of his friend, he said nothing of the truth of which he was not fully persuaded.

(c) Orton, ubi supra, p. 114.

(d) Doddridge's Sermons, and religious Tracts, Vol. III. p. 62.

It is not my design to enter specifically into the story of Colonel Gardiner's extraordinary conversion. That the impression made upon his mind was in a dream, is sufficiently intimated to be the opinion of Dr. Doddridge, though the Colonel himself believed it to be a miraculous vision. As a dream it may very rationally be accounted for, from the predisposing circumstances. He had received a strictly pious education; he had never rejected the principles, though he had departed from the practice of Christianity; he often felt the anguish of his course of life; he was alone, in the solemn stillness of the night; a religious book happened to be opened by him; the dreadful crime in which he was going to engage flashed upon his conscience. Falling asleep in this agitation of his spirits, a dream followed, accommodated to his waking reflections. Nor was he, on this account, the less indebted to the goodness of Divine Providence for the happy and effectual change that was produced in his disposition and conduct. The events which are derived through a succession of intermediate causes, are not less the result of the administration of the Supreme Being than more immediate interpositions.

There cannot be a ſurer dictate of Reaſon, than it is of Scripture, that every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of Lights.

Two pamphlets were publiſhed, containing remarks on the Life of Colonel Gardiner; ne in London, and the other at Edinburgh. The ſecond was better written than the firſt; but neither of them was deemed of ſufficient conſequence to deſerve an anſwer (e).

(e) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 114—116.

In the year 1748 appeared the third volume of the "Family Expoſitor, containing "the Acts of the Apoſtles, with additional Notes on the Harmony of the Evangeliſts;" and "Two Diſſertations, 1. On Sir Iſaac Newton's Syſtem of the Harmony. 2. On "the Inſpiration of the New Teſtament." This volume is a very valuable part of Dr. Doddridge's great work; being executed with ſingular attention and diligence, and comprehending a large variety of curious and important critical remarks, together with excellent practical obſervations. In ſeveral momentous particulars he differed from Lord Barrington and Dr. Benſon, and co-incided in opinion with Dr. Lardner. Of this the latter gentleman took the following notice in a letter to our author. "You have "happily thrown a great deal of light on the Acts of the Apoſtles. I am particularly "obliged to you for the honourable mention you have been pleaſed to make of me "upon many occaſions. I likewiſe thank you for aſſerting and confirming the opinion "that the Jews had not Jus Gladii in the time of our Saviour. I am alſo well pleaſed "to ſee how clear you keep of the now common opinion about Proſelytes of the Gate, "and how you ſometimes overthrow it by good reaſons (f)." In the diſſertation on Sir Iſaac Newton's ſcheme for reducing the ſeveral hiſtories contained in the Evangeliſts to their proper order, Dr. Doddridge ſucceſsfully combats Sir Iſaac's hypotheſis upon the ſubject. But, at the ſame time, he gladly embraced the opportunity of paying him a very fine compliment. "I cannot," ſays the Doctor, "ſet myſelf to this "taſk, without feeling the fatigue of it ſenſibly allayed by the pleaſure with which I "reflect on the firm perſuaſion which a perſon of his unequaled ſagacity muſt have entertained of the truth of Chriſtianity, in order to his being engaged to take ſuch pains "in illuſtrating the ſacred oracles. A pleaſure, which I doubt not every good reader "will ſhare with me; eſpecially as (according to the beſt information, whether public "or private, I could ever get) his firm faith in the divine revelation diſcovered itſelf in "the moſt genuine fruits of ſubſtantial virtue and piety; and conſequently gives us the "juſteſt reaſon to conclude, that he is now rejoicing in the happy effects of it infinitely "more than in all the applauſe which his philoſophical works have procured him; "though they have commanded a fame laſting as the world, the true theory of which "he had diſcovered, and (in ſpite of all the vain efforts of ignorance, pride, and their "offſpring bigotry) have arrayed him as it were in the beams of the ſun, and inſcribed "his name among the conſtellations of heaven." Concerning Dr. Doddridge's Diſſertation on the Inſpiration of the Old Teſtament, Warburton pronounced, that it is a well-reaſoned and judicious performance (g). Perhaps in ſome reſpects the reaſoning may be rather too hypothetical; but, on the whole, it is a production which abounds with important and uſeful obſervations.

The only ſermon publiſhed by Dr. Doddridge in 1748, was one entituled, "Chriſt's "Invitation to thirſty Souls." It had been preached nearly twenty years before at Northampton, and was now printed at the requeſt of a worthy member of the Eſtabliſhed Church, to whom it had been communicated in the intimacy of friendſhip. Prefixed to it is a dedication, of conſiderable length, to the Rev. James Harvey. This circumſtance, if I conjecture rightly, did not pleaſe the ſtrong-minded Warburton. "I think," ſays he, "you do not ſet a juſt value on yourſelf, when you lend your name or countenance "to ſuch weak, but well-meaning rhapſodies as ———. This may do well enough "with the people; but it is the learned that claim you. And though the intermixing with works of this caſt ſober books of devotion of your own compoſing, "becomes your character, and is indeed your duty, yet your charity and love of "goodneſs ſuffer you to let yourſelf down in the opinion of thoſe you moſt value, and "whoſe high opinion you have fairly gained by works of learning and reaſoning inferior to none. Forgive me this freedom (b)." Dr. Hunt thought better, and indeed more juſtly, of the dedication; for he thus expreſſed himſelf, in a letter to the author: "Many thanks to you for your kind preſent of your excellent ſermon. You "have done great honour to our brother Harvey in the dedication, which breathes the "true ſpirit of Chriſtian benevolence, and contains ſuch generous and charitable ſentiments as muſt charm every reader that has any regard to the true intereſts of our "moſt Holy Religion. I think the account you give of the occaſion of the words "(which is ſomething in my way) is perfectly juſt, and the method in which you "have explained and carried on the metaphor throughout is in the higheſt degree "beautiful, as well as inſtructive (i)."

(b) Ibid. p. 205, 206.

(i) Ibid. p. 346, 347.

The firſt publication of Dr. Doddridge in 1749 was "A plain and ſerious Addreſs "to a Maſter of a Family on the important Subject of Family Religion." This was accompanied with two prayers; one, which might be uſed as an introduction to a ſtated ſtated courſe of family-prayer, where it had formerly been neglected; and the other a prayer for a family. to be uſed either morning or evening, with ſuch variations as might eaſily be underſtood by any who were able to read it. The Doctor, though a Diſſenter, and himſelf excelling in the variety and copiouſneſs of more extemporaneous adorations, was not, we ſee, averſe to forms of prayer on proper occaſions. Indeed, he recommends them in his "Addreſs," the ſerioufneſs, affection, and momentous nature of which entitle it to great attention and regard. The next appearance of our author from the preſs was in a diſcourſe that had been preached at Northampton on the twenty-fifth of April, 1749; being the day appointed by his Majeſty for a general thankſgiving on account of the peace concluded with France and Spain. It was entituled, "Reflections on the Conduct of Divine Providence in the Series and Con-"cluſion of the late War," and contains many beautiful and important obſervations, adapted to the circumſtances of the time.

In 1749-50, Dr. Doddridge preached, at a meeting of Miniſters at Creaton in Northamptonſhire, and afterwards publiſhed, a Sermon, the title of which is, "Chriſtian "Candour and Unanimity ſtated, illuſtrated, and urged." This is an admirable diſcourſe, and exhibits a fine tranſcript of the author's own mind, which was fully attuned to the virtue he recommended. It was inſcribed to the Counteſs of Huntingdon, and ſtrongly diſplays his admiration of that lady. I inſert the inſcription (which I am ſure was written with the utmoſt ſincerity), rather by way of warning than example; not as at all diſputing the great excellency of the Counteſs's character, but becauſe there is an exceſs in the language which ought to be applied to very few human beings.

On the twentieth of Auguſt, 1750, Dr. Doddridge preached a ſermon at Salter's-Hall, on occaſion of the late alarm by the ſecond ſhock of an earthquake, which had happened on the eighth of March preceding. The diſcourſe being delivered to a very large and attentive auditory, it was earneſtly requeſted that it might be printed; and accordingly it appeared under the title of "The Guilt and Doom of Capernaum "ſeriouſly recommended to the Conſideration of the Inhabitants of London." Both the ſermon and the preface amply ſhow how ſolicitous our author was, with many other good men, to improve every event of Divine Providence to the beſt of purpoſes. In the December of the ſame year, he was called upon to pay the laſt tribute of reſpect to the memory of his friend and father, Dr. Clark. That gentleman died on the fourth of the month, and on the ſixteenth Dr. Doddridge preached his funeral ſermon at St. Alban's. The diſcourſe is entitled, "Meditations on the Tears of Jeſus over "the Grave of Lazarus;" and the character given of Dr. Clark is as juſt as it is affectionate. It may not be improper to mention, that Dr. Clark was the author of a collection of Scripture Promiſes, which has been very uſeful to many pious Chriſtians, and of three excellent Sermons, on the Nature and Cauſes of Irreſolution in Religion, printed in 1742. As a proof of the liberality of his mind, I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from one of his letters, written in 1727, to Mr. Doddridge. "You have ſeen, I "ſuppoſe, what the public prints inform us of, relating to the proceedings of the "General Aſſembly in Scotland, againſt Mr. Patrick Simpſon. They are going to "deprive that Church of one of the moſt valuable perſons in it, becauſe he does not "think it neceſſary to tie himſelf down exactly to their Shibboleth, nor oblige him-"ſelf to conform to all the ſcholaſtic ways of ſpeaking, concerning ſome things, about "which the Scripture is ſilent. By what I ſaw and heard of him when in Scotland, he "is a much better judge of thoſe matters than the greater part of thoſe who are to "judge him. His crime is, that he is diſpoſed to think for himſelf; but yet he is "very cautious to avoid giving offence, which I perceive is, by the bigots, interpreted "cunning and diſſimulation.

"One would think the experience of ſo many ages ſhould be ſufficient to make "the world wiſer; and that thoſe who pretend to govern in the Church ſhould learn "at laſt that their power might be much better exerciſed, than in deſtroying the "uſefulneſs of the beſt men in it, merely for nice ſpeculations about unrevealed or "diſputable points. Suppoſe a perſon ſhould not ſpeak with exact propriety, con-"cerning the manner of Chriſt's exiſtence, a point ſo much above our reach, if yet he "loves him, truſts in him, and ſincerely obeys him, what harm does religion ſuffer "by it? But I need not enlarge upon this to you, who are ſo well inſtructed in the "unreaſonableneſs of bigotry to a ſet of ſpeculative notions (k)."

(k) Letters to and from the Rev. Dr. Doddridge, p. 17, 18.

I have now ſpecified the works that were publiſhed by Dr. Doddridge during his life-time, in their chronological order, which has been neglected by Mr. Orton, and very much confounded in the three volumes containing the Doctor's Sermons and religious Tracts. Such of his writings as were printed after his deceaſe will hereafter be mentioned; and, therefore, it only remains at preſent to be added, that he was the author of a few ſmall pieces which appeared in other collections. Theſe were, ſome papers when he was a young man, in "The preſent State of the Republic of Letters;" a recommendatory Preface to the performance, entitled, "Familiar Dialogues for "Children;" a biographical Preface to twelve Sermons, by the Rev. Thomas Steffe, a diſſenting miniſter and former pupil, who died, in early life, at Taunton in Somerſetſhire; an elaborate account, in "The Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned," of the ſecond volume of Warburton's "Divine Legation of Moſes;" and an elegant practical "Paraphraſe of the laſt Words of David," according to the critical interpretation of Dr. Richard Grey, of Hinton, Northamptonſhire.

I ought to have taken notice under the proper year (1748), that Dr. Doddridge reviſed the "Expoſitory Works," and other remains of Archbiſhop Leighton, and tranſlated his "Latin Prelections." Theſe were printed together at Edinburgh, in two volumes. Though the preparing of theſe volumes for the preſs took up ſome of the Doctor's time for ſeveral months, in the intervals of other buſineſs, he was far from repenting of his labour. The delight and edification which he found in the writings of this extraordinary man, were eſteemed by him to be a full equivalent for his pains; ſeparately from all the proſpect of that effect which they might have upon others. He acknowledges in his preface, that he never ſpent a quarter of an hour in reviewing any of them, without feeling, amidſt the interruption which a critical examination of the copy would naturally give, ſome impreſſions which he wiſhed always to retain. Indeed, he found in them ſuch heart-affecting leſſons of ſimplicity and humility, candour and benevolence, and of exalted piety, without the leaſt tincture of enthuſiaſm, as he thought could ſcarcely be equaled any where elſe, excepting in the Sacred Oracles (l).

Dr. Henry Miles, of Tooting, ſpeaking of Archbiſhop Leighton's works, ſaid, in a letter to Dr. Doddridge, "I bleſs GOD I ever met with them. There is a ſpirit in "them I never met with in any human writings; nor can I read many lines in them "without being affected: though you know all his works are imperfect and inaccu-"rate (m)." Scotland, in the middle of the laſt century, produced ſome divines, who had imbibed, in a wonderful manner, the genuine ſpirit of devotion, and the genuine ſpirit of Chriſtianity. The name of Scougal will occur to every one who is tolerably acquainted either with the hiſtory of theology, or with compoſitions of a practical nature.

(m) Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 219.

The journey which Dr. Doddridge took to St. Alban's, for the purpoſe of preaching Dr. Clark's funeral ſermon, laid the foundation of his own death. In that journey, which, as we have ſeen before, was in December, 1750, he unhappily contracted a cold, that hung upon him during the remainder of the Winter. When the Spring advanced, the diſorder conſiderably abated; but in the Summer it returned again with great violence. In this ſtate of his health, he was adviſed by his phyſicians and friends to lay aſide his public work for a time, and to apply himſelf to the uſe of proper medicines and exerciſe for the removal of his complaint. With the former part of this advice he could not be prevailed upon to comply; for, in his eſtimation, to be uſeleſs was worſe than death. Whilſt he apprehended that there was no immediate danger, he could not be induced to decline, or even to leſſen, the various ſacred employments in which he ſo much delighted; and he was particularly deſirous to complete the fair tranſcript of his Family Expoſitor. The nearer he approached to his diſſolution, the more plainly was obſerved his continual improvement in a ſpiritual and heavenly temper. Indeed, he ſeemed to have gotten above the world, and to be daily breathing after immortality. This diſpoſition of his mind was ardently expreſſed in ſeveral of his letters, and is manifeſt from his will, which was made at this time, and is prefaced in the following language: "Whereas it is cuſtomary on theſe occaſions to begin with "commending the ſoul into the hands of God through Chriſt, I do it; not in mere "form, but with ſincerity and joy; eſteeming it my greateſt happineſs, that I am "taught and encouraged to do it by that glorious Goſpel, which, having moſt aſſuredly "believed, I have ſpent my life in preaching to others; and which I eſteem an in-"finitely greater treaſure than all my little worldly ſtore, or poſſeſſions ten thouſand "times greater than mine (n)."

(n) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 268—271.

The laſt time that Dr. Doddridge adminiſtered the Lord's Supper to his congregation at Northampton, was on the ſecond of June, 1751. In the ſermon which he delivered previouſly to the celebration of the ordinance, and which was from Hebrews xii. 23. he expatiated on the illuſtrious and innumerable aſſembly that would meet together in the celeſtial world; and in the concluſion of the whole ſervice, he mentioned, with marks of uncommon pleaſure, the authority of Chriſt over miniſters and churches. He dropped, likewiſe, ſome hints of his approaching deceaſe, and ſpoke with great tenderneſs and affection to his people on the proſpect of their final ſeparation. After this he ſpent ſome weeks in London, where the hurries and fatigues he went through contributed to increaſe his diſorder. On his return from the metropolis, which was nearly the middle of July, he determined, notwithſtanding the earneſt entreaties of his friends to the contrary, to addreſs his flock once more from the pulpit. The diſcourſe, which proved in fact to be his farewell ſermon, was from Romans xiv. 8. and was well adapted, not only to the ſtate of his congregation, but to that of his pupils, for whoſe future improvement and welfare he was tenderly concerned.

The laſt public ſervice, in which Dr. Doddridge was ever engaged, was on the eighteenth of July, at the ordination of the Reverend Mr. Adams, at Bewdley, in Worceſterſhire. How unfit he was at this time for taking any part in the duties of the day, was diſplayed in his pale countenance, and in his languid, trembling voice; but he had promiſed his aſſiſtance, and was unwilling to be abſent or unemployed on the occaſion. From Bewdley he went to Shrewſbury, where he reſided ſeveral weeks, at the houſe of his friend Mr. Orton, for the convenience of air, exerciſe, and an entire receſs from buſineſs and company. By this retirement he ſeemed to be a little recruited. Whilſt he was at Shrewſbury, he received many letters from his friends, expreſſive of their high eſteem and affection for him, and of their deep concern for his dangerous illneſs (o). A very pathetic one, written by Mr. Neal, will be found in the collection lately publiſhed. Part of what he wrote is as follows: "You may be ſure, we are all greatly "affected with the danger that threatens a life ſo univerſally deſirable, and to us ſo "peculiarly endeared: and our invaluable friend (Mr. Barker) diſſolved not only us, "but great part of his numerous audience, into tears, by a kind of inſpired eloquence, "with which he offered up ſtrong pleas and cries, for your ſupport and revival, to "Him who is able to deliver from death.—My dear friend, I beſeech you not to think "of returning to Northampton, even though you ſhould receive all imaginable bene-"fit at Shrewſbury in the enſuing fortnight, till you have viſited Briſtol; and in prepar-"ing for that expedition, I conceive no time ſhould be loſt, as the ſeaſon for the "waters, as well as of the year, is ſo far advanced. I ſhould tremble for your return "to Northampton at preſent, notwithſtanding ſome encouraging ſymptoms; for a "relapſe could hardly fail of being fatal, and in ſuch a circumſtance would be next "to certain, conſidering your various engagements, and active temper." Speaking of the academy, Mr. Neal adds, "Mr. Clark, I am perſuaded, is able to do what is "fully ſufficient, and will be very acceptable to the truſtees. And I rejoice in his "ability (which I do not at all diſtruſt) to keep the pupils very profitably employed "for ſome time: though I ſhould much rather hear the academy was all diſbanded, "than that you ſhould read a ſingle lecture between this and Michaelmas. In one "word, your whole duty to God and man is comprehended in the care of your health (p)." Another letter, written ſome weeks before by Mr. Barker, though it has been inſerted, at large, both in the Collection mentioned above, and in Mr. Orton's Memoirs, is too intereſting to be omitted, and therefore it ſhall be inſerted in a note [D].

In autumn Dr. Doddridge's phyſicians judged it proper that he ſhould make a trial of the waters of Briſtol; and accordingly he went thither in the month of Auguſt. Upon his arrival at that place, a worthy clergyman of the Eſtabliſhed Church, with whom he had only a ſlight acquaintance, entertained him in the moſt hoſpitable manner, and with a fraternal affection, till he could be accommodated with ſuitable apartments near the wells; and Dr. Maddox, Biſhop of Worceſter, paid him a friendly viſit, and, in very obliging terms, offered to convey him in his chariot at the ſtated times of drinking the water. Little hope of his deriving benefit from it was given him by the phyſicians at Briſtol; and he received their report of the great hazard of his caſe with a fortitude, reſignation, and chearfulneſs, which never forſook him to the laſt, in any place, or on any occaſion. Here he met with ſeveral of his friends, who were deſirous to do all in their power to teſtify their regard for him; and offers of ſervice and aſſiſtance were made to him by ſtrangers, and even by perſons who had formerly conceived prejudices againſt him. A worthy nobleman intereſted himſelf as kindly about the Doctor's health, as if he had long been his intimate friend. Whilſt Dr. Doddridge was at Briſtol, he was viſited by ſome of the principal people of his congregation, who expreſſed an affection for him not to be deſcribed, and who brought with them aſſurances of the ſame affection from the reſt of his flock, and of their ardent and repeated prayers for his recovery. This new proof of their regard afforded him great ſatisfaction and refreſhment. He was directed by his phyſicians to ſpeak and write as little as poſſible; but he could not content himſelf without ſometimes ſending letters, in ſhort hand, to a few choſen friends, expreſſive of the excellent frame of his mind (q).

(4) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 274—277. Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 142—145.

Dr. Doddridge was ſo deeply affected with the friendſhip expreſſed in this letter, and the divine conſolations which it adminiſtered, that there was reaſon to be apprehenſive that his tender frame would have ſunk under the emotions of his gratitude and joy.

The health of Dr. Doddridge continuing ſtill more and more to decline, he was adviſed, as the laſt reſort in ſo threatening a diſorder, to remove to a warmer climate for the Winter. It was propoſed that he ſhould go to Liſbon. In deliberating upon this ſcheme, his principal objection to it was the great expence with which the execution of it would neceſſarily be attended. He doubted whether, with ſo very precarious a hope of its being beneficial to him, he ought to purſue the deſign; when his family, which, in caſe of his deceaſe, would be but ſlenderly provided for, would be conſiderably injured by the voyage. "It will," ſays Mr. Orton, "I hope, appear to every "conſiderate reader, a glorious circumſtance in the Doctor's life, that it was ſacrificed "to the generous, diſintereſted ſervice of his Great Maſter, and benevolence to man-"kind; that, with the advantage of a genius and qualifications equal to the higheſt "advancement in the Eſtabliſhment, and without being chargeable with want of œco-"nomy, he ſhould find himſelf under the painful neceſſity of preſerving the little "remainder of his life, by an expence diſproportionate to the proviſion made for his "family, dear to him as his own life." There happened to be at Briſtol a clergyman of the Church of England, who had not been previouſly acquainted with Dr. Doddridge, but who behaved to him in the kindeſt and moſt reſpectful manner. In converſation with this gentleman, the Doctor undeſignedly threw out a hint of the principal reaſon which cauſed him to demur about the voyage. The benevolent clergyman immediately ſeized the hint, and took an opportunity of expreſſing, before a lady of conſiderable fortune, who was a Diſſenter, his eſteem and reſpect for the Doctor, and the concern it gave him, that a perſon who did ſo much honour to Chriſtianity in general, and to his own denomination in particular, and who (as he was pleaſed to expreſs himſelf) "if his conſcience had not prevented, might have been in one of the firſt "dignities in their Church," ſhould, on account of his circumſtances, be diſcouraged from taking a ſtep, on which perhaps his life depended. He added, that, in his opinion, it would be an everlaſting reproach upon the Diſſenters as a body, if thoſe who knew of his ſituation did not take ſome ſpeedy and vigorous meaſures to remove the difficulty. No ſooner had this gentleman given the hint, and ſet a handſome precedent, than it was chearfully purſued; and the generoſity of Dr. Doddridge's acquaintance at Briſtol and in other places, fully equalled his wants and his wiſhes. Mr. Neal was particularly active in the management of the affair, and had the pleaſure of informing the Doctor, that inſtead of ſelling what our author had in the funds, he ſhould be able, through the benevolence of friends, to add ſomething to it, after the expence of the voyage was defrayed.

Whilſt Dr. Doddridge continued at Briſtol, and his journey was in proſpect, many other pleaſing circumſtances occurred, which tended to lighten his affliction. A ſervant, in particular, of the family where he lodged, offered herſelf to attend him to Liſbon on very reaſonable terms; a propoſal which was the more ſeaſonable and acceptable, as infirm perſons, who deſigned the ſame voyage, uſually found it extremely difficult to procure ſuch attendance, even by large offers (r). Dr. Oliver was at no ſmall pains to prepare every thing for making the journey as comfortable as poſſible; and Mr. Warburton prevailed upon the ſecretary of the Poſt-Office to write to the captain of the packet-boat at Falmouth, to engage him to give Dr. Doddridge the beſt accommodations in his power (s). On the ſeventeenth of September the Doctor left Briſtol, and after a fatiguing journey of ten days, occaſioned partly by the badneſs of the ſeaſon and roads, and partly by his great weakneſs, he arrived at Falmouth. There he was received in the kindeſt manner by Dr. Turner, the phyſician of the place, who generouſly entertained him in his houſe, and recommended him to the care of his nephew, Dr. Cantley, at Liſbon. During Dr. Doddridge's journey and ſtay at Falmouth, his moſt painful and threatening ſymptoms had been ſuſpended; but, on the night before he ſailed, they returned with greater violence then ever. Mrs. Doddridge, therefore, thought it neceſſary to propoſe, that he ſhould either return home, or ſtay a while longer at Falmouth. Having, however, ſome hope from a change of climate, he gave this ſhort anſwer, "The dye is caſt, and I chooſe to go."

The propriety of Dr. Doddridge's voyage to Liſbon has by ſome perſons been doubted; but in this undertaking he acted by the unanimous advice of the moſt competent judges. At Falmouth much civility was ſhewn him by ſeveral of the inhabitants of the place, to whom his friends had written for that purpoſe, and he parted from them with the utmoſt gratitude and tenderneſs. On Monday the thirtieth of September he went on board the packet; and as the captain of it did not happen to go the voyage, the Doctor had the convenience of his cabin, which was no ſmall comfort and advantage to him in his weak condition. Upon the ſailing of the veſſel, the new ſcene which opened upon him, and the ſoft air and freſh breezes of the ſea, had the moſt pleaſing effect on his ſpirits. The ſea ſickneſs was ſeverely felt by Mrs. Doddridge and the ſervant; but happily he himſelf did not ſuffer from it; ſo that he needed their attendance and aſſiſtance leſs than before. He generally ſat, the greateſt part of the day, in an eaſy chair, in the captain's cabbin; and his mind was admirably ſuſtained by delightful views of the Heavenly world. Such ſacred gratitude and joy appeared in his his countenance, as often brought to the remembrance of his lady the following lines in one of his hymns:

When Death o'er nature ſhall prevail,
And all the powers of language fail,
Joy through my ſwimming eyes ſhall break,
And mean the thanks I cannot ſpeak.

In the Bay of Biſcay the veſſel was unhappily becalmed for ſome days; and the weather proved ſo intenſely hot, that Dr. Doddridge's colliquative ſweats returned, attended with a faintneſs that threatend his ſpeedy diſſolution. Providence, however, ſtill lengthened out the feeble thread of life. When the ſhip came to the deſired haven, and was waiting for the uſual ceremonies of entrance, the fineneſs of the day, the ſoftneſs of the air, and the delightful proſpects by which he was ſurrounded, gave him a freſh flow of ſtrength and ſpirits. He ſtayed upon deck about two hours, and derived from it ſuch a ſenſible degree of refreſhment, as to raiſe even a flattering hope of his recovery. On Sunday the thirteenth of October he landed at Liſbon. The next day he wrote to his aſſiſtant at Northampton, giving him a ſhort account of his voyage, of the magnificent appearance which the city made from the ſea, and of what he obſerved in paſſing through the ſtreets. After mentioning his great weakneſs and danger, he added, "Nevertheleſs, "I bleſs God, the moſt undiſturbed ſerenity continues in my mind, and my ſtrength "holds proportion to my day. I ſtill hope and truſt in God, and joyfully acquieſce "in all he may do with me. When you ſee my dear friends of the congregation, "inform them of my circumſtances, and aſſure them, that I chearfully ſubmit myſelf "to God. If I deſire life may be reſtored, it is chiefly that it may be employed in "ſerving Chriſt among them, and that I am enabled by faith to look upon death as "an enemy that ſhall be deſtroyed, and can chearfully leave my dear Mrs. Doddridge "a widow in a ſtrange land, if ſuch be the appointment of our heavenly Father. I "hope I have done my duty, and the Lord do as ſeemeth good in his ſight (t)."

(t) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 290—293.

At Liſbon, Dr. Doddridge was kindly received and entertained at the houſe of Mr. David King, an Engliſh merchant, whoſe mother was one of the Doctor's congregation, and who had now an opportunity he could never have expected, but which he gladly embraced, of repaying the many ſervices that had been done for his relations at Northampton. In this worthy family our author found the moſt cordial friendſhip, and every accommodation that could tend to alleviate his diſorder. Here he happened to meet with Dr. Watts's Treatiſe on the Happineſs of ſeparate Spirits. which, being a work entirely coincident with his own ſentiments, delighted him in a peculiar manner. In reading this book, Dr. Watts's Hymns, and eſpecially the Scriptures, he employed as much time as his ſtrenglh would admit. At Liſbon he found a family related to Mrs. Doddridge, as well as other kind friends, who, either from a knowledge of his character, or from having received voluntary letters of recommendation, ſhewed him all the civility in their power, and indeed ſeemed to ſtrive who ſhould moſt excel in diſplaying for him an aſſiduous and tender regard. From their company he derived pleaſure, though it was attended with the painful circumſtance of his not being able to converſe with them as freely as he could have wiſhed to have done. The Rev. Mr. Williamſon in particular, then Chaplain to the Britiſh factory, frequently viſited him, with the temper and behaviour of the Gentleman, the Chriſtian, and the Divine.

About a week after Dr. Doddridge's arrival, by the advice of his phyſician, Dr. Cantley, who attended him without receiving the uſual fees, he was removed into the country, a few miles from Liſbon. This, however, was productive of no advantage; for the rainy ſeaſon, which in that climate uſually ſets-in about the latter end of October, came on with ſuch uncommon violence, as not only to preclude any aſſiſtance from air and exerciſe, but to add greatly to his complaints. On the twenty-fourth of October he was ſeized with a colliquative diarrhœa, which ſoon exhauſted his little ſtrength. Nevertheleſs, during the ſucceeding night, which ſeemed the laſt of rational life, he preſerved the ſame calmneſs, vigour, and joy of mind, which he had felt and expreſſed through the whole of his illneſs. The only pain he had in the thought of dying, was the fear of that grief and diſtreſs which Mrs. Doddridge would ſuffer from his removal. To his children, his congregation, and his friends in general, he deſired to be remembered in the moſt affectionate manner; nor did he forget the family where he lodged, or his own ſervant, in the effuſions of his pious benevolence. Many devout ſentiments and aſpirations were uttered by him; but Mrs. Doddridge's heart was too much affected with his approaching change, to be able to recollect them diſtinctly. On the following day he lay in a gentle doſe, in which he continued till an hour before his death. At the laſt ſtruggle he appeared reſtleſs, and fetched ſeveral deep ſighs, ſoon after which he obtained his releaſe. This event took place on Saturday the twenty-ſixth of October, old ſtyle, about three o'clock in the morning: and though he died in a foreign land, and in a certain ſenſe among ſtrangers, his deceaſe was embalmed with many tears. Not only the principal gentlemen of the factory, but even their ſervants, manifeſted a high ſenſe of Dr. Doddridge's worth, and of the greatneſs of the public loſs. A circumſtance which afforded much ſatisfaction to Mrs. Doddridge, and her Liſbon friends, was, that the Doctor, in his laſt ſcenes, was not moleſted by the officious zeal of any of the prieſts of the Church of Rome. Agreeably to the deſire which he had expreſſed before his death, his body was opened, when his lungs were found in ſo ulcerated a ſtate, that it appeared ſurpriſing to the phyſician that his ſpeaking and breathing had not been far more difficult and painful to him than in fact they were, even to the laſt.

Dr. Doddridge had frequently expreſſed a wiſh of being buried at his meeting-place at Northampton, where his children and ſo many of his congregation and friends were depoſited. However, during his illneſs, he ſpoke of this as a matter quite indifferent to him; and, to avoid increaſing the diſtreſs of his afflicted conſort, was deſirous of being interred wherever he ſhould die. It was found, upon enquiry, that the removal of the body to England would occaſion a very large expence, and therefore it was judged moſt prudent to decline it. Accordingly, his remains were conveyed to the burying-ground belonging to the Britiſh factory at Liſbon, with as much decency and reſpect as circumſtances and the place would admit. The greater part of the gentlemen of the factory attended his funeral; and Mr. Williamſon, on the following Sunday, preached a ſermon, in which he gave him a high and honourable character, founded on what he had heard from many, of his worth, and on what he had himſelf ſeen, during the opportunities he had had of converſing with him (v).

(v) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 293—297.

Though Dr. Doddridge's congregation had not the melancholy ſatisfaction of having him interred at his own meeting-houſe, they erected in it a handſome monument to his memory, and made a generous preſent to his widow after her return. The inſcription, which was drawn up by the Doctor's much eſteemed and ingenious friend, Gilbert Weſt, Eſq. was as follows:

To the memory of
PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.
Twenty-one years Paſtor of this church,
Director of a flouriſhing Academy
And Author of many excellent Writings;
By which
His pious, benevolent, and indefatigable zeal
To make men wiſe, good, and happy,
Will far better be made known,
And perpetuated much longer,
Than by this obſcure and periſhable marble;
The humble monument, not of his praiſe,
But of their eſteem, affection, and regret,
Who knew him, loved him, and lament him;
And who are deſirous of recording,
In this inſcription,
Their friendly but faithful teſtimony
To the many amiable and Chriſtian virtues
That adorned his more private character;
By which, though dead, he yet ſpeaketh,
And, ſtill preſent in remembrance,
Forcibly, though ſilently, admoniſheth
His once-beloved and ever-grateful flock.
He was born June 26, 1702,
And died Oct. 26, 1751.
Aged 50 (u).

(u) Ibid. p. 298.

The ſituation of Mrs. Doddridge, during the ſad ſcene through which ſhe paſſed, will juſtly be conſidered as peculiarly melancholy and affecting. She had accompanied her huſband to a foreign land, and had been witneſs to the painful event of his death. Through the goodneſs of God ſhe was enabled to preſerve fortitude and ſerenity in the midſt of her deep affliction. What the ſtate of her mind was, is finely repreſented in a letter which ſhe wrote to her children from Liſbon, a few days after the Doctor's deceaſe, and which has lately been printed, for the firſt time, in the Gentleman's Magazine. It will be found below [E]. In her voyage homeward, and upon her return

[E] It will be found below.

"Liſbon, Nov. 11, N. S. 1751.

"My dear children,

"How ſhall I addreſs you under this awful and "melancholy Providence! I would fain ſay ſome-"thing to comfort you. And I hope God will "enable me to ſay ſomething that may alleviate "your deep diſtreſs. I went out in a firm depend-"ence that, if Infinite Wiſdom was pleaſed to call "me out to duties and trials as yet unknown, he "would return to her family, ſhe was ſtrengthened and ſupported beyond what could have been expected. By the circumſtance of Dr. Doddridge's dying abroad ſhe loſt a conſiderable annuity, which he had provided for her in caſe of widowhood, and to which ſhe would otherwiſe have been entitled. To this conſequence of his voyage, ſhould he die abroad, the Doctor was totally a ſtranger; and it was happy for him that he was never acquainted with it, ſince it muſt have lien with weight upon his ſpirits. The generoſity of his friends was active to compenſate for the loſs which Mrs. Doddridge had ſuſtained. A ſubſcription was opened for her, chiefly in London, and, in a great meaſure, under the direction of Mr. Neal, whoſe kind offices to Dr. Doddridge's family were eminent and invariable. In a ſhort time a ſum was raiſed, which was more than equal to the forfeiture of the annuity. Beſides this, Mrs. Doddridge received ſeveral other handſome preſents, which were ſent her as ſubſcriptions to the Family Expoſitor, from perſons of rank, both among the clergy and laity of the Eſtabliſhed Church. The manner in which theſe benefactions were communicated heightened their value. They were beſtowed with ſo much delicacy, and reflected ſuch high honour on Dr. Doddridge's memory, that ſhe retained a deep impreſſion of them to the lateſt hour of her life. Another inſtance of regard that was paid her, was, that the diſſenting miniſters in the neighbourhood of Northampton, and the pupils who had begun to preach, ſupplied the doctor's congregation, during his abſence, and for half a year after his deceaſe, that the ſalary might be continued to his family for that time (w).

(w) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 299, 300.

" would grant me thoſe ſuperior aids of ſtrength " that would ſupport and keep me from fainting " under them; perſuaded that there was no diſtreſs " or ſorrow, into which he could lead me, under " which his gracious and all-ſufficient arm could not " ſupport me. He has not diſappointed me, nor " ſuffered the heart and eyes directed to him to fail. " God all-ſufficient, and my only hope," is my " motto: let it be yours. Such, indeed, have I " found him; and ſuch, I verily believe, you will " find him too in this time of deep diſtreſs.

" Oh! my dear children, help me to praiſe him! " Such ſupports, ſuch conſolations, ſuch comforts " has he granted to the meaneſt of his creatures " that my mind, at times, is held in perfect aſtoniſh- " ment, and is ready to burſt into ſongs of praiſe " under its moſt exquiſite diſtreſs.

" As to outward comforts, God has withheld no " good thing from me, but has given me all the " aſſiſtance, and all the ſupports, that the tendereſt " friendſhip was capable of affording me, and which " I think my dear Northampton friends could not " have exceeded. Their prayers are not loſt. I doubt " not but I am reaping the benefit of them, and hope " that you will do the ſame.

" I am returned to good Mr. King's. Be good to " poor Mrs. King. It is a debt of gratitude I owe " for the great obligations I am under to that worthy " family here. Such a ſolicitude of friendſhip was " ſurely hardly ever known as I meet with here. " I have the offers of friendſhip more than I can " employ; and it gives a real concern to many here " that they cannot find out a way to ſerve me. Theſe " are great honours conferred on the dear deceaſed, " and great comforts to me. It is impoſſible to ſay " how much theſe mercies are endeared to me, as " coming in ſuch an immediate manner from the " Divine Hand. To his name be the praiſe and " glory of all!

" And now, my dear children, what ſhall I ſay to " you? Ours is no common loſs. I mourn the beſt " of huſbands and of friends, removed from this " world of ſin and ſorrow to the regions of immortal " bliſs and light. What a glory! What a mercy " is it that I am enabled with my thoughts to purſue " him there! You have loſt the deareſt and beſt of " parents, the guide of your youth! and whoſe " pleaſure it would have been to have introduced you " into life with great advantages.

" Our loſs is great indeed! But I really think " the loſs the public has ſuſtained is ſtill greater. " But God can never want inſtruments to carry on " his work. Yet, let us be thankful that God ever " gave us ſuch a friend; that he has continued him " ſo long with us. Perhaps, if we had been to have " judged, we ſhould have thought that we nor the " world could never leſs have ſpared him than at " the preſent time. But I ſee the hand of Heaven, " the appointment of his wiſe Providence, in every " ſtep of this awful diſpenſation. It is his hand " that has put the bitter cup into ours. And what " does he now expect from us but a meek, humble, " entire ſubmiſſion to his will! We know this is " our duty. Let us pray for thoſe aids of his Spirit, " which can only enable us to attain it. A father " of the fatherleſs is God in his holy habitation. " As ſuch may your eyes be directed to him! He " will ſupport you. He will comfort you. And " that he may, is not only my daily, but hourly " prayer.

" We have never deſerved ſo great a good as " that we have loſt. And let us remember, that " the beſt reſpect we can pay to his memory is to " endeavour, as far as we can, to follow his example, " to cultivate thoſe amiable qualities that rendered " him ſo juſtly dear to us, and ſo greatly eſteemed " by the world. Particularly I would recommend " this to my dear P. May I have the joy to ſee " him acting the part worthy the relation to ſo " amiable and excellent a parent, whoſe memory, I " hope, will ever be valuable and ſacred to him and " to us all! Under God, may he be a comfort to " me, and a ſupport to the family! Much depends " on him. His loſs I think peculiarly great. But " I know an all-ſufficient God can over-rule it as " the means of the greateſt good to him.

" It is impoſſible for me to tell you how ten- " derly my heart feels for you all! how much I " long to be with you to comfort and aſſiſt you. " Indeed, you are the only inducements I now have " left to wiſh for life, that I may do what little is " in my power to form and guide your tender years. " For this purpoſe I take all poſſible care of my " health. I eat, ſleep, and converſe at times with " a tolerable degree of chearfulneſs. You, my dears, " as the beſt return you can make me, will do the " ſame, that I may not have ſorrow upon ſorrow. " The many kind friends you have around you, I " am ſure, will not be wanting in giving you all the " aſſiſtance and comfort that is in their power. My " kindeſt ſalutations attend them all.

" I hope to leave this place in about fourteen or " twenty days. But the ſooneſt I can reach North- " ampton will not be in leſs than ſix weeks or two " months time. May God be with you, and give " us, though a mournful, yet a comfortable meeting! " For your ſakes I truſt my life will be ſpared. And, " I bleſs God, my mind is under no painful anxiety " as to the difficulties and dangers of the voyage.

" The winds and the waves are in his hands, to " whom I reſign myſelf, and all that is deareſt to me. " I know I ſhall have your prayers, and thoſe of " my deareſt friends with you.

" Farewell, my deareſt children! I am your " afflicted, but moſt ſincere friend, and ever affec- " tionate mother,

" M. DODDRIDGE (5)." (5) Gent. Mag. Vol. LXI, p. 834, 835.

Dr. Doddridge's funeral ſermon was preached by Mr. Orton, who was in every view the propereſt perſon for that ſervice. On what day it was delivered does not appear from the copy now lying before me. The text was, 1 Cor. xv. 54, and the words, "Death is ſwallowed up in victory." In a ſhort time the diſcourſe was publiſhed, and had an extenſive circulation, under the title of "The Chriſtian's Triumph over "Death." It has ſince been annexed to the three volumes of the Doctor's Sermons and religious Tracts. Mr. Orton did not enter largely into the character of his revered and beloved friend, having probably then formed the deſign of writing his life.

The Muſes were not ſilent on Dr. Doddridge's deceaſe. A poem to his memory was publiſhed by a young gentleman, who, at the time of compoſing it, was a pupil at his academy. The author was Mr. Henry More, who afterwards ſettled in Devonſhire, of which county he is a native, and who is now a diſſenting miniſter at Leſkard in Cornwall. By his friends he is known, not only to be an ingenious poet, but a ſound ſcholar, eſpecially in Biblical criticiſm. The following lines will afford an agreeable ſpecimen of the merit of the poem.

Her bays each Science ſcatters on thy bier;
Each ſocial Virtue drops the friendly tear.
Beneath a mould'ring temple's awful ſhade,
Among the ſolemn nodding ruins laid,
Religion weeps; her boſom ſwelled with care
Heaves the ſad ſigh, half yielding to deſpair;
But chearful Faith ſuſtains her drooping head,
And whiſpers comfort to the fainting maid.
But ah! what power of language can expreſs
The widow'd conſort's woe? What keen diſtreſs
Tore all her heart-ſtrings, when thy trembling ſight
Snatch'd a fond farewell glance, and clos'd in night?
When the felt pulſe, that at her touch before
Beat with a fuller tide, now throbbed no more?
In foreign lands, abandon'd, and alone,
She heard a darling huſband's parting groan:
No children there receiv'd his laſt command,
Wept round the couch and kiſs'd his dying hand:
No ſad domeſtic bore the ſable bier;
No mournful pupil pour'd the tender tear:
No ſoothing friend to miniſter relief,
And, by dividing, mitigate her grief:
She ſolitary brooded o'er her care,
Her only refuge placed in Heav'n and prayer.
And when, her native country to regain,
She meaſured back the wide-extended main,
As the fleet veſſel flew before the wind,
How many a melting look ſhe turn'd behind!
How, till in undiſtinguiſh'd vapour loſt,
Caught each faint glance of the receding coaſt,
Where now, for ever from her eyes remov'd,
Lie the bleſt relics of the man ſhe lov'd!
That dear ſad ſight ſhe never more muſt view,
Her longing eyes have look'd their laſt adieu:
That dear ſad ſight ſhe wiſhes now in vain,
While ocean rolls unnumber'd waves between.

Dr. Doddridge was not handſome in his perſon. In ſtature he was ſomewhat above the middle ſize, with a ſtoop in his ſhoulders, and he was very thin and ſlender. But when he was engaged in converſation, or employed in the pulpit, there was a remarkable ſprightlineſs and vivacity in his countenance and manner, which commanded a general attention (x). Mrs. Doddridge ſurvived her huſband nearly forty years; all which time ſhe exhibited an eminent pattern of the Chriſtian virtues. She departed this life at Tewkeſbury, in Glouceſterſhire, where ſhe had long reſided. The Doctor left four children; one ſon, and three daughters. Philip, the ſon, was brought up to the law, and ſettled as an attorney at Tewkesbury, where he died ſeveral years ago. The eldeſt daughter married Mr. Humphreys, an attorney of the ſame place. She and her two ſiſters, who are ſingle, are ſtill living.

(x) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 301.

It was a happy circumſtance, that, at the time of Dr. Doddridge's illneſs and deceaſe, he had for his aſſiſtant in the Academy Mr. Samuel Clark, the ſon of his friend Dr. Clark. In this gentleman were united wiſdom, knowledge, and an uncommon equanimity and ſteadineſs of temper. Indeed, though very young, he was well qualified to have been choſen to ſucceed Dr. Doddridge in the office of principal tutor; but this his modeſty would not have permitted; and, upon the whole, it was undoubtedly proper that a man of more advanced life ſhould be appointed. The perſon elected by Mr. Coward's truſtees, and who had been recommended by Dr. Doddridge in his will, was the Rev. Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Caleb Aſhworth, of Daventry, to which place the academy was removed in the Autumn of 1752. Dr. Aſhworth diſcharged the duties of the truſt with great fidelity and diligence, and with an ability that increaſed as he proceeded in his employment. Mr. Clark continued as his aſſiſtant for ſeveral years; and, in ſo doing, contributed, in no ſmall degree, to the uſefulneſs and ſucceſs of the inſtitution. Whilſt he was at Daventry he preached and publiſhed a ſermon on occaſion of the earthquake at Liſbon. He afterwards ſettled at the Old Meeting at Birmingham, where he was highly and juſtly reſpected and eſteemed, not only by his own congregation, but by all who knew him. On Sunday the third of December, 1769, he was unhappily killed, in the prime of his days, by a fall from his horſe, as he was ſetting out to preach in the neighbourhood. The funeral diſcourſe for him was delivered and printed by his friend Dr. Aſhworth, under the title of "The Regards a Chriſtian "Congregation owe to their deceaſed Miniſters, repreſented and urged."

Of the writings of Dr. Doddridge, which were publiſhed in his life-time, we have already taken notice. With regard to his grand work, the Family Expoſitor, three volumes were ſtill to make their appearance. Happily he had finiſhed the whole of the copy, in ſhort hand, a few ſlight notes towards the concluſion excepted; and the larger part had been tranſcribed for the preſs. This was the caſe with all the fourth volume, the preface to which had been written by our author. In 1754 that volume was publiſhed, containing St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans, and his firſt and ſecond Epiſtles to the Corinthians. "As far as I know myſelf," ſays the Doctor, "I have no "favourite hypotheſis to ſerve, nor a fondneſs for any unſcriptural phraſes; in which "ſo many have, on one ſide, and on the other, made the very being of orthodoxy to "conſiſt. I have been diſpoſed to let Scripture carry me along with it, wherever it "naturally leads, rather than reſolve it ſhould follow me. Inſtead of labouring to "eſtabliſh any human ſyſtem, which has always, I fear, a leaven of imperfection at-"tending it, I have endeavoured to keep controverſy as much out of ſight as poſſible, "and to repreſent what I verily believe to be the Scripture doctrine, in as ſimple a "manner as I could, and diveſted of thoſe particular expreſſions, which ſome, who "perhaps are not averſe to the main doctrine itſelf, are ready to riſe up againſt." One rule of interpretation laid down by Dr. Doddridge was, when the text and context will bear two meanings, to prefer that which gives the nobleſt and moſt extenſive ſenſe, and might make the paſſage in queſtion moſt univerſally uſeful. Plauſible, however, as this rule may appear, there is danger, unleſs it be exerciſed with peculiar judgment, of its being occaſionally productive of error. In fact, the buſineſs of a commentator on Scripture is to find out the ſingle original ſignification of the language uſed by the ſacred writers, and not to indulge his imagination in giving a ſcope to words beyond what was at firſt ſpecifically intended.

In the beginning of the year 1755, Mr. Orton publiſhed a Collection of Dr. Doddridge's Hymns. Few of the Doctor's works have been more generally acceptable, the ſixth edition of them having appeared in 1788. Indeed, they are, upon the whole well calculated to anſwer the purpoſes of Chriſtian devotion; and, being all of them founded upon particular texts of Scripture, cannot fail of being uſeful to miniſters who preach on the ſame texts. With reſpect to poetical merit, if they cannot be placed in a high rank, they have enough of it for the immediate view which they were intended to anſwer. As the author had not ſo good an ear as Dr. Watts, his numbers are not equally flowing and harmonious. It may be mentioned to his praiſe, that he has not indulged to the extravagancies which Dr. Watts has fallen into, eſpecially in the firſt book of his hymns. I obſerve with pleaſure, that Dr. Doddridge has not taken a ſingle ſubject from the Canticles.

The two remaining volumes of the Family Expoſitor, being the fifth and ſixth, were publiſhed by Mr. Orton in 1756. From the editor's advertiſement it appears, that Dr. Doddridge had himſelf tranſcribed for the preſs the paraphraſe, improvememts, and notes, of the fourth and fifth volumes, and the paraphraſe and improvements of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, and the two firſt Epiſtles of St. John. The notes on theſe three Epiſtles, together with the paraphraſe, improvements, and notes, on the remaining Epiſtles and the "Revelation," were carefully tranſcribed either by Mr. Orton himſelf, or by ſome of the Doctor's pupils, and the tranſcript was compared ſeveral times with the ſhort-hand copy. An accident which, during the author's life, happened to part of the original manuſcript, deſerves to be recorded. In June 1750, a fire broke out in his ſtudy, occaſioned by a wax candle's being left on his writing-deſk, and conſumed many of his papers, and, in particular, part of one volume of the ſhort-hand copy of the Family Expoſitor. The light of the fire being, however, providentially diſcovered by an oppoſite neighbour, who gave an immediate alarm, it was ſpeedily extinguiſhed. When the Doctor was informed of the accident, he ſeemed moſt anxious about the preſervation of this manuſcript; and, when the flames were quenched, it appeared, to his great joy and ſurpriſe, that only that part of the volume which had been tranſcribed was deſtroyed; that the tranſcript lay in another place out of danger; and that all the untranſcribed pages were perfectly legible, the edges of them only being ſinged. "Being an eye-witneſs," ſays Mr. Orton, "of the danger and deliver-"ance, I record this account of it,—chiefly as it ſeems to denote a particular care of "Providence in preſerving this work, and a favourable omen, that God intends it for "extenſive and laſting uſefulneſs." Thoſe who may not carry their reflections ſo far as Mr. Orton has done, will ſympathize with Dr. Doddridge in the pleaſure which he received in having his manuſcript preſerved.

Of all our author's writings, the Family Expoſitor is the moſt important and valuable. It is the work in which he took the greateſt pains, and on which his literary reputation principally depends. Many of his notes diſplay a ſagacious and judicious ſpirit of criticiſm; and the practical reflections are of general utility. How well the work has been received by the learned and pious world, is apparent from the continued demand for it down to the preſent time; nor is its popularity likely to decreaſe. It is the ſeventh edition which is now called for by the public; not to mention the ſeparate impreſſions of it that have appeared in Scotland and Ireland. In paſſing a juſt encomium on the Family Expoſitor, it will not be underſtood that there is any deſign of aſſerting that it is a performance which is totally exempt from imperfections and errors. Such is not the character of the beſt human productions. Diverſities of ſentiment will occur with regard to Dr. Doddridge's interpretations of particular paſſages, and his criticiſms upon them. Perhaps likewiſe, in ſome inſtances, his paraphraſes may be deemed rather too redundant. But no obſervations of this kind are inconſiſtent with allowing to the work the praiſe of its contributing, in a high degree, to Chriſtian inſtruction and improvement. The proper inference to be drawn from any miſtakes into which the moſt ſucceſsful elucidations of the Scriptures have fallen, is, not to depreciate their general merit, but to avoid placing an undue confidence on their authority. While we thankfully derive from them the aſſiſtance they are capable of affording us in our enquiries into the meaning of the ſacred oracles, we ſhould freely examine, and impartially judge for ourſelves.

Dr. Doddridge thought it would contribute to the uſefulneſs of his expoſition, to digeſt the hiſtory of the four Evangeliſts into one continued ſeries, or, in other words, to throw it into the order of an harmony. If ſuch an harmony could be effectually and deciſively aſcertained, each ſtory and diſcourſe would be exhibited with all its concurrent circumſtances, as recorded by the ſacred penmen; frequent repetitions would be prevented; and a multitude of ſeeming oppoſitions be ſo evidently reconciled as to ſuperſede many objections. Theſe undoubtedly are deſirable objects, and the attainment of them is worthy of being ſought for. We are indebted to the exertions of thoſe gentlemen who have laboured in this field of theological literature. Where they have not ſufficiently ſucceeded in the main point, they have, by their reſearches, been enabled to throw a new and beautiful light on many paſſages of the evangelical hiſtorians. That there is no ſmall difficulty in the general ſubject, is manifeſt from the various ſyſtems that have been formed upon it by the ableſt ſcholars, and the moſt judicious critics.

One part of Dr. Doddridge's Family Expoſitor, which muſt have coſt him uncommon pains, was his having every where interwoven the text with the paraphraſe, and carefully diſtinguiſhed the former from the latter by the italic character. By this method it is impoſſible to read the paraphraſe without the text; and every one may immediately ſee, not only the particular clauſe to which any explication anſwers, but alſo what are the words of the original, and what merely the ſenſe of the commentator. Nor was our author content with barely inſerting the old tranſlation, but gave an entire new verſion of the whole Teſtament, the merit and uſefulneſs of which will in many reſpects be acknowledged. This tranſlation was extracted from the paraphraſe, and publiſhed in 1765, in two volumes, 12mo, with ſome alterations and improvements by the editor, together with an introduction, and a number of very ſhort notes.

The laſt work of Dr. Doddridge which was given to the public, was his "Courſe of "Lectures on the principal Subjects of Pneumatology, Ethics, and Divinity; with "References to the moſt conſiderable Authors on each Subject." Of the nature and value of theſe Lectures, which appeared in 1763, in one volume, quarto, I have already ſpoken. As another edition may probably ſoon be demanded, it may not be amiſs to ſuggeſt, that it would be extremely uſeful to enlarge the liſt of references, by introducing the names and productions of thoſe writers who have treated upon the ſeveral matters in queſtion ſince the Doctor's deceaſe. To a perſon converſant in the hiſtory of controverſies this would be no very difficult taſk; and it might, in particular, eaſily be executed by any gentleman who, as a tutor, has made uſe of the Lectures as a text-book, and who conſequently has been in the habit of referring to ſucceeding authors.

If Providence had continued Dr. Doddridge's life, he would undoubtedly have endeavoured to extend his uſefulneſs by many other publications. He intended to print a ſermon to children, and ſome ſacramental meditations. A conſiderable progreſs had been made by him in a "Diſſertation on the Jewiſh Proſelytes," the deſign of which was to defend that opinion concerning them which he mentions in ſome of his notes upon the Acts of the Apoſtles. Another work, which he had nearly completed, and in which he diſplayed his critical knowledge of the Hebrew language, was a new Tranſlation of the minor Prophets. Neither the Diſſertation on the Jewiſh Proſelytes, nor the Tranſlation of the minor Prophets, were thought to be left in a ſufficient ſtate of perfection to be given to the world (y). The loſs with regard to the laſt of theſe objects is the leſs to be regretted, as the buſineſs hath ſince been executed with ſo much judgment and learning by the excellent Biſhop Newcome.

(y) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 107. 124.

Upon Dr. Doddridge's works in general it would be eaſy to produce a variety of encomiums. The applauſes he received were numerous; and what added to their value was, that they came from men by whom it was an honour to be applauded. Nor was it by the learned among the Diſſenters only that his abilities and writings were held in high eſtimation, but by many illuſtrious ornaments of the Church of England. This is abundantly apparent from the collection of letters lately publiſhed. There will be found, together with the praiſes of a Barker, a Miles, a Neal, a Leland, and a Lardner, thoſe of a Coſtard, a Warburton, an Oliver, a Newton, a Secker, an Ayſcough, a Grey, a Hunt, a Gilbert Weſt, a Maddox, a Sherlock, a Hildeſley, a Ducheſs of Somerſet, and a Lord Lyttelton. "I have read," ſays Biſhop Secker, "your works with great ſatisfaction, and, "I hope, ſome benefit; and both rejoice and wonder that, in the midſt of your other "occupations, you continue able, as I pray God you long may, to oblige your fellow Chriſ- "tians ſo often and ſo highly from the preſs. Indeed it muſt and ought to be owned in "general, that the Diſſenters have done excellently of late years in the ſervice of Chriſ- "tianity; and I hope our common welfare will make us chiefly attentive to our common "intereſt, and unite us in a cloſer alliance." By the way, the Biſhop, in the ſame letter, has gently and properly rebuked Dr. Doddridge for the extravagantly compli- mental ſtrain of his epiſtles. "I return you many thanks for your favourable opinion "both of my ſermon and its author, though expreſſed in a manner which you would "have forborn, if you had known me better. Plain men ſhould be treated in a plain "way: and nobody ſhould have things ſaid to him which he doth not deſerve; and "ought not to hear if he did. Let us all endeavour to do what good we can; and "give thoſe who ſeem to endeavour it faithfully, the comfort of knowing we think they "do; but never tempt one another to forget we are unprofitable ſervants (z)."

(z) Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 278.

The reception which Dr. Doddridge's writings met with abroad deſerves to be ſpeci- fically noticed. It appears that the moſt conſiderable of them have been tranſlated into foreign languages. His Sermons on Regeneration, Salvation by Grace, on the Power and Grace of Chriſt, and his Letter on Family Prayer, have been publiſhed in the Dutch tongue. The Memoirs of Colonel Gardiner have appeared in the Dutch, French, and German languages; and the Riſe and Progreſs of Religion in the ſame languages, to which may be added the Daniſh. It is obſervable, that the tranſlation of the laſt work into French was undertaken by the particular encouragement of the late Prince and Princeſs of Orange, and a number of the gentry in Holland. A Proteſtant Prince of the Empire promiſed to recommend it to thoſe about him; and it was ſubſcribed for by many perſons of quality and rich citizens in Germany and Switzerland. Some learned men undertook to tranſlate the former volumes of the Family Expoſitor into German; but the publication of it was oppoſed by ſeveral of the Lutheran clergy, from an apprehenſion that Dr. Doddridge's interpretation of particular paſſages, and his reflections upon them, might not agree with their eſtabliſhed principles, or form of Church government. To remove their terrors, the perſons concerned in the tranſlation firſt publiſhed the Sermons on Regeneration in that language; the candour and mode- ration of which had ſuch an effect in quieting the oppoſition that the other work was completed (a)."

(a) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 123, 124.

Such was the eſtimation in which Dr. Doddridge's writings have been held, and con- tinue to be held, both at home and abroad. It does not, however, hence follow, that his moſt ſincere admirers will think themſelves obliged to concur with him in every ſentiment and every expreſſion. Many judicious perſons have wiſhed that his devotional treatiſes had been more accommodated to univerſal uſe, by a leſs Calviniſtical turn of opinion and language. "I reckon it one unhappineſs," ſays Mr. Jones of Welwyn, "of this excellent man (my much reſpected friend) that, having early imbibed the no- "tions of ſome particular ſyſtems, he could not diſlodge them out of his mind in his "age of riper judgment. This hath been obſerved by others." Mr. Jones adds, that the Doctor's parts were uncommon, his learning great, his moderation equally ſo, and his life and conduct truly Chriſtian (b). Upon the whole, whatever diverſity of judg- ment may be formed on different points, the grand end which Dr. Doddridge had in view, view, and the generally ufeful tendency of his works, cannot be denied. In every thing which he wrote, his aim was to promote the great purpoſes of practical religion.

The narrative which has now been given of Dr. Doddridge's life, has diſplayed the principal circumſtances that illuſtrate his temper and conduct. Nevertheleſs, I cannot diſmiſs the ſubject without entering into a general view of his character. This I am induced to do, partly as it will afford me an opportunity of mentioning ſome things not hitherto noticed, and partly becauſe I have the felicity, in the preſent caſe, of writing from an intimate perſonal knowledge; which is a ſatisfaction that has not frequently occurred in the numerous lives I have had occaſion to lay before the public. The view which I ſhall take of our author will be of his intellectual, and of his religious and moral qualities.

I do not know that genius can be aſcribed to Dr. Doddridge, taking that word in its higheſt ſignification, as employing either a great inventive faculty in ſcience, or that boldneſs of imagination which is productive of original imagery and combinations. In a lower and more popular ſenſe of the term, he might be ſaid to have been a man of genius; for he had a quick conception and a lively fancy. He had a comprehenſion of mind that enabled him to proceed with celerity and vigour in the acquiſition of knowledge; and that activity of his mental frame, which put it into his power to learn much in a little time, was happily accompanied with an invincible reſolution and perſeverance in the proſecution of his ſtudies. In conſequence of his uncommon application, he might even with moderate abilities have laid up a large ſtock of various learning; and therefore it is not ſurpriſing that this ſhould be the caſe with him, when it is conſidered that he was endued with a quickneſs of apprehenſion, and a remarkable ſtrength of memory. So extenſive was his acquaintance with books, that there were few on the general ſubjects of literature which he had not peruſed with attention; and he could retain and eaſily recollect what in them was moſt worthy to be remembered. Of ancient knowledge he had a conſiderable ſtore. With regard to the learned languages, if he could not be called a profound linguiſt, he was ſufficiently verſed in them to read the moſt valuable pieces of antiquity with taſte and pleaſure. This is apparent from his paraphraſe and notes on the New Teſtament, in which he has frequently illuſtrated the force and beauty of the originals with great judgment, and in the true ſpirit of criticiſm (c).

(c) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 105—107.

Dr. Doddridge was well acquainted with the Greek philoſophers and orators, among the laſt of whom he was particularly devoted to Demoſthenes. To the poets of Greece he was far from being a ſtranger; but he was not, I think, deeply converſant with its tragedians. I remember, while I reſided with him, his having read Pindar with much admiration. With the Latin claſſics he was largely acquainted. As became a divine and a theological tutor, he diligently ſtudied the ancient fathers, eſpecially of the three firſt centuries. He paid particular regard to the apologiſts for Chriſtianity, and was a great maſter of Origen and Euſebius. Beyond the fourth century his knowledge of this ſpecies of literature did not, I believe, widely extend, though it did not wholly ſtop there. With eccleſiaſtical hiſtory he had a large acquaintance, and civil hiſtory engaged no ſmall degree of his attention. To this he applied not only to enrich his memory with facts, but to make ſuch reflections upon them, as tended either to promote his inſight into human nature, to exemplify the interpoſitions of Providence, or to explain and illuſtrate the Sacred Writings.

Though Dr. Doddridge's diſpoſition rather led him to cultivate the more polite than the abſtruſer parts of ſcience, he was far from being a ſtranger to mathematical and philoſophical ſtudies. The ſyſtem of Algebra which he read to his pupils was of his own compoſition. But the favourite object of his application, and that in which his principal excellency lay, was divinity, taking that word in its largeſt ſenſe. Whatever could tend to ſtrengthen the proofs of natural or revealed religion, to aſſiſt our conceptions of the divine nature, or enable us more perfectly to underſtand the doctrines and diſcoveries of Scripture, he thought deſerving of the moſt attentive regard. To the evidences of the Jewiſh and Chriſtian revelation he had paid uncommon attention, and how complete a maſter he was of the ſubject is apparent from his Lectures. Perhaps there were few men who had more carefully ſtudied the different ſyſtems of theology, or who could point out their ſeveral defects with greater accuracy and judgment. While he was not one of thoſe who affect to treat with contempt the labours of the wiſe and the learned who have gone before them, but was always ready to receive whatever light they could afford him, nevertheleſs, without a ſlaviſh regard to human ſchemes, he took the ſacred oracles for his guide, and always referred to them for the proofs of the doctrinal ſentiments which he maintained. Upon the whole, I entirely agree with Mr. Orton, that, though others might exceed him in their acquaintance with antiquity, or their ſkill in the languages, he was ſurpaſſed by few in the extent of his learning, and in the variety of uſeful and important knowledge of which he was poſſeſſed (d).

With

With theſe ſtores of information, it was a great advantage to Dr. Doddridge that he had an uncommon facility of ſpeaking and of writing. He uſed to deſcant, in his Lectures, on the ſubjects treated of with ſurpriſing perſpicuity and freedom; and the ſame perſpicuity and freedom attended him when he took the pen in hand. This was owing to the orderly diſpoſition in which things lay in his mind. As his own ideas on the points he had ſtudied were clear and diſtinct, ſo his method of arranging his thoughts was uncommonly juſt and natural. There are, perhaps, few diſcourſes in our language which excel thoſe which were uſually delivered by our author, either in the accuracy of the diviſions, or the adaptation of the ſentiments to the ſubject diſcuſſed. According to the faſhion that now prevails, he may poſſibly be thought to have ſometimes laid down and recapitulated his ſcheme in too formal a manner. But, if he rather exceeded in this reſpect, his error had the advantage of aſſiſting the memory, and contributing to the inſtruction of his hearers and readers.

Though Dr. Doddridge's invincible perſeverance in ſtudy has already been mentioned, I am deſirous of enlarging a little farther upon it. Literary diligence is a matter which I have always earneſtly wiſhed to preſs on every young man of liberal education with whom I have had acquaintance. When accompanied with original genius, it is the parent of all that is great and valuable in ſcience; and where there is not much of original genius, provided there be a tolerable capacity, it is endued with the power of producing valuable attainments, and of rendering eminent ſervices to the learned world. Of this diligence Dr. Doddridge was a ſtriking example. The ſmalleſt portions of time were precious to him; and he was eager to ſeize every moment, even while he was waiting for dinner, company, or his pupils aſſembling together, that he might make ſome advance in any work in which he was engaged. So ſolicitous was he for continual improvement, that one of his ſtudents generally read to him when he was ſhaving and dreſſing. This was a benefit to the pupils, as he took occaſion to inſtruct them, by remarking on their manner of reading, and pointing out the excellencies and defects, either in ſentiment or language, of the book before them. When he was upon a journey, or on occaſional viſits to his friends, where he ſpent the night, he took his papers with him, and employed at leaſt part of the morning in carrying on ſome one or other of his important deſigns. From the time that he began to write his Family Expoſitor, ſomething was done every day in it towards preparing it for the preſs. To all this it may be added, that his employments as an author and a tutor never obſtructed his moſt abundant labours as a miniſter and a paſtor.

But what places Dr. Doddridge's diligence in a ſtill more conſpicuous point of view, is the extent of his correſpondence. This alone would have been almoſt ſufficient to have employed the whole time of an ordinary perſon. Beſides his correſpondence with the parents and guardians of his pupils, he had a number of letters to write, in anſwer to queſtions of moment which were propoſed to him by his brethren, and eſpecially by thoſe who had ſtudied under him. Theſe laſt naturally applied to him for advice and direction, under the various difficulties which occurred to them in their reſpective ſituations. Many were the congregations that had recourſe to him for miniſters, or upon other accounts. His judgment, likewiſe, was frequently deſired by learned men concerning critical queſtions, or works which they were preparing for the preſs; and his own publications gave occaſion for enquiries of this nature. Several foreign gentlemen and divines, who had heard of his character, and peruſed his writings, ſought his epiſtolary acquaintance; and to correſpond with them in Latin or French, was an object that demanded particular attention. It is, indeed, ſurpriſing to find how many hundred letters were received and anſwered by him in the ſpace of a ſingle year (e).

A very honourable part of Dr. Doddridge's correſpondence was that which he maintained with ſome of the brighteſt ornaments, both among the clergy and laity of the Eſtabliſhed Church. This is apparent from the Collection of Letters lately publiſhed. We there ſee how much he was eſteemed, and how highly he was thought of, by the firſt religious and literary characters of the age. In the collection referred to, the letters of Warburton make a diſtinguiſhed figure, and ſhew that great man in a new and very amiable light. They diſplay not only his learning, but the piety, benevolence, and goodneſs of his mind. The ſeverity, or rather the arrogance, with which he treated his literary antagoniſts muſt undoubtedly have afforded too juſt cauſe for leaving an unfavourable impreſſion of him in the eſtimation of the world. But in private life he appears in a far more agreeable point of view. The only time I had ever the honour of being in his company, which was an hour and a half in his own ſtudy, I found him remarkably condeſcending in his manner, and admirably inſtructive and entertaining in his converſation.

Dr. Doddridge's correſpondence was, I think, in ſome inſtances carried to an extent that might have been ſpared; and it is now certain that his friend Mr. Neal was ſo far of the ſame opinion, as to give him a gentle rebuke upon the ſubject (f).

(f) Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 390, 391.

There were people, whoſe good intentions were ſuperior to their wiſdom, and who had very little valuable to communicate, that were proud of writing letters to him, and of receiving his anſwers; and ſuch was the eaſineſs of his diſpoſition, that he was more profuſe in his returns to their kind affections, than convenience or even a regard to his health would admit. Sometimes he lightened his burden, by making uſe of the pen of his pupils, to whom he dictated his letters, while he himſelf went on with his Family Expoſitor, or any other work in which he was employed. I was not unfrequently either his amanuenſis on theſe occaſions, or read to him while he anſwered his correſpondents.

I am next to take a ſurvey of Dr. Doddridge in his religious and moral character. And here the prime and leading feature of his ſoul was that of devotion. This was the pervading principle of his actions, whether private or public. What Dr. Johnſon has obſerved with regard to Dr. Watts, that as piety predominated in his mind, it was diffuſed over his works; and that whatever he took in hand was, by his inceſſant ſolicitude for ſouls, converted to theology (g), may, with equal propriety, be applied to Dr. Doddridge. The greateſt pains were taken by him to keep up an habitual ſenſe of the Supreme Being; to maintain and increaſe the ardour of religion in his heart; and to furniſh himſelf, by devout exerciſes, for the important labours of his ſtation. Nor was it to his ſecret retirements that his piety was limited: it was manifeſted in every part of the day, and appeared in his uſual intercourſe with men. In the little vacancies of time which occur to the buſieſt of mankind, he was frequently lifting up his ſoul to GOD. When he lectured on philoſophy, hiſtory, anatomy, or other ſubjects not immediately theological, he would endeavour to graft ſome religious inſtructions upon them, that he might raiſe the minds of his pupils to devotion, as well as to knowledge; and in his viſits to his people the Chriſtian friend and miniſter were united (h).

(g) Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, Vol. IV. p. 280.

Dr. Doddridge entertained a high idea of the efficacy of prayer (i). It is a point upon which I would ſpeak with great humility and deference; but I cannot avoid thinking that, in this reſpect, he carried his ſentiments ſomewhat farther than reaſon and truth will warrant. Of the importance of prayer, as a natural and juſt tribute to the Deity, as an admirable method of cheriſhing the virtues of the religious life, and as connected with the divine approbation and favour, no one, I truſt, can be more truly ſenſible than myſelf. My views of the matter have lately been ſo fully diſplayed, that they cannot be liable to any miſconſtruction (k). But ſtill I am obliged to obſerve, that Dr. Doddridge did not, in my apprehenſion, ſufficiently limit his notions of the efficacy of prayer. He appeared to aſcribe to it ſuch an immediate influence upon the Supreme Mind, and to expect from it ſuch interpoſitions, as are ſcarcely conſiſtent with the regular order of Providence, and the ſtated courſe of events in the world. If, however, he erred upon this head, he has erred with many wiſe and good men who have gone before him, and by whom he has been ſucceeded. Perhaps Dr. Price and Dr. Ogden may be added to the number.

(k) Sermons on Practical Subjects, Sermon the Seventh.

The piety of Dr. Doddridge was accompanied with the warmeſt benevolence to his fellow-creatures. No one could more ſtrongly feel that the love of God was to be united with love to man. Nor was this a principle that reſted in kind wiſhes and pathetic feelings for the happineſs of others, but was manifeſted in the moſt active exertions for their welfare. No ſcheme of doing good was ever propoſed to him into which he did not enter with ardour. This was apparent from many circumſtances that might copiouſly be enlarged upon, did it comport with my preſent purpoſe. His Sermon for the benefit of the County Hoſpital at Northampton has been ſpoken of before; and it may here be added, that he not only contributed generouſly to that hoſpital, but ſpent much time in ripening the deſign. He often reflected, with great ſatisfaction, on the pains he had taken to eſtabliſh this charity, and on the good effects which it had produced, both in relieving many objects of diſtreſs, and in promoting a ſocial and catholic ſpirit among perſons of different parties and perſuaſions. It was at his own expence that he printed and diſtributed his "Friendly Letter to the Private "Soldiers of a Regiment of Foot." During the Rebellion of 1745, he was remarkably zealous in the cauſe of his king and his country, and contributed to the raiſing of a regiment under the command of the Earl of Halifax, by his own liberality, as well as by his influence over others. In the caſe of a poor Iriſhman, whom he thought to be unjuſtly condemned for murder, he exerted himſelf in a very extraordinary manner, though without ſucceſs. But the generoſity of his mind was the moſt diſplayed when any ſchemes for propagating religion, and for ſpreading the goſpel among thoſe who were ſtrangers to it, were propoſed. In every thing of this kind he was always ready to take the lead, and was ardent in endeavouring to inſpire his friends with the ſame ſpirit (l).

No one could be more amiable than Dr. Doddridge was in his private virtues and manners. It would be needleſs to enlarge on the tenderneſs of his affections as a huſband, a father, and a relation: nor is it neceſſary to inſiſt upon his conduct to his pupils. If he occaſionally diſtinguiſhed any one of them by his particular favour, this did not hinder his behaving to all of them with the kindneſs of a parent; and his regard to them was never abated, excepting from their own fault. In the character of a friend he ſhone with diſtinguiſhed luſtre. Of friendſhip he entertained a ſublime idea, and his heart was admirably fitted for diſcharging all the offices, and reliſhing all the delights, of this endearing connection. It was the happy lot of his life to be honoured with many valuable and faithful friends; and how ſenſible he was of his felicity in this reſpect was diſplayed in every return of gratitude, eſteem, and affection (m). His deportment in company was ſtrikingly polite, affable, and agreeable; and in converſation he greatly excelled, his diſcourſe being at once inſtructive and entertaining, and not unfrequently riſing to the ſplendid.

(m) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 132.

The candour of Dr. Doddridge's mind relative to his ſentiments of other perſons' merit, was carried to the higheſt pitch, and indeed was ſometimes ſo exceſſive as to lead him to form a far better opinion of ſeveral of his acquaintance than in fact they deſerved. This fault was gently and pleaſantly touched upon by Mr. Barker, in one of his letters. "But are you aware," ſays he, "what a creature you are? I love you be"yond expreſſion, and admire your abilities, furniture, ſpirits, &c. more than you "imagine; and not a man in the world rejoices more in your uſefulneſs than I do;
"and yet I often make myſelf merry with your character and conduct. You are ſo en"tirely devoted to God, to truth, and holineſs, that it is very eaſy to impoſe upon
"you under the appearance of any of theſe. And you are ſo perfectly made up of "civility, candour, and good-nature, that a pious enthuſiaſt, or a godly dunce, is "welcome to your table, arms, and heart. You are ſo good yourſelf, that you think
"every body ten times better than they are; ſee merit in the darkneſs of midnight;
"cannot ſee faults without a noon-day ſun; forgive injuries before they are confeſſed;
"and confer favours as a reward for affronts (n)." With ſuch a diſpoſition of mind, it is not ſurpriſing that Dr. Doddridge ſhould frequently be unable to reſiſt the arts of deception: and yet this did not proceed from a general ignorance of the world. He was well acquainted with men and with manners, and could often enter into, and diſcriminate, with no ſmall degree of penetration, the characters of mankind. But, at the ſame time, ſo ardent were the feelings of his piety, and ſuch was the ſuavity of his temper, that he could not eaſily perſuade himſelf that any perſons were inſincere, who made a profeſſion of religion and goodneſs. There is a conſiderable difference between a ſpeculative and a practical knowledge of the world. A man may poſſeſs much of the former, and yet, from a certain flexibility and tenderneſs of mind, have little of the latter. In particular inſtances, he may have ſagacity enough to ſuſpect deceit, while he refuſes to indulge the ſuſpicion, leſt it ſhould lead him to err in his judgment, and be a motive for obſtructing the exertions of his benevolence. Such was the caſe with Dr. Doddridge, and ſuch, alſo, was the caſe with George Lord Lyttelton. They would both of them rather have choſen to be miſtaken, than to have loſt an opportunity of contributing to the relief of real diſtreſs.

(n) Letters, ubi ſupra, p. 139.

In his ſentiments of thoſe who differed from him in religious opinions, Dr. Doddridge exerciſed great moderation. He never confined truth or goodneſs to one particular ſect; and he behaved with the utmoſt candour to the members of the Church of England. Of the Eſtabliſhed Religion of his country he always ſpoke with reſpect; and he never made any petulant objections to its worſhip or diſcipline, or uttered againſt it any ſevere or unkind reflections. His correſpondence with various clergymen of the higheſt rank and merit has heretofore been noticed. It was deeply lamented by him, that a ſeparation from the Eſtabliſhment was, in his apprehenſion, and that of many other good men, rendered ſo neceſſary; and he ſincerely wiſhed and prayed for a greater union amongſt Proteſtants. A like candid and friendly ſpirit he endeavoured to promote among his pupils; and he did it with ſucceſs; for few of them, I believe, can be mentioned, who have not, in this reſpect, followed the inſtructions, and imitated the example of their tutor (o). With all Dr. Doddridge's moderation of temper, he did not in every caſe meet with a ſuitable return. Some time after he had ſet up his academy at Northampton, a proſecution was commenced againſt him in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, by the inſtigation of ſeveral dignitaries of the Church. The ſtep, however was totally diſapproved of by many other eminent members of the Eſtabliſhment. Nevertheleſs, the perſons who had engaged in the buſineſs ſeemed determined to carry it on with vigour: and, as the laws then ſtood, they muſt have ſucceeded in their deſign, had not an application been made to King George the Second, who received, from ſome gentlemen of rank and influence, ſuch a juſt repreſentation of the Doctor's loyal, peaceable, and moderate principles and character, as induced his Majeſty to give an expreſs order for putting a ſtop to the proſecution (p).

(o) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 158—160, 161, 164.

That candour of mind which Dr. Doddridge exerciſed towards the members of the Eſtabliſhed Church, was cultivated by him with regard to his diſſenting brethren of different different denominations. He was ſolicitous to be upon friendly terms, as far as poſſible, with all of them; and by the generality of them he was held in high eſtimation. If this was not the caſe without exception, it will not appear ſurpriſing to thoſe who reflect upon the diverſities of ſentiment that are found among the Diſſenters. There were a few among them who even went ſo far as to charge him with inſincerity. The accuſation they brought againſt him was, that he uſed ſome particular phraſes in his writings, in a ſenſe different from that in which he himſelf underſtood them, in order to pleaſe a party. A friend having acquainted him with this charge, he anſwered as follows: "My conſcience doth not tell me that I am at all to blame on the head you "mention. I write for the public (as I would alſo do in every private correſpondence) "as in the preſence of God, and in the views of his judgment. I would not purchaſe "that phantom, popularity, which is often owing to the very worſt part of a man's "character or performances, by any compliances beneath the dignity of a Chriſtian "miniſter; an office, of which I think ſo highly, as to be deeply ſenſible how un-"worthy I am to bear it. On the other hand, I do indeed deſire to give as little of-"fence as I honeſtly can; and I have high authorities for it: and though I am, and "always declare that I am, in my judgment, greatly againſt the impoſition of human "phraſes, yet, as ſome can hardly be avoided on the one hand or the other, I chooſe "to adopt and uſe ſome that are ambiguous, in what I take to be a fair ſenſe, though "not the only ſenſe they might bear; and by declaring it, to endeavour to fix a good "idea to them, rather than abſolutely to declare againſt, or even totally to diſuſe them. "Others, wider by far in their ſentiments than I, are indulged in this, and even ap-"plauded for it: I have the misfortune (I cannot uſe the word more properly) to be "condemned (q)." Whilſt I have a full conviction of Dr. Doddridge's ſincerity in this matter, I cannot agree with him in opinion. Offenſive expreſſions may juſtly be avoided; but ſurely ambiguous ones ſhould never deſignedly be adopted. The language we uſe, in delivering our views of things, ought to be natural, clear, and capable only of one ſignification.

(q) Orton, ubi ſupra, p. 221.

The charge I have mentioned againſt Dr. Doddridge with regard to his writings, has been extended to his preaching. By ſome of his enemies it was aſſerted, that he was a trimmer in the pulpit. The fact, I am ſatisfied, was preciſely as follows. When he preached in different places, he ſo far accommodated himſelf to the diſpoſitions of the people before whom he diſcourſed, as to avoid giving offence. If a congregation conſiſted of perſons who were of free ſentiments in religion, his ſermon was entirely of a practical nature. On the other hand, in preaching before a Calviniſtical ſociety, it was cuſtomary with him to chooſe what was called an evangelical ſubject. In neither caſe did he deliver any thing that was contrary to his ſincere opinion. His accuſers did not ſufficiently recollect that he was far more devoted to what were deemed the orthodox doctrines than they were ready to imagine; and he had an undoubted right to be believed, when he declared, as he has done in the letter before cited, "On the whole, I "know aſſuredly, that I have not on any occaſion belied the real ſentiments of my "heart (r)." The perſons who were moſt diſpoſed to find fault with Dr. Doddridge, with reſpect to the point in queſtion, were thoſe who are entitled the Rational Diſſenters. They could not eaſily perſuade themſelves that a man of ſuch abilities, and general liberality of mind, could entertain very different opinions from their own; and they wiſhed to have him rank more explicitly among them. It cannot be denied, that in one or two inſtances they had ſome reaſon to complain of his timidity: but, at the ſame time, there were many occaſions on which he behaved with a very becoming fortitude. Once I remember, ſome narrow-minded people of his congregation gave him no ſmall trouble on account of a gentleman, in communion with the Church, who was a profeſſed Arian, and who otherwiſe departed from the common ſtandard of orthodoxy. This gentleman they wiſhed either to be excluded from the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, or to have his attendance upon it prevented. But the Doctor declared, that he would ſacrifice his place, and even his life, rather than fix any ſuch mark of diſcouragement upon one who, whatever his doctrinal ſentiments were, appeared to be a real Chriſtian. When our author happened to be in company with perſons of rank and fortune, he never ſuffered the leaſt tendency to profaneneſs or licentiouſneſs to paſs unnoticed; but manifeſted his diſlike to them, with the freedom of the divine, accompanied with the politeneſs of the gentleman. A correſpondent having charged him with unſoundneſs in one of his publications, his anſwer was Quod ſcripſi, ſcripſi (s); "What I have written, I "have written."

(r) Ibid. p. 222.

(s) Letters to a young Clergyman, p. 103.

How ſincerely Dr. Doddridge deteſted the want of integrity in character, was diſplayed in the following fact. One of his pupils was in the habit of making a jeſt of what is called orthodoxy, and of ridiculing thoſe who adhered to it; and this he continued to do, up to the time in which he began to preach. Then, to the no ſmall ſurprize of his intimate acquaintance, it was rumoured, that in the congregations where he had officiated in the neighbourhood of Northampton, he had appeared highly Calviniſtical, and indeed much more ſo than almoſt any other of his fellow-ſtudents. For obvious vious reaſons he declined ever preaching at Northampton. At length, the affair was brought before the Doctor; and both parts of the charge having been proved by deciſive evidence, the young man was diſmiſſed. Being a perſon of ſome fortune, he was not involved by his diſgrace in any pecuniary difficulties.

With that impartiality which is the duty of every biographer, I have mentioned, in the courſe of my narrative, the inſtances wherein it appeared to me that the character of Dr. Doddridge was ſhaded with ſome degree of imperfection. The ſame impartiality obliges me to add, that at times, he had too oſtentatious a manner of ſpeaking concerning the multiplicity of his employments, engagements, and correſpondences; and that he was fonder of applauſe, from every quarter, than was deſirable in one who was ſo juſtly entitled to it, where applauſe was an honour. I have often thought that in certain points he had a reſemblance of Cicero. He reſembled him in the love of fame, and in not poſſeſſing what may be called the ſternneſs of fortitude. He reſembled him likewiſe in more eſtimable qualities; in the copiouſneſs, diffuſion, and pathos of his eloquence; and in the ſenſibilities and tenderneſs of his mind, eſpecially as diſplayed in the loſs of a daughter.

When all Dr. Doddridge's imperfections are collected together, they will be found to have been very trifling in compariſon with his excellencies. One or two more of his virtues I ſhall touch upon before I conclude. Few have exceeded him in the exerciſe of humility, both with relation to God and man. With reſpect to God, it was apparent in the deepeſt expreſſions of concern for the defects of his improvements and his ſervices; and with regard to man, it was manifeſted in his condeſcenſion to the meaneſt perſons, in his behaviour to his pupils, and in the patience with which he ſubmitted to the words of reproof. He was even highly thankful to his friends for pointing out to him what they judged to be amiſs in his conduct. The language of humility that was uſed by him, though undoubtedly ſincere, was ſometimes carried to an exceſs. In a letter to Dr. Wood of Norwich, he thus expreſſes himſelf: "Pity me, and pray for me, as you do, "in the midſt of ſo many hurries. Oh, my poor, poor attempts of ſervice! They "ſhame me continually. My prayers, my ſermons, my lectures, my books (in hand), "my letters, all daily ſhame me (t)." Nothing can vindicate ſuch humiliating terms from the charge of affectation, but the remembrance that the letter was written under a peculiar depreſſion of ſpirits, united with that ſtrong ſenſe which Dr. Doddridge always entertained of the ardour, zeal, and diligence, with which the duties of life ought to be performed.

(t) Letters to and from Dr. Doddridge, p. 307.

Among the Doctor's other excellencies, I might inſiſt upon the reſignation, ſerenity, and chearfulneſs, with which he ſubmitted to the diſtreſſes of the preſent ſtate. One of his afflictions, and it was an affliction that called for the exerciſe of his meekneſs and patience, was the unkind treatment which he ſometimes met with from thoſe who owed to him a far different kind of behaviour. Few men leſs deſerved to be evil-ſpoken of; but to paſs through the world without reproach is not the lot of the pureſt virtue. Some of his pupils were angry with him, and ſet themſelves to miſrepreſent his character, becauſe he would not recommend them to places they wiſhed for, but for which he conſcientiouſly judged them to be unqualified. His kind behaviour to them in other reſpects did not compenſate, in their eſtimation, for the wound he had given to their ſelf-opinion (v). This is a difficulty which has been experienced by others, who, from their ſituations among the Diſſenters, are ſuppoſed to have any influence in recommending to vacant congregations. Dr. Doddridge was even aſperſed in the caſe of a guardianſhip, where he had acted with the utmoſt probity, friendſhip, and benevolence (u). Whatever was the ill uſage to which he was expoſed, he ſuſtained it with mildneſs, and was always ready to manifeſt a forgiving temper. Nothing could be farther from his character than a reſentful diſpoſition.

(u) Ibid. p. 232.

Upon the whole, Dr. Doddridge was not only a great man, but one of the moſt excellent and uſeful Chriſtians, and Chriſtian miniſters, that ever exiſted. The impreſſion of his numerous and amiable virtues will not be effaced from my mind ſo long as it retains any ſenſe of feeling or reflection. So far will be the impreſſion from being loſt upon me, that I ſhall always cheriſh it with the utmoſt ardour; and I eſteem it as no ſmall felicity of my life, that I have been preſerved to give this teſtimony of duty, gratitude and affection, to the memory of my benefactor, my tutor, my friend, and my father.] K.

 [Mr. Job Orton, the original writer of the Life of Dr. Doddridge, was ſo intimately connected with the Doctor in various reſpects, and was himſelf of ſo excellent and eminent a character, that it is an act of juſtice to his memory, and will be peculiarly acceptable to many of our readers, to give an account of him in this place. Concerning his family he himſelf thus ſpeaks, in a memorial which he left for the uſe of his nephews: 'They will find no lords and 'knights, or perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank, wealth, 'or ſtation among their progenitors. But they will 'learn, (as far as I am capable of judging, by the 'beſt information I could gain, and the knowledge 'of thoſe whom I remember) that there is no one, 'either male or female, in the line of their direct 'anceſtors for many generations, but hath been truly 'ſerious, pious, and good, and filled up ſome uſeful 'ſtation in ſociety with honour.' His grandfather and and father, who were grocers at Shrewſbury, of conſiderable property, were juſtly held in eſtimation for their piety, their good ſenſe, their generoſity, their uſefulneſs, and their Chriſtian virtues in general. The younger Mr. Orton added to his other valuable qualities the benefit of a liberal education, and an extenſive acquaintance with books. His eldeſt ſon, Job, the ſubject of the preſent note, was born on the 4th of September, 1717, and was early taught to pray, to read the Scriptures, and to keep holy the Sabbath-day. At a proper age he was ſent to the Free-ſchool of his native place, where he went through the whole courſe of grammatical education, having ſtayed there ſomewhat more than eight years. Here he enjoyed as great advantages for claſſical knowledge as in moſt public ſchools, but ſuffered, he tells us, 'not a little 'in the moſt important intereſts, by the example and 'temptations of ſome boys who were very wicked and 'profane.' In May, 1733, he left the ſchool, and went to Warrington, under the care of Dr. Charles Owen, the Diſſenting miniſter of that town, who uſually had two or three young men under his tuition. Mr. John Aſhworth, the eldeſt brother of the late Dr. Caleb Aſhworth, of Daventry, and who afterwards preached with Dr. Foſter, in London, and died young, was Mr. Orton's only fellow ſtudent. This ſituation was to Mr. Orton an agreeable tranſition from his father's houſe to that of a large ſeminary, he and his fellow-pupil being treated by their tutor more like his own children, than with the diſcipline neceſſary in an academy. Dr. Owen was a gentleman of conſiderable learning, great piety, and one of the moſt amiable men ever known for a polite behaviour, ſweetneſs of temper and manner, and a genteel addreſs. Mr. Orton continued with him one year; after which he ſpent the month of June, 1734, in the family of Mr. Colthurſt, a moſt excellent and worthy miniſter at Whitchurch, in Shropſhire. There, by the advice and encouragement of Mr. Colthurſt, he firſt joined in the Lord's Supper, and devoted himſelf to a ſincere compliance with the obligations of Chriſtianity. In Auguſt, 1734, he went to Northampton, under the care of Dr. Doddridge, where he continued above ſeven years, with the interruption of about ſeven months in the year 1736, and the beginning of 1737, which, on account of the ill ſtate of his health, he was obliged to ſpend at home. This time, however, was not quite loſt, as his father kept him as cloſe to reading and ſtudy as he thought was conſiſtent with a due regard to his recovery. Before young Mr. Orton went firſt from home, he had been bound apprentice to his father, that, in caſe he ſhould not incline to any of the learned profeſſions, he might be a freeman of the town of Shrewſbury, and be able to engage there in buſineſs; but his inclinations were always to the Chriſtian Miniſtry. To this he might be led, by obſerving the very reſpectful, obliging, and affectionate manner, in which his grandfather and father always behaved to worthy miniſters, and the honourable terms in which they always ſpoke of them. Indeed, the houſes of the two Ortons were the places where not only the Diſſenting Clergy, but ſeveral of the Church of England were uſually entertained in the moſt hoſpitable manner, when they came to Shrewſbury. But though this circumſtance gave the firſt turn to the inclinations of young Orton, he ſoon formed his reſolutions for the miniſtry upon better motives. It was his deſire to devote himſelf to the ſervice of the ſanctuary, with a view to the religious improvement and everlaſting happineſs, of mankind: and to qualify himſelf for this great work were all his ſtudies directed. In a few weeks after he went to Northampton, he had made himſelf ſo perfect a maſter of Rich's ſhort-hand, which his tutor wrote, that he could take down the whole of moſt of the ſermons which he heard.

Such were the ability and diligence with which Mr. Orton purſued his literary courſe, that in March 1738-9 he was choſen aſſiſtant to Dr. Doddridge in the Academy; and he began his lectures in this capacity, with reading to the junior ſtudents in the claſſics and geography. About the ſame time he was examined before a committee of paſtors in the neighbourhood, as to his qualifications for the miniſterial office, and received an ample teſtimony of ſatisfaction and approbation. His firſt ſermon was preached at Welford, in Northamptonſhire, on the 15th of April 1739. After this he continued to preach occaſionally in all the neighbouring congregations, excepting on the firſt Sunday of every month, when he generally aſſiſted Dr. Doddridge at Northampton. During the vacations, which laſted two months, the Doctor continued at home in the former month, while Mr. Orton paid a viſit to his friends and relations at Shrewſbury. In the ſecond month he returned to Northampton, and took care of the family, the congregation, and ſuch of the pupils as remained, whilſt the Doctor made his excurſions to London, or other places.

In this early part of his life, Mr. Orton was honoured with many teſtimonies of his acceptableneſs as a preacher, He received ſeveral invitations from the congregations at Welford, Rowell, and Harborough, to ſettle with them as their miniſter: and he was applied to, likewiſe, by the Diſſenting Society at Salter's Hall, London, to preach there as a candidate; but he thought it beſt to decline theſe applications, as, while he was aſſiſtant at Northampton, he was engaged in a very uſeful employment, and had daily opportunities of improving himſelf ſuperior to what he ſhould have had in any other ſtation. The enjoyment which he had of Dr. Doddridge's converſation was eſteemed by him as a moſt peculiar advantage.

In April 1741, died Mr. Berry, the miniſter of the Preſbyterian meeting at Shrewſbury; and about the ſame time Mr. Dobſon, the paſtor of the Independent Church, in that town, to which Mr. Orton's father belonged, removed to Walſall, in Staffordſhire. Theſe two Societies being thus vacant, concurred in an invitation to Mr. Orton, to accept the paſtoral charge among them, promiſing that in that caſe they would unite together in one congregation. The circumſtance of ſuch a pleaſing coaleſcence of two different denominations of Chriſtians, the unanimity of the application, and the proſpect of an agreeable ſettlement, and of a conſiderable ſphere of uſefulneſs, induced him to accede to the propoſal, though he did it with fear and trembling, as a prophet hath not, in general, equal honour in his own country, and among his own kindred, with what he meets with in another place. In October 1741, he removed to Shrewſbury, and on the eighteenth of that month preached his firſt ſermon to the united congregations. On the eighteenth of the next month, he had the misfortune to loſe his father, who died at the age of fifty-two. This event was not only a great perſonal affliction to Mr. Orton, but brought upon him ſuch a weight of cares, in addition to his various duties as a miniſter, that his health was materially injured; the conſequence of which was, that he was laid under the neceſſity of having an aſſiſtant. He was obliged, likewiſe, in September 1742, to go to Bath, by which he found ſome relief. The perſon choſen to be his aſſiſtant was Mr. Francis Boult, who continued at Shrewſbury till the end of the year 1745, when he removed to Wrexham, in Denbighſhire. On the eighteenth of September, in the ſame year, Mr. Orton was ſolemnly ordained to the paſtoral office. The ſermon and charge that were delivered upon the occaſion were printed, and the teſtimonial was ſigned by a great number of paſtors. Thirty miniſters were preſent at the ſervice. Upon the removal of Mr. Boult to Wrexham, Mr. Moſes Carter was choſen aſſiſtant to Mr. Orton, and accepted the invitation, but died in 1747. He was a man of uncommon ability, and his early death was greatly to be regretted. In 1746 Mr. Orton was invited by the congregation at the new meeting in Birmingham, to be their co-paſtor with Mr. Bourn. Though he had a high eſteem for the people of that ſociety, he did not dare to undertake ſo much work as was neceſſary in the ſituation; beſides which, he was comfortable and uſeful where he was already ſettled. The invitation from Birmingham was ſigned by nine of the principal perſons of the congregation, who were a committee to manage their church affairs. In 1748 Mr. Joſeph Fownes was choſen Mr. Orton's aſſiſtant, and the connection was highly agreeable to both of them, they having always lived together in the utmoſt harmony and friendſhip. By Dr. Doddridge's death, which happened as before related, Mr. Orton loſt his much honoured tutor, father, and friend. "The great and truly paternal tenderneſs," ſays Mr. Orton (in the memorial from which which we write), "he had ſhewn to me from my firſt "coming under his care, and the uncommon confi- "dence which he had in ſome inſtances repoſed in "me, led me to the higheſt reſpect and warmeſt af- "fection for him. His appointing me in his will to "preach his funeral ſermon, was a ſignal honour to "me; and as he left me all his papers which I choſe, "I thought myſelf under particular obligations to at- "tempt to give the world an account of his life and "character, and writings, which I at length effected. "I do not repent the pains ſpent in this work for "ſeveral years, though hurtful to my health, be- "cauſe I hope, and believe, it hath been, and will be, "of great uſe to young miniſters, and others who "read it. It was ſoon after its publication tranſlated "into German, and a copy ſent me from Riga, from "an eminent divine there, who tranſlated and pub- "liſhed my Sermons on Eternity. But Doddridge's "Life was tranſlated by Mr. Lindner, a young Lu- "theran Divine of Saxon-hauſen, in Saxony."

In March 1751-2, Mr. Orton was invited to aſſume the paſtoral charge of the congregation belonging to his late friend at Northampton. Upon this his people at Shrewſbury were alarmed; and, apprehending that he might liſten to the application, they ſent him a moſt reſpectful, affectionate, and unanimous addreſs, to intreat that he would not leave them. A ſeparate addreſs, to the ſame purpoſe, was made to him by the young perſons of the ſociety. He had no inclination to quit a ſituation in which he was comfortable and uſeful; eſpecially as there were ſome circumſtances at Northampton that were of a diſcouraging nature. Nevertheleſs, he thought it a proper piece of reſpect to take ſome time to conſider of the invitation, which at length he declined.

Not long after this event, another attempt was made to draw Mr. Orton from Shrewſbury. He was applied to by a conſiderable congregation in Weſtminſter, to ſucceed their late paſtor, the Rev. Dr. Obadiah Hughes; but he immediately rejected the propoſal, as he never had any inclination to ſettle in London, and as he was firmly perſuaded, that neither his health, nor his abilities, nor his ſentiments, qualified him for a ſituation in the metropolis. In the two laſt particulars he was undoubtedly miſtaken. Whether London would have been favourable to his health, might juſtly be queſtioned; but as to his abilities and ſentiments, they would have enabled him to appear with diſtinguiſhed advantage in the pulpit. He was one of the moſt ſtriking preachers that I ever heard; and if he had been fixed in town, he could not have failed of riſing to a high degree of popularity. His popularity, too, would have been of a ſubſtantial and durable kind, not founded on external and artificial accompliſhments, but on diſcourſes that were practical, ſerious, evangelical, and pathetic, accompanied with a plain, unaffected, and manly delivery, which irreſiſtibly commanded attention. There was one reſpect, in which, perhaps, he was not ſo well fitted for London, and that was in his recluſe mode of living, which grew upon him as he advanced in years and his health declined, and which rendered him very particular and exact in his time of dining, and very cautious, not to ſay faſtidious, in his reception of viſiters. The congregation at Weſtminſter, which was refuſed by him, was ſupplied at Midſummer, 1753, by the writer of the preſent narrative.

From this time nothing material occurred, in the courſe of Mr. Orton's miniſtry at Shrewſbury, till the year 1765. He was comfortable and happy among his people, and in the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Mr. Fownes. But in that year his bodily infirmities had ſo far advanced upon him, that he was quite diſabled from continuing in his public work. On the fifteenth of September, therefore, (which was his birth-day) he delivered his laſt ſermon to his congregation. The Lord's Supper was adminiſtered by him ſeveral times after this; but he durſt not undertake to preach any more.

Mr. Orton's quitting his paſtoral connection with the Diſſenters at Shrewſbury, was attended with unhappy conſequences. A conteſt aroſe with reſpect to the choice of an aſſiſtant to Mr. Fownes, which, at length, ended in a ſeparation. The larger number of the ſociety thought it their duty to provide themſelves with another place of worſhip; and with theſe Mr. Orton concurred in opinion. He eſteemed himſelf bound to countenance them upon every principle of conſcience, as a Chriſtian, a Diſſenter, a Miniſter, and a Friend to Liberty. Though Mr. Fownes continued at the old chapel, this circumſtance did not occaſion any diminution in the friendſhip and affection ſubſiſting between him and Mr. Orton. One almoſt unavoidable effect of the diviſion was its being accompanied with a bad ſpirit, in ſeveral perſons, on both ſides of the queſtion. The height to which the matter was carried, rendered Mr. Orton's ſituation at Shrewſbury greatly uncomfortable, and materially affected his health. He found it neceſſary, therefore, to retire to another place; and at length he fixed at Kidderminſter, to which he was principally led, that he might have the advice of a very able and ſkilful phyſician (Dr. Johnſtone, now of Worceſter), who always proved himſelf a faithful and tender friend. To the care of Dr. Johnſtone, Mr. Orton, under God, owed his life; and, from the regard and affection of the ſame gentleman, he derived ſome of the greateſt preſent conſolations of his exiſtence. It was on the twenty-ſixth of October, 1766, that he came to Kidderminſter, and there he continued for the remainder of his days. His reſidence in that town was as comfortable as he could hope for, in a place comparatively ſtrange to him, and among perſons with moſt of whom he had no previous acquaintance.

Thus far I have been enabled to proceed, from a memorial written by Mr. Orton himſelf, a copy of which has been obligingly communicated to me by the Rev. Mr. Stedman, vicar of St. Chad's, Shrewſbury. To the ſame excellent (though perſonally unknown) friend, I am principally indebted for the materials which have put it into my power to finiſh the remainder of the article.

Though Mr. Orton was prevented by the bad ſtate of his health, from ever again appearing in the pulpit, he ſtill retained the ſame zeal for promoting the great objects of the Chriſtian religion. What he could not perform as a preacher, he was ſolicitous to effect as a practical writer. The following words were written by him in the bible, which he commonly uſed in his ſtudy. 'Si non concedatur ut præco ſim 'publicus, ſim tamen operarius: quod publicè non 'poſſum, faciam, [ut licet, valet] privatim. Quod 'non poſſum prædicando, præſtem ſcribendo. Aux- 'iliare, Domine, ſervum ſenilem.' His whole conduct was in full conformity to theſe pious wiſhes.

Mr. Orton had not appeared much from the preſs, previouſly to his reſignation of the paſtoral office. His only publications before that period were his Funeral Sermon for Dr. Doddridge, printed in 1752; a Faſt Sermon in 1756, occaſioned by the earthquake at Liſbon, entitled, "Noah's Faith and Obedience to the Divine Warnings, and his Preſervation from the Deluge conſidered;" and "Three Diſcourſes on Eternity, and the Importance and Advantage of looking at Eternal Things," publiſhed in 1764. Theſe three Diſcourſes have gone through ſix editions, and have been tranſlated into Welch. Such was Mr. Orton's ill ſtate of health, together with his attention to the duties of his profeſſion, that it was not till 1766 that he was enabled to give to the world his "Memoirs of the Life, Character, and Writings of Dr. Doddridge;" a work to which we have been greatly indebted in the courſe of the preceding article. In 1769, he publiſhed a ſet of Sermons, under the title of "Religious Exerciſes recommended: or, Diſcourſes on the Heavenly State, conſidered under the Idea of a Sabbath." 'Theſe Sermons,' ſay the Monthly Reviewers, 'are not diſtinguiſhed by any remarkable 'elegance of ſtyle, or accuracy of language and com- 'poſition; but they have a much truer recommenda- 'tion: they are ſerious and practical; well adapted 'to do real ſervice to every attentive reader, and 'evidently flowing from a heart under the warm in- 'fluences of benevolence and piety.' After ſome other encomiums, the ſame writers add, 'We are per- 'ſuaded that the preſent work is calculated to pro- 'duce real advantage to mankind; and we ſincerely 'join our wiſhes with thoſe of the author, that it may 'contribute to revive and promote the cauſe of true 'religion, with which the intereſts of virtue and 'morality are eſſentially connected' (1). In 1771, Mr. Orton publiſhed "Diſcourſes to the Aged;" the the ſubjects of which were admirably adapted to the ſituation of the perſons for whom they were intended, and concerning which, it was juſtly obſerved, that they breathe an excellent ſpirit, and ſhew an earneſt deſire in the writer to advance the intereſts of genuine piety and practical religion (2). Our author's next publication, which appeared in 1774, was entitled "Chriſtian Zeal; or, Three Diſcourſes on the Importance of ſeeking the Things of Chriſt, more than our own." At a time when many valuable Treatiſes had been publiſhed in defence of Toleration and Liberty, he thought there was great room to complain of the want of zeal for the ſupport and advancement of real practical religion, and for the good of ſouls. To revive, therefore, this zeal, was the object of the Diſcourſes in queſtion. In 1775, Mr. Orton committed to the preſs three farther Diſcourſes, under the title of "Chriſtian Worſhip." The ſubjects treated of in this piece, which has been tranſlated into Welch, are the profitable hearing of the word; the joining in public prayer; and the ſinging of the praiſes of God. Two volumes of "Diſcourſes on Practical Subjects" were the production of the next year. The Sermons are thirty-ſix in number, and teſtify, in the ſtrongeſt manner, the ardent ſolicitude with which the author endeavoured to inſpire mankind with the principles of piety and virtue. Mr. Orton's laſt publication, which appeared in 1777, was entitled, "Sacramental Meditations; or, Devout Reflections on various Paſſages of Scripture, deſigned to aſſiſt Chriſtians in their Attendance on the Lord's Supper, and their Improvement of it." Theſe meditations, which are fifty in number, are all founded on different texts of the Sacred Writings, and are, what the author himſelf uſed in the adminiſtration of the ſacrament, according to the method obſerved among Diſſenters from the Church of England. 'The reader,' ſay the Monthly Reviewers, 'will not find in this work any rapturous flights, 'or wild chimeras: he will meet with nothing but 'what is rational and pious, tending to form the 'heart to the love of God, and to the practice of what 'is excellent and praiſe-worthy (3).

Several eminent divines of the eſtabliſhment expreſſed their high approbation of the "Sacramental Meditations." 'I think,' ſaid the Rev. Mr. Hunter, vicar of Weaverham, in Cheſhire, and the author of ſeveral ingenious publications, 'I never read a book 'better calculated for the purpoſes of ſpiritual im'provement. The ſhortneſs of the ſections, the 'plainneſs of the ſtyle, the clearneſs of the method, 'render it peculiarly fit for the reading and retention 'of the uninſtructed in low, and the indolent in high, 'life: whilſt a flow of piety, an apt and happy ap'plication of Scripture, an experimental ſenſe of re'ligion, and a profound knowledge of the divine 'life, and of the deep things of God, muſt recom'mend it to the peruſal and approbation of thoſe 'who have made the greateſt progreſs in goodneſs.' Dr. Tucker, dean of Glouceſter, wrote as follows to a friend: 'Pray thank Mr. Orton for his book in my 'name. I am charmed, and I hope edified too with 'it; which I make my conſtant companion. As I 'read, I am delighted to find the great Divine, and 'the able Controverſialiſt, concealing himſelf under 'the better character of the pious and humble Chriſ'tian, and avoiding all the parade of human learning. 'A man who was leſs a ſcholar, and leſs a Chriſtian, 'would have ſtuffed his book with a thouſand quota'tions.' We ſhall add the important teſtimony of Dr. Adams, Maſter of Pembroke College, Oxford, which he gave in a letter to Mr. Orton. 'The de'ſign,' ſays the Doctor, 'of your book, was quite 'new to me, and is, I think, happily executed. In 'our large communions (ſuch as I have often ſeen at 'St. Chad's), it is the very book I ſhould wiſh in 'every one's hands. You have, perhaps, done 'more good of the beſt ſort, under the neceſſity of 'retirement, than you could have done in better 'health, which univerſally brings diſſipation alone 'with it. This is a conſolation of the higheſt and 'nobleſt kind, which I am perſuaded you have a 'right to, and I hope God will, in your weakeſt 'hours, enable you to take to yourſelf (4).'

(4) Letters to a young Clergyman, from the late Rev. Mr. Job Orton, p. 128, 129.

Beſides theſe ſeveral publications, all of which appeared with his name, Mr. Orton, in 1770, was the author of two anonymous tracts, entitled, "Diotrophes admoniſhed," and "Diotrophes re-admoniſhed." They were written in defence of his excellent friend, Dr. Adams, at that time vicar of St. Chad's, Shrewſbury, who had been violently attacked by ſome of the high-flown Calviniſtical Methodiſts, and eſpecially by the writer of a piece, which made a conſiderable noiſe in its day, called "Pietas Oxonienſis." Mr. Orton's two pamphlets reflected great credit on his underſtanding and affections, being written with much knowledge, and in the ſpirit of Chriſtian candour. With the moſt ardent zeal in the vindication of his friend, he appears to have ſteered ſomething of a middle way between Dr. Adams and his antagoniſts, reſpecting certain theological niceties and diſtinctions. The controverſy, he hoped, might do good, by exciting a diſpoſition to enquire into the contents of the Goſpel, and by leading many to read and think on religious ſubjects who otherwiſe would not probably have done it. Nor was his expectation diſappointed: for he had the pleaſure of hearing that his tracts had been ſerviceable in this view, eſpecially in Shropſhire; and that they were much valued by many reſpectable Clergymen, particularly thoſe of evangelical principles (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 151.

There is one ſmall publication by Mr. Orton, which, from not having known of it, we have omitted to mention in its proper place. It was the earlieſt piece printed by him, having firſt appeared in 1749, and we apprehend without his name. The title of it is, "A Summary of Doctrinal and Practical Religion, by way of Queſtion and Anſwer; with an Introduction, ſhewing the Importance and Advantage of a Religious Education." So well has this tract been received, that it has gone through ſeven editions (6).

(6) From the information of Mr. Eddowes.

As we are ſpeaking of Mr. Orton's writings, we ſhall here finiſh our account of them, by taking notice of his poſthumous works. In the courſe of his miniſterial ſervice, he delivered a ſhort and plain expoſition of the Old Teſtament, with devotional and practical reflections; which expoſition and reflections have recently been publiſhed, from the author's manuſcripts, for the uſe of families, by the Reverend Robert Gentleman, of Kidderminſter, Worceſterſhire, in ſix large volumes, octavo. The firſt volume appeared in 1788, and the laſt in 1791. This work has met with a very favourable reception from the pious world, and is calculated for general utility. Of the notes it cannot be ſaid that they are eminently critical; but they often convey valuable inſtruction; and the reflections are admirably adapted to promote the purpoſes of ſerious religion.

The laſt production of Mr. Orton that has been given to the publick, is, "Letters to a young Clergyman," 12mo, 1791. Mr. Stedman, to whom the letters were written, is the editor, and he has performed an acceptable ſervice in committing them to the preſs. The advice contained in them is, in general, excellently fitted for the direction and improvement of the younger Clergy, of every denomination. We cannot help taking notice of a few detached paſſages. In the fourth letter, he thus expreſſes himſelf:

'I know not what to ſay about extemporary preach'ing. It may on ſome accounts be deſirable and 'uſeful: But I dare not encourage it in Young Divines. 'I never knew an inſtance of it, but the preacher was 'careleſs in his ſtudies, ſlovenly and incorrect in his 'diſcourſes; and loſing the habit of accurate compoſitions could never recover it afterwards. Yet I 'would by no means deſire you to confine yourſelf 'entirely to your notes. When a thought ſtrikes you, 'or ſomething in your ſermon ſeems to ſtrike your 'hearers, you may add a few ſentences, as you find 'matter ariſing in your mind: And if you are tho'roughly maſter of your ſubject, and have a good 'deal of your ſermon, eſpecially the application of it, 'committed to memory, thus much will be eaſy, 'and you will not heſitate and appear at a loſs. But 'ſuppoſe you preach at your new church Sermons 'which you have delivered at Little Cheverel half a 'year ago; not exactly as written, but commit the 'ſubſtance, every leading thought, and the text which 'you have introduced into them, to memory, and 'then enlarge pro re natâ. Or, you may compoſe 'and write out one new ſermon every week, and let 'it be preached at your churches alternately; and then,

'on

'on the other part of the day, have at the other 'church your plan, texts, and leading thoughts, 'only written down, and diſcourſe to your people 'from them: ſo that each place will have a compleat 'and a kind of extemporary diſcourſe alternately. But 'then, if you do this as it ought to be done, it will 'very little leſſen your labour: for it will require as 'much pains in ſtudying your plan, texts, and ſub-'ordinate thoughts, and putting them down, as in 'writing a ſermon at large. But let me caution you, 'never to venture without a finiſhed diſcourſe in your 'pocket, leſt any indiſpoſition of your own, or cir-'cumſtance relating to the congregation, ſhould diſ-'qualify you for ready conception and utterance. I 'have known ſo many Miniſters become injudicious 'and unacceptable by a careleſs habit of compoſing, 'or rather of not compoſing at all, in their younger 'days, and in ſmall country places, that I make 'theſe conceſſions, guarded as they are, with fear. 'The other extreme is beſt for a young divine to err 'in. Beſides, there is no way by which you will ſo 'ſpeedily and effectually increaſe your fund of the-'ological knowledge, as by accurate compoſures. 'Thus you will ſtudy your ſubject carefully, view-'ing and examining it on every ſide; conſulting all 'the commentators you may have upon your text and 'parallel places, and reading what other divines '(whoſe writings you may be poſſeſſed of) have ſaid 'upon the ſubject. So that, were you to read nothing 'for a whole week but what you would read in this 'method (except Hiſtory, Claſſicks, &c. by way of 'relaxation), I ſhall commend your diligence, and 'ſay, you had kept to the good maxim, Hoc age (7).

(7) Letters to a young Clergyman, p. 14—16.

In the ninth letter, we have the following morcel of literary hiſtory.

'I am now reading the works of Mr. WILLIAM 'PERKINS, an eminent tutor and divine at Cambridge 'in QUEEN ELIZABETH's reign. They are three 'volumes in folio, and I have got thro' one of them. 'What leads me more particularly to read him was, 'that his elder brother was one of my anceſtors, from 'whom I am in a direct line, by my mother's ſide, 'deſcended. I think him an excellent writer: his 'ſtyle is the beſt of any of that age, or the next, and 'many paſſages in his writings are equal to thoſe of 'the beſt writers in modern times. He is judicious, 'clear, full of matter, and deep Chriſtian experience. 'He wrote all his works with his left hand, being 'lame of his right, and died about forty-four. I 'could wiſh all Miniſters, eſpecially young ones, would 'read him, as they would find large materials for 'compoſition. He hath ſome tracts againſt the Pa-'piſts; appears to have been a pretty high Calviniſt, 'but he hath many admirable things in practical di-'vinity. His works are little known in England, but 'they are ſtill in eſtimation in Germany, many of 'them being written in elegant Latin, and others 'tranſlated into German (8).'

(8) Ibid. p. 39, 40.

The twelfth letter contains ſome admirable remarks on religious converſions.

'Whether I have been the inſtrument of much 'good I know not. I have not ſeen thoſe good 'effects of my miniſtry, which ſome miniſters have had. 'There were few, if any, of my congregation, who 'were profligate and abandoned; and whoſe conver-'ſion, when that happens, is very remarkable, and 'engages much attention. I hope many aged per-'ſons have been edified by my ſervices, and not a few 'young people trained up in ſentiments of wiſdom 'and piety; who are now uſeful in their families and 'ſtations, and ornaments to religion. Indeed, I lay 'very little ſtreſs upon what ſome divines call Con-'verſions; I have ſeen ſo many inſtances of 'their coming to nothing; or, that their converts have 'only been converted from the ſins of men to the ſins 'of devils, from drunkenneſs and debauchery to 'ſpiritual pride, bitterneſs, and uncharitableneſs; 'and this I cannot call a ſaving change. I ſee little 'alteration for the better in the conduct of many, who 'have been ſaid to be converted. I am cautious of 'calling any thing by that name, where there is not 'a regular, conſiſtent conduct following it. Haſty 'impreſſions, which ſome miniſters are very ready to 'obſerve and admire, are often loſt in a little time, 'and thoſe who have been under them become worſe 'than they were before. I have no idea of con-'verſion, as paſſing a certain line, and then getting 'into a ſaving ſtate. Converſion is a work of time, 'and I ſee no right we have to ſay any are converted 'or become good, till one hath a longer ſeaſon of 'trial to obſerve whether they continue ſteadfaſt in 'the practice of righteouſneſs, and act in every cir-'cumſtance and relation, in the main, conſiſtent with 'the demands of the Goſpel. I wiſh you may have 'the pleaſure to ſee many ſuch converts (9).'

(9) Ibid. p. 65, 66.

We ſhall content ourſelves with only referring to the fourteenth letter for ſome excellent obſervations on œconomy.

Beſides Mr. Orton's publication of Dr. Doddridge's hymns, and of the three laſt volumes of the Family Expoſitor, he printed, in 1764, a new edition of the life and death of the Rev. Mr. Philip Henry, and prefixed to it an addreſs to the deſcendants of that eminently pious and worthy divine. Of religious Biography our author was particularly fond, and he was a great admirer of the two Henrys, Philip and Matthew. Mr. Matthew Henry's expoſition was read by Mr. Orton in his family, and he had a moſt happy faculty, whilſt he was doing it, of abridging that diffuſe writer. He had been ſolicited, during his retirement, to form a regular abridgment of Henry's expoſitions; but his increaſing infirmities obliged him to decline the employment.

The nature of Mr. Orton's writings was ſuch as to render them acceptable to ſerious perſons, of different denominations. Dr. Tucker highly approved of them, and ſaid that his ſermons were the ſermons to do good. Indeed, the Dean had ſuch a great reſpect for the judgment of Mr. Orton, that he ſubmitted ſome of his own works to his correction. Dr. Adams read Mr. Orton's ſermons in his family at Oxford. It is ſtill more remarkable, that our author's extempore prayers were exceedingly admired by clergymen of the Church of England, who muſt, in general, be ſuppoſed to give a decided preference to precompoſed forms. The Rev. Dr. Stonhouſe, rector of Great and Little Cheverel, Wiltſhire, being at Mr. Orton's houſe, and joining in his family-worſhip, was ſo ſtruck with the propriety and pertinency of his prayer, that he thanked him for it, and told him that it deſerved to be written in letters of gold. "I have often," ſays Mr. Stedman, "learnt my duty from his prayers." We may obſerve by the way, that a cloſe friendſhip ſubſiſted between Dr. Stonhouſe and Mr. Orton, and that the latter wrote an excellent letter to the other, on the death of a daughter. It was printed for private uſe, under the title of "A Letter from a Miniſter to one in Affliction."

After the publication of the "Sacramental Medi-"tations" in 1777, Mr. Orton's bad ſtate of health no longer permitted him to inſtruct and edify the world from the preſs. But he ſtill continued to be uſeful by his pious example, his affectionate exhortations, and his correſpondence with his intimate friends. In 1781, he made a preſent, to the library belonging to the ſchools of Shrewſbury, of Dr. Kennicott's Hebrew Bible, ſuperbly bound. It was accompanied with the following inſcription.

Mr. Orton had before this made ſome valuable preſents of books to the ſame library. As in the inſcription now given, he is ſtiled S. T. P. it is proper to take notice, that the degree of Doctor in Divinity had been conferred upon him many years previouſly to his his deceaſe, but he would never permit himſelf to be addreſſed by that title, or prefix it to any of his writings.

In the ſpring of the year 1783, Mr. Orton's complaints multiplied ſo faſt upon him, that there was no proſpect of his continuing much longer in life. Whilſt he was in this ſituation, the following letter was written to him by Mr. Fownes, and conveyed by Mr. Stedman. Notwithſtanding its length, we cannot condeſcend to make an apology for inſerting it, as, from its excellence, it will delight every pious reader, and others may paſs it over at their pleaſure.

'Shrewſbury, June 11, 1783.

'My dear and much reſpected Friend,

'If I have not written to you for a conſiderable 'time, the reaſon has been that I was unwilling to 'diſquiet you by appearing to lay you under a neceſ- 'ſity of returning anſwers which I know it would be 'painful for you to ſend. But the very weakneſs, 'which for a time made me think it leſs proper to 'addreſs a letter to you, is what now induces me to 'do it. I cannot tell how to bear the thought of 'receiving repeated accounts of your increaſing in- 'firmities without letting you know how ſenſibly I ſym- 'pathize with you under all your burthens and com- 'plaints, and how earneſtly I wiſh you all thoſe ſup- 'ports and conſolations to ſuſtain you under your in- 'firmities which will enable you in patience to poſſeſs 'your ſoul, to enjoy peace and ſerenity in the midſt 'of the afflicting ſymptoms with which you are viſited, 'and to experience the happineſs of that thankful 'hope which you have ſo often recommended to 'pious perſons as their right and duty in circumſtances 'not unlike to yours, and to which all who know 'you are perſuaded that you have the juſteſt title.

'I need not remind you, that the ſufferings of the 'ſervants of God, though very frequently and mate- 'rially the ſame with thoſe which are endured by 'perſons of a very different character, are nevertheleſs, 'in the mitigations which accompany them, the en- 'couragements which are mingled with them, and 'the proſpect which lies beyond them, of a totally 'oppoſite nature. While thoſe, who have no hope 'but in the preſent life, muſt conſider every decay 'they find come upon them as foreboding the de- 'ſtruction of all their comfort; thoſe who have laid 'up for themſelves a portion in a future world, may 'view every abatement of their ſtrength as the preſage 'of the approach of their felicity. While the hope 'of the one vaniſhes, that of the other advances, and 'aſſumes a brighter aſpect; and thoſe forerunners of 'the total diſſolution of theſe earthly tabernacles, 'which the one cannot ſeriouſly behold without pain- 'ful apprehenſions, give the other reaſon to rejoice 'that the day of his redemption draws nigh, and that 'his labours, uneaſineſs, and anxiety, will ſoon be 'exchanged for that reſt which remains for the 'people of God. And if it pleaſes the God and 'Father of our ſpirits, who knows the need in which 'his children ſtand of his aſſiſtance to enable them to 'endure the afflictions he lays upon them, to give them 'ſtrength and command of thought, to reflect and 'dwell upon the reviving views which are given them 'of their preſent trials and future enjoyments, in that 'covenant of grace which is well ordered in all things 'and ſure, what cauſe have they to be comforted in 'all their tribulations and to wait with chearfulneſs 'till the days of their mourning ſhall be ended!

'To ſuch pleaſing, animating reflections as theſe, 'dear Sir, it is your happineſs that you may give 'way without ſcruple. And to this it is my wiſh 'to invite you. Nor do all the diſcouraging thoughts 'with which you may ſometimes have been troubled, 'prevent my inviting you to it without the leaſt 'heſitation. It is no ſurprize at all to me, that 'perſons whoſe hearts have been moſt ſincerely de- 'voted to their great maſter, ſhould feel doubts and 'fears riſing up in their minds, when they think 'they ſee the hour coming on when the change of 'worlds is to be made; and, far from thinking it 'any weakening of the evidence of the ſtrength of 'their concerns to find favour of the Lord, I am 'well perſuaded it is often a confirmation of it. 'Thoſe, who have the fulleſt and moſt powerful 'convictions of the extent and ſanctity of the divine 'law, will be the moſt ſenſible how far the moſt 'eminent of his ſervants come ſhort of it. Thoſe 'who have been moſt converſant with their own 'hearts, and moſt ſolicitous to have them entirely 'united in fulfilling the divine law, will have the 'quickeſt, moſt poignant, ſenſibility of their de- 'ficiencies in theſe excellent attainments. Thoſe, 'who have the higheſt conception of the value of 'that eternal life, which is the gift of God through 'Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, are ſometimes the moſt 'ready to queſtion whether they ſhall be found meet 'to riſe to ſuch an exalted height of glory. Theſe, 'I am perſuaded, are the real cauſes of thoſe clouds 'and deſponding apprehenſions which may at any 'time have hung over your mind. Suffer them not 'to oppreſs you, but turn your thoughts to that 'grace which is ſet before us by the Father of mercy 'in the Goſpel of his Son. Let the compaſſion of 'the great high prieſt of our profeſſion, who knows 'how to be touched with the feeling of our infirmi- 'ties, be the ſubject of your meditation. Let the 'tenderneſs of the Great Father of our ſpirits, who 'knows the weakneſs of our frame, the imperfection 'of our knowledge, and the force of the obſtructions 'with which we are called to ſtruggle in our paſſage 'through a world full of ſnares, temptations, and im- 'pediments to that advancement in the divine life, 'which I am ſatisfied has been the object of your 'wiſhes and labours, be much before you, and I 'truſt you will find light ſpringing up in your mind, 'diſpelling your fears, reviving your hopes, and 'giving you that peace which will keep you from 'fainting under your trials, and aſſiſt you to finiſh 'your courſe with joy.

'It will give me great pleaſure to hear, by the 'friend who brings this, that you find any abatement 'of your complaints, and that you recover any 'ſtrength; as by the laſt information which I heard 'concerning you, I am willing to hope you may. 'My earneſt wiſhes, and my conſtant petitions for 'you, are, that as your day is ſo your ſtrength may 'be, and that God, who knows how to comfort thoſe 'who are caſt down, may fill you with all joy and 'peace in believing. In theſe wiſhes Mrs. Fownes, 'who deſires to be affectionately remembered to you, 'cordially joins with me; and if from theſe aſſurances, 'or from any thing which I have ſaid, you receive 'any comfort in your affliction, it will be a real 'ſatisfaction, to

'Dear Sir,
'your ſincere, and affectionate Friend,
'Brother, and Servant,
'Joſeph Fownes.'

Somewhat more than a month after the receipt of the preceding letter, Mr. Orton departed this life at Kidderminſter, on the nineteenth of July 1783, and in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age. On the twenty-fifth of the ſame month, agreeably to his own requeſt, he was buried in Mr. Bryan's grave, in the Chancel of St. Chad's Church, Shrewſbury. Mr. Bryan had been formerly Vicar of St. Chad's, but had been ejected from his living in 1662. On the removal of the grave-ſtone from under the altar-ſteps the following inſcription was diſcovered:

(10) Communicated by the Rev. Mr. Lucas, of Shrewſbury.

With regard to the notice to be taken of him after his deceaſe, Mr. Orton left the ſubſequent directions in his will. 'I deſire Meſſrs. Fownes and Lucas 'would preach the following ſabbath to their re-'ſpective congregations, or to each other's, from, '1 Tim. i. 11, 12. But I deſire they would ſay 'nothing of me, but exhibit the glory of the Goſpel, 'and the honour of the Chriſtian miniſtry. Only 'let them aſſure my former hearers, that ſerving them 'in all their intereſts, eſpecially their beſt, was the 'delightful buſineſs of my life; that all my time and 'ſtudies were directed that way; and that if they 'retain any gratitude and reſpect to me, they would 'ſhew it by their holy converſation, and by eſteeming 'their preſent paſtors highly in love for their works 'ſake; by their wiſe and faithful improvement of 'their labours; and by their candour and love one to 'another.' Mr. Fownes's Sermon was publiſhed.

Our author's talents as a preacher have been thus delineated by Mr. Fownes: 'Mr. Orton was maſter 'of a great variety of ſtyles, and I have frequently 'heard him in the courſe of his public ſervices adopt 'them all with ſucceſs. But the general character of 'his preaching was rather of a practical, ſerious, and 'affectionate turn than diſtinguiſhed by laboured and 'long continued trains of reaſoning. The didactic 'manner, like that of a parent addreſſing his children, 'or an inſtructor his pupils, was that which ſeemed 'moſt adapted to his taſte and inclination; and 'though he acquitted himſelf with general accep-'tance in all the methods in which he addreſſed his 'hearers, it was in that he chiefly excelled.'

The following intereſting teſtimony to the memory and worth of Mr. Orton came from the hand of his friend and phyſician Dr. Johnſtone, in a letter to Mr. Stedman.

"Dear Sir, Feb. 26, 1786.

'Lord Bacon reckons it a great deficiency in Bio-'graphy, that it is for the moſt part confined to the 'actions of Kings and Princes, and a few perſons of 'high rank; while the memory of men diſtinguiſhed 'for worth and goodneſs in the lower ranks of life 'has been only preſerved by tradition.——I rejoice 'therefore, that you have undertaken to collect me-'moirs of the late Rev. Job Orton, one of thoſe ex-'cellent perſons, who was as induſtrious in conceal-'ing that worth which was ſo conſpicuous to all who 'knew him, as he was earneſt and ſkilful in applying 'it to the beſt and moſt benevolent purpoſes.—Indeed, 'my friend, we ſhall not ſee his like again: we ſhall 'not ſee knowledge ſo extenſive joined with ſuch 'humility, ſuch wiſdom and diſcernment of the 'human character and of human life, ſo determinately 'employed in doing good to all around him, and to 'diffuſe happineſs to the large circle of human ſociety. 'He truly had the wiſdom of the ſerpent and the 'innocence of the dove. Of the ſeventeen years 'which he paſſed in Kidderminſter, I ſpent moſt 'uſefully and happily daily many hours in his com-'pany: his counſel always ſkilful, was faithful and 'benevolent. I felt the advantage of it, and regret 'the irreparable loſs I have ſuſtained. I do not re-'member I ever ſpent ten minutes in his company, 'without being witneſs to ſome benevolent deſign or 'ſome benevolent action. He comforted and adviſed 'the opulent—he viſited the widow and the fatherleſs, 'the ſick, the poor and needy, in their affliction. 'He applied his fortune in relieving their wants; 'and a mind, ſtill more rich in reſources than his 'fortune was in abundance, in contrivances, as well 'as incitements to others, to adminiſter relief. To 'ſuch as needed, he gave with that generous addreſs, 'and that exquiſite ſkill, in which I think he ſurpaſſed 'moſt perſons I have ever known. I repeat it, I 'never was in his company without perceiving he 'was carrying on ſome uſeful deſign, either of a 'public or private nature: doing good himſelf and 'impelling others to concur with him in executing 'ſome charitable work, or ſome plan to relieve in-'digence, to alleviate pain, to inform ignorance, 'to check and reform vice: in arbitrating and ſettling 'differences, which had any where taken place among 'his friends or acquaintance he poſſeſſed great in-'fluence, and ſhewed always great addreſs, and gave 'ſatisfaction by his interference. He poſſeſſed a 'happy manner of engaging the affections and con-'fidence of young perſons, and he gave them advice 'in ſuch a manner as had generally a happy in-'fluence in forming their character to habits of vir-'tue and religion. His ability and his zeal as a 'miniſter I do not preſume to mention: his worth 'as a man, his ſincerity as a Chriſtian, need no ſuch 'feeble teſtimony as mine. It is indeed an injury 'to ſo high a character to offer any teſtimony. But 'I cannot forbear calling to your recollection, that 'though he was zealous as a Chriſtian, yet he poſſeſſed 'no warmth of zeal to any thing but real religion. 'A Proteſtant Diſſenter he was upon principle, but 'entertained the moſt liberal communication with 'many individuals belonging to the Eſtabliſhment, 'diſtinguiſhed like himſelf by worth and talents; 'and had the moſt generous and charitable ſentiments 'concerning parties and perſons of different ſocieties 'and perſuaſions in religion in every part of Europe. 'I need not inform you, that a bad ſtate of health 'brought him to Kidderminſter; and that I had the 'honour of being confided in, as his phyſician. His 'complaints were of the nervous and melancholic 'kind: they often interrupted his eaſe and his uſe-'fulneſs; but were prevented from confining him en-'tirely to the houſe till the month of June, 1783. 'He had often complained of failure of memory; 'but yet in particular inſtances, very conſtantly gave 'proofs of his poſſeſſing it with unuſual accuracy 'and extent. At length, however, the defect which 'he perceived appeared to others, now and then in 'expreſſing an improper word, and in making a pauſe 'before he pronounced the intended one. He com-'plained of pain and a growing confuſion in his 'head. About a week before his death, that con-'fuſion became apparent and complete. He knew 'every perſon, but could not expreſs what he in-'tended. In three or four days more he became 'lethargic, and died apoplectic the 19th of July, 1783, 'in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age.—Thus lived, and 'thus died this ſervant of God—this good man—'dear to and revered by all: this counſellor and friend, 'whoſe loſs we muſt ever deplore. But, my friend, 'let us no longer view our loſſes. How ſingular was 'our advantage! He was our counſellor and com-'forter while alive: his memory, ever dear to us, and 'preſent with us, will ſtill ſuſtain and protect us. 'If at any time malediction ſhall perſecute us living or 'dead—it will be replied——"No——this cannot "be true, the honeſteſt and worthieſt of men was "their friend."—In books of piety, and in the lives 'of pious men, we ſee the effects which religion 'ought to have; thoſe who knew Mr. Orton ſaw 'the influence it had, ſaw its ſpirit and precepts 'exemplified in his temper and conduct (11)."

'Were it neceſſary,' ſays Mr. Stedman, to add to 'the above, it would be eaſy to produce the teſtimo-'nies of a Kennicott, an Adams, a Tucker, with 'ſeveral others, given by eminent men, both of the 'Eſtabliſhment, and among the Diſſenters: for, to 'uſe the language of the Apoſtle, He had a good re-'port of all men, and of the truth itſelf.'

'Dum memor ipſe mei, dum Spiritus hos reget artus,
'Semper Honos, Nomenque tuum, Laudeſque ma-'nebunt.' VIRGIL (12).

The ſame gentleman, who rejoices in every opportunity of gratefully and affectionately connecting his name with that of his friend hath, in other places, ſaid, 'It affords me a kind of pleaſure to think that 'I have his ſacred remains depoſited in my church, 'that ere long I ſhall mingle my duſt with his, ariſe 'with him, and, I hope, be happy together (13).'

'Sic mihi contingat vivere, ſicque mori (14).'

It has occured to us, that Mr. Orton, who ſo long reſided at Kidderminſter, the principal ſeat of Mr. Baxter's miniſterial uſefulneſs, had a conſiderable reſemblance, in certain reſpects, to that famous divine. In extent of abilities, Baxter was undoubtedly greatly ſuperior to Mr. Orton, and he prodigiouſly exceeded him in the multiplicity of his writings: but with regard to the nature of their practical works, and the ſtrictneſs, we had almoſt ſaid the rigidneſs, of their perſonal piety, there was no ſmall degree of ſimilarity. Both of them diſplay, in their productions, the ſame ardent zeal to excite the attention of men to their eternal concerns, and urge theſe concerns with peculiar energy and pathos. Both of them were animated with a ſeriouſneſs of ſpirit, which ſeems never to have forſaken them in the moſt ordinary occurrences of life: nor could either of them bear to be much interrupted in their ſacred employments. When ſome viſitors to Mr. Baxter, after having ſitten a while with him, ſaid, 'We are afraid, Sir, that we break in 'upon your time; his anſwer was, 'To be ſure 'you do.' What was Mr. Orton's diſpoſition in this reſpect, is expreſſed with great vivacity in one of his letters to Mr. Stedman. The paſſage ſhall conclude the preſent article, 'I am glad I have no viſitors 'like Mr. , no ſuch Bath friends;—I would 'not have them:—They are not friends;—I would 'not ſubmit to ſuch grievances and inconveniences, 'nor ſhould my wife (if I had ſuch an one as his).  [DODSLEY (ROBERT), a poetical, dramatical, and miſcellaneous Writer, was born at Mansfield, in Nottinghamſhire, in the year 1703. The humble ſituation and circumſtances of his parents precluded him from the advantages of a liberal education; and to his misfortune in this reſpect he has alluded in one of his poems.

"O native Sherwood! happy were thy Bard,
"Might theſe his rural notes, to future time,
"Boaſt of tall groves, that nodding o'er thy plain,
"Roſe to their tuneful melody. But ah!
"Beneath the feeble efforts of a Muſe
"Untutored by the lore of Greece or Rome;
"A ſtranger to the fair Caſtalian Springs,
"Whence happier poets inſpiration draw,
"And the ſweet magic of perſuaſive ſong,
"The weak preſumption, the fond hope expires."

When he grew up to manhood, no better mode of ſubſiſtence offered itſelf than that of entering into ſervice; and therefore he became a footman to the Honourable Mrs. Lowther (a), in which ſtation his good conduct and abilities ſoon brought him into notice. Several poems were written by him, which excited ſo much attention that he was encouraged to publiſh them; and this he did under the title of "The Muſe in "Livery." The collection is now little known; but the writter of the preſent article remembers to have ſeen it above fifty years ago; and, as far as his memory ſerves him at ſo long a diſtance of time and upon a ſlight inſpection, the work was printed in large 12mo, or what now would be called crown octavo, had a handſome Liſt of Subſcribers prefixed to it, and was dedicated to Mrs. Lowther.

(a) New Univerſal, Hiſtorical, and Literary Dictionary. Vol. IV. p. 447.

What contributed ſtill more to Mr. Dodſley's reputation, was his writing a dramatic piece called "The Toyſhop," which being ſhewn in manuſcript to Mr. Pope, he was ſo well pleaſed with the delicacy of its ſatire, and the ſimplicity of its deſign, that he took the author under his protection; and though he had no immediate connection with the theatre, procured ſuch a powerful intereſt in his favour, that his production was brought without delay upon the ſtage. It was acted at Covent-Garden in 1735, and met with great ſucceſs (b); and when printed, it was received with much applauſe by the public. 'The Hint,' ſay the writers of the Biographia Dramatica, 'of this elegant and ſenſible little piece ſeems built on "Randolph's Muſes Looking-Glaſs." The author of it, however, has ſo perfectly modernized it, and adapted the Satire to the peculiar manners and follies of the times he writes to, that he has made it perfectly his own, and rendered it one of the juſteſt, and at the ſame time the beſt-natured rebukes that faſhionable abſurdity perhaps ever met with (c).'

(c) Biographia Dramatica. Vol. II. p. 376.

The pecuniary advantages which Mr. Dodſley had derived from his firſt publication, and from the ſucceſs of his dramatic ſatire, were applied by him to a very wiſe and uſeful purpoſe. Inſtead of adopting the precarious ſituation of a town writer, he determined to engage in ſome profitable buſineſs; and the buſineſs he fixed upon was happily ſuited to his literary taſte, and favourable to his connections with men of learning. In 1735, he opened a bookſeller's ſhop in Pall-Mall; and in this ſtation, ſuch was the effect of Mr. Pope's recommendation and aſſiſtance, and of his own good character and behaviour, that he ſoon obtained not only the countenance of perſons of the firſt abilities, but alſo of thoſe of the firſt rank; and in a few years he roſe to great eminence in his profeſſion (d). Mr. Dodſley's employment as a bookſeller, did not, however, prevent his purſuing the bent of his genius as an author. In 1736-7, he produced upon the ſtage, at Drury-Lane theatre, a farce, entitled "The King and the Miller of Mansfield," which met with a ſucceſs not inferior to that of "The Toyſhop." The plot of the piece is built on on a traditional ſtory in the reign of King Henry the Second. Of this ſtory Mr. Dodſley has made a very pleaſing uſe, and has wrought it out into a truly dramatic concluſion. The dialogue is natural, yet elegant; the ſatire poignant, yet genteel; the ſentimental parts are ſuch as do honour both to the head and the heart of the writer; and the cataſtrophe, though ſimple, is affecting and perfectly juſt. The ſcene lies in and near the Miller's houſe in Sherwood Foreſt (e); and Mr. Dodſley had probably an additional pleaſure in the choice of his ſubject, from the connection of it with his native place. In 1737-8, he brought forward another farce, entitled "Sir John Cockle at Court." It was acted at Drury-Lane, and is a ſequel to "The King and Miller of Mansfield." The miller, newly made a Knight, comes up to London, with his family, to pay his compliments to the King. This piece is not, however, equal in merit to the firſt part: for though the King's diſguiſing himſelf in order to put Sir John's integrity to the teſt, and the latter's reſiſting every temptation, not only of bribery, but of flattery alſo, is ingenious, and gives an opportunity for many admirable ſtrokes both of ſentiment and ſatire, yet there are a ſimplicity and a fitneſs for the Drama in the ſtory of the former production, which it is ſcarcely poſſible to come up to, in the circumſtances that ariſe from the incidents of the "Sir John Cockle at Court (f)."

(e) Biographia Dramatica. Vol. II p. 179.

(f) Ibid. p. 344.

Mr. Dodſley's next dramatic performance was "The blind Beggar of Bethnal Green," a Ballad Farce, which, according to Mr. Victor, was acted at Drury-Lane, in 1739 (meaning, without doubt, 1739-40), but the writers of the Biographia Dramatica ſay, in 1741. This piece did not meet with much ſucceſs (g). In 1745, Mr. Dodſley was the author of "Rex et Pontifex," being an attempt to introduce upon the ſtage a new ſpecies of Pantomime. It does not, however, appear to have been repreſented at any of our theatres. In 1748, our ingenious bookſeller collected together, in one volume, octavo, the ſeveral dramatic productions we have mentioned (and which had all of them been ſeparately printed), and publiſhed them under the modeſt title of "Trifles." The treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle afforded to Mr. Dodſley another opportunity of diſplaying his poetical talents, in conjunction with his loyalty. On this occaſion, he wrote "The Triumph of Peace," a Maſque, which was ſet to muſick by Dr. Arne, and performed at Drury-Lane, in 1748-9 (h).

Mr. Dodſley, in the year 1750, was the concealed author of a ſmall work, which, for a ſhort time, had a very great celebrity. It was publiſhed under the following title; "The Œconomy of Human Life, tranſlated from an Indian Manuſcript; written by an "ancient Bramin. To which is prefixed, an Account of the Manner in which the ſaid "Manuſcript was diſcovered. In a letter from an Engliſh Gentleman, now reſiding in "China to the Earl of ." According to the pretended hiſtory of the ſaid letter, as dated from Peking, on the twelfth of May, 1749, the Emperor of China, "very "curious of ſearching after the writings of antiquity," commiſſioned one of the Hanlins, or Doctors of the firſt order, to go on a kind of embaſſy to the grand Lama, or immortal high prieſt of Tartary, the chief object of which was to obtain ſome of thoſe ancient books, which were ſuppoſed to have been for many ages ſecreted from public inſpection. He ſucceeded ſo far as to procure a number of valuable pieces of antiquity, amongſt which, however, none had the preference in point of age, or merit, to this ſyſtem of morality, written in the language and character of the ancient Gymnoſophiſts, or Bramins, and tranſlated in a ſtyle remarkable for its energy of diction, and ſhortneſs of the ſentences, and which the tranſlator judged came the neareſt to the force of the original. Beſides this apocryphal introduction of the book into the world, it derived ſome attention from its being elegantly printed on a fine paper, with a ſmall page, and a very large margin, after the French manner. But what chiefly contributed to the popularity of "The Œconomy of Human Life," was its being univerſally aſcribed to the Earl of Cheſterfield. This idea was ſtrengthened by a Letter that had been addreſſed to his Lordſhip by Mrs. Tereſia Conſtantia Philips, in which, to the no ſmall ſurprize of the faſhionable circles, ſhe had complimented him on being the author of "The Whole "Duty of Man." She had probably heard an account of the Earl's Letters to his ſon. However this may have been, the notion that "The Œconomy of Human Life" was written by Lord Cheſterfield procured it a rapidity and extenſiveneſs of ſale, and a height of applauſe, which it would not have obtained, if it had been known that it came from the humble pen of a bookſeller. The Monthly Reviewers, though they gave to the work the praiſe which it deſerved, were not carried away with the general report, but expreſſed their doubts concerning its authenticity (i). Neither were the editors of the Gentleman's Magazine among the number of thoſe who were great admirers of the publication. After giving a ſhort ſection from it, they added as follows. 'The foregoing extract takes up ſixty-ſix lines, making four pages of the pamphlet; 'which, beſides twenty-three of preface, conſiſts of a hundred and eleven pages, 'but twenty of theſe are loſt, by freſh titles to the ſeveral parts and ſections. The 'pamphlet is printed on a fine paper, with a large margin, and is induſtriouſly attributed 'to a noble Earl, diſtinguiſhed by his fine genius, and the elegance of his writings and 'ſpeeches. But our readers will perceive, that in the ſentiment there does not appear

(i) Monthly Review, Vol. IV. p. 64, 65, 70.

'to be any thing new; and that the ſtile and manner are ſo much beneath the great 'original from which they are copied, that the precept is rather enfeebled than en-'forced by the imitation (k)." Upon the whole, "The Œconomy of human life" is not without a conſiderable ſhare of merit. The ſubjects are well choſen; the advice is good; the ſtile is ſuccinct, and frequently nervous: but the work, in general, is deficient in that ſtrength and energy, that vividneſs of imagination, and that luminouſneſs of metaphor which pervade thoſe parts of Scripture that were intended to be imitated, and which occur in many of the genuine oriental writings. The popularity of Mr. Dodſley's performance produced a number of imitations. There ſpeedily came out "The Second Part of the Œconomy of human Life;" and great pains were taken to perſuade the world that it was the production of the author of the former publication. Nay, this was poſitively aſſerted in the title page, though the writer of the firſt work had advertized to the contrary; and indeed had repeated his public diſavowal of making any additions whatſoever to the piece. Another pamphlet was intended as a kind of a Burleſque on "The Œconomy of human Life." It was entitled "The Œconomy "of a Winter's Day;" and, though a ſhort and haſty production, contained ſome pleaſant ſtrokes, and ſome ſenſible remarks. Next followed "The Œconomy of "Female Life;" by a lady, as was pretended; but the work was too dull and too inſipid to have come from a female pen. Concerning another publication, which appeared about the ſame time, it may perhaps be queſtioned whether it aſſumed its title ſolely from a principle of imitation. It was entituled, "The Œconomy of the "Sexes; or, the Doctrine of Divorce, the Plurality of Wives, and the Vow of Celi-"bacy freely examined;" and was a ſenſible and judicious performance (l). We have been the longer in our account of Mr. Dodſley's "Œconomy of human Life," as, from the extravagant applauſe given it for a time, founded upon the ſuppoſition of its proceeding from a celebrated nobleman, it affords an inſtance of the power of literary faſhion; the hiſtory of which, as it hath appeared in various ages and countries, and as it hath operated with reſpect to the different objects of ſcience, learning, art, and taſte, would form a work that might be highly inſtructive and entertaining.

Our author's next appearance in the world was in his poetical capacity. The ſubject was "Public Virtue," and was intended to be comprized in three books, including 1. Agriculture. 2. Commerce. 3. Arts. The firſt book however, which was publiſhed, in Quarto, in 1754, was all that was accompliſhed by Mr. Dodſley. It is probable that the reception and ſale of the poem did not encourage him to complete his deſign. Indeed, to write a truly excellent Georgic is one of the laſt efforts of the human mind. Perfectly to ſucceed in this ſpecies of poetry requires a Virgil's genius, judgment, exquiſiteneſs of taſte, and power of harmony. With regard to Mr. Dodſley's production, there are, amidſt its imperfections, a number of beauties in it deſerving of applauſe. It contains ſeveral exalted ſentiments, and the deſcriptions are often delicate and well expreſſed. But, at the ſame time, the diction is frequently too proſaic; many of the epithets are inadequate; and, in ſome places, a ſufficient attention is not paid to the harmony of the verſification (m). The following addreſs to the genius of Britain is pleaſing:

"O wake the breaſt of her aſpiring ſon.
"Inform his numbers; aid his bold deſign,
"Who in a daring flight preſumes to mark
"The glorious track her Monarch ſhould purſue."

In the year 1758, Mr. Dodſley publiſhed "Melpomene; or the Regions of Terror "and Pity. An Ode." This piece we regard as one of the happieſt efforts of his Muſe. It cannot, indeed, be compared with the odes of a Dryden, an Akenſide, a Maſon, or a Gray; but it contains ſeveral ſtriking and beautiful paſſages. The two firſt ſtanzas will furniſh no unfavourable ſpecimen of the Poem.

It was in the ſame year (1758), that Mr. Dodſley brought upon the ſtage his principal dramatic production, which was " Cleone," a Tragedy, acted at Covent Garden. This play was offered firſt to Mr. Garrick; but it was rejected by him with ſome degree of contempt; principally, as it ſhould ſeem, becauſe there was not a character in it ſufficiently adapted to the diſplay of his own peculiar talents. Nevertheleſs, when it came to be repreſented on a rival theatre, he betrayed a jealouſy concerning it which added no honour to his reputation. To prevent its ſucceſs, he himſelf appeared in a new part on the firſt night of its being acted. This ſcheme had no effect; for the tragedy roſe above all oppoſition, and had a long and crowded run; which, however, was not ſolely owing to its intrinſic merit, but was derived, in a great degree, if not principally, from the exquiſite performance of Mrs. Bellamy, who played the character which gives name to the piece. The Prologue to " Cleone" was written by Mr. Melmoth; and the Epilogue by Mr. Shenſtone.

An imperfect hint towards the fable of this tragedy was taken from the " Legend of " St. Genevieve," written originally in French, and tranſlated into Engliſh, in the laſt century, by Sir William Lower. Mr. Pope, in his very early youth, had attempted a tragedy on the ſame ſubject, which he afterwards burnt; and he it was who had adviſed Mr. Dodſley to extend the plan to five acts. The circumſtance of " Siffroy's" giving his friend directions concerning his wife has ſome degree of ſimilarity to " Poſt- " humus's" orders in Cymbeline. In the two laſt acts, the author appears to the greateſt advantage; Cleone's madneſs, in particular, over her murdered infant, being highly pathetic (n). This tragedy has ſince been revived by Mrs. Siddons; but ſo ſtrong were the feelings which her exquiſite performance of the character of Cleone excited on the firſt night of acting, that the houſe was thin on the ſecond night, and the play was dropped. The minds of the audience were affected with ſuch real diſtreſs, that it overpowered the pleaſure ariſing from dramatic fiction, and theatric repreſentation.

(n) Monthly Review. Vol. XIX. p. 582, 583. Biographia Dramatica. Vol. II. p. 57, 58.

In 1760, Mr. Dodſley publiſhed his laſt ſeparate Work, and which added greatly to his reputation: we mean his " Select Fables of Eſop and other Fabuliſts. In three " Books." This is indeed a claſſical performance, both in regard to the elegant ſimplicity of the ſtile, and the propriety of ſentiments and characters. The firſt book contains ancient, the ſecond modern, and the third original, Fables. Under the laſt head, the ſtories are wholly invented by the author and his friends; and this third part will not be found to be in the leaſt inferior to the two firſt. There are two farther circumſtances which give an advantage to the work over every former collection of the ſame kind: Firſt, a " Life of Eſop," by Monſ. Meziriac; a very learned and ingenious Frenchman; and which is the only life of Eſop that is conſiſtent with common ſenſe; that of Planudes being a ridiculous medley of abſurd traditions, or equally abſurd inventions. The ſecond is an " Eſſay on Fable;" in which rules are delivered for this ſpecies of compoſition, drawn from nature; and by which theſe ſmall and pleaſing kind of productions, that were thought to have little other ſtandard than the fancy, are brought under the juriſdiction of the judgment. The eſſay conſiders the Fable regularly; firſt, with relation to the moral; ſecondly, the action and incidents; thirdly, the perſons, characters, and ſentiments; and, laſtly, the language. This is one of the firſt pieces which has attempted to introduce a regular criticiſm concerning the ſubject (o); and Mr. Dodſley has been ſo eminently ſucceſsful in his deſign, that we recollect only a ſingle inſtance in which the propriety of his remarks has been diſputed [A]. Our (o) Monthly Review. Vol. XXIV. p. 150, 151, Annual Regiſter. Vol. III. p. 265, 266.

[A] We recollect only a ſingle inſtance in which the propriety of his remarks has been diſputed.] The paſſage we refer to occurs in the Gentleman's Magazine, and is as follows: ' Mr. Dodſley, in his ingenious Eſſay ' on Fable, amongſt other requiſites, obſerves, that " a fable ſhould be natural. This rule, ſays he, ' may be infringed by aſcribing to creatures appetites ' and paſſions that are not conſiſtent with their known ' characters.——A Fox ſhould not be ſaid to long ' for grapes." This alludes to the well-known fable ' of the Fox and the Grapes; which, however abſurd ' it may appear in this part of the world, is not ſo ' in the Eaſt. For, Dr. Haſſelquiſt in his travels ' obſerves, that " the fox is an animal common in ' Paleſtine, and that there is plenty of them near the ' convent of St. John in the deſert, about vintage- ' time; for they deſtroy all the vines unleſs, they ' are ſtrictly watched." To the ſame effect, Solomon ' ſaith, in the Canticles, ii. 15. Take us the foxes, ' the little foxes that ſpoil the vines: for our vines have ' tender grapes. Hence therefore it ſeems as if this ' ancient apologue might be reſtored to its uſual ' rank, without any prejudice to nature or common ' ſenſe (1).'

(1) Gent. Mag. Vol. XXVII. p. 551.

Author, before he committed his Eſſay on Fable to the preſs, ſubjected it to the reviſal of his literary friends, and eſpecially of Mr. Shenſtone (p). When that ingenious and amiable Poet's works were publiſhed in 1763, Mr. Dodſley prefixed to them a ſhort account of his life and writings. A ſpecimen of Mr. Dodſley's talent at ſmaller pieces of poetry may be ſeen at the cloſe of the third volume of his Collection of Poems, by different eminent hands. By this Collection, which was extended to ſix volumes, 12mo, he performed a very acceptable ſervice to the cauſe of genius and taſte; as it has been the means of preſerving ſeveral productions of merit, which might otherwiſe have ſunk into oblivion. Another plan, which was formed and executed by him, was "A Collec-"tion of Plays by old Authors," in twelve volumes, of the ſame ſize. This appeared in 1744, and was a valuable acquiſition to the literary world; but it has been highly improved in the ſecond edition, publiſhed by Mr. Reed, in 1780. In the new edition, beſides Mr. Reed's excellent preface, ſome plays, before inſerted, are rejected; and others, of greater merit, are introduced in their room. That eminently uſeful ſchool-book, "The Preceptor," ought not to be forgotten; the deſign of which was framed by Mr. Dodſley, and the execution of which was accompliſhed by ſeveral of the diſtinguiſhed writers of the age.

(p) Hull's Select Leters. Vol. II. p. 109, 110.

In the courſe of his profeſſion Mr. Dodſley acquired a very handſome fortune, which enabled him to retire from the active part of buſineſs. During the latter years of his life, he was much troubled with the gout, to which he at length fell a martyr, whilſt he was upon a viſit to his friend Mr. Spence, at Durham. He was buried in the Abbey-Church-Yard of that city, and the following inſcription was engraved on his tomb-ſtone:

"If you have any reſpect
"for uncommon induſtry and merit,
"regard this place,
"in which are depoſited the remains of
"MR. ROBERT DODSLEY;
"who, as an Author, raiſed himſelf
"much above what could have been expected

"and who, as a man, was ſcarce
"exceeded by any in integrity of heart,
"and purity of manners and converſation.

"Sept. 25, 1764,

As an author Mr. Dodſley is entitled to conſiderable praiſe. His works are recommended by an eaſe and elegance which are ſometimes more pleaſing than a more laboured and ornamented manner of compoſition. In verſe, his numbers, if not ſublime, are flowing; and his ſubjects are well choſen and entertaining. His proſe is familiar, and yet chaſte; and in his dramatic pieces he has always kept in view the one great principle, delectando pariterque monendo. Some general moral is conſtantly conveyed in each of his plans, and particular inſtructions are diſperſed in the particular ſtrokes of ſatire. The dialogue, at the ſame time, is eaſy, the plots ſimple, and the cataſtrophe intereſting and pathetic (q). Mr. Dodſley's Eſſay on Fable will be a durable monument of his ingenuity. With regard to his private character, he is equally entitled to applauſe. As a tradeſman he preſerved the greateſt integrity, as a writer the moſt becoming humility. Mindful of the early encouragement which his own talents met with, he was ever ready to give the ſame opportunity of advancement to thoſe of others; and on many occaſions he was not only the publiſher but the patron of genius. There was no circumſtance by which he was more diſtinguiſhed, than by the grateful remembrance which he retained, and always expreſſed, towards the memory of thoſe to whom he owed the obligation of being firſt taken notice of in life. Modeſt, ſenſible, and humane, he acquired the eſteem and reſpect of all with whom he was acquainted; and it was his happineſs to paſs many years in an intimacy with men of the brighteſt abilities, and whoſe names will be revered by poſterity (r).

In 1772, a ſecond volume of Mr. Dodſley's works was collected together and publiſhed, under the title of "Miſcellanies." The volume contains "Cleone," "Mel-"pomene," "Agriculture," and the "Œconomy of Human Life."]

DODWELL (Henry), a very learned writer, in part of the XVIIth and beginning of the XVIIIth century, was born in the Pariſh of St. Warburgh in Dublin [A], towards the latter end of October, 1641 (a); and baptized November 4th (b). His father had an eſtate at Connaught; but, it being ſeized by the Iriſh rebels, he came, with his wife and child, to England in 1648, to obtain ſome aſſiſtance among their relations. After ſome ſtay in London, they went to York, and placed their ſon in the free-ſchool of that city (c), where he continued five years, and laid the foundation of his future great accompliſhments. His father, after having ſettled him with his mother at York, went to Ireland, to look after his eſtate, but died of the plague at Waterford: and his mother, going thither for the ſame purpoſe, fell into a conſumption, of which ſhe died, in her brother Sir Henry Slingſby's houſe (d). Being thus deprived of his parents, Mr. Dodwell was reduced to ſuch ſtreights that he had not money enough to buy pen, ink, and paper [B]; and ſuffered very much for want of his board being regularly paid (e). Thus he continued till 1654, when his uncle, Mr. Henry Dodwell, rector of Newbourn and Hemley in Suffolk, ſent for him, diſcharged his debts [C], and not only aſſiſted, but alſo perfected, him in his ſtudies (f). With him he remained about a year, and then went to Dublin, where he was at ſchool for a year longer (g). In 1656 he was admitted into Trinity-College in that city, of which he was ſucceſſively choſen Scholar and Fellow (h). But in 1666 he quitted his Fellowſhip, in order to avoid going into holy orders (i), as the ſtatutes of the College require [D]. He came the ſame year to England, and reſided at Oxford (k) for the ſake of the public library. Thence he returned to his native country for a time (l), and in 1672 publiſhed, at Dublin, in 8*vo*. a poſthumous treatiſe of his late learned Tutor John Stearn, M. D. to which he put a preface of his own [E]. His ſecond work was, 'Two Letters of Advice. I. For the Suſception of Holy Orders. II. For Studies Theological, eſpecially ſuch as are Rational.' To the ſecond edition of which, in 1681, was added, 'A Diſcourſe concerning the Phœnician Hiſtory of Sanchoniathon [F].' In 1673, he wrote a preface, without his name, to 'An Introduction

[A] Was born in the pariſh of St. Warburgh in Dublin.] Though Ireland was the place of his birth, yet by both parents he was of Engliſh extraction. His father, William Dodwell, was in a military office, being Corporal of the Field, a poſt now diſuſed, but equal to a Captain of horſe (1). His grandfather (who firſt of that family ſettled in Ireland) was Henry Dodwell, a Clergyman (2); a native of Oxford, and ſon of William, ſuppoſed to be brother of Alderman Henry Dodwell, Mayor of that city in the year 1592 (3).—As for Mr. Dodwell's mother; ſhe was daughter of Sir Francis Slingſby, uncle to that Sir Henry Slingſby, who was beheaded in 1658, for being concerned in a plot againſt Oliver Cromwell, then Protector. Sir Francis Slingſby was a very brave officer under Sir George Carew, Lord Preſident of Munſter (4).

[B] That he had not money enough to buy pen, ink, and paper.] So that he was forced to uſe ſuch paper as young gentlewomen had covered their work with, and thrown away as no longer fit for their uſe, he having no other to write his exerciſes on; and to make uſe of charcoal, inſtead of pen and ink, which he had not money to purchaſe; and then, when he came to ſchool, to borrow pen and ink of his ſchool-fellows to fit his exerciſes for his maſter's ſight (5).

(5) Brokeſby, ubi ſupra, p. 15.

[C] Diſcharged his debts.] The non-payment of which, and eſpecially of his board, had procured him a great deal of neglect and ill treatment; which was to him frequently matter of melancholy reflexions, and had made a very great impreſſion upon his tender mind, as appears from the following inſtance. One night, when at his uncle's, he was heard to cry out bitterly, and make a ſad noiſe, in his ſleep. Upon which, his uncle going to him, and awaking him, the young man told him, that he dreamed his landlord Hind was come to fetch him back to York: the thoughts of which gave him inexpreſſible uneaſineſs (6).

[D] As the ſtatutes of the College require.] By the ſtatutes of that college, the Fellows are obliged to take Orders when they are Maſters of Arts of three years ſtanding. The learned Biſhop Jer. Taylor offered to uſe his intereſt for procuring a diſpenſation of the ſtatute. But Mr. Dodwell refuſed to accept of that kind offer; leſt it ſhould be an ill precedent, and of bad conſequence afterwards to the college. The reaſons given for his declining the miniſterial function were, 1. The great weight of that office, and the ſevere account which the Miniſters of Chriſt have to give to their Lord and Maſter. 2. His natural baſhfulneſs, and humble opinion, and diffidence of himſelf; tho' he was, unqueſtionably, very well qualified in point of learning, of every kind. 3. That he thought he could do more ſervice to religion, and the Church, by his writings, whilſt he continued a layman, than if he took Orders; for then the uſual objections made againſt clergymen's writings on thoſe ſubjects, viz. 'That 'they plead their own cauſe, and are biaſſed by ſelf-'intereſt,' would be entirely taken off (7).

(7) Ibid. p. 23, 24, &c.

[E] A poſthumous treatiſe of his late learned tutor John Stearn, M. D. to which he put a preface of his own.] He entituled that book, De Obſtinatione: Opus poſthumum Pietatem Chriſtiano-Stoicam ſcholaſtico more ſuadens: and his own preface, prolegomena Apologetica, de uſu Dogmatum Philoſophicorum, &c. Wherein he apologizes for his tutor; who, by quoting ſo often in that book, and ſetting a high value upon the writings and maxims of the Heathen Philoſophers, particularly of the Stoics, might ſeem to depreciate the Holy Scriptures. Mr. Dodwell therefore premiſes firſt, that the author's deſign in that work is only to recommend Moral Duties, and enforce the practice of them by the authority of the antient Philoſophers; and that he doth not meddle with the great myſteries of Chriſtianity, which are diſcoverable only by divine revelation. After that, he ſhews, that, in things which concern our practice, reaſon is to be regarded, and even in things wherein God hath ſuperadded a farther revelation of his will in the Holy Scriptures: That, in the examination of natural reaſoning, the authority of the great aſſertors and vindicators of Reaſon challenges our regard; and conſequently the Philoſophers.—Moreover, he argues, that the great end of Revelation was to inſtruct us in things, which we could not by our reaſon attain to the knowledge of; but that in ordinary caſes our reaſon is given us by God to be our guide and director, it being the candle of the Lord: That revelation was ſuperadded by God to make a farther diſcovery of his will, and to aſſiſt our natural reaſon, and hence not to be expected in caſes where reaſon is ſufficient to attain the end: That faith, or belief of divine revelation, is founded on reaſon, and that ſome acts of reaſon precede faith, and are ſuppoſed in our belief of divine revelation, &c. Laſtly, he ſhows, that by Obſtinatio Dr. Stearn meant what the Greeks call ἀπάθεια, εὐπάθεια, ἀναμαξησία, i. e. Firmneſs, the not ſinking under adverſities and misfortunes (8).

" troduction to a devout Life," by Francis de Sales, the laſt Biſhop and Prince of Geneva; which was publiſhed at Dublin, in Engliſh, this ſame year, in 12*mo* (m). He came over again to England in 1674, and ſettled in London; where he became acquainted with ſeveral learned men; particularly, in 1675, with Dr. William Lloyd, afterwards ſucceſſively Biſhop of St Aſaph, Litchfield and Coventry, and Worceſter. With that eminent Divine he contracted ſo great a friendſhip and intimacy, that he attended him to Holland, when he was appointed Chaplain to the Princeſs of Orange. He was alſo with him at Saliſbury, when he kept his reſidence there as Canon of that Church; and ſpent afterwards a good deal of time with him at St. Aſaph (n). In 1675 he publiſhed " Some Conſiderations of preſent Concernment; How far the Romaniſts may be truſted " by Princes of another perſuaſion," in 8*vo* [G]. The year following he put out " Two " ſhort Diſcourſes againſt the Romaniſts. 1. An Account of the fundamental Principle " of Popery, and of the Inſufficiency of the Proofs which they have for it. 2. An " Anſwer to ſix Queries propoſed to a Gentlewoman of the Church of England, by an " Emiſſary of the Church of Rome [H]." In the year 1679, he publiſhed, in 4*to*, " Separation of Churches from Epiſcopal Government, as practiſed by the preſent Non- " conformiſts, proved ſchiſmatical, from ſuch Principles as are leaſt controverted, and do " withal moſt popularly explain the Sinfulneſs and Miſchief of Schiſm [I]. This, being animadverted upon by R. Baxter (o), was vindicated, in 1681, by Mr. Dodwell, in " A " Reply to Mr. Baxter's pretended Confutation of a Book, intituled, Separation of " Churches, &c." To which were added, " Three Letters to Mr. Baxter, written in the " year 1673, concerning the Poſſibility of Diſcipline under a Dioceſan Government, &c." 8*vo*. In 1682 came out his " Diſſertations on St. Cyprian [K]." The year following, he publiſhed " A Diſcourſe concerning the One Altar, and the One Prieſthood, inſiſted " on (m) Brokeſby, as above, p. 33. 36. Mr. Dodwell reviſed it, and left out whatever was Popiſh; publiſhing it under this title. *An Introduction to a Devout Life: containing eſpecially a prudent Method for Spiritual Cloſet Exerciſes, and Remedies againſt the Difficulties ordinarily occurring in the Conduct of a pious Life. two letters was written for the uſe of a ſon of Biſhop Leſley, a brother to Mr. Charles Leſley, well known for his writings againſt the Quakers, Deiſts, Papiſts, and Socinians: one for whom Mr. Dodwell had a great eſteem (9).——As for his Diſcourſe on Sanchoniathon; it was occaſioned by ſome letters that paſſed between him and the learned Dr. Tho. Smith. This learned perſon having deſired Mr. Dodwell's thoughts concerning that author, Mr. Dodwell wrote this diſcourſe, wherein he delivers it as his opinion, that Philo-Byblius was the forger, or contriver, of that Hiſtory under the name of Sanchoniathon.

[G] Some Conſiderations of preſent Concernment, &c.] This book was chiefly levelled againſt Father P. [H] An Account of the fundamental Principle of Popery,——and An Anſwer to Six Queries, &c.] That fundamental principle is, the pretended Infallible Authority of that Church. He begins this treatiſe by ſhewing, that the Romaniſts are guilty of formal ſchiſm with reſpect to us in England; ſince they ſeparated from us upon the prohibition of Pius V. by his Bull dated Febr. 25, 1569. There is a very long preface to this ſhort tract, 'concerning the uſe- 'fulneſs of the following hypotheſis.'——His Anſwer to the Six Queries was occaſioned by their being preſented to a gentlewoman of the Church of England, by a Romaniſt, in order to ſeduce her. Whereupon Mr. Dodwell was deſired to give a ſhort and diſtinct anſwer to them: which he accordingly did. The queries were, 1. 'Whether any one going from the 'Church of England, and dying a Roman Catholick, 'can be ſaved? 2. Whether they be idolaters, or 'not? 3. Where was the Church of England before 'Luther's time? 4. Why all the Churches are not 'united in one? 5. Why the Church of England 'doth not hold up to confeſſion, faſting-days, holy 'oil, which we ourſelves commend? 6. Why was 'Reformation done by Act of Parliament?' Theſe two Diſcourſes make but a very ſmall volume in 12*mo*. They were reprinted in 1688, 4*to*, with 'A new 'Preface relating to the Biſhop of Meaux, and other 'modern Complainers of miſrepreſentation.'

[I] Separation of Churches, &c.] This book was occaſioned by an Anſwer to a Sermon of the learned John Sharp (afterwards Archbiſhop of York) on Romans xiv. 19, by a Nonconformiſt. Mr. Dodwell undertook to vindicate the doctrine contained in this ſermon: and that produced the book now before us. In this Mr. Dodwell ſhews, that ſeparation from epiſcopal communion renders perſons unſecure of their eternal ſalvation: that ſalvation is ordinarily to be expected from the participation of the Sacraments of Baptiſm and the Lord's Supper, which God has appointed as the ordinary means of obtaining the Goſpel-benefits, not to be obtained merely by hearing the word, and prayer: that the validity of the Sacraments depends on the authority of the perſons adminiſtering them, there being ſuch whom God has commiſſioned to act as his Miniſters, whoſe acts he will ratify in heaven: that God is not obliged to beſtow ſpiritual benefits on any, who receive the Sacraments from perſons not thus authorized, beſides their adminiſtering them being an uſurpation on God's authority, &c. In this book he hath learned diſcourſes on the Sin unto Death; and the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt. He intended to write, moreover, " A Hiſtory of the firſt " Schiſms in the Chriſtian Church," as a ſecond part of this work; which he ſtiled the Hiſtorical part, as the former the Rational. Accordingly he began it, and in Latin, that it might be beneficial to foreigners as well as our nation; but he never finiſhed it (11).

(11) Brokeſby, p. 58, &c.

[K] Diſſertations on St. Cyprian.] They were compoſed at the requeſt of the excellent Dr. J. Fell, Biſhop of Oxford, who deſired our author to write Obſervations on St. Cyprian, when he was about publiſhing his beautiful edition of that Father. This produced theſe Diſſertations; which were dedicated by the author to that Prelate, on the 7th of April 1682, and printed, that year, in the ſame ſize as Biſhop Fell's St. Cyprian, and deſigned to be bound with it. A ſecond edition of them, under the title of Diſſertationes Cyprianicæ, &c. was reprinted at Oxford in 1684, 8*vo*. They are chiefly explanations of ſome paſſages in St. Cyprian. In the XIth Diſſertation he ſhews, 'How ſmall the number of martyrs was 'in the firſt perſecutions: and how later Martyrologies, eſpecially of the Romaniſts, have multi- 'plied then without the authority of antient monu- 'ments.' This ſubject he handled particularly at the requeſt of Dr. W. Lloyd, Biſhop of St. Aſaph (12); with a proſpect of the ſucceſſion of King James II (13). And he [Mr. Dodwell] thought, that the leſſening the number of martyrs leſſened not the glory of Chriſtianity, when the heroic conſtancy and patience of them that ſuffered, which tended ſo much to its honour, was the great reaſon the perſecutors put a ſtop to theſe ſlaughters. However, Mr Dodwell was ſeverely, nay rudely, reflected upon for this Diſſertation by Biſhop Burnet, who thus ſpeaks to him: 'in one of theſe [Diſſertations] you laboured 'to leſſen one of the glorious characters of the Chriſ- 'tian

He publiſhed alſo, " Diſſertations on Irenæus [O]." On the 2d of April 1688, he was elected, by the Univerſity of Oxford, Camden's Profeſſor of Hiſtory, without any application of his own, and when he was at a great diſtance from Oxford (r): and the 21ſt of May was incorporated Maſter of Arts in that Univerſity (s). But this beneficial and creditable employment of Profeſſor he did not enjoy long; being deprived of it in November, 1691, for refuſing to take the Oaths of Allegiance to King William and Queen Mary (t). When their Majeſties had ſuſpended thoſe Biſhops who would not acknowledge their authority, Mr. Dodwell publiſhed " A cautionary diſcourſe of Schiſm, " with a particular Regard to the Caſe of the Biſhops, who are ſuſpended for refuſing to " take the new Oath." London, 8*vo* (u). And when thoſe Biſhops were actually deprived, and others put in their ſees [P], he joined the former, looking upon the new Biſhops, and their adherents, as Schiſmatics. He wrote likewiſe " A Vindication of the deprived " Biſhops:" and " A Defence of the ſame [Q]." After having loſt his Profeſſorſhip, he continued

(u) Upon occaſion of this diſcourſe it was ſaid, That, allowing his plea to ſtand, he had made Religion for the Church, not the Church for Religion. See the Life of Mr. John Kettlewell, &c. Lond. 1718. p. 317.

' tian religion from the number of the martyrs; and ' in the next (concerning the ſignal courage aud fortitude of the martyrs) you began the account of the ' patience and fortitude of the martyrs with the wilfulneſs of the firſt Chriſtians, and their deſire of ' fame and vain-glory. It is true, you after that ' gave better reaſons for it: but would a Vaninus, ' a Hobbes, and a Spinoza, ſay any thing more derogatory to that glory of our moſt holy faith than you ' wrote in thoſe two Diſſertations?' In anſwer to that, Mr. Dodwell replies, That he wrote thoſe Diſcourſes with a deſign of advancing, not of undervaluing, martyrdom,'——And that he could have eaſily confuted his adverſaries, had it not been for the ' great veneration he had for the goodneſs and piety ' of ſeveral of the Fathers, who were of too eaſy belief ' of matter of fact not ſufficiently atteſted (14).' This Diſſertation was profeſſedly attacked by Father Thierry Ruinart, a Benedictin; in the General Preface to his " Acta Primorum Martyrum ſincera & ſelecta, ex " Libris cum editis tum manuſcriptis collecta, &c. " Notiſque & obſervationibus illuſtrata. His præ" mittitur Præfatio generalis, in qua refellitur Diſſer" tatio 11ma Cyprianica de Paucitate Martyrum." Paris 1689, 4*to*, and Amſtel. 1712, fol. Mr. Dodwell never anſwered this Preface; not that it was unanſwerable, but really out of tenderneſs for religion: becauſe he muſt have been forced to expoſe the weakneſs or credulity of antient writers, which ſome irreligious wretches would lay hold on to vile purpoſes (15). At the end of theſe Diſſertations are ſome chronological tables, chiefly the Canons of Ptolemy collated with manuſcripts; ſome Faſti out of manuſcripts; a fragment of Theon, and another of the Emperor Heraclius, both founded on Ptolemy's Canons.

[L] A Diſſertation on a paſſage of Lactantius.] In his treatiſe " de Mortibus Perſecutorum, ſect. 17." the words are——' per circuitum ripæ Strigæ " Nicomediam venit.' In explaining which, Mr. Dodwell obſerves, That " Striga" is firſt uſed for the limit of a Roman camp, and thence for the borders of fields, and limits of countries: that rivers were convenient for all theſe ends: that as Euphrates was the boundary of the Roman empire towards the Parthians, and the Rhine towards the Germans, ſo was the Danube of the Illyrian Province. And, becauſe paſſage by water was the eaſieſt for infirm perſons, Diocleſian made choice of it in his chronical weakneſs to go to Nicomedia, partly by the Danube, and partly by the Euxine ſea, though it was ' per circuitum,' by taking a compaſs about.

[M] Of the Prieſthood of Laicks.] " De Jure Lai" corum Sacerdotali, ex Sententia Tertulliani alio" rumque Veterum;" as the title of it is. It was written by way of anſwer to H. Grotius's Diſſertation " De Cœnæ Adminiſtratione ubi paſtores non ſunt, " &c." which was tranſlated about this time into Engliſh by Mr. William Baxter, the Antiquary, and publiſhed under this title, " Anti-Dodwelliſm (16): " being two curious Tracts formerly written by Hugo " Grotius, concerning a Solution of theſe two curious " queſtions: 1. Whether the Euchariſt may be ad" miniſtered in the abſence of, or want of, Paſtors, " &c."

(16) Probably becauſe it was contrary to what Mr. Dodwell had aſſerted in his book of Schiſm, and its defences.

[N] The Poſthumous Works of the learned Dr. John Pearſon.] They were printed at London in 1688, 4*to.* under this title, " V. Cl. Johannis Pearſonii, " S. T. P. Ceſtrienſis nuper Epiſcopi, Opera Poſt" huma Chronologica, &c. viz. De Serie & Succeſſione primorum Romæ Epiſcoporum Diſſer" tationes duæ: quibus præfiguntur Annales Paulini, " & Lectiones in Acta Apoſtolorum. " Ceſtrienſis Cyprianicos, Diſſertatio Singularis." The additions made by Mr. Dodwell are, a Diſcourſe to ſhew that Theophilus Antiochenus, the author of the Diſcourſe "ad Autolycum," was not Theophilus Biſhop of Antioch: another, to ſhew what St. Jerom meant by this paſſage, ' That the Churches were ' governed by a Council of Preſbyters at firſt, till diviſions aroſe, &c.' another, to prove, how little Euſebius was acquainted with Latin authors or affairs in the Weſt; and how long after his Chronicon he wrote his Hiſtory. A Diſſertation concerning the younger Agrippa's death. A Diſcourſe, ſhewing, that Celibacy and Virginity were not ſo much eſteemed in the firſt ages of the Church as in the following times. A Diſcourſe about Tertullian's Epocha, in his firſt book againſt Marcion, c, 19. A Diſſertation concerning the ſucceſſion of the firſt Biſhops begins his Cyprianic Annals: which Annals are inſerted in Biſhop Fell's edition of St Cyprian (17).

(17) This Diſſertation contains 226 pages.

[O] Diſſertations on Irenæus.] They were printed at Oxford in 1689, in 8*vo*, under the title of " Diſ" ſertationes in Irenæum. Though they are ſix in number, they are only prolegomena to what the author farther deſigned. He hath joined to his work, " Philippus Sidetes de Catechiſtarum Alexandri" norum Succeſſione," i. e. Of the Readers in the " School of Alexandria; with notes. At the end there is a Chronological Table.

[P] When thoſe Biſhops were actually deprived, and others put in their Sees.] The deprived Biſhops were, Dr. Will. Sancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; Dr. Will. Lloyd, Biſhop of Norwich; Dr. Fr. Turner, of Ely; Dr. Tho. Kenn, of Bath and Wells; Dr. Rob. Frampton, of Glouceſter; and Dr. Tho. White, of Peterborough. And thoſe put in their Sees were, Dr. John Tillotſon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; Dr. John Moore, at Norwich; Dr. Sim. Patrick, at Ely; Dr. Rich. Kidder, at Bath and Wells; Dr. Edw. Fowler at Glouceſter; and Dr. Rich. Cumberland, at Peterborough.

While he lived there, he became acquainted with Mr. Francis Cherry of Shotteſbrooke, a perſon of great learning and virtue, for the ſake of whoſe converſation he removed to Shotteſbrooke, where he chiefly ſpent the remainder of his days (x). In 1692, he publiſhed his Camdenian Lectures read at Oxford [R]: and, in 1694, "An "Invitation to Gentlemen to acquaint themſelves with ancient Hiſtory;" being a preface to Degory Whear's "Method of reading Hiſtory," tranſlated into Engliſh by Mr. Bohun. About this time having loſt one or more of the Dodwells, his kinſmen, whom he deſigned for his heirs, he married on the 24th of June 1694, in the 52d year of his age, a perſon, in whoſe father's houſe at Cookham he had boarded ſeveral times, and by her had ten children (y). In 1696 he drew up the Annals of Thucydides and Xenophon, to accompany the editions of thoſe two authors by Dr. John Hudſon and Mr. Edward Wells. Having likewiſe compiled the Annals of Velleius Paterculus, and of Quintilian, and Statius, he publiſhed them all together in 1698, in one volume, 8*vo* [S]. About the ſame time he wrote an account of the leſſer Geographers, publiſhed by Dr. Hudſon [T]: and, "A Treatiſe concerning the Lawfulneſs of inſtrumental Muſick in Holy "Offices (z):" occaſioned by an organ being ſet up at Tiverton in 1696: with ſome other things [U]. In 1701, he publiſhed his account of the Greek and Roman Cycles [W], which was the moſt elaborate of all his pieces, and ſeems to have been the work of the greateſt part of his life (a). The ſame year was publiſhed a letter of his [X], concerning Mr. Toland's diſingenuous treatment of him (b). [R] His Camdenian Lectures read at Oxford.] The firſt was read May 25, 1688, and the ſixteenth, or laſt, Nov. 6, 1691: beſides which, there are three more, that were prepared, but not read. Theſe Lectures are upon "Hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ Scriptores," i. e. thoſe authors, who wrote the Hiſtory of the Roman Emperors, from the time of Trajan to that of Dioclesian. They were printed at Oxford 1692, 8vo, under this title, "Prælectiones Academicæ in Scholâ Rheto- "rices Camdenianâ: cum Fragmentis è Libris Linteis." Theſe Libri Lintei were the Annals, or Commentaries, of the antient Romans, which uſed to be written on linen.

[S] Having likewiſe compiled the Annals of Velleius, &c.] The title of them was, "Annales Velleiani, "Quinctilianei, Statiani; ſeu Vitæ P. Vellei, M. Fa- "bii Quinctiliani, Papinii Statii (obiterque Juvenalis) "pro temporum ordine diſpoſitæ." Thoſe of Velleius Paterculus, were written at the requeſt of Dr. Charlett, late Maſter of Univerſity-College, Oxon. when he procured an edition of that author in 1692. At the end of theſe Annals is an appendix, concerning Julius Celſus, who digeſted Cæſar's Commentaries; and concerning Commodianus; in two Diſſertations addreſſed to the moſt learned Grævius.

[T] He wrote an account of the Leſſer Geographers] The firſt volume of theſe Geographers was publiſhed in 1698. 8vo. The ſecond in 1703. The third and fourth in 1712, &c. Mr. Dodwell's account of the ſeveral authors is printed in theſe volumes.

[U] With ſome other things] Particularly "De Ta- "bulis Cælorum Diſſert. Et Tabulæ Chronolog. pro "mente XII Patriarch." Theſe are printed in Dr. Grabe's 'Spicilegium,' Vol. I. among the notes. The firſt is a Diſſertation on theſe words, ταις πλαξι των ουρανων. Tabulis Cælorum, uſed in the Teſtament of the XII Patriarchs: whereby Mr. Dodwell underſtands the archetypal and original Law, as it is in the ſupreme Lawgiver in heaven; in oppoſition to the written Law of Moſes; and ſuppoſes it to be alſo part of Enoch's prophecy. The other piece is, 'Chronolo- 'gical Tables, according to the author of the Teſtament of the Twelve Patriarchs, inſerted in that collection of Dr. Grabe.

[W] His account of the Greek and Roman Cycles.] It was printed at Oxford in 1701, 4to, under this title, "De Veteribus Græcorum Romanorumque Cyclis, "obiterque de Cyclo Judæorum ætate Chriſti, Diſſer- "tationes Decem, cum Tabulis neceſſariis. Inſerun- "tur Tabulis Fragmenta Veterum inedita, ad rem "ſpectantia chronologicam. Opus Hiſtoriæ veteri, "tam Græcæ quam Romanæ, quam et Sacræ quoque "neceſſarium." At the end are 'Tabulæ Chronolo- "gicæ ad hoc opus illuſtrandum neceſſariæ." The contents of theſe Diſſertations are, 1. Of Meton's Cycle. 2. Of that of Calippus. 3. Of the Athenian Cycles before Meton. 4. The Cycles of the Olympiads. 5. The Delphic and Bœotian Cycles. 6. Of the Iſthmian Games, and Corinthian and Sicilian Cycles. 7. Of the Nemean Games, and Argolic Cycles. 8. Of the Laconic Cycles. 9. Of the Macedonian and Jewiſh Cycles. 10. Of the antient Roman Cycles.

[X] A Letter of his.] It was inſerted in the ſecond edition of "The Canon of the New Teſtament vindi- "cated, by J. Richardſon, B. D." in anſwer to J. Toland's Amyntor; who had (19) quoted a long paſſage out of Mr. Dodwell's Diſſertations on Irenæus (20), tending (as that impious author imagined) to invalidate the authority of the Holy Scriptures, and to repreſent the Canon of the New Teſtament as precarious and ill-grounded (21).

[Y] As alſo the Annals of Thucydides and Xenophon.] They were printed at Oxford in 4to, under this tule; "Annales Thucydidei et Xenophontei. Præmittitur "Apparatus, cum vitæ Thucydidis Synopſi Chrono- "logicâ."

" carnaſſeus," in the Oxford edition of that Hiſtorian by Dr. Hudſon, folio; his "Two " Diſſertations on the age of Phalaris and Pythagoras [Z];" and his " Admonition to " Foreigners, concerning the late Schiſm in England [AA]." When the bill for preventing Occaſional Conformity was depending in Parliament, he wrote a treatiſe, intituled, "Occaſional Communion fundamentally deſtructive of the Diſcipline of the Primi- " tive Catholick Church, and contrary to the Doctrine of the lateſt Scriptures concerning " Church Communion;" which was publiſhed in 1705, at London, 8*vo*. About the ſame time, obſerving that the deprived Biſhops were reduced to a ſmall number (d), he wrote, " A Caſe in View conſidered: in a Diſcourſe, proving that [in Caſe our preſent " invalidly deprived Fathers ſhall leave all their Sees vacant, either by Death or Reſigna- " tion] we ſhall not then be obliged to keep up our Separation from thoſe Biſhops, who " are as yet involved in the Guilt of the preſent unhappy Schiſm." Lond. 1705. 8*vo*. Some time after, he publiſhed " A farther Proſpect of the Caſe in View, in Anſwer to " ſome new Objections not then conſidered." Lond. 1707. 8*vo*. Hitherto Mr. Dodwell had acted in ſuch a manner as had procured him the applauſe of all, excepting ſuch as hated or deſpiſed the Nonjurors; but, about this time, he publiſhed ſome opinions that drew upon him almoſt univerſal cenſure. For, in order to exalt the powers and dignity of the Prieſthood, in that One Communion, which he imagined to be the Peculium of God, and to which he had joined himſelf, he endeavoured to prove, with his uſual perplexity of learning, That the doctrine of the Soul's Natural Mortality was the true and original Doctrine; and that Immortality was only at Baptiſm conferred upon the Soul, by the Gift of God, through the Hands of One Set of regularly-ordained Clergy (e). In ſupport of this opinion, he wrote " An Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, proving, from the Scriptures " and the firſt Fathers, that the Soul is a Principle naturally mortal; but immortalized " actually by the pleaſure of God, to Puniſhment, or to Reward, by its Union with the " Divine Baptiſmal Spirit. Wherein is proved, That none have the Power of giving this " Divine Immortalizing Spirit, ſince the Apoſtles, but only the Biſhops." Lond. 1706. 8vo. At the end of the Preface to the Reader is a Diſſertation, to prove " That Sacer- " dotal Abſolution is neceſſary for the Remiſſion of Sins, even of thoſe who are truly pe- " nitent." This Diſcourſe being attacked by ſeveral perſons [BB], our author endeavoured to vindicate himſelf in the three following pieces: namely, 1. " A Preliminary Defence " of the Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, concerning the Diſtinction between Soul and Spirit: in " two Parts. I. Againſt the Charge of favouring Impiety. II. Againſt the Charge of " favouring Hereſy. In the former is inſerted a Digreſſion, proving, that the Collection " of the Code of the Four Goſpels in Trajan's Time is no way derogatory to the ſuf- " ficient Atteſtation of them." Lond. 1707, 8*vo*. 2. " The Scripture Account of the " Eternal Rewards or Puniſhments of all that hear of the Goſpel, without an Immorta- " lity neceſſarily reſulting from the Nature of the Souls themſelves that are concerned in " thoſe Rewards or Puniſhments. Shewing particularly, I. How much of this Account " was diſcovered by the beſt Philoſophers. II. How far the Accounts of thoſe Philoſo- " phers were corrected, and improved, by the Helleniſtical Jews, aſſiſted by the Reve- " lations [AA] His Admonition to Foreigners, concerning the late Schiſm in England.] The title of it was, " De " nupero Schiſmate Anglicano Paræneſis ad Exteros, " tam Reformatos quam etiam Pontificios, qua Jura " Epiſcoporum vetera, eorundemque à Magiſtratu " Seculari Independentia, omnibus aſſerenda com- " mendantur." Lond. 8vo. i. e. " An Admonition to " Foreigners, as well of the Reformed Religion as " Papiſts; wherein the ancient Right of Biſhops, and " their Independency on the Secular Magiſtrate, are " aſſerted and recommended." The ſchiſm, here mentioned, is that which was occaſioned by the deprivation of ſome of the Biſhops, and the putting others into their Sees. See above note [P].

[Z] Two Diſſertations on the age of Phalaris and Pythagoras.] They were occaſioned by the diſpute between Dr. Bentley and the Honourable Mr. Boyle, concerning the Epiſtles of Phalaris. In the preface, Mr. Dodwell ſhews, that Atoſſa the daughter of Cyrus, was not the firſt inventor of Epiſtles, as the Doctor had aſſerted; but the thing ſhe invented was, the manner of joining the tables, on which they were written, with ſuch exactneſs, that they might be more conveniently carried. Theſe two Diſſertations were printed at Oxford in 8vo, under this title: " Exerci- " tationes duæ: prima de ætate Phalaridis: ſecunda " de ætate Pythagoræ Philoſophi."

[BB] This Diſcourſe being attacked by ſeveral perſons.] The chief books written againſt it were theſe: I. " A Charge of Hereſy maintained againſt Mr. Dod- " well's late Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, concerning the Mor- " tality of the Soul: by way of Addreſs to the Clergy " of the Church of England. Laying open his oppo- " ſition to the received Creeds, and his falſification of " all ſacred and profane Antiquity." By Edmund Chiſhull, late Chaplain at Smyrna, and Fellow of C.C.C. Oxon. Lond. 1706, 8vo. In this book the author gives the following character of Mr. Dodwell.——

' His modeſty will, I hope, excuſe me, if I have ex- ' preſſed myſelf ſomewhat freely concerning the ſize ' of his judgment and underſtanding, and if I rank ' him only in that lower claſs of learned men, who ' are indeed fitted for the collecting of materials, but ' are unqualified to judge rightly of, and to reaſon ' upon, what they ſhall collect.' The other pieces publiſhed againſt the Epiſtolary Diſcourſe were, II. " A " Letter to Mr Dodwell; wherein all the Arguments " in his Epiſtolary Diſcourſe againſt the Immortality " of the Soul are particularly anſwered, and the Judg- " ment of the Fathers concerning that matter truly " repreſented.' By Samuel Clarke, M. A. Lond. 1706, 8vo. III. ' A Philoſophical Diſcourſe con- " cerning the natural Immortality of the Soul; where- " in the great queſtion of the Soul's Immortality is " endeavoured to be rightly ſtated and fully cleared. " Occaſioned by Mr. Dodwell's late Epiſtolary Diſ- " courſe. In two Parts." By John Norris, M. A. rector of Bemerton. Lond. 1708. 8vo. IV. Tho. Mills, M. A. afterwards Biſhop of Waterford and Liſmore, publiſhed alſo an Anſwer to Mr. Dodwell, Oxford 1707, 8vo, intituled, " The Natural Immortality of the Soul aſ- " ſerted and proved from the Scriptures and Firſt Fa- " thers:

" lations of the Old Teſtament. III. How far the Diſcoveries fore-mentioned were im" proved by the Revelations of the Goſpel. Wherein the Teſtimonies alſo of S. Irenæus
" and Tertullian are occaſionally conſidered." Lond. 1708. 8*vo.* And, 3. 'An Expli-
" cation of a famous Paſſage in the Dialogue of S. Juſtin Martyr with Tryphon, concern" ing the Immortality of Human Souls. Being a Letter to the learned Author of a Book,
" intituled, Ἡ Χάρις δοθεῖσα, &c. With an Appendix, conſiſting of a Letter to the Rev.
" Mr. John Norris, of Bemerton; and an Expoſtulation relating to the late Inſults of " Mr. Clarke and Mr. Chiſhull." Lond. 1708. 8*vo.* Upon the death of Dr. William Lloyd, the deprived Biſhop of Norwich, on the firſt of January 1710-11; Mr. Dodwell, with ſome other friends, wrote to Dr. Thomas Kenn, of Bath and Wells, the only ſurviving deprived Biſhop, to know, Whether he challenged their ſubjection? He returned for anſwer, That he did not: and ſignified his deſire that the breach might be cloſed by their joining with the Biſhops poſſeſſed of their ſees; giving his reaſons for it. Accordingly, Mr. Dodwell, and ſeveral of his friends, joined in communion with them (f). But others refuſing ſo to do, Mr. Dodwell was exceedingly concerned at it, and wrote, " The Caſe in View now in Fact. Proving, That the Continuance of a ſeparate Commu-
" nion, without Subſtitutes in any of the late invalidly-deprived Sees, ſince the death of " William late Lord Biſhop of Norwich, is ſchiſmatical. With an Appendix, proving,
" That our late Invalidly-deprived Fathers had no Right to ſubſtitute Succeſſors, who " might legitimate the Separation, after that the Schiſm had been concluded by the De-
" ceaſe of the laſt Survivor of thoſe ſame Fathers." Lond. 1711. 8*vo.* Our author wrote ſome few other things [CC], beſides all that has been already mentioned. At length, after a very ſtudious and aſcetic courſe of life, he died at Shotteſbrooke the 7th of June 1711, in the ſeventieth year of his age; and was buried in the chancel of the Church there (g), where a monument is erected to him [DD]. Mr. Dodwell, as to his perſon, was of a ſmall but well-proportioned ſtature, of a ſanguine and fair complexion, of a grave

" thers: in anſwer to Mr. Dodwell's Epiſtolary Diſ-" courſe, in which he endeavours to prove the Soul to " be a Principle naturally mortal."

[CC] Our author wrote ſome few other things.] Namely, I. " Diſſertatio ad Fragmentum quoddam T.
" Livii." i. e. 'A Diſſertation on a Fragment ſup-
" poſed to be Livy's;" extant among Archbiſhop Laud's MSS. in the Bodleian Library. This Diſſertation is mentioned by Mr. Hearne, in his notes on Book vi. of Livy, of his edition. Mr. Dodwell likewiſe ſettled the times of the actions related by that author, by the years ab Urbe Cond. according to the Varronian account, ſet at the top of each page (22). II. At the requeſt of a Gentleman in the Iſle of Man, who had deſired his thoughts on this point, 'Whether
' the Church of England had juſt reaſons, when ſhe
' reformed, to lay aſide the uſe of Incenſe, which ' was practiſed in all churches before our quarrel with
' the Church of Rome?' he wrote, in 1709, 'A
' Diſcourſe concerning the Uſe of Incenſe in Divine
' Offices. Wherein it is proved, that that practice,
' taken up in the Middle Ages, both by the Eaſtern
' and Weſtern Churches, is, notwithſtanding, an ' Innovation from the Doctrine of the firſt and pureſt
' Churches, and the Traditions derived from the ' Apoſtles. Serving alſo to evince, That even the ' Conſent of thoſe Churches of the Middle Ages is ' no certain Argument, that the particulars, wherein
' they are ſuppoſed to conſent, were faithfully de-
' rived from the Apoſtles, againſt the modern Aſſert-
' ers of the Infallibility of Oral Tradition.' Printed at London in 1711, 8vo. III. " Julii Vitalis Epi-
" taphium, cum Notis Henrici Dodwelli, et Com-
" mentario G. Muſgrave. Accedit Dodwelli Epiſtola
" ad Cl. Goezium de Puteolanâ & Bajanâ Inſcripti-
" onibus." Iſcæ Dunmoniorum & Londini, 1711, 8vo. This epitaph of Julius Vitalis, on which Mr. Dodwell wrote notes, was found at Bath, and publiſhed by Mr. Hearne at the end of his edition of King Alfred's Life by Sir John Spelman, 8vo. The Letter to Mr. Goetz, Profeſſor at Leipſick, was written by Mr. Dodwell in 1700, being an explanation of an inſcription on Memonius Caliſtus, found at Puteoli; and on another found at Baiæ. IV. " De
" ætate & patriâ Dionyſii Periegetæ." On the age and country of Dionyſius the Geographer. Printed in the Oxford Edition of that author in 1710, 8vo. V. " De Parmâ Equeſtri Woodwardianâ Diſſertatio,
" &c." On the ancient Roman ſhield, formerly in Dr. Woodward's poſſeſſion, whereon was repreſented the ſacking of Rome by the Gauls. This Diſſertation Mr. Dodwell was prevented by death from finiſhing; it was publiſhed by Mr. Hearne in 8vo. Oxon. 1713. The learned author ſuppoſes this ſhield to have been made about the time of Nero. VI. Four Letters, which paſſed between the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of Sarum, and Mr. Henry Dodwell, were printed from the originals. Lond. 1713, 12mo.

Mr. Dodwell wrote likewiſe, VII. 'A Tract concerning the Death of Judas. Wherein he ſhowed, that ἀπήγξατο does not ſignify his being ſtrangled with grief, as Grotius and Dr. Hammond underſtood it, but that he hanged himſelf. It was never printed: nor the following, being VIII. " A Diſſertation con' cerning the Time of the Greek Tranſlation of the ' Old Teſtament by the LXX.' In which he proved, from the teſtimony of Eupolemus in Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, that it was not in the time of Demetrius Phaleræus a prince, and of Ptolemy Philadelphus the ſon of Ptolemy Lagida; but of Demetrius Phaler, a Grammarian, and of Ptolemy Philopator, who might be ſurnamed Philadelphus as well as the former; as there were ſeveral Phyſcones, Soteres, Philometores, and Euergetæ. This Diſſertation was left unfiniſhed: as alſo IX. " A Diſſertation concerning the Laws of Nature and Nations;" in which the author propoſed to ſhew, that theſe laws were not (as is generally ſuppoſed) the reſult of reaſon, though highly congruous thereto; but laws delivered by Almighty God to Adam, or Noah, the firſt common parents of all mankind, or at leaſt to ſome in thoſe firſt ages, wherein God moſt frequently revealed his Will: that theſe were tranſmitted by tradition; that they muſt proceed from the arbitrary pleaſure of the great Governor of the univerſe, &c. X. He deſigned to publiſh " The Epiſtle of St. Barnabas," with a literal tranſlation, and notes; having ever ſince the year 1691, wrote " Prolegomena" to it. But though he reſumed this deſign not long before his deceaſe, yet it was left imperfect. XI. Laſtly, He began to ſettle the Time and Order in which Tertullian wrote each of his books. But on this ſubject he made but a very little progreſs (23).

grave and ſerious, but a comely, pleaſant countenance: of a piercing eye, of a ſolid judgment, and ready apprehenſion (b). He naturally enjoyed ſo ſtrong and vigorous a conſtitution of body, that he knew not, by his own experience, what the head-ach was (i). His induſtry was prodigious, as appears by the many books he publiſhed. Extremely frugal he was of his time [EE], and indefatigable in his ſtudies, by which means he became acquainted with almoſt all authors, both ſacred and profane, ancient and modern (k). He ſtudied, not for his own benefit only, but alſo for that of others: for he was generouſly communicative, and always ready to aſſiſt others in worthy undertakings; very zealous to promote learning, and though learned almoſt beyond any one of his age, yet (what is very uncommon) of ſingular humility and modeſty. Accordingly he was courted and admired by the moſt eminent men abroad (l), who beſtow the higheſt encomiums upon him, on all occaſions (m). It muſt however be owned, that, as he converſed more with books than men, his Style is, for that reaſon, obſcure and intricate, and full of digreſſions: for he often complained to his friends, that he was not able to comprize his thoughts in few words (n). With regard to his moral character; he was a perſon of great ſobriety and temperance; of exemplary charity, notwithſtanding the narrowneſs of his fortune; of ſtrict Piety; a great lover of the Clergy, and a zealous Member of the Church of England (o). As for his being a Nonjuror, that indeed gives no very advantageous idea of his diſcretion or judgment: but it muſt be conſidered, on the other hand, that conſcience is a ſtubborn thing, that will not always ſtoop to intereſt or ambition.

[E E] Extremely frugal he was of his time.] How deſirous he was to ſave and improve it, is evident from the care he took not to loſe that part of it wherein he travelled, which was chiefly on foot, through his own choice, rather than by ſtage-coaches, that he might thereby be maſter of his own hours, often reading as he walked. For this end, he carried with him, in his journeys, books fitted for his pockets, the Hebrew Bible in four ſmall volumes, the Greek New Teſtament, and the Common Prayer, accordingly. For the ſame purpoſe he had Thomas à Kempis, S. Auguſtine's Meditations, and other books of the like nature and ſize (25). After he was ſettled in Berkſhire, he generally walked from Shotteſbrooke to London, in a day, which is ſix and twenty miles (26). M.

 Mr. Ezahred Hamilton, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and Secretary to the Duke of Ormond, informed the correſpondent, whom we have ſo frequently had occaſion to mention with reſpect and gratitude, that Mr. Dodwell, when in London, uſed daily to frequent a coffee-houſe near Temple Bar, where he was willing to anſwer all who aſked his opinion concerning matters of literature. Many of his countrymen reſorted to the ſame coffee-houſe, and regularly ſaw him home every night. The reaſon of his marrying late in life was the offence he took at ſome of his relations, who did not pay him a certain pittance which he had agreed with them ſhould be tranſmitted to him yearly out of the fortune he poſſeſſed. The fact, as ſtated by Mr. Harris, in his edition of Sir James Ware's works, was as follows: 'He had a good eſtate in Ireland, the profits of which 'he gave to his next kinſman, reſerving only a ſmall 'part for his own ſubſiſtence. But upon his marriage 'he took the whole to himſelf; his kinſman having 'raiſed a fair fortune out of the eſtate, while he enjoyed it (27).'

(27) Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. II. p. 265.

Our correſpondent has farther favoured us with the anſwers which he would have given to the ſix queries propoſed to a gentlewoman of the Church of England, by an emiſſary of the Church of Rome. "I 'fancy," ſays he, 'Mr. Dodwell and I would not 'anſwer the ſix queries in the ſame manner. However, as I never read his book, I ſhall attempt ſuch 'an anſwer to his queries as I apprehend is agreeable to the fundamental doctrines of real Proteſtants.' To render our friend's communication more perſpicuous, we ſhall give each query (from note H), and then ſubjoin the reply.

1. "Whether any one going from the Church of "England, and dying a Roman Catholic, can be "ſaved?"

Anſwer. "Man ought to be humble, and not "pretend to determine who ſhall be ſaved, or who "ſhall be damned. Thus much in general; more "particularly, if one who has learned his religion "from the Bible ſhall chuſe another guide, he is "guilty of a great ſin, and to the mercy or judgment "of God we leave him."

2. "Whether

2. "Whether they be idolaters or no?"

Anſwer. "They who pay divine honours to images are idolaters. They who, without authority, pay ſuch homage before images as induces others to worſhip images, cauſe ſuch perſons to commit idolatry."

3. "Where was the Church of England before Luther's time?"

Anſwer. "Where the Church of England was, as contradiſtinguiſhed from the Church of Rome, or Conſtantinople, or France, &c. is a captious queſtion. But the Church of Chriſt was in the Bible, and in thoſe who believe the Bible and obey its precepts."

4. "Why all the Churches are not united in one?"

Anſwer. "God knows; we pretend not to judge of the depths of his providence. The moſt obvious reaſons are to be found in the paſſions, ſins, will-worſhip, and uſurpations of men."

5. "Why the Church of England doth not hold up to confeſſion, faſting-days, holy oil, which we ourſelves commend?"

Anſwer, "Let the diſciples of any particular Church anſwer a queſtion concerning a particular Church. As I am of no Church, I ſhall never anſwer any argument ad hominem.

6. "Why was reformation done by Act of Parliament?

Anſwer. "That it might have the effect of a Law in the land, juſt as the privileges of the Romiſh Church were frequently confirmed by Law; and that thoſe of the Church of Rome might be legally diſpoſſeſſed, and others put in their room."

Whatever may be ſpecifically determined concerning the paucity of Martyrs, for which Mr. Dodwell contended, it is certain, that they were ſufficiently numerous to exhibit a glorious evidence of the ſtrength of principle, and of the admirable efficacy of the Chriſtian Religion. The uſual diviſion of the perſecutions of the three firſt Centuries after Chriſt into the number of ten, has always appeared to us more fanciful than juſt. For ſome of the ten which are commonly enumerated were not general perſecutions; and were we to reckon up all the particular ones, the catalogue would probably be increaſed. There can be no juſt doubt but that the firſt Chriſtians were expoſed to frequent and ſevere perſecutions. Several ſceptical writers have, indeed, repreſented them as trifling and inconſiderable; and this has eſpecially been done by Voltaire, whoſe ſentiments many perſons have been ready to adopt. But Voltaire has been well confuted by Dr. Macknight, in his book upon the truth of the Goſpel Hiſtory. For a juſt account of the primitive perſecutions, recourſe may be had to Moſheim, Lardner, and Prieſtley.

Before Mr. Dodwell committed his book, upon "The One Altar and the One Prieſthood," to the preſs, he brought it to Dr. Tillotſon, and deſired his judgment concerning it. The Doctor freely expreſſed his diſlike of it; and told the author, that though his work was written with ſuch great accuracy and cloſe dependence of one propoſition upon another, as that it ſeemed to be little leſs than demonſtration, 'ſo 'that (added Tillotſon) I can hardly tell you, where 'it is, that you break the chain; yet I am ſure, that 'it is broken ſomewhere: for ſuch and ſuch particu-'lars are ſo palpably falſe, that I wonder you do not 'perceive the abſurdity of them; they are ſo groſs, 'and grate ſo much upon the inward ſenſe (28)." When Dr. Tillotſon, after the Revolution, had conſented to be Archbiſhop of Canterbury, before he was conſecrated to the ſee, Mr. Dodwell wrote him a Letter to diſſuade him from being the aggreſſor in the new-deſigned ſchiſm, and in erecting another altar againſt that of the deprived fathers and brethren. 'If,' ſays he, 'their places be not vacant, the new 'conſecration muſt, by the nature of the ſpiritual 'monarchy, be null, invalid, and ſchiſmatical.' He affirmed, likewiſe, that ſuch as were concerned in this practice, cut themſelves off from the communion of which they were before members; as did all others who joined with them (29).

(28) Birch's Life of Tillotſon, p. 400, 401.

(29) Ibid. p. 246, 247.

Mr. Dodwell in his former writings had afforded too much evidence of his attachment to narrow and ſuperſtitious principles; but by his treatiſe on the natural mortality of the ſoul, and on immortality's being conferred upon it only through the medium of the baptiſm of a regularly ordained prieſt, he diſguſted thoſe who had hitherto been his greateſt admirers. His philoſophy was hateful to every orthodox divine, and his theology appeared ridiculous to all who had any liberality of ſentiment. It is ſaid, that he was greatly diſſatisfied with the manner in which he was treated by Dr. Clarke; but he ſeems to have had no good reaſon for his reſentment. When a learned man aſſerts the ſtrangeſt of all paradoxes to ſerve a particular end, he muſt expect a little ſeverity from his antagoniſts. Dr. Clarke, however, was not guilty of any exceſs in this reſpect; for his ſtyle is not remarkably harſh or controverſial (30).

(30) From the Remarks of the correſpondent before mentioned.

Biſhop Burnet, in one of his Letters to Mr. Dodwell, after ſome other animadverſions, proceeds as follows: 'You are a learned man; and your life has 'been not only without blemiſh, but exemplary. 'But you do not ſeem to remember, or enough to 'conſider the woe our Saviour has denounced againſt 'thoſe by whom ſcandals come; and, according to 'the true notion of ſcandal, I know no man, that has 'laid more in the way of the little ones, or weaker 'Chriſtians, than you have done. I do aſſure you, 'I would rather wiſh that I could neither read nor 'write, than to have read or writ to ſuch purpoſes 'as you have been purſuing now above thirty years. 'You ſeem to love novelties and paradoxes, and to 'employ your learning to ſupport them. I do aſſure 'you, I have a juſt value for many valuable things 'that I know to be in you; and do heartily lament 'every thing that is otherwiſe (31).'

(31) New Univerſal Dict. vol. IV. p. 460.

Of Mr. Dodwell's ten children, ſix ſurvived him; four daughters, and two ſons, Henry and William. Henry was brought up to the Law, and became ſceptical in his principles, to which, perhaps, his father's abſurd and peculiar notions might not a little contribute. In 1742, he publiſhed a pamphlet, entitled "Chriſtianity not founded upon Argument," which, under the cover of zeal for Religion, was an attack upon revelation. It was written with ingenuity and ſubtilty; excited great attention for a time; and was anſwered (and indeed effectually) by ſeveral able and learned men. Proper notice has been taken of it in our Life of Dr. Doddridge. This Mr. Henry Dodwell took a very active part in the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, during the early period of that Society; and, from all which the writer of the preſent Note could obſerve concerning him (having often been with him, both at general meetings and in committees) he appeared to be a polite, humane, and benevolent man.

William Dodwell, who followed his father in the general orthodoxy of his principles, but did not, we apprehend, adopt his peculiarities, became a learned and reſpectable divine of the Church of England. He was educated at Trinity-College, Oxford, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, on the eighth of June, 1732 (32). In the courſe of his Life, he obtained ſeveral conſiderable preferments. He was Rector of Shotteſbroke, and Vicar of Buckleſbury and of White-Waltham. Dr. Sherlock, when Biſhop of Saliſbury, gave him a prebendal ſtall in that Cathedral, and he afterwards became a Canon of the ſame Church. Biſhop Thomas promoted him to the Arch-Deaconry of Berks. The principal works by which he was diſtinguiſhed, were, "A Free Anſwer "to Dr. Middleton's Free Enquiry," publiſhed in 1749; and "A Full and Final Reply to Mr. Toll's "Defence of Dr. Middleton," which appeared in 1751. Both theſe works were written with temper, as well as with learning. Our author was judged to have performed ſuch good ſervice to the cauſe of religion by his anſwer to Dr. Middleton, that the Univerſity of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of Doctor in Divinity by diploma, in full convocation, on the twenty-third of February, 1749-50. He wrote likewiſe, a "Diſſertation on Jephtha's Vow (33)." Beſides theſe productions, he publiſhed a great number of Sermons, a catalogue of which is ſubjoined. Two Sermons on the "Eternity of Hell Torments," from 2 Theſſ. i. 7, 9, 1743. "The Deſirableneſs of the "Chriſtian Faith." "A Viſitation Sermon," from 1 Pet. i. 8. 1744. He was born at Stonwick, in Northamptonſhire, on the 20th of March, 1625 (a), being the fifth in deſcent (b) from William Dolben of Denbighſhire; and deſcended from an antient family of that name, ſettled at Segrayd, in the ſame county. Dr. William Dolben, the father of the Archbiſhop, was at that time Rector of Stanwick, and of Benefield, to both of which he was inſtituted in one day (c); and Prebendary of Lincoln (d), through the intereſt of the Lord Keeper Williams, whoſe niece Elizabeth Williams he had married. Few marriages have been more fortunate in their iſſue: beſides the ſubject of the preſent article, their ſecond ſon William proved highly eminent in the profeſſion to which he was educated. He became Recorder of London, received the honour of Knighthood; and, in 1678, was appointed one of the Judges in the Court of Common Pleas. In 1683 he was removed from that ſituation, very highly to his honour, being the only Judge that gave his opinion againſt the legality of diſſolving corporations by Quo Warranto (e). His rank was juſtly reſtored by King William; who, in 1689, appointed him a Judge of the King's Bench (f); and in that ſtation he remained till his death, which happened in 1693, the 65th year of his age. He was buried in the Temple-Church, and left a character of high eſtimation for ſtrict integrity, and the moſt penetrating diſcernment (g). Dr. William Dolben, however, neither lived to ſee the eminence of his ſons, nor to complete his own career of advancement; for he died in 1631, when his eldeſt ſon John was only ſix years old, being himſelf nominated, at the time, for the ſucceſſion to a vacant biſhopric [A]: but his death produced an affecting teſtimony to his merit, of no ſmall value in the moral eſtimate of honours. This was conferred by his pariſhioners of Stanwick, by whom he was ſo ſincerely beloved, that on his falling ill at London of the ſickneſs which proved fatal to him, they plowed and ſowed his glebe lands at their own expence, that his widow might have the benefit of the crop; which ſhe accordingly received after his deceaſe (b): an anecdote more felt and valued by his family than any thing that uſually adorns the page of the Biographer.

John Dolben, afterwards archbiſhop, was educated at Weſtminſter-ſchool, where he was admitted a King's ſcholar in 1636; and in 1640 was elected to Chriſt-Church, Oxford, where he was admitted, in the ſame year, a ſtudent on Queen Elizabeth's foundation. It has been thought worthy of remark, as a ſtrong inſtance of hereditary attachment to thoſe ſeminaries, that he was the ſecond in order, of ſix ſucceeding generations, which have paſſed through the ſame ſteps of education (i).

(i) Liſt of Weſtm. Scholars Anno 1768.

When the civil wars broke out, Mr. Dolben took arms for the Royal cauſe in the garriſon at Oxford, and ſerved as an enſign in the unfortunate battle of Marſton-Moor, in 1644, where he received a dangerous wound in the ſhoulder from a muſquet-ball; but this was not the worſt of his ſufferings; in the defence of York, ſoon after, he received a ſeverer wound of the ſame kind in the thigh; which broke the bone, and confined him twelve months to his bed. In the courſe of his military ſervice he was advanced to the rank of Captain, and (according to Wood) of Major.

In 1646, when there appeared no longer any hope of ſerving the King's cauſe by arms, when Oxford and his other garriſons were ſurrendered, and himſelf in the hands of his enemies, Mr. Dolben retired again to his college, and renewed his ſtudies; a ſenſe of duty had made him an active ſoldier; inclination and natural abilities rendered him at all times a ſucceſsful ſtudent. In 1647 he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and remained at College till ejected by the Parliamentarian viſitors in 1648. In the interval between this period and the year 1656, when he entered into holy orders, we have no account of him; but it is moſt probable that his time was, in general, ſtudiouſly employed, and eſpecially from the moment when he took up that deſign. From 1657, when he married Catharine daughter of Ralph, elder brother of Archbiſhop Sheldon (k), to the time of the King's Reſtoration, he lived in Oxford, at the houſe of his father-in-law, in St. Aldate's pariſh; and throughout that interval, in conjunction with Dr. Fell and Dr. Alleſtry (l), conſtantly performed divine ſervice and adminiſtered the ſacraments, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, to the great comfort of the Royaliſts then reſident in Oxford, particularly the ſtudents ejected in 1648, who formed a regular and pretty numerous congregation. The houſe appropriated to this ſacred purpoſe was then the reſidence of Dr. Thomas Willis, the celebrated phyſician, and is yet ſtanding, oppoſite to Merton-College. The attachment of Mr. Dolben to what he conſidered as the right cauſe had before been active and courageous; it was now firm and unwearied, with equal merit, and with better ſucceſs.

When the Regal Government was reſtored, for the ſake of which Mr. Dolben had ſo often hazarded his life, his zeal for the cauſe and ſufferings in it were not forgotten by the King. In that very year, 1660, he took his degree of Doctor in Divinity, on being appointed a Canon of Chriſt Church, Oxford. In the ſame year he was alſo preſented to the Rectory of Newington-cum-Britwell, in Oxfordſhire (m), in the gift of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. His preferments and honours now ſucceeded each other rapidly; the time of trial was paſt, and the time of reward had arrived. In 1661 he became a Prebendary of St. Paul's, and was one of thoſe who ſigned the reviſed Liturgy, which paſſed the Houſe of Convocation December 20, in that year. In 1662 he was appointed Archdeacon of London, and preſented to the vicarage of St. Giles's, Cripplegate; but reſigned the latter a ſhort time after, with his other parochial preferment, on being inſtalled Dean of Weſtminſter. He was choſen Prolocutor of the Lower Houſe of Convocation in 1664, and ſoon after became Clerk of the Cloſet to the King. In 1666 he was conſecrated Biſhop of Rocheſter, and allowed to hold the Deanery of Weſtminſter in commendam. In 1675 he was appointed Lord High Almoner; an office, ſays Wood, which he diſcharged with ſuch juſtice and integrity as was for the great benefit of the poor. It would betray great ignorance of the ways of courts to ſuppoſe, that in all theſe ſteps he was not in part indebted to the interference and intereſt of Archbiſhop Sheldon; yet where merit is conſpicuous, the effect of patronage is greatly facilitated, which appears to have been the caſe in the inſtance now before us.

(m) Le Neve's Lives of the Archbiſhops.

Tranſlation to the ſee of York was the final gradation of his honours, and enjoyed only for a ſhort time, as between the laſt advancement and his death ſomething leſs than three years intervened. He was tranſlated to York in Auguſt, 1683, and then became, by an unuſual tranſition, the Eccleſiaſtical Governor of that place which he had formerly aſſiſted in defending by military force. His activity was not yet exhauſted, though exerted in a different line (n); he diligently contributed to the good adminiſtration of the ſervice in his cathedral, and in 1685 made a new regulation of Archbiſhop Grindal's order of Preachers, and appointed a weekly celebration of the Holy Sacrament: and was, in all reſpects, as his epitaph expreſſes it, an example both to the flock and to the paſtors under him.

(n) Drake's York.

The death of Archbiſhop Dolben was occaſioned, not by natural decay, but by the criminal neglect of perſons who have eſcaped from the diſgrace they deſerved by mere obſcurity. At an inn on the North road he was ſuffered by the proprietors to ſleep in a room where the infection of the ſmall-pox remained; he there caught the diſorder, which being of a virulent kind, and attended with lethargy, put an end to his life at Biſhopthorp, on the 11th of April, 1686, in the 62d year of his age, after a confinement to his bed of only four days. That ſo valuable a life ſhould have been cut off thus prematurely is matter of juſt regret, and of indignation againſt thoſe who were the cauſes of it; but Providence, in permitting ſuch events, inſtructs us very forcibly on how precarious a tenure we hold all worldly bleſſings. The body of the Archbiſhop was depoſited in the cathedral at York, where a handſome monument, with a very copious inſcription [B], records his merits, and the principal circumſtances of his life.

Anthony Wood ſays of Archbiſhop Dolben, that "he was a man of a free, gene"rous, and noble diſpoſition, and of a natural, bold, and happy eloquence." The latter circumſtance is confirmed by the teſtimony of his epitaph; and by another, which we ſhall preſently cite at large. The former, by the following inſtances of his liberality, at the different places with which he was connected. The pulpit at Stanwick is inſcribed as his gift when Biſhop of Rocheſter. He contributed one hundred pounds to the rebuilding of St. Paul's cathedral, and two hundred and fifty to the repairs at Chriſt Church, Oxford. He rebuilt that part of the epiſcopal palace at Bromley, which the preſent liberal improver has left ſtanding; and, when Dean of Weſtminſter, influenced the chapter to aſſign an equal ſhare with their own, in the dividends of fines, to the repairs and ſupport of that venerable church (o). At York he gave one hundred and ninety-five ounces of plate for the uſe of the cathedral (p).

But the fulleſt account of his perſon, talents, and character, was drawn up by his friend Sir William Trumbull, and is ſtill extant in his own hand-writing; which, as it proceeds from a perſon who had the fulleſt knowledge of him, and is certainly authentic, we ſhall preſerve in the original words (q).

As an Author, not much remains to teſtify his abilities. It is ſaid by Wood, that he was not very careful to print his ſermons, though they much deſerved publication: and, in fact, only three are known to be extant.

1. " A Sermon preached before the King, at Whitehall, on Good Friday, March 24, " 1664." The text from John xix. part of ver. 19.

2. " A Sermon on Pſal. liv. ver. 6 and 7." On a day of Thankſgiving for a Naval Victory; namely, June 20, 1665.

3. Another on a ſimilar occaſion in 1666, the text from Pſal. xviii. 1, 2, 3. Both theſe were alſo preached before the King. They are all printed in Quarto.

DONNE (JOHN), an eminent Poet and Divine of the laſt century, was born in London [A], in the year 1573, and educated in his father's houſe under a private Tutor, till the eleventh year of his age, when he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford; at which time it was obſerved of him, as formerly of the famous Picus Mirandula, that he was rather born than made wiſe by ſtudy (a). He was admitted a Commoner of Hart-Hall, together with his younger brother, in Michaelmas Term 1584 (b). He declined taking his firſt degree at Oxford, by advice of his relations, who, being of the Romiſh religion, diſliked the oath tendered upon that occaſion. After he had ſtudied three years in that Univerſity, he removed to Cambridge *, and from thence, about three years after, to Lincoln's-Inn, in London [B], where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great improvement in the ſtudy of the law (c). He was now in his eighteenth year, and as yet had profeſſed himſelf of no particular denomination of Chriſtians: but, about his nineteenth year, he laid aſide the ſtudy of the Law, and of all other ſciences, and ſet himſelf wholly to conſider the points of religion controverted between the Romiſh and Reformed Churches [C]; which ended in a ſincere attachment to the Proteſtant Religion (d). [C] He ſet himſelf to conſider the points controverted between the Romiſh and Reformed Churches.] Let us hear our author himſelf upon this head. 'I had a longer 'work, ſays he (3), to do than many other men: for 'I was firſt to blot out certain impreſſions of the Ro- 'mane Religion, and to wreſtle both againſt the exam- 'ples and againſt the reaſons, by which ſome hold was 'taken, and ſome anticipations early layde upon my 'conſcience, both by perſons, who by nature had a 'power and ſuperiority over my will, and others, who 'by their learning and good life ſeemed to me juſtly to 'claime an intereſt for the guiding and rectifying of 'mine underſtanding in theſe matters.' Afterwards he ſays: 'Although I apprehend well enough, that 'this reſolution not only retarded my fortune, but 'alſo bred ſome ſcandal, and endangered my ſpiritual 'reputation, by laying me open to miſinterpretations; 'yet all theſe reſpects did not tranſport me to any vio- 'lent and ſudden determination, till I had, to the 'meaſure of my poore wit and judgement, ſurveyed 'and digeſted the whole body of Divinity controverted 'between ours and the Romane Church. In which 'ſearch and diſquiſition, that God, which awakened 'me then, and hath never forſaken me in that induſ- 'try, as he is the author of that purpoſe, ſo he is a 'witneſs of this proteſtation, that I behaved my ſelfe, 'and proceeded therein with humility and diffidence 'in my ſelfe, and by that, which, by his grace, I 'tooke to be the ordinary meanes, which is frequent 'praier and equall and indifferent actions.' When he ſet about this enquiry, as he believed Cardinal Bellarmine to be the beſt defender of the Popiſh cauſe, he applied himſelf to the examination of that writer's works; and, about the twentieth year of his age, had marked all the Cardinal's works with obſervations under his own hand; which he ſhewed to the then

1596 and 1597, Mr. Donne accompanied the Earl of Eſſex in his expeditions againſt Cadiz and the Azores Iſlands, and ſtaid ſome years in Italy and Spain [D], where he made many uſeful obſervations, and perfected himſelf in the languages of thoſe countries. Soon after his return to England, he was made Secretary to the Lord Chancellor Egerton [E], and continued in that employment five years; during which time, he married privately, and without her father's conſent, the daughter of Sir George More, Chancellor of the Garter and Lieutenant of the Tower; who was ſo incenſed at the match, that he procured our author to be diſmiſſed from the Lord Chancellor's ſervice, and committed to priſon (e) [F]. He ſoon obtained his liberty, but was put to the trouble of a long and expenſive law-ſuit, to recover poſſeſſion of his wife, who was forcibly detained from him. At length, time, together with our author's extraordinary merit and winning behaviour, ſo far wrought upon Sir George, that he was prevailed on to uſe his intereſt with the Lord Chancellor, that his ſon-in-law might be reſtored to his poſt: but his requeſt was refuſed [G]. As for Sir George, he was ſo far reconciled to Mr. Donne and his wife, as not to deny them his paternal bleſſing; but would contribute nothing towards their ſupport, though they ſtood in great need of it, our author's fortune being much diminiſhed by the expence of his travels, books, law-ſuit, and the generoſity of his temper. However, his wants were, in a great meaſure, prevented by the ſeaſonable bounty of their kinſman Sir Francis Wooley, who entertained them ſeveral years at his houſe at Pirford in Surrey, where our author had ſeveral children born to him (f). During his reſidence at Pirford, he applied himſelf, with great diligence and ſucceſs, to the ſtudy of the Civil and Canon Laws; and, about this time, was ſollicited by Dr. Morton (afterwards Biſhop of Durham) to go into Holy Orders, and accept of a benefice, which the Doctor would have reſigned to him: but Mr. Donne thought fit to decline this obliging offer [H]. He lived with Sir Francis till that Gentleman's death; a little before which, by the mediation of Sir Francis, a perfect reconciliation was effected between our author and his father-in-law; Sir George obliging himſelf to pay Mr. Donne 800*l.* at a certain day, as a portion with his wife, or 20*l.* quarterly for their maintenance, till the ſaid portion was paid. After the death of Sir Francis Wooley, Mr. Donne took a houſe for his wife and children at Mitcham in Surrey [I], and lodgings for himſelf near Whitehall in London; where he

[D] He ſtayed ſome years in Italy and Spain.] The time he ſpent in Spain was, at his firſt going into Italy, deſigned for travelling to the Holy Land, and viewing Jeruſalem, and our Saviour's ſepulchre. But the diſappointment of company, or a ſafe convoy, or the uncertainty of returns of money into thoſe remote parts, prevented his deſign (5).

[E] He was made Secretary to the Lord Chancellor Egerton.] This, probably, was intended by that Lord only as an introduction of our author to ſome more conſiderable employment in the State. For his Lordſhip often expreſſed his high opinion of his Secretary's abilities; whom he treated rather as a friend than a ſervant, conſtantly admitting him to a place at his own table (6).

[F] He married—the daughter of Sir George More—who was ſo incenſed at the match, that he procured our author to be diſmiſſed from the Chancellor's ſervice, and committed to priſon.] Sir George's daughter lived in the Lord Chancellor's family, and was niece to his Lady. Sir George, having ſome intimations of the intended marriage, removed his daughter, in all haſte, from the Chancellor's to his own houſe at Lotheſley in Surrey; and the friends on both ſides endeavoured to draw them from their mutual affection to each other: but to no purpoſe; for, having exchanged the moſt faithful promiſes, they found means to have their marriage privately conſummated. The affair was broken in the ſofteſt manner to Sir George by his friend and neighbour the Earl of Northumberland. But Sir George was ſo tranſported with anger, that he preſently engaged his ſiſter, the Lord Chancellor's Lady, to join with him in requiring Mr. Donne's diſmiſſion, and would not be ſatisfied till his ſuit was granted. The Chancellor, at diſmiſſing our author, declared, He parted with a friend, and ſuch a Secretary as was fitter to ſerve a King than a ſubject. But Sir George's anger was not ſatisfied, till our author, together with Mr. Samuel Brook (*), who married him, and his brother, Mr. Chriſtopher Brook (†), who gave the Lady in marriage, were all committed to three ſeveral priſons. Mr. Donne, who was the firſt enlarged, never reſted, till, by his ſollicitation and intereſt, he procured the liberty of his two impriſoned friends (7).

(8) Ibid. p. 19.

[H] He thought fit to decline Dr. Morton's obliging offer.] Dr. Morton, having deſired a conference with our author, told him, 'he had a matter to propoſe to him; which nevertheleſs he would not declare to him, but upon condition, that he ſhould not return a preſent anſwer, but paſs three days in faſting and prayer, and, after a ſerious conſideration of the propoſal, then return with his anſwer.' Mr. Donne promiſing to obſerve this condition, Dr. Morton told him, 'he was no ſtranger to his neceſſities, and would now renew the attempt he had formerly made, to perſuade him to wave his expectations of court preferment, and enter into Holy Orders, with this additional reaſon, that, the king having juſt made him (Dr. Morton) Dean of Glouceſter, he was ready to reſign to him (Mr. Donne) a very good benefice he was poſſeſſed of, if God ſhould incline his heart to embrace this motion;' adding, that 'no man's parts or education ſet him above that employment, which is to be an Ambaſſador for the God of glory, that God who by a vile death opened the gates of life to mankind.' Mr. Donne performed his promiſe, and the third day after returned with his anſwer, which was to this effect: 'That he acknowledged his (Dr. Morton's) great kindneſs, with an heart full of humility and thanks, but could not accept his offer; not that he thought himſelf too good for that calling, or that his education and learning, though not eminent, might not, by the aſſiſtance of God's grace, render him in ſome meaſure fit for it; but becauſe ſome former irregularities of his life had been too notorious not to expoſe him to the cenſure of the world, and perhaps bring diſhonour to the ſacred function: beſides, being determined by the beſt Caſuiſts, that God's glory ſhould be the firſt end, and a maintenance the ſecond motive, to embrace that calling, his preſent condition was ſuch, he feared he could not reconcile his conſcience to that rule (9).' This was our author's preſent reſolution.

[I] He ſettled his wife and children at Mitcham in Surrey.] His fortune, at this time was very narrow, as he was much visited and caressed by the Nobility, foreign Ministers, and other persons of distinction (g). Some time after, at the earnest entreaty of his friends, he removed his family to London, where Sir Robert Drury, a gentleman of a considerable estate, gave him a commodious apartment in his own large house in Drury-Lane (b). He was incorporated Master of Arts in the University of Oxford (having before taken the same degree at Cambridge) the 18th of April 1610 (i). About two years after he was prevailed upon, not without some difficulty, to accompany Sir Robert Drury to Paris (k) [K]. Before this journey, and after our author's return from France, many of the Nobility and others pressed the King to confer some secular employment on him (l) [L]: but his Majesty, as appears from several of his letters. Writing to the Honourable Sir R. D. he says: 'There is not one 'person, besides myself, in my house, well. I have 'already lost half a child, and with that mischance of 'hers, my wife fallen into an indisposition, which 'would afflict her much, but that the sickness of her 'children stupifies her; of one of which, in good 'faith, I have not much hope. This meets a fortune 'so ill provided for phisique and such relief, that if 'God should ease us with burials, I know not how to 'perform even that. I flatter myself in this, that I 'am dying too; nor can I truly die faster by any 'waste, than by loss of children. From my hospital at 'Mitcham (10).' In another letter addressed to Sir Henry Goodere, having expressed his wishes for death, he adds—which though I know it is not meerly out of a wearinesse of this (life), because I had the same desires when I went with the tide, and enjoyed fairer hopes than now; yet I doubt worldly incumbrances have encreased it (11). We shall add but one passage more from another of our author's letters: 'I write from 'the fire-side in my parler, and in the noise of three 'gamesome children, and by the side of her, whom 'because I have transplanted into a wretched fortune, 'I must labour to disguise that from her by all such ho-'nest devices, as giving her my company and dis-'course (12).' Here you have part of the picture of his narrow fortune, and the perplexities of his generous mind: and thus it continued with him for about two years; all which time his family remained constantly at Mitcham; to which place he often retired himself, and destined some days to a constant study of some points of controversy betwixt the English and Romish Church, and especially those of Supremacy and Allegiance (13).

[K] He was prevailed on, not without some difficulty, to accompany Sir Robert Drury to Paris.] Mrs. Donne, who was with child, and in an ill state of health, expressed some reluctance at her husband's intended journey, saying, her divining soul boded her some ill in his absence, and therefore desired him not to leave her. This made Mr. Donne lay aside all thoughts of the journey, and really resolve against it. But Sir Robert becoming very importunate in his request, Mrs. Donne, at last, gave a faint consent to the journey, which was proposed to be but for two months (14). Mr. Walton is mistaken in telling us, Sir Robert Drury accompanied the Lord Hay in his embassy from King James to the French King: for that Lord was not sent embassador to France till July 1616 (15), whereas it is evident from the dates of some of our author's letters (16), that he was at Paris with Sir Robert Drury in 1612. Mr. Donne, before his departure, presented his wife with a copy of verses (17), in which we may particularly admire the following beautiful similitudes.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
  Though I must go, indure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
  Like gold to an airy thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two so
  As stiff twin compasses are two;
Thy soul, the fixt foot, makes no show
  To move, but doth, if t'other do;

And though it in the center sit,
  Yet when the other far doth rome,
It leans and hearkens after it,
  And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must,
  Like t'other foot, obliquely run,
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
  And makes me end where I begun.

We shall here give the reader Isaac Walton's account of Mr. Donne's vision, soon after his arrival at Paris. It was not indeed told him by our author himself, but by a person of honour, who had a great intimacy with Mr. Donne (18). However take it in Walton's own words (19); 'Two days after their arrival there, 'Mr. Donne was left alone, in that room in which 'Sir Robert, and he, and some other friends had 'dined together. To this place Sir Robert returned 'within half an hour; and as he left, so he found 'Mr. Donne alone; but in such an extasy, and so al-'tered as to his looks, as amazed Sir Robert to be-'hold him: insomuch that he earnestly desired Mr. 'Donne to declare what had befallen him in the short 'time of his absence. To which Mr. Donne was 'not able to make a present answer; but after a long 'and perplext pause, did at last say, "I have seen a "dreadful vision since I saw you: I have seen my "dear wife pass twice by me thorough this room, "with her hair hanging about her shoulders, and a "dead child in her arms; this I have seen since I "saw you." To which Sir Robert replied, "Sure, "Sir, you have slept since I saw you, and this is the "result of some melancholy dream, which I desire "you to forget, for you are now awake." 'To which 'Mr. Donne's reply was,' "I cannot be surer that I "now live, than that I have not slept since I saw "you: and am as sure, that, at her second appear "ing, she stopt, and lookt me in the face, and va-"nisht." 'Rest and sleep had not altered Mr. 'Donne's opinion the next day; for he then affirmed 'this vision with a more deliberate, and so confirmed 'a confidence, that he enclined Sir Robert to a faint 'belief, that the vision was true. It is truly said, 'that desire and doubt have no rest; and it proved so 'with Sir Robert; for he immediately sent a servant 'to Drury-house, with a charge to hasten back and 'bring him word, whether Mrs. Donne were alive, 'and, if alive, in what condition she was as to her 'health. The twelfth day, the messenger returned 'with this account; that he found and left Mrs. 'Donne very sad, and sick in her bed; and that, 'after a long and dangerous labour, she had been de-'livered of a dead child. And, upon examination, 'the abortion proved to be the same day, and about 'the very hour, that Mr. Donne affirmed he saw her 'pass by him in his chamber.'

[L] Many of the Nobility, and others, pressed the king to confer some secular employment on him: but his Majesty rejected their application.] King James, it seems, had given our author some hopes of a State-employment, being always much pleased with his company and conversation, especially at his meals, where there were usually discourses and debates, concerning religion or literature, between his Majesty, and those Divines, whose places required their attendance on him at those times; particularly Dr. Montague, Dean of the Chapel (*), and Dr. Andrews (†), his Majesty's Almoner (20). Among others, who solicited our author's advancement in the State, was the earl of Somerset, when in the greatest height of favour; who being at Theobald's with the King, and one of the Clerks of the Council dying there, dispatched a messenger for Mr. Donne to come thither immediately, and, at our author's coming, said to him; 'To testify the reality of my affection, and 'my purpose to prefer you, stay in this garden 'till jesty, considering him as better qualified for the service of the Church, rejected their application (m). About this time, the disputes concerning the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy being on foot, our author, by King James's especial command, wrote a treatise on that subject, intituled, Pseudo-Martyr [M], printed at London in 1610, in 4*to*; with which his Majesty was so highly pleased, that, resolving to prefer him in the Church, he was now very pressing with him to enter into Holy Orders: but Mr. Donne, being desirous to qualify himself for the sacred function by a closer application to the studies of Divinity and the learned languages, deferred his compliance with the King's instances, till about three years after, when he was ordained both Deacon and Priest by his good friend Dr. John King (*), then Bishop of London (n). Presently after, he was appointed one of the Chaplains in ordinary to his Majesty; and about the same time, attending King James in a progress, he was created Doctor in Divinity, at the recommendation of that Prince, by the University of Cambridge (o). His abilities, and industry in his profession, were so eminent, and himself so well beloved and esteemed by persons of quality, that, within the first year of his entering into sacred Orders, he had the offer of fourteen several benefices: but, as they lay in the country, his natural inclination to living in London, the place of his birth, and of his friends and acquaintance, made him refuse them all. Immediately after his return from Cambridge, his wife died [N]; and his grief for her loss was so great, that, for some time, he betook himself to a retired and solitary life (p). Soon after, he was chosen Preacher of Lincoln's-Inn, and was in high esteem with the Members of that Honourable Society. In 1619, he was appointed, by King James, to attend the Lord Hay Earl of Doncaster, in his embassy to the Princes of Germany; and, about fourteen months after his return to England, he was advanced to the Deanry of St. Paul's [O], vacant by the removal of Dr. Cary to the Bishoprick of Exeter (q). Soon after the vicarage of St. Dunstan in the West, and another benefice, fell to Dr. Donne; the advowson of the former having been given him by the Earl of Dorset, and that of the latter by the Earl of Kent. In 1623-4, he was chosen Prolocutor of the Convocation (r); on which occasion he spoke a Latin oration, as his inauguration speech (s). About the same time, he was appointed by the King to preach several occasional sermons, at Paul's Cross, and other places: these discourses were misrepresented to his Majesty, who gave the Doctor an opportunity of justifying himself in his royal presence (t) [P]. The year following, he was seized with a dangerous fit of sickness [Q]; of which, however,

'till I go up to the king, and bring you word that 'you are Clerk of the Council: doubt not my doing 'this; for I know the King loves you, and know 'the King will not deny me.' But it happened otherwise; for the King denied the Earl's request, and replied; 'I know Mr. Donne is a learned man, has 'the abilities of a learned Divine, and will prove a 'powerful preacher; and my desire is, to prefer him 'that way, and in that way I will deny you nothing 'for him (21).' It appears from one of our author's letters (22), that he solicited in vain for the place of one of his Majesty's Secretaries in Ireland, upon the death of Sir Geoffrey Fenton.

[M] His Pseudo-Martyr.] King James himself had engaged in the controversy concerning the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, as appears by his Works still extant. As he had some discourses with Mr. Donne upon that subject, he was so pleased with his clearness in stating the objections made to the taking those oaths, and his answers to them, that he commanded our author to draw up the objections and answers in form, and bring them to him; which our author performed within six weeks, and brought them to the King in his own hand-writing, as they now stand in the book abovementioned (22). The title, at length, is: "Pseudo-Martyr: Wherein out of "certaine Propositions and Gradations this Conclusion "is evicted; that those, which are of the Romane "Religion in this Kingdome, may and ought to "take the Oath of Allegiance." It is dedicated to King James I, with a "Preface" addressed "to "the Priestes and Jesuites, and to their Disciples in "this kingdome." This book was animadverted upon by one Thomas Fitzherbert, in a Censure of it, subjoined to his "Supplement to the Discussion of Dr. "Barlow's Answer to the Judgment of a Catholic "Englishman, &c." printed at St. Omers in 1613, in 4to.

[N] His Wife's Death.] Mrs. Donne died the 15th of August 1617, on the seventh day after the birth of her twelfth child, and was buried in the parish-church of St. Clement's near Temple-Bar, in London (23). She left our author in a narrow unsettled estate, with seven children then living, to whom he gave a voluntary assurance, that he would never bring them under the subjection of a step mother; which promise he faithfully kept (24). The first sermon he preached after the death of his wife, was in the church where she lay buried, on this text out of Jeremiah's Lamentation: 'Lo, I am the man that have seen affliction (25).'

[O] He was advanced to the deanry of St. Paul's.] Upon the vacancy of the deanry, the King sent an order to Dr. Donne to attend him the next day at dinner. When his Majesty was sat down, he said: 'Dr. 'Donne, I have invited you to dinner; and, though 'you sit not down with me, yet I will carve to you 'off a dish that I know you love well; for knowing 'you love London, I do therefore make you Dean of 'St. Paul's; and when I have dined, then do you 'take your beloved dish home to your study; say 'grace there to yourself, and much good may it do 'you (26).'

(26) Ib. p. 46.

[P] His Sermons were misrepresented to the King, who gave the Doctor an opportunity of justifying himself in his royal presence.] His Majesty was told, that Dr. Donne had fallen in with the general humour of the pulpits, and was busy in insinuating a fear of the King's inclination to Popery, and a dislike of his government. Whereupon his Majesty sent for our author, and required his answer to the accusation; which was so clear and satisfactory, that the King said, 'he 'was right glad he rested no longer under the suspi-'cion.' When the King had said this, Dr. Donne kneeled down, and thanked his Majesty, and protested, his answer was faithful and free from all collusion; and therefore desired 'that he might not rise, 'till, as in like cases he always had from God, so he 'might have from his Majesty some assurance that he 'stood clear and fair in his opinion.' At which the King raised him from his knees, and protested 'he 'believed him, and that he knew he was an honest 'man, and doubted not, but that he loved him truly.' And having thus dismissed him, he called some Lords of his Council into his chamber, and said with much earnestness, 'My Doctor is an honest man, and, my 'Lords, I was never better satisfied with an answer 'than with that he hath now made me: and I always 'rejoice, when I think, that by my means he became 'a Divine (27).'

ever, he recovered, and publiſhed, on that occaſion, his moſt excellent book of "Devotions," which he had written on his ſick bed (u). He continued in perfect health till the fifty-ninth year of his age, when, being with his eldeſt daughter Mrs. Harvey, at Aberyhatch in Eſſex, in Auguſt 1630, he was taken with a fever, which brought on a conſumption (w): notwithſtanding which, he returned to London, and preached in his turn, at Court, as uſual, on the firſt Friday in Lent (x) [R]. He died [S] the thirty firſt of March 1631 (y), and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, where a monument was erected over him [T]. His character is excellently drawn by the writer of his life [U]; and his abilities, both as a Preacher [W], and a Poet [X], are ſufficiently ſeen in his incomparable writings [Y]. friend Dr. Henry King, one of the Reſidentiaries of St. Paul's, and afterwards Biſhop of Chicheſter: who, obſerving that our author's ſickneſs rendered his recovery doubtful, took a proper opportunity to acquaint him, that, 'as there had been an offer lately 'made to the chapter, for renewing the leaſe of the 'beſt prebendal corps belonging to that church, which 'had been refuſed, becauſe the tenant had offered too 'low a fine; his intention was, if he could not raiſe 'him to an higher ſum, to prevail with the other Re'ſidentiaries to join in accepting what was offered;' deſiring the Dean would agree to this propoſal, 'as it 'would be a conſiderable addition to his preſent eſtate, 'which (he knew) ſtood in need of it.' The Dean thanked the Doctor for his kind offer, but declared he could not accept it, ſaying, 'he dared not, upon his 'ſick bed, when God had made him uſeleſs to the 'ſervice of the Church, make any advantage from it; 'but that, if he ſhould reſtore him to ſuch a degree 'of health, as again to ſerve at his altar, he ſhould 'then gladly take the reward, which the bountiful 'benefactors of that church had deſigned him;' proteſting, 'he would not augment, on his ſick bed, that 'little worldly eſtate he ſhou'd leave behind him (28).'

[R] He preached, in his turn, at Court, as uſual, on the firſt Friday in Lent.] His text upon this occaſion, was, "To God the Lord belong the iſſues from death," Pſal. lxviii. 20. It was printed at London in 1633, in 4to, under the title of "Death's Duel, or a "Conſolation to the Soule againſt the Dying Life and "Living Death of the Body, &c. Being his laſt "Sermon, and called by his Majeſty's Houſehold, "THE DOCTOR'S OWNE FUNERAL SERMON."

[S] His death.] Finding himſelf haſtening to his end, he ſent for many of his intimate friends, and took his laſt leave of them. Having done this, and ſettled his private affairs, he waited his diſſolution with much chearfulneſs and reſignation, and cloſed his laſt breath with theſe words, 'Thy kingdom come, thy will be done (29).' It muſt not be omitted, that, among other preparations for death, he made uſe of this very remarkable one. He ordered an urn to be cut in wood, on which was to be placed a board of the exact height of his body. This being done, he cauſed himſelf to be tied up in a winding-ſheet, in th ſame manner as dead bodies are. Being thus ſhrouded, and ſtanding with his eyes ſhut, and with juſt ſo much of the ſheet put aſide, as might diſcover his thin, pale, and death-like face, he cauſed a ſkilful painter to take his picture. This piece, being finiſhed, was placed near his bedſide, and there remained as his conſtant remembrancer to the hour of his death (30).

[U] His character — drawn by the Writer of his life.] 'He was of ſtature moderately tall, of a ſtrait 'and equally proportioned body, to which all his 'words and actions gave unexpreſſible addition of 'comelineſs. The melancholy and pleaſant humour 'were in him ſo contempered, that each gave advan'tage to the other, and made his company one of the 'delights of mankind. His fancy was unimitably 'high, equalled only by his great wit, both being 'made uſeful by a commanding judgement. His aſpect 'was chearful, and ſuch as gave a ſilent teſtimony of 'a clear knowing ſoul, and of a conſcience at peace 'with itſelf. His melting eye ſhewed that he had a 'ſoft heart, full of noble compaſſion; of too brave 'a ſoul to offer injuries, and too much a Chriſtian, 'not to pardon them in others. He did much con'template (eſpecially after he entered into his ſacred 'calling) the mercies of Almighty God, the immor'tality of the Soul, and the Joys of Heaven, and 'would often ſay, in a kind of ſacred extaſy, "Bleſſed 'be God, that he is God, only, and divinely like 'himſelf! He was by nature highly paſſionate, but 'more apt to reluct at the exceſſes of it. A great 'lover of the offices of Humanity, and of ſo merciful 'a ſpirit, that he never beheld the miſeries of man'kind without pity and relief. He was earneſt and 'unwearied in the ſearch of knowledge; with which 'his vigorous ſoul is now ſatisfied, and employed in a 'continual praiſe of that God that firſt breathed it in'to his active body; that body which once was a 'Temple of the Holy Ghoſt, and is now become a 'ſmall quantity of Chriſtian Duſt. But I ſhall ſee it 'reanimated. Feb. 1639. I. W. (31).'

[W] His abilities as a preacher.] Mr. Walton tells (32) us, that, upon his firſt entring into Holy Orders, his Modeſty was ſuch, he could not be perſuaded to preach to any eminent auditory, but went uſually, accompanied by ſome one friend, to preach privately in ſome village near London; his firſt ſermon being preached at Paddington. This he did till the King ſent and appointed him a day to preach before him at Whitehall; and, though much was expected from him, both by his Majeſty and others, yet he was ſo happy as to exceed their expectations; 'Preaching the 'word ſo, as ſhewed his own heart was poſſeſſed with 'thoſe very thoughts and joys he laboured to inſtil 'into others: A preacher in earneſt, weeping ſome'times for his auditory, ſometimes with them; always 'preaching to himſelf, like an Angel from a cloud, 'but in none; carrying ſome, at St. Paul was, to 'heaven in holy raptures, and enticing others by a 'ſacred art and courtſhip to amend their lives; here 'picturing a vice ſo as to make it ugly to thoſe that 'practiſed it, and a virtue ſo as to make it beloved 'even by thoſe that loved it not; and all this with a 'moſt particular grace and an unexpreſſible addition 'of comelineſs.'

[X]————a poet.] Our author's poems conſiſt of I. "Songs and Sonnets." II. "Epigrams." III. "Elegies." IV. "Epithalamions or Marriage "Songs." V. "Satyres." VI. "Letters to ſe"veral Perſonages." VII. "Funeral Elegies. VIII. "Holy Sonnets." They are printed together in one Volume 12mo. London 1719; with the addition of "Elegies upon the Author by Several "Perſons." Mr. Dryden has very juſtly given Dr. Donne the character of the greateſt wit, tho' not the greateſt Poet, of our nation (33); and in his "Dedica"tion of Juvenal to the Earl of Dorſet," he ſays (34): 'Donne alone, of all our countrymen, had your ta'lent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your 'verſification. And were he tranſlated into numbers 'and Engliſh, he would yet be wanting in the dig'nity of expreſſion.—You equal Donne in the variety, 'multiplicity, and choice of thoughts; you excel 'him in the manner and the words. I read you both 'with the ſame admiration, but not with the ſame 'delight. He affects the metaphyſicks, not only in 'his ſatyrs, but in his amorous verſes, where nature 'only

A little farther (35), Mr. Dryden aſks: 'Wou'd not Donne's Satyrs, 'which abound with ſo much wit, appear more 'charming, if he had taken care of his words and of () Mr. Pope. See his Satires of Dr. J. Donne. 'his numbers?' Whether our late excellent poet () took the hint from this queſtion, or not, is uncertain; but he has ſhewn the world, that Dr. Donne's Satires, when tranſlated into numbers and Engliſh (as Mr. Dryden above expreſſes it) are not inferior to any thing in that kind of poetry, even his own admirable writings.

[Y] His writings.] Beſides the Pſeudo-Martyr, and volume of poems already mentioned, there are extant the following Works of Dr. Donne, viz. I. "Devotions upon emergent Occaſions, and ſeveral Steps "in his Sickneſs. 12mo. Lond. 2d edit." (36). II. "Paradoxes, Problems, Eſſays, Characters, &c. "To which is added a Book of Epigrams, written in "Latin by the ſame Author; tranſlated into Engliſh "by J. Maine, D. D. As alſo Ignatius his Con- "clave, a Satyr tranſlated out of the Original Copy "written in Latin by the ſame Author; found "lately amongſt his own Papers" Lond. 1653, 12mo. Theſe pieces are dedicated, by the author's ſon Dr. (37) See the laſt remark. John Donne (37), to Francis Lord Newport. Part of this collection was publiſhed, in 1633, under the title of "Juvenilia, or Certain Paradoxes and Pro- "blems." 4to. The Epigrams were firſt printed in 1632, under the title of "Faſciculus Poematum et "Epigrammatum miſcellaneorum," &c. 8vo. The Satire, intituled "Ignatius his Conclave," was firſt printed in 1626, in 8vo. under the title of "Ignatius "his Conclave, viz. of eſtabliſhing a Church in the "Moon; and again in 1635, under the title of Ig- "natius his Conclave, or his Inthronization in a late "Election in Hell." 12mo. With this piece was printed another, intituled "An Apology for the Jeſuits." III. Three volumes of Sermons, in folio; the firſt printed in 1640; the ſecond in 1649; and the third in 1660. IV. "Eſſays in Divinity, &c. Being ſeve- "ral Diſquiſitions interwoven with Meditations and "Prayers, before he went into Holy Orders." Lond. 1651, 12mo. They were publiſhed after the author's death, by his ſon. V. "Letters to ſeveral Perſons of "Honour;" publiſhed by the author's ſon, in 4to. Lond. 1654. There are ſeveral of Dr. Donne's let- ters, and others to him from the Queen of Bohemia, the Earl of Carliſle, Archbiſhop Abbot, and Ben Jonſon printed in a book intituled "A Collection "of Letters made by Sir Tobie Matthews, Knt." Lond. 1660, 8vo. VI. "The Ancient Hiſtory of "the Septuagint;" tranſlated from the Greek of Ariſteas. Lond. 1633, 12mo. This tranſlation was reviſed and corrected by another hand, and printed in 1685, in 8vo. VII. "ΒΙΑΘΑΝΑΤΟΣ: or a Declaration "of that Paradox or Theſis, that Self-Homicide is "not ſo naturally a Sin, that it may not be other- "wiſe." London, 1684, 1648, &c. 4to. The ori- ginal, under the author's own hand, is preſerved in the Bodleian Library. Mr. Walton gives this piece the character of 'An exact and laborious treatiſe, 'wherein all the laws violated by that Act (Self- 'murder) are diligently ſurvey'd, and judiciouſly cen- 'ſured; a treatiſe written in his younger years, which 'alone might declare him not only perfect in the Civil 'and Canon Law, but in many other ſuch ſtudies and 'arguments as enter not into the conſideration of ma- 'ny, that labour to be thought great clerks, and pre- (38) Life &c. ubi ſupra, p. 60. 'tend to know all things (38).' 'In one of our au- thor's letters, addreſſed to Sir Robert Carr, and ſent with his book in manuſcript, he ſpeaks of it himſelf in the following terms; 'Becauſe it is upon a miſinter- 'pretable ſubject, I have always gone ſo near ſup- 'preſſing it, that it is only not burnt. No hand hath 'paſſed upon it to copy it, nor many eyes to read it; 'only to ſome particular friends in both Univerſities, 'then when I writ it, I did communicate it; and I 'remember I had this anſwer, that certainly there was 'a falſe thread in it, though not eaſily found. Keep it, 'I pray, with the ſame jealouſy: let any, that your 'diſcretion admits to the ſight of it, know the date 'of it, and that it is a book written by Jack Donne, () Our author was then ſetting out for Germany. 'and not by Dr. Donne. Reſerve it for me if I 'live (); and, if I die, I only forbid it the preſſe 'and the fire. Publiſh it not, but yet burn it not, 'and between thoſe do what you will with it (39).' (39) Dr. Donne's Letters, &c. p. 21, 22.

[Z] He left behind him a ſon, of both his names.] He was educated at Weſtminſter School, and elected from thence a Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford, in 1622. Afterwards he travelled abroad, and took the degree of Doctor of Laws at Padua in Italy. The 30th of June, 1638, he was incorporated in the ſame degree in the Univerſity of Oxford. He died in 1662, and was in- terred in the Church-yard of St. Paul's, Covent-Garden. Mr. Wood gives him the character of an Atheiſtical Buffoon, and tells us, he was much valued by King Charles II (40); no great compliment to that monarch's judgment. This Dr. Donne, beſides ſeveral pieces of his father, publiſhed (as Wood expreſſes it) ſeveral frivolous trifles, under his own name; among which is, "The Humble Petition of Covent-Garden againſt "Dr. John Baber a Phyſician." Lond. 1661 (41). B. (40) Wood, Faſti Oxon. Vol I. col. 276, 277. (41) Ibid.

 [There muſt undoubtedly have been great pregnancy in the parts of young Donne, which occa- ſioned him to be ſent to Oxford at ſo early an age as that of eleven years. No ſuch cuſtom now takes place, nor indeed can it be proper in any inſtance. The moſt ſolid and well-founded ſcholars are uſually thoſe who continue long at a Grammar School. The only caſe which has lately happened, of a very early ad- miſſion into an Engliſh Univerſity, is that of Prince William, Son to the Duke of Glouceſter. But ex- traordinary priviledges may be ſuppoſed to be al- lowed to royal blood. However unſuitable the age of the young Prince might be for collegiate inſtruction, we were pleaſed that ſome teſtimony of reſpect was paid to one of our own Univerſities; and we ſhould farther have been pleaſed if Oxford or Cambridge, or both, had been thought as worthy to educate the Sons of a Britiſh Monarch as the Univerſity of Gottingen. But perhaps theſe are the conceptions of an ignorant individual, who is little acquainted with the policy of Courts.

The condition required by Dr. Morton of Mr. Donne, (mentioned in note H), that he ſhould not give an anſwer to the Doctor's propoſal till he had paſſed three days in faſting and prayer, deſerves no- tice, as marking the high devotional ſpirit of the times. For it is to be remembered, that this was not the propoſition of an enthuſiaſtic Puritan, but of a very eminent and reſpectable Divine of the Church of En- gland. If our anceſtors carried matters of this nature too far, their ſucceſſors have run into the contrary extreme. A principle of piety, exerciſed in referring our concerns to the providential direction of the Supreme Being, would be no bar to the wiſdom, abi- lity, and ſucceſs, of our lawful undertakings. This ſentiment, that prayer and labour ſhould co-operate, is expreſſed by Donne himſelf, in one of theſe poems, though with no elegance of language:

"In none but us are ſuch mixt engines found,
"As hands of double office; for the ground
"We till with them, and them to heaven we raiſe;
"Who prayerleſs labours, or without this prays,
"Doth but one half, that's none (42)." (42) Johnſon's Lives of the Poets. Vol. I. p. 46.

The name of Dr. Donne is now more generally known as a poet than in any other capacity, though none of his poetical works are read at preſent, ex- cepting his Satires, which, being modernized by Mr. Pope, are printed on the oppoſite page. His verſi- fication is allowed to be intolerably harſh and unmu- ſical; but different accounts have been given of his genius as a poet. Dr. Birch obſerves, that his poe- tical works ſhew a prodigious fund of genius, under the diſguiſe of an affected and obſcure ſtile, and a moſt inharmonious verſification (43). A far ſuperior (43) Life of Tillotſon. p. 87. arbiter in ſubjects of taſte (Dr. Warton) has aſſerted, that Dr. Donne poſſeſſed the true poetical genius, with noble talents for moral poeſy. The ſame writer ha- ving before characterized him as a man of wit, and a man of ſenſe, but aſked what traces he had left of pure poetry, hath been thought by a periodical critic to be guilty of an inconſiſtency. This, however, we do not perceive to be the caſe; for Dr. Donne might have noble talents for moral poeſy, and yet they might be perverted from being properly diſplayed, by his want of taſte and neglect of harmony. The critic re- ferred to farther ſays, "Did any man, with a poetical "ear, ever yet read ten lines of Donne without diſ- "guſt? or are there ten lines of poetry in all his "works?

" works? No" (44). We as confidently anſwer, " Yes;" and, for the truth of our anſwer, we ſhall only appeal to the four ſtanzas inſerted in note K, where there are ſixteen lines which, notwithſtanding their quaintneſs, may be read without diſguſt, and have in them a true ſpirit of poetry. Dr. Warton, in the ſecond volume of his Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, has ſome additional obſervations concerning Donne, the greater part of which we ſhall tranſcribe. " Two noblemen of taſte and learning, the " Duke of Shrewſbury and the Earl of Oxford, de- " ſired Pope to melt down and caſt anew the weighty " bullion of Dr. Donne's Satires, who had degraded " and deformed a vaſt fund of ſterling wit and ſtrong " ſenſe by the moſt harſh and uncouth diction. " Pope ſucceeded in giving harmony to a writer, " more rough and rugged than even any of his age, " and who profited ſo little by the example Spenſer " had ſet of a moſt muſical and mellifluous verſifi- " cation, far beyond that of Fairfax, who is ſo fre- " quently mentioned as the greateſt improver of the " harmony of our language. The Satires of Hall, " written in very ſmooth and pleaſing numbers, pre- " ceded thoſe of Donne many years; for his Virgi- " demiarum were publiſhed, in ſix books, in the year " 1597; in which he calls himſelf the very firſt Eng- " liſh Satiriſt. This, however, was not true in fact; " for Sir Thomas Wyatt, of Allington Caſtle in " Kent, the friend and favourite of Henry VIII. and, " as was ſuggeſted, of Anne Boleyn, was our firſt " writer of ſatire worth notice. But it was not in " his numbers only that Donne was reprehenſible. " He abounds in falſe thoughts, in far-ſought ſenti- " ments, in forced unnatural conceits. He had a " conſiderable ſhare of learning," and " he was one " of our poets who wrote elegantly in Latin; as did " Ben Jonſon (who tranſlated into that language " great part of Bacon de Augmentis Scientiarum); " Cowley, Milton, Addiſon, and Gray. In Donne's " introduction to his witty catalogue of curious books, " written plainly in imitation of Rabelais (whom " alſo Swift imitated, in a catalogue of odd treatiſes, " prefixed to the Tale of a Tub), there is a paſſage ſo " minutely applicable to the preſent times, that I am " tempted to tranſcribe it. Ævum ſortiti ſumus, quo " planè indoctis nihil turpius, plenè doctis nihil ra- " rius. Tam omnes in Literis aliquid ſciunt, tam " nemo omnia. Mediâ igitur plerumque iter viâ, et " ad evitandam ignorantiæ turpitudinem, et legendi " faſtidium" (45). In the account of a converſation which Ben Jonſon is ſaid to have held with Mr. Drummond of Hawthornden in Scotland, Jonſon told Drummond that Donne was originally a poet, his grandfather on the mother's ſide being Heywood the epigrammatiſt; and that his writings, from not being underſtood, would periſh. Ben Jonſon farther ſaid, that he eſteemed him the firſt poet in the world for ſome things; that his verſes of the loſt Ochadine he had by heart; and that paſſage of the Calm, that duſt and feathers did not ſtir, all was ſo quiet. It was likewiſe affirmed by Jonſon, that Donne wrote his beſt pieces before he was twenty-five years of age; and that after he was made Doctor he reſolved to deſtroy all his poems (46).

Dr. Johnſon, in his Life of Cowley, has taken ſome particular notice of Donne, who was one of the firſt of our metaphyſical Poets. According to Dr. Warton, he was in this reſpect the corrupter of Cowley (47). Several of the inſtances of metaphyſical poetry which Dr. Johnſon has produced, are given from Donne, two or three of whoſe paſſages of this kind we ſhall inſert. The poets we are ſpeaking of ſometimes drew their conceits from the receſſes of learning not very much frequented by common readers of poetry. " Thus Donne ſhews his medicinal know- " ledge in ſome encomiaſtic verſes:

" In every thing there naturally grows
" A Balſamum to keep it freſh and new,
" If 'twere not injured by extrinſique blows;
" Your youth and beauty are this balm in you.
" But you, of learning and religion,
" And virtue and ſuch ingredients, have made
" A Mithridate, whoſe operation
" Keeps off, or cures, what can be done or ſaid."

Though the following lines, on the laſt night of the Year, have ſomething in them too ſcholaſtic, they are, ſays Dr. Johnſon, not inelegant.

" This twilight of two years, not paſt nor next,
" Some emblem is of me, or I of this,
" Who, meteor-like, of ſtuff and form perplext,
" Whoſe what and where, in diſputation is,
" If I ſhould call me any thing, ſhould miſs.

" I ſum the years and me, and find me not " Debtor to th' old, nor creditor to th' new,
" That cannot ſay, my thanks I have forgot,
" Nor truſt I this with hopes; and yet ſcarce true
" This bravery is, ſince theſe times ſhew'd me you."

Of thoughts ſo far-fetched, as to be not only unexpected, but unnatural, the books of the metaphyſical poets were full. Few but Donne would have thought that a good man is a teleſcope.

" Though God be our true glaſs, through which " we ſee
" All, ſince the Being of all things is he,
" Yet are the trunks, which do to us derive
" Things, in proportion fit, by perſpective
" Deeds of good men; for by their living here,
" Virtues, indeed remote ſeem to be near" (48).

Of Dr. Donne's proſe works little remembrance now remains. Dr. Birch remarks, that all his wit and learning cannot ſecure his ſermons from univerſal neglect. The moſt valuable of his proſe-writings is his " Pſeudo Martyr," which contains an unanſwerable confutation of the Papal Supremacy (49). Granger is of the ſame opinion (50).

(49) Life of Tillotſon, p. 21. 27.

There is one of Dr. Donne's productions, which had long ſlept in Oblivion, that has lately been brought into notice. We mean his ΒΙΑΘΑΝΑΤΟΣ: or a declaration of that Paradox or Theſis, that Self-Homicide is not ſo naturally a Sin, that it may not be otherwiſe. Mr. Moore, in his elaborate work on Suicide, a work in which every thing relative to the ſubject is critically and amply conſidered, hath entered into an examination of Dr. Donne's poſitions, and ſhewn that they will not ſtand the teſt of a ſtrict enquiry (51).

A print of Donne's monument, engraven by Hollar, may be ſeen in Dugdale's account of St. Paul's Cathedral.

There is ſomething in the private character of Dr. Donne which attaches the mind, and renders the contemplation of it pleaſing and intereſting even at the preſent day. This ariſes from the ſtory of his marriage, the difficulties in which that event involved him, and the amiable ſenſibilities which he appears to have diſplayed in all the relations and circumſtances of Life.] K.

 [DOUGLAS (GAWIN), Biſhop of Dunkeld, and eminent for his poetical talents, was deſcended from a noble family [A], being the third Son of Archibald, Earl of Angus, and was born in Scotland at the cloſe of the year 1474, or the beginning of 1475. His father was very careful of his education, and cauſed him to be early inſtructed

[A] Deſcended from a noble family.] It is obſerved by the writer of his life, prefixed to the edition of his Virgil printed at Edinburgh in 1710, that 'his 'grandfather George, the fifth Earl of Angus, was 'a man of excellent endowments both of body and 'mind, remarkable for his wiſdom and conduct, but 'eſpecially famous for his loyalty and valour. He 'followed King James II. and aſſiſted him againſt 'his own kinſman the Earl of Douglas, whom, toge- 'ther with Percy Earl of Northumberland, he over- 'threw in a bloody battle. Afterwards, when the 'Engliſh army beſieged Alnwick, he marched thither 'with ſtructed in literature and the ſciences (a). He was intended by his father for the church [B]; and after having paſſed through a courſe of liberal education [C] in Scotland, is ſuppoſed to have travelled into foreign countries, for his farther improvement in literature, and to obtain a knowledge of the manners and cuſtoms of other nations. After his return to Scotland, he obtained the office of Provoſt of the Collegiate Church of St. Giles in Edinburgh, a poſt of conſiderable dignity and revenue; and was alſo made Rector of Heriot Church (b). He was likewiſe appointed Abbot of the opulent convent of Aberbrothock; and the Queen-mother, who was then Regent of Scotland, and about this time married his nephew the Earl of Angus, nominated him to the Archbiſhopric of St. Andrew's. But he was prevented from obtaining this dignity by a violent oppoſition [D] that was made to him at home, and by the refuſal of the Pope to confirm his appointment. The Queen-mother afterwards promoted him to the Biſhopric of Dunkeld; and for this preferment obtained a bull in his favour from Pope Leo X. by the intereſt of her brother, Henry VIII. king of England [c]. But ſo ſtrong an oppoſition was again made to him [E], that he could not, for a conſiderable time, obtain peaceable poſſeſſion of this new preferment; and was even impriſoned for more than a year, under pretence of having acted illegally, in procuring a bull from the Pope [d]. He was afterwards ſet at liberty, and conſecrated Biſhop of Dunkeld, by James Beaton, Chancellor of Scotland, and Archbiſhop of Glaſgow. After his conſecration he went to St. Andrew's, and thence to his own church at Dunkeld; where the firſt day, we are told, "he was moſt kindly received by his clergy and people, all of them bleſſing God for ſo worthy and learned a biſhop [e]." He ſtill, however, met with many obſtructions; and, for ſome time, was forcibly kept out of the palace belonging to his dioceſe [F]; but he at length obtained peaceable poſſeſſion. He ſoon after accompanied the

' with ten thouſand horſe, and in ſight of the enemy ' brought off Monſ. Briſac, with 300 Frenchmen under ' his command, who had been in the caſtle, and ' carried them ſafe to Scotland. This George married ' Elizabeth Sibbald, daughter to Sir Andrew Sibbald ' of Balgony, chief of an antient and honourable ' family, and treaſurer of Scotland at that time. By ' this lady he had two ſons. The eldeſt was Archi- ' bald, the ſixth Earl of Angus, who was far from ' diminiſhing the power, riches, and grandeur, to ' which Earl George his father had raiſed that illuſtri- ' ous family. His courage and wiſdom were ſo re- ' markable, that none was more honoured than he ' by all ranks of men, ſo that he was commonly ' called the great Earl of Angus (1).'

(1) P. 1.

[B] Intended by his father for the church.] It is ſaid, that, ' being dedicated by his parents to the ſer- ' vice of the altar, he was under ſome neceſſity of ' improving himſelf in virtue and learning, if he ex- ' pected any conſiderable dignity in the church, be- ' cauſe King James I. had made a law, that none ' ſhould be capable of being a Canon or Prebend in ' any Cathedral or Collegiate Church, except he who ' was Bachelor in the Canon Law, or had taken a ' degree in theology (2).'

(2) Life, ut ſupra, p. 2.

[C] Having paſſed through a courſe of liberal education.] Mr. Warton ſays, ' According to the practice ' of that age, eſpecially in Scotland, his education ' perhaps commenced in a grammar-ſchool of one of ' the monaſteries. There is undoubted proof that it ' was finiſhed at the Univerſity of Paris (3).'

(3) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, Vol. II. p. 280.

[D] He was prevented from obtaining this dignity by a violent oppoſition] It is ſaid, by the writer of his life, that ' neither the royal authority, nor the great ' power and intereſt of his noble relations, nor his ' own merits and excellent qualities, were able to ' procure him peaceable poſſeſſion. His competitors ' were John Hepburn and Andrew Forman. The ' firſt was Prior of St. Andrew's, and during the ' vacancy Vicar-General of the dioceſe, and manager ' of the revenues. He being a cunning man, and of ' great power, engaged the Canons to elect him, and ' was ſupported by many of the nobility. Where- ' fore he laid ſiege to the caſtle of St. Andrew's, ' which had been poſſeſſed by Gawin's ſervants, and ' after ſome reſiſtance having taken it, he placed a ' garriſon of ſoldiers in it. The other, Andrew For- ' man, was Biſhop of Murray, and Archbiſhop of ' Bourges in France, and had been legate a latere ' to Pope Julius II. By the intereſt he had in the ' Court of Rome, and the powerful recommendation ' of the Duke of Albany, afterwards governor, he ' obtained a bull from the Pope for that dignity, and ' was ſubmitted to, and acknowledged as Archbiſhop ' by moſt of the Clergy, and all the vaſſals of the ſee. ' Mr. Douglas reflecting on the ſcandals which aroſe ' from theſe unworthy and ambitious conteſts, reſolved ' to prefer the honour of a Chriſtian and peaceable ' diſpoſition to his temporal intereſt and greatneſs, ' and therefore did wholly lay aſide his pretenſions to ' that ſee (4).'

(4) P. 4, 5.

[E] So ſtrong an oppoſition was again made to him, &c.] We are told, that though ' his right was founded ' both on the royal and papal authority, yet he could ' not obtain conſecration, nor peaceable poſſeſſion of ' his Biſhopric, for a conſiderable time, becauſe of a ' powerful competitor. For Andrew Stewart, Pre- ' bendary of Craig, and brother to the Earl of Athol, ' had got himſelf poſtulated Biſhop, by ſuch of the ' chapter as were preſent, and his title was ſupported ' by all the enemies of the Queen, and her huſband ' the Earl of Angus, and particularly the Duke of ' Albany; who arrived in Scotland in May, 1515, ' and was declared regent. In the firſt ſeſſion of Par- ' liament after the governor's arrival, Mr. Douglas ' was accuſed of acting contrary to the laws of the ' nation, and ſtatutes of Parliament. Some acts, ' indeed, had been made againſt receiving bulls from ' Rome, yet they were ſeldom put in execution. ' But the governor and his party were glad to find ' any pretext againſt one, who was ſo nearly related ' to the Earl of Angus, and ſo capable to ſupport his ' intereſt. He was, therefore, pronounced guilty, and ' committed to the cuſtody of John Hepburn the prior, ' in the caſtle of St. Andrew's. Whence he was after- ' wards removed, firſt to the Caſtle of Edinburgh, then ' to the Caſtle of Dunbar, and at laſt carried back again ' to the caſtle of Edinburgh, in which places he continu- ' ed priſoner more than a year, until the governor was ' reconciled to the Queen and Earl of Angus (5).'

[F] Was forcibly kept out of the palace belonging to his dioceſe.] The writer of his life ſays, ' After the ' bulls were publiſhed at the altar, and the bleſſing ' pronounced, he went to the Dean's houſe, where he ' was moſt honourably entertained; becauſe his own ' palace and the ſteeple were poſſeſſed by Andrew ' Stewart's ſervants, who pretended to keep them in ' the name of the Governor, and refuſed to ſurrender ' in the abſence of their maſter. The next day, ' when the Biſhop was endeavouring to go to Church, ' he was hindered by the frequent firing of his adver- ' ſaries, and therefore was forced to perform divine ' ſervice in the Dean's houſe, where the Canons took ' the oath of canonical obedience, and he on the ' other hand ſwore to obſerve certain ſtatutes of the ' Church. After dinner he began to conſult with ' the nobility, gentry, and clergy that were then ' with him, what was fit to be done: and when ſome ' adviſed him to ſend one of his friends to the Gover- ' nor, and others that he himſelf ſhould go to Court, ' in the duke of Albany, Regent of Scotland, to Paris, when that nobleman was ſent to renew the ancient league between Scotland and France [G]. After his return to Scotland, he made a ſhort ſtay at Edinburgh, and then repaired to his dioceſe, where he applied himſelf diligently to the duties of his epiſcopal office. He was alſo a promoter of public-ſpirited works, and particularly finiſhed the ſtone bridge over the river Tay, oppoſite to his own palace, which had been begun by his predeceſſor (f). We meet with no farther particulars concerning him till ſome years after, when he was at Edinburgh, and when that ſkirmiſh happened between the Earls of Arran and Angus, with their friends and followers, of which an account was given in a former part of our work (g). On that occaſion biſhop Douglas reproved Archbiſhop Beaton for wearing armour, as inconſiſtent with the clerical character, but was afterwards inſtrumental in ſaving his life (h). During all theſe diſorders in Scotland, it is ſaid, that biſhop Douglas behaved "with that moderation and peaceableneſs, which became a wiſe man and religious prelate (i)." Notwithſtanding which the violence and animoſity which then prevailed among the different parties in Scotland, induced him to retire to England [H]. After his departure, a proſecution was commenced againſt him in Scotland [I]; but he was well received 'in the mean time news are brought, that Andrew 'Stewart had taken arms, and was reſolved to join his 'ſervants, and defend the palace againſt the Biſhop. 'Then James Lord Ogilvy, David Maſter of Crawford, Colin Campbell of Glenurquhie, the Laird of 'Kinſawns, and the reſt who were with the Biſhop, 'made themſelves ready to oppoſe him; and immediately diſpatched expreſſes to the Shire of Angus 'and other parts, to call the Biſhop's friends to his 'aſſiſtance. A very great number came the next day 'from Montroſe, the lower parts of Fife, and all 'the neighbouring country; ſo that Stewart, finding 'it was impoſſible for him to enter the palace, retired 'into the woods: and thoſe who held out the Biſhop's 'houſe, and the ſteeple, were ſummoned to ſurrender under pain of excommunication. They refuſed 'to yield; but the Prebend of Alith and James Carmichael, with the Biſhop's ſervants, made themſelves maſters of the ſteeple, more by prudence and 'ſtratagem than force. After which, thoſe in the 'palace began to be afraid, and begged that a truce 'might be granted them for ſome hours, and the 'ſentence of excommunication delayed; both which 'were granted. Yet they continued obſtinate, until 'the houſe was beſieged: and then it was yielded, 'without the death or mutilation of any. Which 'was certainly very acceptable to the good biſhop, who 'in all the actions of his life diſcovered a gentle and 'merciful diſpoſition, regulating the warlike and 'heroic ſpirit, that was natural to his family, by the 'excellent laws of the Chriſtian Religion. Andrew 'Stewart being informed how matters had gone, went 'with his brother to Court, hoping to get a favourable reception from the Governor. The Biſhop 'thought it neceſſary to go thither alſo, and to defend his right. After the buſineſs had been a good 'time debated before the Governor, at laſt, by the 'prudent mediation of ſome Lords of the council, 'an agreement is made on theſe terms: That Stewart 'ſhould keep the revenues of the Biſhopric, which 'he had formerly received, and poſſeſs the Churches 'of Alith and Cargill, paying yearly to the Biſhop 'certain chalders of victual (6).'

(6) Ibid. p. 6, 7.

[G] To renew the antient league between Scotland and France.] We are informed, that 'ambaſſadors 'having been ſent from King Francis I. to Scotland, 'for renewing the antient league between the two 'nations, the Scots nobility met together, and choſe 'the Governor (the Regent) as the fitteſt perſon to 'go to the Court of France, for managing an affair 'of ſo great conſequence. It was neceſſary that 'ſome perſons of great experience and ſingular wiſdom ſhould accompany the Duke, and be aſſiſtant 'to him: and none were judged more worthy of this 'honourable employment than our Biſhop and Mr. 'Patrick Panter, Chancellor of the Chapter of Dunkeld, Abbot of Cambuſkenneth, and Secretary of 'State to King James V. as he had been to his father 'James IV (7).'

(7) Ibid. p. 8.

[H] Induced him to retire to England.] It is ſaid, that 'perceiving the great violence and hatred of the 'court againſt the family of Angus, and the danger 'he was expoſed to on that account, he reſolved to 'leave the kingdom, and retire into England till the 'ſtorm was over. This unluckily fell out, when the 'Emperor Charles V. and the King of England entered into an alliance with France, which likewiſe 'engaged the Scots to ſhare in the fate of their allies, 'war being declared againſt them immediately before 'by the King of England. His enemies, who were 'the prevailing party at Court, took this opportunity 'to endeavour his ruin (8).'

(8) Ibid. p. 11.

[I] A proſecution was commenced againſt him in Scotland.] 'He was no ſooner gone, than a proceſs 'is commenced, and a ſentence of proſcription paſſed 'againſt him by public authority, which was afterwards turned into a proclamation, bearing, That 'whereas Gawin Douglas, Biſhop of Dunkeld, had 'treaſonably (as they word it) entered, and deſigned 'to reſide in England, joining himſelf to the public 'enemy of the kingdom, after war was denounced; 'and that not only without licence and permiſſion, 'but againſt the expreſs orders of the Governor: 'therefore they command the Vicar General of St. 'Andrews (the ſee being vacant) to ſequeſtrate the 'revenues of Dunkeld, and ſtrictly forbid all perſons 'to aid or aſſiſt him with money or counſel, or any 'ways to keep correſpondence with him, under the 'higheſt pains. It is not a little ſurprizing that ſo 'good and peaceable a man ſhould meet with ſo 'ſevere treatment. But if we reflect how much the 'Court was incenſed againſt the whole name of 'Douglas at that time, partly becauſe of the Earl of 'Angus's marriage with the Queen, the Regent's rival 'for the Government, and ſiſter to the King of England, who had been always the Regent's, and was 'now the declared enemy of the whole nation; and 'partly on account of his late victory in the ſkirmiſh 'at Edinburgh, which perhaps the young Earl uſed 'not with that moderation that he ought. I ſay, if 'we reflect on theſe things, our wonder will be very 'much leſſened. But there was ſomething more in 'it. James Beaton, Archbiſhop of Glaſgow, who, 'by his being Chancellor many years, had acquired 'great power and authority, had an eye to the Archbiſhopric of St. Andrew's, ſome months before vacant by the death of Andrew Forman, and was 'afraid of no competitor ſo much as the Biſhop of 'Dunkeld; and, therefore, to be rid of him, ſeems 'to have had a principal hand in the draught of this 'act and edict againſt him, on purpoſe to render him 'odious not only to the whole nation, but alſo to 'foreigners, and eſpecially to the ſee of Rome. For 'in the body of the edict it is reſolved, that the 'three eſtates write to the Pope, not to aſſume or 'recommend him to the Archbiſhopric, as being a 'perſon that had bad deſigns againſt the government, 'and was in the enemy's country and intereſt. And 'as if they had been aware, that it would juſtly be 'concluded by unbiaſſed perſons, that this proceeded 'out of private favour to ſome other perſon, as well 'as pique at our good Biſhop, it is likewiſe decreed, 'that ſupplicatory letters be ſent to the Pope by the 'three eſtates for that purpoſe. But Archbiſhop 'Beaton, not content with this, writes alſo a letter 'to the King of Denmark, wherein he repreſents the 'Biſhop received in England, where he was treated with particular reſpect, on account of the excellency of his character, and his great abilities and learning. King Henry VIII. allowed him a liberal penſion; and he became particularly intimate with Polydore Vergil [K] (k). He died of the plague, at London, in the year 1521, or 1522. He was interred in the Savoy church, on the left ſide of the tomb ſtone of Thomas Halſay, biſhop of Laghlin, in Ireland; on whoſe tomb-ſtone a ſhort epitaph for biſhop Douglas is inſcribed (l).

Biſhop Douglas is ſtiled by Mr. Warton, one "of the diſtinguiſhed luminaries that "marked the reſtoration of letters in Scotland, at the commencement of the ſixteenth "century, not only by a general eminence in elegant erudition, but by a cultivation of "the vernacular poetry of his country (m)." He was alſo celebrated for his perſonal virtues [L]. He tranſlated the Æneid of Virgil into Scottiſh heroics, with the additional thirteenth book by Mapheus Vegius, at the requeſt of Henry, earl of Sinclair, [M] to whom he was related. It was printed at London, in 4to. in the year 1553, under the following title: "The XIII Bukes of Eneados of the Famoſe Poete Virgill. "Tranſlatet out of Latyne verſes into Scotriſh metir, bi the Reverend Father in God, "Mayſter Gawin Douglas, Biſhop of Dunkel, and Unkil to the Erle of Angus. "Every Buke having his perticular Prologe [N]." "This tranſlation," ſays Mr. Warton,

(m) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, ut ſupra, p. 280.

'Biſhop of Dunkeld as a perſon diſaffected to the 'government, and going about to infringe the privi'leges granted the Scots nation by the holy ſee, by 'endeavouring to be preferred to the archbiſhopric 'of St. Andrews, and abbacy of Dumfermling, by 'the intereſt and favour of the emperor and king of 'England, then public enemies to Scotland: and, 'therefore, he entreats that king, that he would 'write to his miniſters at Rome, to inform his holi'neſs, that the biſhop was under a ſentence of ba'niſhment becauſe of his demerits, and thereby put 'a ſtop to his ambitious deſigns. This letter is dated 'at Edinburgh, 8 April, 1522, and both it, and the 'above named act of parliament (dated 21 February '1521-2), are yet extant in a valuable collection of 'Epiſtles and Memorials, &c. to Foreign Courts and 'others from the Kings of Scotland, &c. now in the 'Advocates Library at Edinburgh (9).

(9) Ibid p. 11, 12.

[K] Intimate with Polydore Vergil.] Mr. Pinkerton obſerves, that 'Biſhop Douglas ſent Polydore 'Vergil a little memoir on the origin of the Scots; 'in which, as Polydore ſtates it, he traced them to 'Gathelus, &c. But Polydore, being a man of ſci'ence and ſenſe, right'y put the firſt ſettlement of 'the Scots in Britain, in the fifth century, not chu'ſing to ſacrifice truth and learning to dreams un'worthy even of children (10).'

(10) Ancient Scottiſh Poems, Vol. I. p. 97.

Mr. Pinkerton alſo farther informs us, that 'in 'the Tranſacta inter Angliam et Scotiam in the Cot'ton Lib. are different papers, mentioning our poet. '27th June, 1518, is an original letter, ſigned by 'Gawin Douglas. 14th Dec. 1521, are inſtructions 'for him, from Angus and others, to implore the 'king of England's aid againſt Albany the gover'nor (11).'

(11) Ibid. p. 95.

[L] Celebrated for his perſonal virtues.] Hume of Godſcroft, in his "Hiſtory of the Douglaſes," ſays, 'Gawin Douglas, biſhop of Dunkeld, left be'hind him great approbation of his virtues, and love 'of his perſon in the hearts of all good men; for 'beſides the nobility of his birth, the dignity and 'comelineſs of his perſonage, he was learned, tem'perate, and of ſingular moderation of mind; and in 'theſe turbulent times had always carried himſelf 'among the factions of the nobility equally, and 'with a mind to make peace, and not to ſtir up par'ties; which qualities were very rare in a clergyman 'of thoſe days. He wrote in his native tongue di'vers things; but his chiefeſt work is the tranſlation 'of Virgil, yet extant in verſe, in which he ties 'himſelf ſo ſtrictly as is poſſible: and yet it is ſo well 'expreſſed, that whoſoever ſhall eſſay to do the like, 'will find it a hard piece of work to go through with. 'In his prologues before every book, where he hath 'his liberty, he ſheweth a natural and ample vein of 'poeſy, ſo pure, pleaſant, and judicious, that I be'lieve there is none that hath written before or ſince, 'but cometh ſhort of him. And, in my opinion, 'there is not ſuch a piece to be found, as in his 'prologue to the 8th book, beginning, Of Drevil'ling and Dreams, &c. at leaſt in our language (12).'

(12) Teſtimonies of Learned Men concerning Gawin Douglas, prefixed to his Virgil, edit. 1710, p. 3.

[M] At the requeſt of Henry, earl of Sinclair.] This appears from Biſhop Douglas's poetical preface to his tranſlation of the Æneid, in which are the following lines:

'And that ze knaw at quhais inſtance I tuke
'For to tranſlate this maiſt excellent buke,
'I mene Virgillis volum maiſt excellent,
'Set this my werk full febill be of rent,
'At the requeſt of ane Lord of renowne,
'Of anceſtry nobill and illuſtir baroun,
'Fader of bukis, protector to ſcience and lare,
'My ſpecial gude Lord Henry Lord Sinclare.
'Quhilk with great inſtance, diverſe tymes ſere,
'Prayit me tranſlaite Virgill, or Homere,
'Quhais pleſoure ſoithle, as I underſtude,
'As nere conjonit to his lordſchip in blude;
'So that me thocht his requeiſt ane command,
'Half diſparit thys werk I tuke one hand,
'Not fully grantand, nor anys ſay and ze,
'Bot onlie to aſſay how it mycht be.
'Quhay mycht ganeſay ane lorde ſa gentil and kynd,
'That ever had ony courtaſy in thare mynd?

'Has grete delite as ever had Ptholome (13).'

(13) p. 4.

[N] Every buke having his perticular prologe.] Mr. Warton ſays, 'The ſeveral books are introduced with 'metrical prologues, which are often highly poetical, 'and ſhew that Douglas's proper walk was original 'poetry. In the prologue to the ſixth book, he 'wiſhes for the Sybill's golden bough, to enable him 'to follow his maſter Virgil through the dark and 'dangerous labyrinth of the infernal regions. But 'the moſt conſpicuous of theſe prologues is a de'ſcription of May; the greater part of which I 'will inſert.

(14) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, Vol. II. p. 282, &c.

Mr. Warton alſo ſays, 'The poetical beauties of 'this ſpecimen will be reliſhed by every reader who 'is fond of lively touches of fancy, and rural ima- 'gery. But the verſes will have another merit with 'thoſe critics who love to contemplate the progreſs 'of compoſition, and to mark the original workings 'of genuine nature; as they are the effuſion of a 'mind year 1501 [O]; but he did not actually engage in and complete it till about eleven years after.

'mind not overlaid by the deſcriptions of other poets, 'but operating, by its own force and bias, in the de-'lineation of a vernal landſcape, onſuch objects as 'really occurred. On this account, they deſerve to 'be better underſtood: and I have therefore tranſlated 'them into plain modern Engliſh proſe. In the 'mean time, this experiment will ſerve to prove their 'native excellence. Diveſted of poetic numbers and 'expreſſion, they ſtill retain their poetry; and to 'uſe the compariſon of an elegant writer on a like 'occaſion, appear like Ulyſſes, ſtill a king and con-'queror, although diſguiſed like a peaſant, and 'lodged in the cottage of the herdſman Eumaeus.

"Freſh Aurora, the wife of Tithonus, iſſued from "her ſaffron bed, and ivory houſe. She was "cloathed in a robe of crimſon and violet-colour; the "cape vermilion, and the border purple: ſhe opened "the windows of her ample hall, overſpread with "roſes, and filled with balm, or nard. At the ſame "time, the chryſtal gates of heaven were thrown "open, to illumine the world. The glittering "ſtreamers of the orient diffuſed purple ſtreaks "mingled with gold and azure. The ſteeds of the "ſun, in red harneſs of rubies, of colour brown as "the berry, lifted their heads above the ſea, to glad "our hemiſphere: the flames burſt from their noſ-"trils:—While ſhortly, apparelled in his luminous "array, Phœbus, bearing the blazing torch of day, "iſſued from his royal palace; with a golden crown, "glorious viſage, curled locks bright as the chryſo-"lite or topaz, and with a radiance intolerable.— "The fiery ſparks, burſting from his eyes, purged "the air, and gilded the new verdure. The golden "vanes of his throne covered the ocean with a glit-"tering glance, and the broad waters were all in a "blaze, at the firſt glimpſe of his appearance. It "was glorious to ſee the winds appeaſed, the ſea be-"calmed, the ſoft ſeaſon, the ſerene firmament, the "ſtill air, and the beauty of the watery ſcene. The "ſilver-ſcaled fiſhes, on the gravel, gliding haſtily, "as it were from the heat or ſun, through clear "ſtreams, with fins ſhining brown as cinnabar, and "chiſſel-tails, darted here and there. The new "luſtre, enlightening all the land, beamed on the "ſmall pebbles on the ſides of rivers, and on the "ſtrands, which looked like beryl: while the reflec-"tion of the rays played on the banks in variegated "gleams; and Flora threw forth her blooms under "the feet of the ſun's brilliant horſes. The bladed "ſoil was embroidered with various hues. Both "wood and foreſt were darkened with boughs; "which, reflected from the ground, gave a ſhadowy "luſtre to the red rocks. Towers, turrets, battle-"ments, and high pinnacles, of churches, caſtles, "and every fair city, ſeemed to be painted; and, "together with every baſtion and ſtory, expreſſed "their own ſhape on the plains. The glebe, fearleſs "of the Northern blaſts, ſpread her broad boſom.— "The corn-crops, and the new-ſprung barley, re-"cloathed the earth with a gladſome garment.—The "variegated veſture of the valley covered the cloven "furrow; and the barley-lands were diverſified with "flowery weeds. The meadow was beſprinkled "with rivulets; and the freſh moiſture of the dewy "night reſtored the herbage which the cattle had "cropped in the day. The bloſſoms in the blowing "garden truſſed their heads to the protection of the "young ſun. Rank ivy-leaves overſpread the wall "of the rampart. The blooming hawthorn cloathed "all his thorns in flowers. The budding cluſters of "the tender grapes hung end-long, by their tendrils, "from the trellices. The gems of the trees unlock-"ing, expanded themſelves into the foliage of Na-"ture's tapeſtry. There was a ſoft verdure after bal-"my ſhowers. The flowers ſmiled in various colours "on the bending ſtalks. Some red, &c. Others, "watchet, like the blue and wavy ſea; ſpeckled "with red and white; or, bright as gold. The "daiſy unbraided her little coronet. The graſs "flood embattelled, with banewort, &c. The "ſeeded down flew from the dandelion. Young "weeds appeared among the leaves of the ſtrawberries. "Gay gilliflowers, &c. The roſe buds putting forth, "offered their red vernal lips to be kiſſed; and dif-"fuſed fragrance from the criſp ſcarlet that ſur-"rounded their golden ſeeds. Lilies, with white "curling tops, ſhewed their creſts open. The odor-"ous vapour moiſtened the ſilver webs that hung "from the leaves. The plain was powdered with "round dewy pearls. From every bud, ſcyon, herb, "and flower, bathed in liquid fragrance, the bee "ſuckled ſweet honey. The ſwans clamoured amid "the ruſtling reeds; and ſearched all the lakes and "gray rivers where to build their neſts. The red "bird of the ſun lifted his coral creſt, crowing clear "among the plants and rutis gent, picking his food "from every path, and attended by his wives Toppa "and Partlet. The painted peacock, with gaudy "plumes, unfolded his tail like a bright wheel, in-"ſhrouded in his ſhining feathers, reſembling the "marks of the hundred eyes of Argus. Among the "boughs of the twiſted olive, the ſmall birds framed "their artful neſts, or along the thick hedges, or re-"joiced with their merry mates on the tall oaks. In "the ſecret nook, or in the clear windows of glaſs, "the ſpider full buſily wove her fly net, to enſnare "the little gnat or fly. Under the boughs that ſcreen "the valley, or within the pale-incloſed park, the "nimble deer trooped in ranks, the harts wandered "through the thick woody ſhaws, and the young "fawns followed the dappled does. Kids ſkipped "through the briers after the roes; and in the paſ-"tures and leas, the lambs, full tight and trig, bleat-"ed to their dams. Doris and Thetis walked on the "ſalt ocean; and Nymphs and Naiads, wandering "by ſpring wells in the graſſy groves, plaited luſty "chaplets for their hair, of blooming branches, or "of flowers red and white. They ſung, and danced, "&c. Meantime, dame Nature's minſtrels raiſe their "amorous notes, the ring-dove coos and pitches on "the tall copſe, the ſtarling whiſtles her varied deſ-"cant, the ſparrow chirps in the clefted wall: the "goldfinch and linnet filled the ſkies, the cuckow "cried, the quail twittered; while rivers, ſhaws, "and every dale reſounded; and the tender branches "trembled on the trees, at the ſong of the birds, and "the buzzing of the bees, &c."

This landſcape may be finely contraſted with a deſcription of Winter, from the prologue to the ſeventh book, a part of which I will give in literal proſe.

"The fern withered on the miry fallows: the "brown moors aſſumed a barren moſſy hue: banks, "ſides of hills, and bottoms, grew white and bare; "the cattle looked hoary from the dank weather; "the wind made the red weed waver on the dike: "From crags and the foreheads of the yellow rocks "hung great icicles, in length like a ſpear: the ſoil "was duſky and grey, bereft of flowers, herbs and "graſs: in every holt and foreſt, the woods were "ſtripped of their array. Boreas blew his bugle "horn ſo loud, that the ſolitary deer withdrew to "the dales; the ſmall birds flocked to the thick "briers, ſhunning the tempeſtuous blaſt, and chang-"ing their loud notes to chirping; the cataracts "roared, and every linden-tree whiſtled and brayed "to the ſounding of the wind. The poor labourers "went wet and weary, draggled in the fen. The "ſheep and ſhepherds lurked under the hanging "banks, or wild broom. Warm from the chimney-"ſide, and refreſhed with generous cheer, I ſtole to "my bed, and lay down to ſleep; when I ſaw the "moon ſhed through the windows her twinkling "glances and watery light: I heard the horned bird, "the night-owl, ſhrieking horribly with crooked "bill from her cavern; I heard the wild-geeſe, with "ſcreaming cries, fly over the city through the ſilent "night. I was ſoon lulled aſleep; till the cock "clapping his wings crowed thrice, and the day "peeped. I waked and ſaw the moon diſappear, "and heard the jack-daws cackle on the roof of the "houſe. The cranes prognoſticating tempeſts, in a "firm phalanx, pierced the air with voices ſounding "like a trumpet. The kite, perched on an old tree, "faſt by my chamber, cried lamentably, a ſign of "the dawning day. I roſe, and, half opening my "window, perceived the morning, livid, wan, and "hoary; the air overwhelmed with vapour and cloud; "the ground ſtiff, grey, and rough; the branches "rattling; the ſides of the hills looking black and "hard with the driving blaſts; the dew drops con-"gealed after. Beſides this work biſhop Douglas alſo wrote an original poem, called, "The Palice of Honour [P]," which was printed at London, in 4to, in 1553, and at Edinburgh, in 4to. in 1579. In his youth he likewiſe tranſlated Ovid's books, De Remedio Amoris [Q]: and he alſo wrote an allegorical poem, called "King Hart;" which was firſt publiſhed from an original manuſcript by Mr. Pinkerton, in 1786, in his "Ancient Scotiſh Poems."] T.

(15) Warton, ut ſupra p. 289, 290, &c.

[O] Projected his tranſlation ſo early as the year 1501.] Mr. Warton obſerves, that in one of our author's poems, 'written that year, he promiſes to 'Venus a tranſlation of Virgil, in atonement for a 'ballad he had publiſhed againſt her court: and when 'the work was finiſhed, he tells lord Sinclair, that he 'had now made his peace with Venus, by tranſlating 'the poem which celebrated the actions of her ſon 'Eneas (16).' Mr. Warton alſo remarks, that 'no 'metrical verſion of a claſſic had yet appeared in Eng-'liſh; except of Boethius, who ſcarcely deſerves 'that appellation. Virgil was hitherto commonly 'known only by Caxton's romance on the ſubject of 'the Eneid; which, our author ſays, no more 'reſembles Virgil, than the Devil is like St. 'Auſtin (17).'

A new edition of Biſhop Douglas's tranſlation of Virgil was printed at Edinburgh, in ſmall folio, in 1710, with an account of his life prefixed, to which we have repeatedly referred in the courſe of this article. To this edition a large and valuable Gloſſary is added.

[P] The Palice of Honour.] Mr. Warton obſerves of this poem, that it is 'a moral viſion, written in 'the year 1501, planned on the deſign of the Tablet 'of Cebes, and imitated in the elegant Latin dialogue '"De Tranquillitate Animi" of his countryman Flo-'rence Wilſon, or Florentius Voluſenus.—The ob-'ject of this allegory is to ſhew the inſtability and in-'ſufficiency of worldly pomp; and to prove, that a 'conſtant and undeviating habit of virtue is the only 'way to true Honour and Happineſs, who reſide in a 'magnificent palace, ſituated on the ſummit of a high 'and inacceſſible mountain. The allegory is illuſ-'trated by a variety of examples of illuſtrious perſo-'nages; not only of thoſe who by a regular perſeve-'rance in honourable deeds gained admittance into this 'ſplendid habitation, but of thoſe who were excluded 'from it, by debaſing the dignity of their eminent 'ſtations with a vicious and unmanly behaviour. 'It is addreſſed, as an apologue for the conduct of a 'king, to James the Fourth, is adorned with many 'pleaſing incidents and adventures, and abounds 'with genius and learning (18).' Both the editions which have been printed of this poem are extremely ſcarce

[Q] Tranſlated Ovid's books de Remedio Amoris.] It is remarked by the writer of his Life, that 'this 'ſeems to have been the firſt of all his works, and 'done not without ſome view to himſelf. For, as 'Hume informs us, he had felt the effects of love; 'and what Ovid writes of himſelf, might in ſome 'meaſure be applied to his tranſlator.

" Curabar propriis æger Podalirius herbis,

'But this was in his younger years, and long be-'fore he was in holy orders. And he was very ſoon 'freed from the tyranny of this unreaſonable paſſion, 'as appears from the very tranſlation, which he 'finiſhed ſo early, and ſeems to have propoſed as an 'antidote againſt its charms both to himſelf and 'others. He hath given alſo many excellent precepts 'and advices againſt the danger of immoderate love 'and unlawful pleaſures, in his admirable prologue to 'Virgil's 4th book (19).]

DRAKE (Sir FRANCIS) one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of the naval heroes in the glorious reign of Elizabeth. A man, of whom it may be truly ſaid, That he had a head to contrive, a heart to undertake, and a hand ready to execute, whatever promiſed glory to himſelf, and good to his country. As he was, properly ſpeaking, the ſon of merit, we have but a very indifferent account of his family, or even of his father. That which Camden (a) gives us, and which he ſays he had from Drake's own mouth, is ſo embarraſſed with inconſiſtent circumſtances, that there is no relying upon it, and truſting to our reaſon at the ſame time, as will be ſhewn in the notes [A]. We will, therefore, give the reader, in this place, a plainer account, as early in its riſe, ſupported by good authority, and, in all its circumſtances, very agreeable to the ſequel of his ſtory, leaving it to his judgment to piece therewith the chief points in Camden's relation (b); which may be alſo reputed truths, if we knew with certainty how to reconcile, and bring them in (c). According then to this other account, I find he was the ſon of one Edmund Drake, an honeſt Sailor, and born near Taviſtock in the year 1545, being the eldeſt of twelve brethren, and brought up at the expence, and under the care, of his kinſman Sir John Hawkins. It is likewiſe ſaid, that, at the age of eighteen, he was Purſer of a ſhip trading to Biſcay, at twenty he made a voyage to Guinea, and, at the age of twenty-two, had the honour to be appointed Captain of the Judith, and in that capacity was in the harbour of St. John de Ulloa, in the gulph of Mexico, where he behaved moſt gallantly in the glorious actions under Sir John Hawkins, and returned with him into England with a very great reputation, but not worth a groat (d). Upon this he conceived a deſign of making repriſals on the King of Spain, which, ſome ſay, was put into his head by the Miniſter of his ſhip; and, to be ſure, in Sea-divinity the caſe was clear: the King of Spain's ſubjects had undone Mr. Drake, and therefore Mr. Drake was at liberty to take the beſt ſatisfaction he could on the ſubjects of the King of Spain (e). This doctrine, how rudely

[A] As will be ſhewn in the notes.] As in venturing to depart from what Camden has ſaid, we, at the ſame time, leave the great road in which all our other writers have travelled, it is but juſt that we ſhould give the world a full account of the motives which induced us to take this ſtep, that it may clearly appear it did not proceed from ſingularity, but neceſſity. Our learned Hiſtorian, ſpeaking of the events (1) which happened in the year 1580, has theſe words: 'About this time 'returned into England Francis Drake, having ac-'quired great wealth, and greater reputation, by 'proſperouſly ſailing round about the world, being, 'if rudely ſoever preached, was very taking in England, and therefore he no ſooner publiſhed his deſign, than he had numbers of volunteers ready to accompany him, though they had no ſuch pretence to colour their proceedings as he had (f). In 1570 he made his firſt expedition with two ſhips, the Dragon and the Swan; and the next year in the Swan alone, wherein he returned ſafe, if not rich [B]. And, having now means ſufficient to perform greater matters, as well as ſkill to conduct them, he laid the plan of a more important deſign with reſpect to himſelf, and to his enemies (g). This he put into execution on the twenty-fourth of March 1572, on which day he ſailed from Plymouth, himſelf in a ſhip called the Paſcha, of the burthen of ſeventy tons, and his brother John Drake in the Swan, of twenty-five tons burthen, their whole ſtrength conſiſting of no more than ſeventy-three, men and boys; and, with this inconſiderable force, on the twenty-ſecond of July he attacked the town of Nombre de Dios, which then ſerved the Spaniards for the ſame purpoſes (though not ſo conveniently) as thoſe for which they now uſe Porto Bello. He took it in a few hours by ſtorm, notwithſtanding a very dangerous wound he received in the action; yet, after all, they were no great gainers, but, after a very briſk action, were obliged to betake themſelves to their ſhips with very little booty. His next attempt was to plunder the mules laden with ſilver, which paſſed from Venta Cruz to Nombre de Dios; but in this ſcheme too he was diſappointed. However, he attacked the town of Venta Cruz, carried it, and got ſome little plunder. In their return they unexpectedly met with a ſtring of fifty mules laden with plate, of which they carried off as much as they could, and buried the reſt. In theſe expeditions he was very much aſſiſted by a nation of Indians, who then were, and yet are, engaged in a perpetual war with the Spaniards. The Prince, or Captain, of theſe people at this time was named Pedro, to whom Captain Drake preſented a fine cutlaſs which he wore, and to which he ſaw the Indian had a mind. Pedro, in return, gave him four large wedges of gold, all which Captain Drake threw into the common ſtock, with this remarkable expreſſion, 'That he thought 'it but juſt, that ſuch, as bore the charge of ſo uncertain a voyage on his credit, ſhould 'ſhare the utmoſt advantages that voyage produced.' Then embarking his men with all the wealth he had obtained, which was very conſiderable, he bore away for England, and was ſo fortunate as to ſail in twenty-three days from Florida to the Iſles of Scilly, and thence, without any accident, to Plymouth, where he arrived the ninth of Auguſt 1573 (b). His ſucceſs in this expedition, joined to his honourable behaviour towards his owners, gained him a high reputation, and the uſe he made of his riches ſtill a greater; for, fitting out three ſtout frigates at his own expence, he ſailed with them to Ireland, where, under Walter Earl of Eſſex (the unfortunate father of that ſtill more unfortunate Earl, who was beheaded), he ſerved as a volunteer, and did many glorious actions (i). After the death of his noble patron he returned into England, where Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, who was then Vice-Chamberlain to Queen Elizabeth, Privy-Counſellor, and a great favourite, took him under his protection, introduced him to her Majeſty, and procured him her countenance (k). By this means he acquired a capacity of undertaking the grand expedition, which will render his name immortal. The thing he firſt propoſed was a voyage into the South-Seas through the Streights of Magellan, which was what hitherto no Engliſhman

'if not the firſt of all which could challenge this glo'ry, yet, queſtionleſs, the firſt but Magellan, whom 'death cut off in the midſt of his voyage. This
'Drake, to relate no more than what I have heard
'from himſelf, was born of mean parentage in De-
'vonſhire, and had Francis Ruſſel, afterwards Earl of 'Bedford, for his godfather, who, according to the 'cuſtom, gave him his Chriſtian name. Whilſt he 'was yet a child, his father, embracing the Proteſtant
'doctrine, was called in queſtion by the Law of the 'Six Articles made by Henry VIII. againſt the Pro-
'teſtants, fled his country, and withdrew himſelf into 'Kent. After the death of King Henry, he got a 'place among the ſeamen in the King's navy to read
'prayers to them, and, ſoon after, he was ordained
'Deacon, and made Vicar of the church of Upnore
'upon the river Medway, where the Royal fleet uſu-
'ally rides. But, by reaſon of his poverty, he put 'his ſon apprentice to the maſter of a bark, his neigh'bour, who held him cloſely to his buſineſs, by which 'he made him an able ſeaman; his bark being em'ployed in coaſting along the ſhore, and ſometimes in 'carrying merchandize into Zealand and France.
'The youth, being painful and diligent, ſo pleaſed the 'old man by his induſtry, that, being a bachelor, at 'his death he bequeathed his bark unto him by his laſt
'will.' It falls out unhappily for this ſtory, that the parts of it are not conſiſtent. If Drake was in his tender years or childhood, when his father was perſecuted on the ſcore of the Six Articles, he muſt have been born a good while before the year 1539 (2); and, if ſo, how could Sir Francis Ruſſel be his godfather, who was himſelf born in 1527 (3)? ſo that, without much ſtraining this account, they might be both of an age. It is very certain, that Mr. Drake was but a young man when Sir John Hawkins made him Captain of the Judith, but according to this computation he was thirty-five or thirty-ſix at leaſt. It is allowed by all the writers of his time, that he died in the flower of his age, which could not well be ſaid, if he had been between ſixty and ſeventy. As to the account that I have followed, we have it from John Stowe, who was a very induſtrious careful man, and particularly inquiſitive into things of this nature (4). Beſides, as the reader ſees in the text, he ſettles every ſtep of his advancement, and affirming that he was in the twenty-ſecond year of his age when he became Captain of the Judith, this fixes his birth to 1545, ſince he was veſted with that command in October 1566; by fixing this date, the facts mentioned by Camden from the mouth of Sir Francis Drake become very probable; for Sir Francis Ruſſel might well be his godfather, and all the events follow that he ſets down, only the perſecution his father ſuffered muſt have been in the reign of Queen Mary, which is the more probable, if we conſider that Camden himſelf aſſures us, Queen Elizabeth, in the beginning of her reign, made that eſtabliſhment of the fleet in the river Medway, where Drake's father read prayers to the ſeamen (5). Neither is this the only miſtake in Sir Francis Drake's ſtory by that author.

[B] Wherein he returned ſafe, if not rich.] We have no particular account of theſe two voyages, or what he performed man ever attempted. This project was well received at Court, and, in a short time, Captain Drake saw himself at the height of his wishes; for, in his former voyage, having had a distant prospect of the South-Seas, he framed an ardent prayer to God, that he might sail an English ship in them, which he now found an opportunity of attempting, the Queen's permission furnishing him with the means, and his own fame quickly drawing to him a force sufficient (l) [C]. The fleet, with which he sailed on this extraordinary undertaking, consisted of the following ships; the Pelican, commanded by himself, of the burthen of one hundred tons; the Elizabeth, Vice admiral, eighty tons, under Captain John Winter; the Marygold, a bark of thirty tons, commanded by Captain John Thomas; the Swan, a fly-boat of fifty tons, under Captain John Chester; and the Christopher, a pinnace of fifteen tons, under Captain Thomas Moon (m). In this fleet were embarked no more than one hundred and sixty-four able men, and all the necessary provisions for so long and dangerous a voyage; the intent of which, however, was not openly declared, but given out to be for Alexandria, though all men suspected, and many knew, he intended for America. Thus equipped, on the fifteenth of November 1577, about three in the afternoon, he sailed for Plymouth; but a heavy storm, taking him as soon as he was out of port, forced him, in a very bad condition, into Falmouth, to refit; which having expeditiously performed, he again put to sea the thirteenth of December following (n). On the twenty-fifth of the same month he fell in with the coast of Barbary, and, on the twenty-ninth, with Cape Verd; the thirteenth of March he passed the equinoctial; the fifth of April he made the coast of Brazil in 30° N. L. and entered the river De la Plata, where he lost the company of two of his ships; but meeting them again, and having taken out of them all the provisions they had on board, he turned them adrift. On the twenty-ninth of May he entered the port of St. Julian, where he did the least commendable action of his life, in executing Mr. John Doughty, a man next in authority to himself; in which, however, he preserved a great appearance of justice (o) [D]. On the twentieth of August he entered the Streights of Magellan; on the twenty-fifth performed in them. They were made in the years 1470 and 1571; and there is nothing clearer than that Captain Drake had two great points in view; the one was, to inform himself perfectly of the situation and strength of certain places in the Spanish West-Indies; the other to convince his countrymen, that, notwithstanding what had happened to Captain Hawkins in his last voyage, it was a thing very practicable to sail into these parts and return in safety; for, it is to be observed, that Hawkins and Drake separated in the West-Indies, and that the former, finding it impossible to bring all his crew home to England, had set a part of them, but with their own consents, ashore in the bay of Mexico; and these being looked upon as so many men lost, and indeed very few of them found their way home, the terror of such a captivity as these poor men were known to endure had a great effect (6). But Captain Drake in these two voyages, having very wisely avoided coming to blows with the Spaniards, and bringing home sufficient returns to satisfy his owners, dissipated these apprehensions, as well as raised his own character; so that, at his return from his second voyage, he found it no difficult matter to raise such a strength as might enable him to perform what he had long meditated in his own mind, but which he never would have been able to effect, but by pursuing this cautious method.

(6) See the accounts of John Oxenham's Voyage in Hakluyt, p. 594.

[C] Quickly drawing to him a force sufficient.] We have observed in the text, that Captain Drake was the first Englishman, at least so far as we know, that had so much as a sight of the South-Seas; and, as Mr. Camden remarks, he was so inflamed with that sight, as to have no rest in his own mind, till he had accomplished his purpose of sailing an English ship in those seas (7). He was not, however, so forward as to tell this to all the world, because he foresaw that such an undertaking would be attended with many difficulties; that the navigation was new, and required much consideration before it was attempted; that the Spaniards were sufficiently alarmed by his last attempt, and that it would be highly rash for him to adventure upon such an enterprize, without having the sanction of public authority. While he meditated this great design in his own mind, without communicating it to any, he took care to procure the best lights he could to engage several bold and active men to serve under him wherever he went, and, by a well-timed display of public spirit, made himself known to, and gained some powerful friends at Court (8). But, while he was thus wisely and warily contriving what he afterwards so happily executed, one John Oxenham, who had served as a soldier, a seaman, and a cook, and had gained great reputation by his gallant behaviour in the last voyage under him, believed he had penetrated Captain Drake's scheme, and thought to be beforehand with him in the execution of it. Accordingly, in 1575, this man sailed in a bark of one hundred and forty tons burthen, with seventy brave fellows, to Nombre de Dios, where laying his bark up in a creek, he marched cross the Isthmus, with his companions, got into the South-Seas with some canoes, and took two Spanish ships with an immense treasure in gold and silver. But wanting Drake's abilities and generosity, though he was little, if at all, inferior to him in courage, he fell out with his men, which occasioned such a delay in his return, that the Spaniards found and recovered the treasure, afterwards destroyed many, and at length took him and some of his companions, whom, for want of a commission to justify their proceedings, they hanged as pirates (9). Captain Drake, before he had any knowledge of the issue of this business, and being acquainted with no more than was public throughout all the West of England, that Oxenham was sailed upon some such design, brought his own project to bear by the means mentioned in the text (10), and easily obtained a force sufficient to accomplish it, which, all things considered, must at this day appear a very extraordinary event, more especially if we consider that he never disclosed his real intention after he had his commission, nor indeed could disclose it with safety, and yet made all his preparations so judiciously, that it does not appear any other circumnavigator met with fewer discouragements than he, who performed all by the light of his own judgment, and at the expence of private persons who had an entire confidence in him.

[D] A great appearance of justice.] This is by much the most remarkable passage in the life of our hero in reference to his moral character, and for which, as we shall see, he has been very severely censured. We will first state the matter of fact briefly and plainly; then mention the surmises which have been raised thereupon; and, lastly, shew the reader what has been, or may be, alledged in his justification, which we take to be the true course of rendering works of this kind useful; since, in other books, the actions of great men are seen only in particular lights, according as the author's subject, or sometimes his humour, inclines him to place them; but the business of a Biographer is, from the relation of facts, to fifth of September he paſſed them, having then only his own ſhip, which, in the South Seas, he new named the Hind; on the twenty-fifth of November he came to Machao, in the latitude of thirty degrees, where he had appointed a rendezvous in caſe his ſhips ſeparated: but Captain Winter, having repaſſed the Streights, was returned to England. Thence he continued his voyage along the coaſts of Chili and Peru, taking all opportunities of ſeizing Spaniſh ſhips, or of landing, and attacking them on ſhore, till his crew were ſated with plunder; and then coaſting North America, to the height of forty-eight degrees, he endeavoured to find a paſſage back into our ſeas on that ſide, which is the ſtrongeſt proof of his conſummate ſkill and invincible courage; for, if ever ſuch a paſſage be found to the northward, this, in all probability, will be the method; and we can ſcarcely conceive a clearer teſtimony of an undaunted ſpirit, than attempting diſcoveries after ſo long, ſo hazardous, and ſo fatiguing a voyage (p). Here, being diſappointed of what he ſought, he landed, and called the country New Albion, taking poſſeſſion of it in the name, and for the uſe, of Queen Elizabeth; and, having careened his ſhip, ſet ſail from thence on the twenty-ninth of September, 1579, for the Moluccas. The reaſon of Captain Drake's chuſing this paſſage round, rather than returning by, the Streights of Magellan, was partly the danger of being attacked at a great diſadvantage by the Spaniards, ſhew what the man of whom he is ſpeaking really was. Let us proceed then in the preſent caſe to the buſineſs.

On the 18th of June, Captain Drake arrived with his ſmall fleet at Port St. Julian, which lies within one degree of the Streights of Magellan, where he continued about two months, during which time he made the neceſſary proviſion for paſſing the Streights with ſafety (11). Here it was that, on a ſudden, having carried the principal perſons engaged in the ſervice to a deſart iſland lying in the bay, he called a kind of Council of War, or rather Court Martial, where he expoſed his commiſſion, by which the Queen granted him the power of life and death, which was delivered him, with this remarkable expreſſion from her own mouth: "We do account, that he, Drake, who "ſtrikes at thee, does ſtrike at us." He then laid open with great eloquence, for, tho' his education was but indifferent, he had a wonderful power of ſpeech, the cauſe of this aſſembly; he proceeded next to charge Mr. John Doughty, who had been ſecond in command during the whole voyage, when Drake was preſent, and firſt in his abſence, with plotting the deſtruction of the undertaking, and the murder of his perſon. He ſaid, he had the firſt notice of this gentleman's bad intentions before he left England, but that he was in hopes his behaviour towards him would have extinguiſhed ſuch diſpoſitions, if there had been any truth in the information. He then appealed for his behaviour to the whole aſſembly, and to the gentleman accuſed: he next expoſed his practices from the time they left England, while he lived towards him with all the kindneſs and cordiality of a brother, which charge he ſupported by producing papers under his own hand, to which Mr. Doughty added a full and free confeſſion. After this, the captain, or, as in the language of thoſe times he is called, the General, quitted the place, telling the aſſembly he expected that they ſhould paſs a verdict upon him, for he would be no judge in his own cauſe. Camden, as the reader will ſee, ſays, that he tried him by a jury; but other accounts affirm, that the whole forty perſons, of which the court was compoſed, adjudged him to death, and gave this in writing under their hands and ſeals, leaving the time and manner of it to the General. Mr. Doughty himſelf ſaid, that he deſired rather to die by the hands of juſtice than to be his own executioner. Upon this, Captain Drake, having maturely weighed the whole matter, preſented three points to Mr. Doughty's choice. Firſt, to be executed upon the iſland where they were; next, to be ſet aſhore on the main land; or, laſtly, to be ſent home to abide the juſtice of his country. He deſired he might have till the next day to conſider of theſe, which was allowed him, and then, giving his reaſons for rejecting the two laſt, he declared that he made the firſt his choice, and, having received the ſacrament with the General, from the hands of Mr. Francis Fletcher, chaplain to the Fleet, and made a full confeſſion, his head was cut off with an axe, by the Provoſt Marſhal, July 2d, 1578. It is very remarkable, that this iſland had been the ſcene of another affair, preciſely of the ſame nature, fifty-eight years before, when Magellan cauſed John de Carthagena, who was joined in commiſſion with him by the King of Spain, to be hanged for the like offence; and hence it was called the Iſland of true Juſtice (12).

(12) Sir William Monſon's Naval Tracts, p. 396.

As to the imputations which this matter brought upon Drake, we will firſt cite what Camden ſays of this tranſaction (13). 'On the 26th of April entering into the mouth of the River of Plate, he ſaw 'an infinite number of ſea-calves. From thence 'ſailing into the haven of St. Julian, he found a gibbet ſet up as is thought by Magellan for the puniſhment of certain mutineers. In this very place, 'John Doughty, an induſtrious and ſtout man, and 'the next unto Drake, was called to his trial for raiſing a mutiny in the fleet, found guilty by twelve 'men after the Engliſh manner, and condemned to 'death, which he ſuffered undauntedly, being beheaded, having firſt received the Holy Communion 'with Drake. And, indeed, the moſt impartial perſons in the fleet were of opinion, that he had acted 'ſeditiouſly, and that Drake cut him off as an emulator of his glory, and one that regarded not ſo much 'whom he himſelf excelled in commendations for ſea 'matters, as who he thought might equal him. Yet 'wanted there not ſome who, pretending to underſtand 'things better than others, gave out that Drake had 'in charge from Leiceſter to take off Doughty upon 'any pretence whatever, becauſe he had reported that 'the Earl of Eſſex was made away by the cunning 'practices of that Earl.' We find this matter touched in ſeveral other books, and particularly in two, which were written on purpoſe to expoſe the Earl of Leiceſter, and perhaps deſerving the leſs credit for that reaſon (14).

(13) Annal. Eliz. p. 354.

(14) Leiceſter's Commonwealth p. 41. Leiceſter's Ghoſt, Stanza 112, 113.

It may be offered, in defence of Sir Francis Drake, that this man was openly put to death, after as fair a trial as the circumſtances of time and place would permit; that he ſubmitted patiently to his ſentence, and received the ſacrament with Drake, whom he embraced immediately before his execution. Beſides theſe, there are two points which deſerve particular conſideration. Firſt, that in ſuch expeditions ſtrict diſcipline and legal ſeverity are often abſolutely neceſſary. Secondly, that as to the Earl of Eſſex, for whoſe death Doughty had expreſſed concern, he was Drake's firſt patron, and it is therefore very improbable he ſhould deſtroy a man for endeavouring to detect his murther. We may add to all this, if liberty may be indulged to conjectures, that this man, preſuming upon the Earl of Leiceſter's favour (who very probably impoſed him upon Drake to be rid of him), was thence encouraged to form deſigns againſt Drake; and this might alſo be the reaſon which hindered him from inclining to an abſolute pardon, as doubting whether it was poſſible to truſt one who had ſo far abuſed his confidence already, and whoſe known intereſt with ſo great a man might always enable him to find inſtruments, in caſe he was wicked enough to enter upon freſh intrigues. All this, however, is ſubmitted entirely to the reader's judgment; ſince it is our deſign only to furniſh proper lights from the intelligence which has come to our hands, but by

Spaniards, and partly the lateneſs of the ſeaſon, whence dangerous ſtorms and hurricanes were to be apprehended (q). Perhaps too he gave out amongſt his ſeamen, that he was deterred by the confident, though falſe, report of the Spaniards, that the Streights could not be repaſſed [E]. On the thirteenth of October he fell in with certain iſlands, inhabited by the moſt barbarous people he had met with in all his voyage. On the fourth of November he had ſight of the Moluccas, and, coming to Ternate, was extremely well received by the King thereof, who appears, from the moſt authentic relations of this voyage, to have been a wiſe and polite Prince. On the tenth of December he made Celebes, where his ſhip unfortunately ran on a rock the ninth of January following, whence beyond all expectation, and in a manner miraculouſly, they got off, and continued their courſe. On the ſixteenth of March he arrived at Java Major; thence he intended to have proceeded for Malacca, but found himſelf obliged to alter his purpoſe, and think of returning directly home (r). On the twenty-fifth of March, 1580, he put this deſign in execution; and, on the fifteenth of June, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope, having then on board his ſhip fifty-ſeven men, and but three caſks of water. On the twelfth of July he paſſed the Line, reached the coaſt of Guinea on the ſixteenth, and there watered. On the 11th of September he made the iſland of Tercera, and, on the third day of November, the ſame year, entered the harbour of Plymouth. In this voyage he completely ſurrounded the globe, which no Commander in Chief had done before (s) [F]. His ſucceſs in the voyage, and the immenſe maſs of wealth he brought home, raiſed much diſcourſe throughout the kingdom, ſome highly commending, and ſome as loudly decrying him. The former alledged, that his exploit was not only honourable to himſelf, but to his by no means to aim at impoſing our ſenſe of things upon the publick.

[E] That the Streights could not be repaſſed.] In ſpreading this report, the Spaniards certainly acted very wiſely, for it intimidated even the boldeſt navigators of other nations from attempting this paſſage, from an apprehenſion, that, when they were once in thoſe ſeas, they ſhould never get out again; but either fall into the hands of the Spaniards, from whom they could hope no mercy, or periſh by famine before they could poſſibly reach the Eaſt-Indies (15). It is very evident from Captain Drake's conduct, for we have no other way left of coming at his ſentiments, that he had maturely weighed all theſe things before he left England. He carried five ſhips with him to Port St. Julian, that the people might be more at their eaſe, and have greater plenty of proviſions; but when he came thither he broke up two of them, that there might be leſs danger of ſeparating in ſtrange ſeas, which, though it failed him, was nevertheleſs a juſt precaution. In the next place it appears, that he had formed a deſign of returning by a new paſſage, which, though often attempted on the other ſide, no Engliſhman could ever have thought to have tried in this manner, becauſe, till he opened the way, none had the leaſt notion of entering theſe ſeas. Laſtly, he had taken great care to victual himſelf properly, that if this deſign failed, as it did, he might be in a condition to follow the example of Magellan. In order to encourage his people to this, he ſeemed to give credit to the opinion propagated by the Spaniards, of the great danger in repaſſing the Streights of Magellan, which, however, were actually repaſſed by Captain John Winter, though Drake and his company could know nothing of this at that time. But, that Captain Drake could not apprehend any impoſſibility in the thing itſelf, we may be aſſured from hence, that in this very voyage he had not only paſſed the Streights, but had alſo been driven back again, not through the Streights indeed, but in the open ſea; of which we have a very diſtinct account given us from his own mouth, by his relation, Sir Richard Hawkins, which is very curious, and well deſerves the reader's notice (16): 'In all the Streights it ebbeth and floweth 'more or leſs, and in many places it riſeth very little, 'but in ſome Bays where are great in-draughts it riſes 'eight or ten feet, and doubtleſs farther in more. 'If a man be furniſhed with wood and water and the 'wind good, he may keep the main ſea, and go round 'about the Streights to the Southwards, and it is the 'ſhorter way; for, beſides the experience which we 'made, that all the ſouth part of the Streights is but 'iſlands, many times having the ſea open, I remem-'ber that Sir Francis Drake told me, that, having 'ſhot the Streights, a ſtorm took him firſt at North-'Weſt, and afterwards vered about to the South-'Weſt, which continued with him many days with 'that extremity, that he could not open any ſail, and 'that at the end of the ſtorm he found himſelf in fifty 'degrees, which was ſufficient teſtimony and proof 'that he was beaten round about the Streights; for, the 'leaſt height of the Streights is in fifty-two degrees 'and fifty minutes, in which ſtand the two entrances 'or mouths. And moreover, he ſaid, that, ſtanding 'about when the wind changed, he was not well able 'to double the Southermoſt iſland, and ſo anchored 'under the lee of it; and going aſhore, carried a 'compaſs with him, and ſeeking out the Southermoſt 'part of the iſland, caſt himſelf down upon the utter-'moſt point, groveling, and ſo reached out his body 'over it. Soon after he embarked, where he acquaint-'ed his people that he had been upon the Southermoſt 'known land in the world, and further to the South-'ward upon it than any of them, or any man as yet 'known. Theſe teſtimonies may ſuffice for this truth 'unto all but ſuch as are incredulous, and will believe 'nothing but what they ſee; for my part, I am of 'opinion, that the Streight is navigable all the year 'long, although the beſt time be in November, De-'cember, and January, and then the winds are more 'favourable, which at other times are variable as in 'all narrow ſeas.'

(16) Obſervations in his Voyage to the South-Sea, p. 95, 96.

[F] Which no Commander in Chief had done before.] The firſt, into whoſe thoughts the poſſibility of this entered, was the celebrated Chriſtopher Columbus, whoſe knowledge in the art of navigation, when one conſiders the defects in Philoſophy and Aſtronomy in his time, appears perfectly amazing (17). Sir John Cabot, father to Sebaſtian Cabot, who was contemporary with Columbus, comprehended his principles perfectly, which induced him to propoſe, to our King Henry the Seventh, the finding a North-Weſt Paſſage. Ferdinand Magellan, a Portugueſe by birth, offered his ſervice to the Crown of Spain, and propoſed ſearching for a paſſage to the South, which was accepted. He ſailed from St. Lucar, September the twentieth, 1519; he found and paſſed the Streights, which bear his name, the next year; but in his return was killed in the Eaſt-Indies. His ſhip came back ſafe to Spain; and as this was the firſt, ſo it was the only example that Captain Drake had to encourage him in his deſign; and, to balance this, there were a multitude of unfortunate attempts afterwards. In 1527, the Spaniards ſent Garcia de Loaiſa, a Knight of Malta, with a ſquadron of ſeven ſhips to follow the route of Magellan. He paſſed the Streights indeed; loſt ſome of his ſhips in the South-Seas; others put into the Ports of NewSpain, and his country; that it would eſtabliſh our reputation for maritime ſkill in foreign nations, and raiſe a uſeful ſpirit of emulation at home; and that as to the money, our merchants having ſuffered deeply from the faithleſs practices of the Spaniards, there was nothing more juſt than that the nation ſhould receive the benefit of Drake's repriſals. The other party alledged, that, in fact, he was no better than a pirate; that, of all others, it leaſt became a trading nation to encourage ſuch practices; that it was not only a direct breach of all our late treaties with Spain, but likewiſe of our old leagues with the houſe of Burgundy; and that the conſequences would be much more fatal than the benefits reaped from it could be advantageous. Things continued in this uncertainty during the remainder of the year 1580, and the ſpring of the ſucceeding year. At length they took a better turn, for, on the fourth of April, 1581, her Majeſty going to Deptford in Kent, went on board Capt. Drake's ſhip, where after dinner ſhe conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and declared her abſolute approbation of all that he had done, to the confuſion of his enemies, and to the great joy of his friends (t). She likewiſe gave directions for the preſervation of his ſhip, that it might remain a monument of his own and his country's glory. In proceſs of time the veſſel decaying, it was broken up; but a chair, made of the planks, was preſented to the Univerſity of Oxford, and is ſtill preſerved (u) [G]. In 1585 he ſailed and only his veſſel and another reached the Eaſt-Indies, where himſelf and all his people periſhed. Another ſquadron of ſeven ſhips, fitted out by the Biſhop of Placentia, had no better fortune; for, having reached the South-Seas, they were ſo diſcouraged, that they proceeded no farther. In 1526, the Genoeſe ſent two ſhips to paſs theſe Streights, of which, one was caſt away, and the other returned home without effecting any thing. Sebaſtian Cabot, in the ſervice of the crown of Portugal, made the like trial; but, not being able to find the Streights, returned into the River of Plate. Americus Veſpuſius, from whom the new world received its name, undertook to perform in the ſervice of the Crown of Portugal, what Cabot had promiſed; but this vain man was ſtill more unlucky, for he could not find either the Streights, or the River of Plate. Some years after, the Spaniards equipped a ſtout ſquadron under the command of Simon de Alcaſara, but, before they reached the height of the Streights, the ſailors mutinied, and obliged their commander to return (18). Such repeated misfortunes diſcouraged even the ableſt and boldeſt ſeaman; ſo that, from this time, both Spaniards and ſtrangers dropped all thoughts of emulating Magellan; and highly probable it is, that, if Captain Drake had fully diſcloſed his deſign, he had not been more fortunate than the reſt. His courage therefore may well be admired, who durſt endeavour an enterprize, the declaring of which had infallibly deſtroyed it: and his ſagacity in navigating ſeas wholly unknown, as well in his return as in his going out, (for not a man on board his ſhip had ever ſeen the Cape of Good Hope), can hardly be enough admired. His intrepidity in ſailing ſo far to the North, in hopes of coming that way home, was very ſurprizing, and the methods he took through all the voyage to keep his people ſteady, in full ſpirits, and for the moſt part in good health, muſt give us a very high idea of his capacity; and therefore, we need not at all wonder that, upon his coming to England, his fame roſe to ſuch a height as to provoke envy as well as praiſe.

[G] And is ſtill preſerved.] It is obſerved by Mr. Camden, that, when the Queen went to dine on board the Golden Hind, there was ſuch a concourſe of people that the wooden bridge over which they paſſed broke, and upwards of an hundred perſons fell into the river, by which accident, however, there was nobody hurt; as if, ſays he, that ſhip had been built under ſome lucky conſtellation. Upon this occaſion the following verſes, made by the ſcholars of Wincheſter College, were nailed to the mainmaſt (19).

The ſame learned author, in another famous work of his (*), takes notice of a circumſtance very extraordinary in relation to this celebrated ſhip, which is ſo ſtrange in itſelf, that we ſhould have paſſed it by in a writer of leſs credit; but what Camden thought fit to record of things happening in his own time, it might be juſtly thought a fault in us to omit. Speaking of the ſhire of Buchan in Scotland, he ſays: 'Is is hardly worth 'while to mention the Clayks, a ſort of Geeſe, which 'are believed by ſome, with great admiration, to grow 'upon trees on this coaſt, and in other places, and 'when they are ripe to fall down into the ſea, becauſe 'neither their neſts nor eggs can any where be found. 'But they who ſaw the ſhip in which Sir Francis Drake 'ſailed round the world, when it was laid up in the 'river Thames, could teſtify that little birds bred in 'the old rotten keels of ſhips, ſince a great number 'of ſuch, without life and feathers, ſtuck cloſe to the 'out-ſide of the keel of that ſhip. Yet I ſhould think 'that the generation of theſe birds was not from the 'logs of wood, but from the ſea, termed, by the poets, 'the Parent of all things.' But to proceed in our narration. Time, that deſtroys all things, having made great breaches in this ſhip, which for many years had been contemplated with juſt admiration at Deptford, it was at length broke up, and a chair made out of the planks was, by John Davies, Eſq. preſented to the Univerſity of Oxford, upon which the famous Abraham Cowley made the following epigram, that neither the hero nor his veſſel might want the aſſiſtance of the Muſes to render them immortal (20):

failed again to the Weſt-Indies, having under his command Captain Chriſtopher Carliſle, Captain Martin Frobiſher, Captain Francis Knollys, and many other officers of great reputation. In that expedition he took the cities of St. Jago, St. Domingo, Carthagena, and St. Auguſtin; exceeding even the expectation of his friends, and the hopes of the common people, though both were ſanguine to the laſt degree (w). Yet the profits of this expedition were but moderate, the deſign of Sir Francis being rather to weaken the enemy than to enrich himſelf (x). In 1587 he proceeded to Liſbon, with a fleet of thirty ſail, and having intelligence of a great fleet aſſembled in the Bay of Cadiz, which was to have made part of the Armada, he, with great courage, entered that port, and burnt there upwards of ten thouſand ton of ſhipping; and, after having performed all the ſervice that the State could expect, he reſolved to do his utmoſt to content the Merchants of London, who had contributed, by a voluntary ſubſcription, to the fitting out of his fleet. With this view, having intelligence of a large carrack expected at Tercera from the Eaſt-Indies, thither he ſailed; and, though his men were ſeverely pinched for want of victuals, yet, by fair words, and large promiſes, he prevailed upon them to endure theſe hardſhips for a few days; within which ſpace the Eaſt-India ſhip arrived, which he took, and carried home in triumph; ſo that throughout the whole war there was no expedition ſo happily conducted as this, with reſpect to reputation or profit (y); and therefore we need not wonder, that, upon his return, the mighty applauſe he received might render him ſomewhat elate, as his enemies report it did; but certain it is, that no man's pride had ever a happier turn, ſince it always vented itſelf in ſervice to the publick [H]. Thus, at this time, he undertook to bring water into the town of Plymouth, through the want of which, till then, it had been grievouſly diſtreſſed; and he performed it by conducting thither a ſtream from ſprings at eight miles diſtance, that is to ſay, in a ſtrait line; for, in the manner by which he brought it, the courſe it runs is upwards of twenty miles (z). In 1588 Sir Francis Drake was appointed Vice-Admiral under Charles Lord Howard of Effingham, High Admiral of England. Here his fortune favoured him as remarkably as ever, for he made prize of a very large galleon, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdez, who yielded on the bare mention of his name. In this veſſel fifty thouſand ducats were diſtributed among the ſeamen and ſoldiers, which preſerved that love they had always borne to their valiant Commander. It muſt not, however, be diſſembled, that, through an overſight of his, the Admiral ran the utmoſt hazard of being taken by the enemy; for, Drake being appointed, the firſt night of the engagement, to carry lights for the direction of the Engliſh fleet, he, being in full purſuit of ſome hulks belonging to the Hanſe towns, neglected it, which occaſioned the Admiral's following the Spaniſh lights, and remaining almoſt in the centre of their fleet till morning. However, his ſucceeding ſervices ſufficiently effaced the memory of this miſtake, the greateſt execution done on the flying Spaniards being performed by the ſquadron under his command (a) [I]. [H] Since it always vented itſelf in ſervice to the publick.] It muſt be obſerved, that though, in his voyage round the world, our gallant ſeaman had the Queen's commiſſion, yet he had not the honour to command any of the Queen's ſhips. But, in the expedition of 1585, Sir Francis Drake went on board one Man of War, and his Vice-Admiral, Frobiſher, was in another (21). In this laſt enterprize, in 1587, he had four of the Queen's ſhips, and twenty ſix ſail of ſeveral ſizes fitted out by the Merchants of London; ſo that, if we conſider the expectations which his former ſucceſſes had raiſed, his having now ſeveral intereſts to ſerve, and thoſe in a manner oppoſite to each other, one cannot but admit, that this fortune was very ſingular, as well as his conduct great, that could give full ſatisfaction to all. Yet this he did in ſo high a degree, that Sir William Monſon confeſſes, in his naval tracts, Envy herſelf knew not what to object, either to the management or the iſſue of this voyage (22). If therefore Sir Francis Drake bore his head a little higher upon his return, it was highly pardonable, and all that we find objected to him is no more than this, that, in the ſoldier-like language of that time, he very merrily called this, burning the King of Spain's beard (23). This expreſſion was indeed blunt and coarſe enough, and yet there is ſomething in it expreſſive: it is on all hands allowed that he did infinite miſchief, and retarded thereby the coming of the Armada for a whole year.

At Lattar Lammas we'll fulfil.

The next year he commanded as Admiral at ſea the fleet ſent to reſtore Don Antonio King of Portugal, the command of the land-forces being given to Sir John Norris. They were hardly got out to ſea before the Commanders differed, though it is on all hands agreed, that there never was an Admiral better diſpoſed, with reſpect to ſoldiers, than Sir Francis Drake. The ground of their difference was this: the General was bent on landing at the Groyne, whereas Sir Francis, and the ſea-officers, were for ſailing to Liſbon directly, in which, if their advice had been taken, without queſtion, their enterprize had ſucceeded, and Don Antonio been reſtored. For it afterwards appeared, on their invading Portugal, that the enemy had made uſe of the time they gave them to ſo good purpoſe, that it was not poſſible to make any impreſſion. Sir John Norris, indeed, marched by land to Liſbon, and Sir Francis Drake very imprudently promiſed to ſail up the river with his whole fleet; but, when he ſaw the conſequences which would have attended the keeping his word, he choſe rather to break his promiſe than to hazard the Queen's navy; for which he was grievouſly reproached by Norris, and the miſcarriage of the whole affair was imputed to his failure in performing what he had undertaken: yet Sir Francis fully juſtified himſelf on his return, for he made it manifeſt to the Queen and Council, that all the ſervice that was done was performed by him, and his ſailing up the river of Liſbon would have ſignified nothing to the taking the caſtle, which was two miles off, and that without reducing it there was no taking the town (b) [K]. The war with Spain ſtill con-

There is a letter ſtill preſerved by Strype, written by Sir Francis Drake to the Lord High-Treaſurer Burleigh, dated June 6, 1588, wherein he acquaints him, that the Spaniards were approaching, and that though their ſtrength outwent report, yet the chearfulneſs and courage which the Lord Admiral expreſſed, gave all who had the honour to ſerve under him aſſurance of victory. This compliment, which ſure was very well turned, proved alſo a prophecy, which Sir Francis had his ſhare in fulfilling (25). On the twenty-ſecond of July, Sir Francis obſerving a great Spaniſh ſhip, commanded by Don Pedro de Valdez, who was reputed the projector of this invaſion, floating at a diſtance from both fleets, ſent his pinnace to ſummon thoſe who were on board to yield. Valdez, to maintain his credit and pretence to valour, returned, that they were four hundred and fifty ſtrong, that he himſelf was Don Pedro, and ſtood much upon his honour, and thereupon propounded ſeveral conditions upon which he was willing to yield: but the Vice-Admiral replied that he had no leiſure to parley, but, if he thought fit inſtantly to yield, he might, if not he ſhould ſoon find that Drake was no coward. Pedro hearing it was Drake, whoſe name was ſo terrible to the Spaniards, preſently yielded, and, with forty-ſix of his attendants, came aboard Sir Francis's ſhip, where, giving him the ſolemn Spaniſh congee, he proteſted, 'that they were all reſolved to 'have died fighting, had they not fallen into his 'hands, whoſe felicity and valour was ſo great, that 'Mars the god of war, and Neptune the god of the 'ſea, ſeemed to wait upon all his attempts, and whoſe 'noble and generous carriage toward the vanquiſhed 'had been oft experienced by his foes.' Sir Francis, to requite theſe Spaniſh compliments with real Engliſh kindneſs, ſet him at his own table, and lodged him in his own cabin, ſending the reſt of his company to Plymouth. Drake's ſoldiers were well recompenſed with the plunder of this ſhip, wherein they found fifty-five thouſand ducats of gold, which they joyfully ſhared amongſt them (26). This Don Pedro Valdez remained above two years Sir Francis Drake's priſoner in England; and, when he was releaſed, paid him, for his own and his two Captains liberties, a ranſom of three thouſand five hundred pounds (27). The Spaniards, notwithſtanding their loſs was ſo great and their defeat ſo notorious, took great pains to propagate falſe ſtories, which in ſome places gained ſo much credit as to hide their ſhame. This provoked all good Engliſhmen, and, amongſt them, none more than Sir Francis Drake, who, to ſhew that he could upon occaſion draw his pen as well as his ſword, vouchſafed this refutation of their romances (28): 'They were not aſhamed to publiſh, in ſundry lan-'guages in print, great victories in words, which 'they pretended to have obtained againſt this realm, 'and ſpread the fame in a moſt falſe ſort over all parts 'of France, Italy, and elſewhere; when, ſhortly af-'ter, it was happily manifeſted in very deed, to all 'nations, how their navy, which they termed in-'vincible, conſiſting of one hundred and forty ſail of 'ſhips, not only of their own kingdom, but 'ſtrengthened with the greateſt argoſies, Portugal 'carracks, florentines, and large holks of other coun-'tries, were by thirty of her Majeſty's own ſhips of 'war, and a few of our own merchants, by the wiſe, 'valiant, and advantageous conduct of the lord Charles 'Howard, High Admiral of England, beaten and 'ſhuffled together even from the Lizard in Cornwall, 'firſt to Portland, where they ſhamefully left Don Pe-'dro de Valdez with his mighty ſhip; from Portland to 'Calais, where they loſt Hugh de Moncado, with the 'galleys of which he was Captain; and from Calais 'driven with ſquibs from their anchors, were chaſed 'out of the ſight of England, round about Scotland 'and Ireland. Where, for the ſympathy of their re-'ligion, hoping to find ſuccour and aſſiſtance, a great 'part of them were cruſhed againſt the rocks, and 'thoſe other that landed, being very many in number, 'were, notwithſtanding, broken, ſlain, and taken. 'And ſo ſent from village to village, coupled in hal-'ters, to be ſhipped into England, where her Majeſty, 'of her princely and invincible diſpoſition, diſdaining 'to put them to death, and ſcorning either to retain 'or entertain them, they were all ſent back again to 'their countries, to witneſs and recount the worthy 'atchievement of their invincible and dreadful na-'vy. Of which the number of ſoldiers, the fearful 'burthen of their ſhips, the commanders names of 'every ſquadron, with all other their magazines of pro-'viſions, were put in print, as an army and navy ir-'reſiſtible and diſdaining prevention; with all which 'their great terrible oſtentation, they did not in all 'their ſailing round about England ſo much as ſink or 'take one ſhip, bark, pinnace, or cock-boat, of ours, 'or even burnt ſo much as one ſheepcote on this land.' If the knowledge of a writer, with reſpect to the ſubject which employs his pen, ought to render his relation more credible; or if the quality of an author can add any weight to his productions, this will not fail of being eſteemed as well as believed. To ſpeak the truth plainly, there is not perhaps in our own, or in any other language within ſo narrow a compaſs, ſo full, ſo perſpicuous, and ſo ſpirited a relation of a tranſaction, glorious as this was, extant in any Hiſtory. Indeed, what wonder, if the defeat of the Spaniards be as finely painted by the pen, as it was gallantly atchieved by the ſword, of Sir Francis Drake!

[K] There was no taking the town.] Before this expedition, all difficulties, however great, were ſeen to bend before the fortune of Sir Francis Drake. But whether it was the ſtrange diviſion of command, for there were two Generals in Chief declared, and a third who expected to command them, though without a commiſſion; whether they were deceived in the furniſhing the fleet, which would not have been the caſe if the ſole management had been committed to Sir Francis Drake; or whether their hopes failed them in Portugal; ſo it was, that, with reſpect to the great end of their expedition, they miſcarried; and, as they carried continuing, and it being evident that nothing galled the enemy ſo much as the loſſes they met with in the Indies, a propoſition was made to the Queen by Sir John Hawkins and Sir Francis Drake, the moſt experienced ſeamen in her kingdom, for undertaking a more effectual expedition into thoſe parts than had hitherto been made through the whole courſe of that war; and, at the ſame time, they offered to be at a great part of the expence themſelves, and to engage their friends to bear a conſiderable proportion of the reſt (c). The Queen readily gave ear to this motion, and furniſhed, on her part, a ſtout ſquadron of men of war, on board one of which, The Garland, Sir John Hawkins embarked. Their whole force conſiſted of twenty ſeven ſhips and barks, and on board them were about two thouſand five hundred men. Of all the enterprizes, throughout the war, there was none of which ſo great hope was conceived as of this, and yet none ſucceeded worſe. The fleet was detained, for ſome time after it was ready, on the Engliſh coaſt, by the arts of the Spaniards, who, having intelligence of its ſtrength, and of the ends for which it was intended, they conceived, that the only means whereby it might be diſappointed was by procuring ſome delay; in order to which they gave out, that they were ready themſelves to invade England; and, to render this the more probable, they actually ſent four galleys to make a deſcent on Cornwall (d). By theſe ſteps they carried their point; for, the Queen and the nation being alarmed, it was by no means held proper to ſend ſo great a number of ſtout ſhips on ſo long a voyage at ſo critical a juncture. At laſt, this ſtorm blowing over, the fleet ſailed from Plymouth on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, in order to execute their grand deſign of burning Nombre de Dios, marching thence by land to Panama, and there ſeizing the treaſure which they knew was arrived from Peru. A few days before their departure, the Queen ſent them advice, that the plate fleet was ſafely arrived in Spain, excepting only one galleon, which, having loſt a maſt, had been obliged to return to Porto Rico. The taking of this veſſel ſhe recommended to them as a thing very practicable, and which could prove no great hindrance to their other affair. When they were at ſea the Generals differed, as is uſual in conjunct expeditions. Sir John Hawkins was for executing immediately what the Queen had commanded, whereas Sir Francis Drake inclined to go firſt to the Canaries, being preſſed thereto by Sir Thomas Baſkerville, in which he prevailed; but the attempt they made was unſucceſsful, and then they ſailed for Dominica, where they ſpent too much time in refreſhing themſelves, and ſetting up their pinnaces. In the mean time the Spaniards had ſent five ſtout frigates to bring away the galleon from Porto Rico, having exact intelligence of the intention of the Engliſh Admirals to attempt that place. On the thirtieth of October Sir John Hawkins weighed from Dominica, and, in the evening of the ſame day, The Francis, a bark of about thirty five tons, and the ſternmoſt of Sir John's ſhips, fell in with the five ſail of Spaniſh frigates before-mentioned, and was taken; the conſequences of which being foreſeen by Sir John, it threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, of which, or rather of a broken heart, he died on the twelfth of November, 1595 (e). At this time they were before Porto Rico, and the very ſame evening Sir John Hawkins died. While the great officers were at ſupper together, a cannon ſhot from the fort pierced the cabin, killed Sir Nicholas Clifford, wounded Captain Stratford, and mortally wounded Mr. Brute Browne, ſtriking the ſtool from under Sir Francis Drake, who was drinking, without doing him any hurt at all. The next day, November 13th, 1595, the General, purſuant to the reſolution of a Council of War, made a deſperate attack on the ſhipping in the harbour of Porto Rico, which was attended with great loſs to the Spaniards, yet with very little advantage to the Engliſh, who meeting with a more reſolute reſiſtance, and much better fortifications, than they expected, were obliged to ſheer off. The Admiral then ſteered for the main, where he took the town of Rio de la Hacha, which he burnt to the ground, a church, and a ſingle houſe belonging to a Lady, only excepted. After this he deſtroyed ſome other villages, and then proceeded to Santa Martha, which he likewiſe burned. The like fate had the famous town of Nombre de Dios, the Spaniards refuſing to carried Don Antonio out with ſtrong hopes of leaving him a King, ſo, when they brought him home, he left all his hopes behind (29). In moſt of our Hiſtories many aſperſions are thrown upon Sir Francis Drake, and Sir William Monſon very impartially profeſſes, that he cannot excuſe his breaking his promiſe to Sir John Norris, though he allows the thing was impracticable. Now, though the breaking a promiſe be a bad thing, one might be tempted to think, that not being able to keep it is a pretty tolerable excuſe. The Queen and her Council underſtood it ſo, for Sir Francis alledged, and it could not be denied, that the very time they ſpent at the Groyne, the Spaniards employed in fortifying Liſbon, which was the reaſon he oppoſed that meaſure (30). He ſhewed, that whatever was done there or elſewhere, for the credit of the nation, was performed ſolely by the fleet and by his orders, in conſequence of which a large fleet, laden with naval ſtores from the Hanſe Towns, was taken, and a great quantity of ammunition and artillery. He farther ſhewed, that, had it not been for the fleet, the army muſt have been ſtarved: and that, if they had ſtayed any longer, neither fleet nor army could have returned home; all which diſtreſſes aroſe from their not going about their principal buſineſs at firſt, which was what he adviſed: but, when he found he could not prevail upon ſome men to manage their own affairs right, he contented himſelf with managing, as well as he could, thoſe that were immediately within his own province, and, with reſpect to theſe, even the cenſurers of this expedition admit, that nobody could have managed them better. Happy for Sir Francis Drake, if, upon his receiving this firſt check at play, he had withdrawn his ſtake.

ranſom any of theſe places, and the booty taken in them being very inconſiderable. On the twenty-ninth of December, Sir Thomas Baskerville marched, with ſeven hundred and fifty men, towards Panama, but returned on the ſecond of January, finding the deſign of reducing that place to be wholly impracticable. This diſappointment made ſuch an impreſſion on the Admiral's mind, that it threw him into a lingering fever, attended with a flux, of which he died on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, about four in the morning; though Sir William Monſon hints, that there were great doubts whether it was barely his ſickneſs that killed him [L]. Such was the end of this great man, when he had lived fifty-five years (f), according to ſome, but according to our computation fifty-one (g); but his memory will ſurvive as long as that world laſts which he firſt ſurrounded. His death was generally lamented by the whole nation, but more eſpecially by his country-men, who had great reaſons to love him from the circumſtances of his private life, as well as to eſteem him in his public character. He was elected Burgeſs for the town of Boſſiney, alias Tintagal, in the county of Cornwall, in the Parliament held the twenty-ſeventh of Queen Elizabeth, and for the town of Plymouth in Devonſhire, in the thirty-fifth of the ſame reign (h). It is indeed true, that he died without iſſue, but not that he lived and died a Bachelor, as ſeveral authors have written (i); for he left behind him a widow, Elizabeth (k), daughter and ſole heireſs of Sir George Sydenham, of Combe-Sydenham, in the county of Devon, Knight, who afterwards married William Courteney, Eſq. of Powderham-Caſtle in the ſame county. It was not the cuſtom of thoſe times to [L] Whether it was barely his ſickneſs that killed him.] In the text we have ſtated the facts according to the lights given us, and from the authorities of the beſt writers in thoſe times. We will in this note endeavour to clear up ſome paſſages that might otherwiſe ſeem obſcure, and by doing this we ſhall, in ſome meaſure, enable the reader to form a juſt notion as to his death. Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins were, without doubt, two of the moſt experienced officers, that thoſe ſtirring times, and that glorious reign, had bred. Each of them had his reaſons for undertaking that expedition, and both of them acted from motives of honour. They knew well the ſituation of the countries which were to be the ſcene of their actions, and the plan they laid was equally worthy of the great experience they had, and the high reputation raiſed thereby. In few words, their aim was to plunder and deſtroy Nombre de Dios, to force a paſſage through the Iſthmus, and then to make themſelves maſters of Panama; which done, they were to act as circumſtances ſhould direct (31). The preparations made for their voyage, chiefly at the expence of the General, were ſuch as could not be concealed. The Spaniards, being apprized of theſe, alarmed England, and thereby gained time to ſend advice into America. When, after many months delay, the Queen allowed them to proceed, ſhe charged him with another project, which was attacking Porto Rico, where, according to her information (and it was true), the whole cargo of a rich galleon was depoſited (32). When they were at ſea, Sir Thomas Baſkerville ſtarted a third project, which was reducing one of the Canary Iſlands, to which Sir Francis Drake aſſented, as believing, that, whatever became of their expedition, the conqueſt of that iſland would be of very great importance to the nation (33). Their miſcarriage in that was many ways detrimental, but chiefly through this which they did not foreſee, that it gave time for the Court of Spain to ſend five frigates, with nine hundred regular troops on board to St. John de Porto Rico. Of this they had no ſuſpicion, and therefore they ſpent more time than they needed to have done before they went thither, and, the bark Francis being taken in their paſſage, Sir John Hawkins truly foreſaw what afterwards happened, that the Spaniards, by the help of the reinforcement that ſquadron carried, would be too ſtrong for them. The ſad accident of his death, and of two principal Commanders deſperately wounded the ſame evening, damped the ſpirits of the ſoldiers and ſeamen exceedingly. General Drake himſelf, when he took his leave of Mr. Brown in order to go to the attack, could not help ſaying, Brute, Brute, (that was his Chriſtian name) how heartily could I lament thy fate, but that I dare not let my ſpirits ſink now (34). The ſeveral enterprizes that followed, were to gratify other mens projects; but at laſt Sir Francis Drake returned to his firſt deſign, and made an attempt upon the Iſthmus; but the Spaniards were too well provided, ſo that he plainly ſaw things went not with him as in former days. The whole of this expedition was a ſeries of misfortunes, in which Providence made uſe of their own counſels to deſtroy them. If they had gone at firſt to Porto Rico, they had done the Queen's buſineſs and their own. If, when they had intelligence of the Spaniſh ſuccours being landed there, they had proceeded directly to the Iſthmus, in order to have executed their deſigns againſt Panama, before their forces had been weakened by that deſperate attack, they might poſſibly have accompliſhed their firſt intention; but graſping too many things ſpoiled all. A very ſtrong ſenſe of this threw Sir Francis Drake into a melancholy, which occaſioned a bloody flux, the natural diſeaſe of the country, that brought him to his end (35). His body, according to the cuſtom of the ſea, was ſunk very near the place where he firſt laid the foundation of his fame and fortune. This appears to be a plain and probable relation of the end of this great man. If the reader has a mind to ſee it ſet in a ſtronger light, Mr. Fuller ſhall afford him that ſatisfaction, which will be heightened by knowing that he wrote from the mouth of Henry Drake, Eſq. who accompanied his couſin in that unfortunate expedition (36).

> 'Now began the diſcontent of Sir Francis to feed upon him. He conceived that expectation, a mercileſs uſurer, computing each day ſince his departure, exacted an intereſt and return of honour and profit proportionable to his great preparations, and tranſcending his former atchievements. He ſaw that all the good which he had done in this voyage conſiſted in the evil he had done to the Spaniards afar off, whereof he could preſent but ſmall viſible fruits in England. Theſe apprehenſions accompanying, if not cauſing, the diſeaſe of the flux, wrought his ſudden death; and ſickneſs did not ſo much untie his clothes as ſorrow did rend at once the robe of his mortality aſunder. He lived by the ſea, died on it, and was buried in it. Thus an extempore performance, ſcarce heard to be begun before we hear it is ended, comes off with better applauſe, or miſcarries with leſs diſgrace, than a long ſtudied and openly premeditated action. Beſides, we ſee how great ſpirits having mounted up to the higheſt pitch of performance, afterwards ſtrain and break their credits in ſtriving to go beyond it. Laſtly, God oftentimes leaves the brighteſt men in an eclipſe, to ſhew, that they do but borrow their luſtre from his reflection. We will not juſtify all the actions of any man, though of a tamer profeſſion than a ſea Captain, in whom civility is often counted preciſeneſs. For the main, we ſay, that this our Captain was a religious man towards God, and his houſes, generally ſpeaking, churches, where he came chaſte in his life, juſt in his dealings, true of his word, and merciful to thoſe that were under him, hating nothing ſo much as idleneſs.'

(31) It was upon this plan they formed the offer they made to the Queen, and, no doubt, had good intelligence.

ſet up cenotaphs, at leaſt for private perſons, otherwiſe one might have expected ſome monument ſhould have been erected to the memory of Sir Francis Drake. Indeed it was needleſs: for, his picture was common, not only here, but in all parts of Europe, inſomuch that a diſturbance was occaſioned at Rome by the imprudence of a famous Painter, who cauſed the head (l) of Sir Francis Drake to be hung up, in a public place, next to that of his Catholic Majeſty. Hitherto we have ſpoken of his public actions: let us now, as we have ample and excellent materials, diſcourſe ſomewhat of his perſon and character. He was low of ſtature, but well ſet, had a broad open cheſt, a very round head, his hair of a fine brown, his beard full and comely, his eyes large and clear, of a fair complexion, with a freſh, chearful, and very engaging countenance (m). As Navigation had been his whole ſtudy, ſo he underſtood it thoroughly, and was a perfect maſter in every branch, eſpecially in Aſtronomy, and in the application thereof to the Nautic Art. As all men have enemies, and all eminent men abundance of them, we need not wonder that Sir Francis Drake, who performed ſo many great things, ſhould have as much ill ſpoken of him as of any man of the age in which he lived. Thoſe who diſliked him alledged, that he was a man of low birth, haughty in his temper, oſtentatious, ſelf-ſufficient, an immoderate ſpeaker, and, though indiſputably a good Seaman, no great General; in proof of which they took notice of his neglecting to furniſh his fleet thoroughly in 1585; his not keeping either St. Domingo or Carthagena, after he had taken them; the ſlender proviſion he made in his expedition to Portugal; his breaking his word to Sir John Norris, and the errors he committed in his laſt undertaking (n). In excuſe of theſe it is ſaid, that the glory of what he did might very well remove the imputation of his mean deſcent; what was thought haughtineſs in him might be no more than a juſt concern for the ſupport of his authority: his diſplay of his great ſervices, a thing incident to his profeſſion; and his love of ſpeaking qualified by his wiſdom and eloquence, which hindered him from ever dropping a weak or an ungraceful expreſſion. In equipping his fleet, he was not ſo much in fault as thoſe whom he truſted: ſickneſs hindered his keeping the places he took in the Weſt-Indies; his counſels were continually croſſed by the land-officers in his voyage to Portugal; and, as to his laſt attempt, the Spaniards were certainly well acquainted with his deſign, at leaſt as ſoon as he left England, if not before. His voyage round the world, however, remains an inconteſtible proof of his courage, capacity, patience, quick-ſightedneſs, and public ſpirit; ſince therein he did every thing that could be expected from a man who preferred the honour and profit of his country to his own reputation or private gain (o) [M]. It was the felicity of our Admiral to live under the reign

[M] To his own reputation or private gain.] The materials that I have collected from ſeveral writers in that age, and which are to be digeſted into this note, will, I hope, ſufficiently juſtify what is advanced in the text, and ſhew, that if Sir Francis Drake amaſſed a large fortune to himſelf, by continually expoſing himſelf to labours and perils which hardly any other man would have undergone, for the ſake even of the greateſt expectations, he was far from being governed by a narrow and private ſpirit. On the contrary, his notions were free and noble, and the nation ſtands indebted to his memory for advantages infinitely greater than are commonly imagined.

I. He was the great author of our navigation to the Weſt-Indies; for, though he was not the firſt that went thither, yet, after the ſevere check that Sir John Hawkins met with when Drake commanded the Judith, our ſeamen were much diſcouraged, and, in all probability, would ſcarcely have adventured upon any expeditions of that ſort in haſte, if he had not encouraged them by his two proſperous voyages. In theſe he acted with extraordinary caution, and was remarkably careful of the health and ſafety of his ſeamen, that he might beget in them not only a confidence in himſelf, but a thorough contempt of thoſe vulgar fears, which repreſented voyages into that part of the world as ſo difficult and dangerous in many reſpects, beſides that of falling into the hands of the Spaniards (37). In this he ſucceeded ſo well, that, in the ſpace of a very few years, many ſmall veſſels, moſt of them commanded by perſons bred under him, followed that courſe, and, partly by trading, partly by privateering, brought great wealth into the nation, and accuſtomed the Engliſh mariners to traverſe ſeas and viſit ports, to which, but for his vigilance and good fortune, they had remained much longer ſtrangers (38). On this account, therefore, he may be conſidered, very juſtly, as the author of all our ſucceſs in thoſe parts: for, though ſeveral famous ſeamen engaged afterwards in expeditions of the like nature, and began to think of making ſettlements alſo in thoſe remote parts, yet it was but in conſequence of the lights he gave them, and from that ſpirit of emulation which was raiſed by the extenſive reputation he had acquired.

II. He was alſo the firſt that ſhewed his own nation, what, till then, no other nation had ever attempted, that it was practicable with a very ſmall force to act againſt the Spaniards, both by ſea and land, as this nation have acknowledged, and attribute to him all the troubles they afterwards met with from the French and Dutch, as well as from the Engliſh (39). In his expedition of 1572, he had but two ſhips, if they might be ſo called, one of ſeventy tons, commanded by himſelf, the other of twenty-five tons, commanded by his brother John, and his whole force conſiſted but of ſeventy-three men and boys. Yet after he was diſcovered, and known to be upon the coaſt, and to have committed hoſtilities, he had the courage to reſolve upon remaining there, and to do his buſineſs with pinnaces, finding his ſhips too large, and therefore intending to deſtroy one, and convert the other into a ſtore-ſhip: but knowing that his ſeamen would never conſent to this, tho' the ſhips were his own and the beſt part of his eſtate, he prevailed upon the carpenter of the leſſer to bore holes in the bottom of her in the night, without ſo much as communicating the deſign to his own brother who commanded her. This happy temerity was followed by as much ſucceſs as he could wiſh, ſince he kept the Bay of Mexico for many months in a manner blocked up, and his fertility in inventing expedients to anſwer all purpoſes, and to provide againſt all dangers, excited that amazing ſpirit amongſt the ſeamen of his time, that is ſcarcely credible in ours (40); a ſpirit that rendered them ſo famous, as to occaſion their being ſought after and employed by all nations, but more eſpecially the French and Dutch; as might be ſhewn from numerous inſtances.

III. His genius was far from being confined to ſmall undertakings, though neceſſity compelled its firſt appearance in ſuch: for, when he undertook his voyage round reign of a Princeſs who never failed to diſtinguiſh merit, or to beſtow her favours where ſhe ſaw deſert. Sir Francis Drake was always her favourite, and ſhe gave a very lucky proof of it in reſpect to a quarrel he had with his countryman Sir Bernard Drake, whoſe arms Sir Francis had aſſumed, which ſo provoked the other, who was a ſeaman likewiſe, that he gave him a box on the ear. The Queen took up the quarrel, and gave Sir Francis a new coat, which is thus blazoned: Sable a feſs wavy between two pole-ſtars argent, and, for his creſt, a ſhip on a globe under ruff, held by a cable, with a hand out of the clouds, over it this motto, Auxilio divino, underneath, Sic parvis magna, in the rigging whereof is hung up by the heels a wivern, gules, which was the arms of Sir Bernard Drake (p). Her Majeſty's kindneſs, however, did not extend beyond the grave; for, ſhe ſuffered his brother Thomas Drake, whom he made his heir, to be proſecuted for a pretended debt to the Crown, which much diminiſhed the advantages he would otherwiſe have reaped from his brother's ſucceſſion (q). This brother of his accompanied him in his laſt expedition, as his brother John and his brother Joſeph had done in his firſt voyages to the Weſt-Indies, where they both died; and both Thomas and John left children behind them, whereas Sir Francis, and nine of his other brethren, died without (r). As for the land eſtate which he had purchaſed, and which was very conſiderable (for, though, on proper occaſions, he was extremely generous, yet he was alſo a great œconomiſt), it came to his nephew and godſon Francis Drake, ſon to his brother Thomas (s), who, by letters patent, dated Auguſt 2d, 1622, in the twentieth year of the reign of King James the Firſt, was created a Baronet (t), and, in the beginning of the next reign, was returned one of the Knights of the Shire for the county of Devon (u). He was twice married, firſt to Jane, daughter of Sir Amias Bampfylde, of Poltimore, in the ſame county, Knight, by whom he had a daughter that died an infant; and, ſecondly, to Joan, daughter of Sir William Strode, of Newman, Knight, by whom he had four ſons (w). The eldeſt, Sir Francis Drake, Baronet, married Dorothy, the daughter of Mr. Pyn, but dying without iſſue, the title devolved upon his nephew by his ſecond brother Thomas, who became thereby Sir Francis Drake, Baronet, who frequently repreſented the town of Taviſtock in Parliament (x). He was thrice married, but had no iſſue, but by his laſt wife, who was the daughter of Sir Henry Pollexfen, Knight, Lord Chief-Juſtice of the Common Pleas, his ſon and ſucceſſor by her was Sir Francis-Henry Drake, Baronet, who died January 26th, 1740, leaving iſſue by his wife, the ſiſter of Sir William Heathcote, Baronet, three ſons and two daughters (y). The eldeſt of theſe, Sir Francis Henry Drake, Baronet, was, in 1750, the repreſentative of this family, and member of Parliament for Beeralſton, in the county of Devon, and had in his poſſeſſion a Bible, with an inſcription indented on the edges, ſignifying, that it made the tour of the world round the world, he not only framed the ſcheme in his own head, but kept it entirely within his own breaſt, bringing it out only by parts, as the execution required, and propoſing nothing to be effected till he had made the neceſſary proviſions for effecting it, tho' without any communication, by which he drew his people firſt into the South-Seas, thence to the Eaſt-Indies, and home by a route new to him and them, which he had never accompliſhed if his intentions had been foreſeen from the beginning (41). In 1585, he executed a great undertaking with a conſiderable force, having, under him, Captain Frobiſher, and other able ſeamen, with like conduct and courage, and with dreadful deſtruction to the enemy; ſo that there is very little reaſon to regret Sir Philip Sidney's not going that voyage with him; nor will any wiſe man believe implicitly, on the credit of Sir Fulk Grevil, that Sir Francis Drake was leſs capable of performing any ſervice in America than that excellent perſon (42), or that he left him behind from a jealouſy of his ſuperior abilities.

(41) This Sir Wm. Monſon fairly acknowledges, though no great admirer of Sir Francis Drake.

IV. We are aſſured by Camden (43) and other writers, that Sir Francis Drake firſt brought tobacco into England, whence a certain writer moſt unaccountably took it in his head to conclude his life of Sir Francis Drake with a violent invective againſt that plant, and an outrageous abuſe upon all who take it (44). But men of milder tempers and clearer judgements will acknowledge, that Sir Francis was in this a very great benefactor to his country, ſince it will not be eaſy to name any one commodity, through which ſuch vaſt advantages have accrued to this nation. It is true, that Sir Walter Ralegh is commonly entitled to this honour, but then it is grounded upon his bringing it into uſe by his own practice and example. Yet, in both of theſe truly great men, the good done to their country was but accidental; for, we cannot ſuppoſe that either of them could foreſee what prodigious wealth the cultivation of tobacco would bring into Great Britain; and yet this ought not to leſſen, in the leaſt, our gratitude or veneration towards their memories.

V. The laſt thing I have to ſay, and I ſay it upon the credit of Mr. Camden, is, that he was the author of our trade to the Eaſt-Indies; for, as that learned writer informs us, the books, papers, and charts, that were found in the Eaſt-India ſhip, which he took in his return from his expedition to the coaſts of Spain in 1587, gave thoſe lights which encouraged the undertaking a trade to thoſe parts, and produced an application to the Queen, for eſtabliſhing our firſt Eaſt-India Company (45). Theſe are facts that are certainly worth the knowing, remembering, and conſidering, that we may do proper juſtice to the character of this illuſtrious perſon, who, as from low and mean beginnings, he raiſed himſelf to move in a ſuperior orb; ſo, by his example, he encouraged and raiſed thoſe Engliſh fleets that have ſince given law in the ſeas, which he viſited with barks ſo ſmall, that they would now be ſcarcely thought capable of ſuch a voyage. Let us conclude with a circumſtance, which, though not of ſo public, is yet, not altogether of a private nature, and deſerves to be remembered to the honour of this worthy perſon, and of Sir John Hawkins, who, in 1588, adviſed the eſtabliſhment of the cheſt at Chatham, for the relief of ſeamen wounded in their country's ſervice (46). They were, indeed, both remarkable for bearing in mind that they had been (47) once ſeamen themſelves as long as they lived; and, though they were very ſtrict in maintaining diſcipline, yet they were ſo well obeyed from a principle of affection, that inſtances of ſeverity were things to which they were very ſeldom conſtrained.

world with Sir Francis Drake (z). There are many other relicks preſerved in the cabinets of the curious, in memory of this famous perſon; ſuch as the ſtaff made out of his ſhip before it was broken up, in that of Mr. Thoreſby at Leeds (a); and there is hardly any collection of Engliſh money, in which there are not pieces of Queen Elizabeth's coin, ſuppoſed to be marked with a Drake, in honour of Sir Francis's voyage round the world, in the twenty-ſecond year of her reign. I ſay, ſuppoſed, becauſe ſome curious perſons ſuggeſt, that this bird upon her coin is not a Drake but a Dove, and conſider this tradition as a vulgar error (b). It may be ſo indeed, for any thing we know with certainty; as, on the other hand, it may not be ſo, for any thing that has been ſaid to the contrary. Two things, however, are certain; one, that there are a variety of marks upon the coin of that Queen, and the other, that they were ſometimes placed in commemoration of remarkable events; as, for inſtance, the Belgic Lion very fairly impreſſed upon the Queen's breaſt, at the time when ſhe took the United Provinces under her royal protection (c). It is, therefore, far from being impoſſible, and perhaps it is not carrying the thing too far, to ſay, that it is not altogether improbable, there may be ſome truth in this vulgar notion; for, that nothing of this is recorded, in the hiſtories of this reign, is no conſiderable objection, ſince we are ſatisfied, that many things of a like nature, the truth of which cannot be diſputed, were nevertheleſs omitted, partly from the abundance of more weighty materials, and partly from the want of attention in our Hiſtorians to things of this nature, which would have left us in the dark as to many curious particulars, if their negligence had not excited a ſtrong ſpirit of enquiry in the learned lovers of Engliſh Hiſtory, who have lived in ſucceeding times, and whoſe induſtry has been repaid by a variety of uſeful as well as entertaining diſcoveries.

heſitation, that our great navigator was the ſon of a clergyman. In this the doctor implicitly followed Camden; but our ingenious predeceſſor, who had taken uncommon pains upon the ſubject, was probably well founded in his opinion, that Drake's father was only an honeſt ſailor. Concerning young Drake's early diligence and fidelity, by which he ſo far obtained the favour of his maſter as to be left heir to his little veſſel, Dr Johnſon remarks, that it is "a "circumſtance that deſerves to be remembered, not "only as it may illuſtrate the private character of this "brave man, but as it may hint, to all thoſe who may "hereafter propoſe his conduct for their imitation, "that virtue is the ſureſt foundation both of reputation "and fortune, and that the firſt ſtep to greatneſs is "to be honeſt. If it were not," proceeds the doctor, "improper to dwell longer on an incident at the firſt "view ſo inconſiderable, it might be added, that it "deſerves the reflection of thoſe, who, when they are "engaged in affairs not adequate to their abilities, "paſs them over with a contemptuous neglect, and, "while they amuſe themſelves with chimerical "ſchemes and plans of future undertakings, ſuffer "every opportunity of private advantage to ſlip away "as unworthy their regard. They may learn, from "the example of Drake, that diligence in employments of leſs conſequence is the moſt ſucceſsful introduction to greater enterprizes (48)."

(43) Miſcellaneous and Fugitive Pieces. Vol. I. p. 160.

In one of Drake's adventures, during the expedition of 1572, he was the firſt perſon that leaped upon the ſhore; concerning which event Dr. Johnſon has made the following ingenious and judicious reflections. "To leap upon the enemy's coaſt in ſight "of a ſuperior force, only to ſhow how little they "were feared, was an act that would in theſe times "meet with little applauſe; nor can the general be "ſeriouſly commended, or rationally vindicated, who "expoſes his perſon to deſtruction, and, by conſequence his expedition to miſcarriage, only for the "pleaſure of an idle inſult, an inſignificant bravado. "All that can be urged in his defence is, that perhaps "it might contribute to heighten the eſteem of his "followers, as few men, eſpecially of that claſs, "are philoſophical enough to ſtate the exact limits of "prudence and bravery, or not to be dazzled with "an intrepidity, how improperly ſoever exerted. It "may be added, that perhaps the Spaniards, whoſe "notions of courage are ſufficiently romantic, might "look upon him as a more formidable enemy, and "yield more eaſily to a hero of whoſe fortitude they "had ſo high an idea (49)."

(49) Ibid. p. 173.

We are tempted to inſert Dr. Johnſon's remarks concerning ſome ſavage tribes, diſcovered by Drake, who were quite naked, but who ornamented themſelves with paint of ſeveral kinds, delineating generally the figures of the Sun and Moon, in honour of their Deities. "It is obſervable," ſays the doctor, "that moſt nations, amongſt whom the uſe of cloathes "is unknown, paint their bodies. Such was the "practice of the firſt inhabitants of our own country. "From this cuſtom did our earlieſt enemies, the "Picts, owe their denomination. As it is not probable that caprice and fancy ſhould be uniform, "there muſt be, doubtleſs, ſome reaſon for a practice "ſo general and prevailing in diſtant parts of the "world, which have no communication with each "other. The original end of painting their bodies "was, probably, to exclude the cold; an end which, "if we believe ſome relations, is ſo effectually produced by it, that the men thus painted never ſhiver "at the moſt piercing blaſts. But doubtleſs any people ſo hardened by continual ſeverities would, even "without paint, be leſs ſenſible of the cold than "the civilized inhabitants of the ſame climate. "However, this practice may contribute, in ſome "degree, to defend them from the injuries of winter, and, in thoſe climates where little evaporates by "the pores, may be uſed with no great inconvenience; but in hot countries, where perſpiration in "greater degree is neceſſary, the natives only uſe "unction to preſerve them from the other extreme of "weather. So well do either reaſon or experience "ſupply the place of ſcience in ſavage countries (50)."

(50) Ibid. p. 201. 202.

Dr. Johnſon is unwilling to believe that the ill ſucceſs of Sir Francis Drake's laſt voyage haſtened his death "Upon what," ſays he, "this conjecture "is grounded, does not appear, and we may be "allowed to hope, for the honour of ſo great a man, "that it is without foundation, and that he, whom no "ſeries of ſucceſs could ever betray to vanity or "negligence, could have ſupported a change of "fortune without impatience or dejection (51)."

(51) Ibid. p. 234.

Notwithſtanding the apparent juſtice, as well as candour, of this remark, we are afraid that it is not well founded. From the circumſtances, related in note [L], there is too much reaſon to apprehend that the chagrin of Drake's mind contributed to the acceleration of his deceaſe (52).

There are many prints of Sir Francis Drake, but the moſt authentic one is that which is given in the firſt edition of Harris's Voyages. It was engraved from an original picture in the poſſeſſion of Sir Philip Sydenham, Bart. repreſentative in Parliament for the County of Somerſet. It deſcended to Sir Philip from his anceſtor, Sir George Sydenham, whoſe only daughter Sir Francis Drake married.] K.

DRAKE (JAMES), a noted political writer and phyſician in the end of the XVIIth and beginning of the XVIIIth century, was born at Cambridge in the year 1667, and, by the care of an indulgent father, had a very liberal education. In 1684, he was admitted into the univerſity wherein he was born; and ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf not only in his college, but alſo in public, by his quickneſs and ingenuity. Some time before the Revolution, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, after having performed his exerciſes with very great applauſe; and in proceſs of time he commenced Maſter, with unuſual honours paid him by men of the brighteſt parts in the univerſity. He took a turn to London in the year 1693, where being ſoon made known, he was very much admired at all places frequented by ingenious men; and, having a particular genius to the ſtudy of Phyſic, was encouraged in the purſuit of it by Sir Thomas Millington, and the moſt eminent members of the College of Phyſicians. In 1696 he took the degree of Doctor in that Faculty (a), and was ſoon after Fellow of the Royal Society, as likewiſe of the College of Phyſicians. But, whether through his own inclination, or that the narrowneſs of his fortune ſtreightened him ſo as not to let him appear in a proper equipage, he had been in London but a ſhort time before the Bookſellers laid hold of him: in whoſe ſervice being liſted as an author, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee whatever he did paſs off very currently, and to meet with a favourable acceptance from the public. In 1697, he contributed very much to the publication of a pamphlet, entitled, "Commendatory "Verſes upon the Author of Prince Arthur, and King Arthur;" which was very well received. But the next book he publiſhed did not meet with the ſame favourable reception: I mean, "The Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament, begun at Weſtminſter the 10th day of "February, in the 12th year of King William, A. D. 1700." Lond. 1702, 8vo. For, the Houſe of Lords thinking it reflected too ſeverely on the memory of the late King William, they convened the author before them in May 1702 [A], and ordered him to be proſecuted by the Attorney-General, who brought him to a trial, in which he was acquitted the year following (b). In 1704, being diſguſted at his diſappointment of being made one of the Commiſſioners of the ſick and wounded as was promiſed him, and diſſatisfied at the rejecting of the Bill to prevent Occaſional Conformity, and the diſgrace of ſome of his friends who were ſticklers for it, he wrote in concert with Mr. Poley, Member of Parliament for Ipſwich, 'The Memorial of the Church of England: 'humbly offered to the Conſideration of all true Lovers of our Church and Conſtitution'. Lond. 1704, 8vo. The Lord-Treaſurer Godolphin, and other great officers of the Crown in the Whig intereſt, therein ſeverely reflected upon, were ſo highly offended at the publication of it, that they repreſented it to Queen Anne as an inſult upon her Majeſty's honour, and an intimation that the Church was in danger under her adminiſtration.

(a) The Memorial of the Church of England, &c. To which is added an Introductory Preface, wherein is contained the life and death of the Author. Edit. 1711 8vo. The learned Dr. W. Richardſon could not find, in the Univerſity Regiſters, ſuch a perſon as W. Drake, M. D. of Cambridge.

[A] They convened the author before them in May 1702,] The paſſage that gave offence, was in the preface, and ran thus.—'And, perhaps, there was a 'third thing in proſpect, of deeper reach than all 'theſe, which was, That ſhould it have pleaſed God, 'for our ſins, to have ſnatched from us the king on 'the ſudden, by chance of war, or other fatal accident, 'during the tumult of arms abroad, and the civil diſ-'orders they had raiſed amongſt us at home, and a 'numerous, corrupt, licentious party throughout the 'nation, from which the Houſe of Commons was 'ſometimes not free; they might entertain hopes, 'from the advantage of being at the helm, and the 'aſſiſtance of their rabble, to have put in practice 'their own ſchemes, and, "To have given us a new "model of government of their own projection," 'and ſo to have procured to themſelves a laſting 'impunity, and to have mounted their own beaſt, 'the rabble, and driven the ſober part of the nation, 'like cattle before them. That this is no conjecture 'will readily appear to any conſidering perſons, from 'the "Treatment her Royal Highneſs the Princeſs "of Denmark, the Heireſs apparent to the Crown, "met with all along from them, and all their party." 'They were not contented to ſhew her a conſtant ne-'glect and ſlight themſelves, but their whole party 'were inſtructed not only to treat her with diſreſpect, 'but ſpight: They were buſy to traduce her with 'falſe and ſcandalous aſperſions; and ſo far they car-'ried the affront, as to make her at one time almoſt "the common ſubject of the tittle-tattle of almoſt "every coffee-houſe and drawing-room," 'which 'they promoted with as much zeal, application, and 'venom, as if a bill of excluſion had then been on 'the anvil, and theſe were the introductory ceremo-'nies.'

This paſſage being complained of, and read, in the Upper Houſe, the Lords ordered the bookſellers, for whom that book was printed, to attend their houſe on the Saturday following. But before that day came, Dr. Drake having owned himſelf to be the author of the book in queſtion, he was on the 9th of May examined by the Lord-Keeper; who aſked him, 'What 'he had to ſay concerning the ſaid book?' And the book and the paragraph being ſhewed him, 'He 'owned he wrote the book, and that paragraph in 'particular; and thought he had juſt reaſon to write 'it, he having heard her Highneſs talked of diſre-'ſpectfully in almoſt every coffee-houſe.' Then he withdrew, and, after ſome debate, was called in again; and the Lord-Keeper told him, 'The houſe 'was not ſatisfied with what he had ſaid, but thought 'he trifled; and required him to acquaint the Houſe 'with the grounds of his writing that paragraph.' He anſwered, 'He found it mentioned in divers 'anonymous pamphlets publiſhed at that time, and 'hoped, it was no hurt to anſwer thoſe pamphlets, 'and deſired time to recollect what thoſe pamphlets 'were;' and then withdrew. After ſome time he was called in again, and aſked, 'If he could charge 'any perſon or perſons, in the kingdom, with the 'matters aſſerted by him in that paragraph? and, 'Whether he had heard any other perſon ſay, that 'they could charge any perſon whatſoever with the 'matters contained in that paragraph?' To theſe queſtions he anſwered, 'That he did not know of any 'ſuch perſon.' Being further aſked, 'If he had any 'other grounds beſides the pamphlets? And what theſe 'pamphlets were?' He ſaid, he had no other grounds beſides theſe ſeveral pamphlets following, the two Legion Letters; the Black Liſt; the Jura Populi Anglicani; and Toland's Reaſons for inviting over the Princeſs of Hanover. Laſtly, being aſked, 'If 'in any of theſe pamphlets there was any thing ſaid 'about "Setting aſide the preſent Queen?" he anſwered, 'He did not remember there was.' Then he being tration [B]. Accordingly, her Majeſty took notice of it in her ſpeech to the enſuing Parliament, October 27, 1705 (c) [C], and was addreſſed by both Houſes [D] upon that occaſion (d). Moreover, the 6th of December was appointed, by the Houſe of Lords, to enquire into the danger of the Church: when, after a long debate, it was voted, That the Church was not in danger (e). The 14th of that month, the Commons concurred in the ſame reſolution: in conſequence of which, they beſought her Majeſty to puniſh the authors and ſpreaders of the 'ſeditious and ſcandalous report' abovementioned. Soon after, the Queen put out a Proclamation for diſcovering the author of the Memorial (f). Whereupon, the Printer being taken into cuſtody, and examined before one of the Secretaries of State, pretended to make a diſcovery; but could do nothing more than fix it upon three of the members of the Houſe of Commons, namely, Mr. Poley, Mr. Ward, and Sir Humphrey Macworth; and related, that a woman in a maſk, with another barefaced, brought him the manuſcript, and made a bargain with him to have two hundred and fifty printed copies; which he delivered to four porters, ſent to him by the perſons concerned. But though the woman that came to the Printer without a maſk, and ſome of the porters, were found out, yet it was impoſſible to fix it with certainty upon any of the three Gentlemen abovementioned, or upon any other perſon; being withdrawn, the Lords took the aforeſaid paragraph into conſideration, and reſolved and declared, 'That in the preface of a book intituled, "The Hiſ-"tory of the laſt Parliament, &c." 'written by Dr. 'Drake, as he owned at the bar, there were ſeveral 'groundleſs, falſe, and ſcandalous expreſſions, tend-'ing to create jealouſies in her Majeſty of her people, 'and to cauſe great miſunderſtandings, fears, and 'diſputes amongſt the Queen's ſubjects, and to diſturb 'the peace and quiet of the kingdom (1).'

[B] And an intimation that the Church was in danger under her adminiſtration.] The deſign of that book was not ſo much to ſhew the danger of the Church under The government of the Queen, as under the then adminiſtration; namely, that of the Lord-Treaſurer Godolphin, the Duke of Marlborough, and all thoſe who countenanced the whig or diſſenting intereſt, and had been the occaſion of the miſcarrying of the bill againſt Occaſional Conformity. And the publication of it, at that time was, with a view of influencing the election of the new parliament. Such was the real intention of that book. But, as moſt Miniſters of State are apt to repreſent affronts againſt themſelves as inſults upon their Maſters, or even as down-right treaſon, it was ſo in the preſent caſe. That the reader may beſt judge of the drift of that book, we ſhall give here the beginning of it; with a few extracts from the ſame. It begins in theſe words. 'Thoſe that look no deeper than the ſurface 'of things are apt to conclude, without heſitation, 'that the Church of England is in a very flouriſhing 'condition; its dignities and preferments make a very 'goodly ſhow, and the patronage of the Queen ſeems 'to promiſe a continuance of proſperity. But, for 'all this fine complexion and fair weather, there is a 'Hectic Fever lurking in the very bowels of it; 'which, if not timely cured, will infect all the hu-'mours, and at length deſtroy the very being of it. 'The nation has a long time abounded with Sectaries, 'who, in the preceding century, violently overturned 'both Church and State.——The ſons of thoſe men 'yet remain, and inherit many of them the princi-'ples of their fathers; it would therefore be no very 'uncharitable ſuppoſition, without any other argu-'ment, to imagine them heirs of their deſigns like-'wiſe.—If, ſince the Church recovered its ancient 'luſtre and authority, they have been more ſilent, 'and, in appearance, more moderate, it is not that 'they are better tempered or affected, but that, ſub-'mitting to the neceſſity of the times, they have diſ-'ſembled their intentions better; yet ſome overt-'attempts here, and the whole courſe of their pro-'ceedings in Scotland during the two laſt reigns, ſuf-'ficiently ſhew us what treatment we might expect, if 'they had the power.—The hiſtory of their carriage 'towards the church is public and recent, as likewiſe 'are the advances that have been made in their fa-'vour, and the repulſes which the Church has met 'with. Every thing has paſt in Scotland to the de-'ſire of the Preſbytery, even to the endangering of 'the Church and Monarchy of England, and the diſ-'heriſon of its Conſtitution, and the immediate pre-'judice of its Sovereignty; but, on the contrary, 'nothing for the ſecurity of the Church here.—All 'attempts to ſettle it on a perpetual foundation have 'been oppoſed, and rendered ineffectual.'—Then he ſhews, what danger the Church hath been brought into, by putting its beſt friends out of their places, viz. the Duke of Buckingham, the Earls of Rocheſter, Nottingham, Jerſey, and Winchelſea; Sir Edward Seymour; the Lords Granville, Guilford, Gower; Earl of Dorſet, Sir George Rook, and other great patrons and aſſerters of the intereſt of the Church at Court; who were turned out, without the leaſt pretence or colour of offence (2).—Next he proves, what want of moderation there is in all Sects whatſoever, though they reproach the Church of England for having none; and, conſequently, how little favour ſhe muſt expect from them, if they ſhould be uppermoſt. 'The Independents and Preſbyterians formerly 'in England and Ireland; the Kirk of Scotland, here-'tofore and at preſent; the Anabaptiſts at Munſter; 'the Lutherans in divers parts of Germany, Sweden, 'Denmark, &c. the Calviniſts in Holland, and at 'Geneva; and the Roman Catholics, at ſeveral times, 'almoſt all the world over, have in their reſpective 'turns experimentally demonſtrated by their practice, 'that they will not endure a rival Church in their do-'minions; and ſome of them——not even tolerate 'it (3).' In another place, he gives this excellent character of the Church of England. 'Our Church 'is not ſo rigid, or ſo capricious, as to require an 'abſolute uniformity of ſentiments among her ſons in 'matters of doubt or ſpeculation, which are not eſſen-'tial to the true faith, nor neceſſary to the mainte-'nance of order and good diſcipline. She does not 'require "implicit Faith," nor command her ſons 'to believe as the Church believes, whether they 'comprehend her meaning or not, or can be con-'vinced in their underſtandings that thoſe things are 'true, which ſhe delivers as ſuch. She could wiſh, 'indeed, that all her ſons had as ſound and clear un-'derſtandings to embrace all uſeful truths as ſtrong 'conſtitutions to digeſt all wholſome food: but, like 'a tender indulgent mother, ſhe does not reject thoſe 'weak ones, who, through infirmity, cannot receive 'all that is good and conducive, if they admit all 'that is eſſential to the Chriſtian Faith, and neceſ-'ſary to Chriſtian Communion (4).'

perſon (g); ſo that Dr. Drake, the true author of the Memorial remained undiſcovered. It was not the Parliament only that ſhewed their reſentment againſt that book; for, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, the Grand Jury of the city of London having preſented it, at the ſeſſions, as a falſe, ſcandalous, and traiterous libel, it was forthwith burnt in the ſight of the Court then ſitting: and, the Tueſday following, before the Royal Exchange, by the hands of the common hangman (b). But though Dr. Drake then eſcaped, yet as he was very much ſuſpected of being the author of that book, and had rendered himſelf obnoxious, upon other accounts, to ſome perſons then in power, occaſions were ſought for endeavouring to ruin him if poſſible. A news-paper he was publiſhing at that time, under the title of Mercurius Politicus, afforded his enemies the pretence they wanted. For, they, taking exception at ſome paſſages therein, proſecuted him in the Queen's-Bench, in the beginning of the year 1706. His caſe was argued at the bar of that Court on the 30th of April; when, upon a flaw in the information [E], the trial was adjourned: and, the ſixth of November following, the Doctor was acquitted (i). However, the government brought a writ of error (k). The ſeverity of this proſecution, joined to repeated diſappointments, and ill uſage from ſome of his party, flung the Doctor into a fever; of which he died at Weſtminſter, on the 2d of March 1706-7, after a ſhort confinement to his bed; not without violent exclamations againſt the rigor of his proſecutors (l). Beſides thoſe books of his that are mentioned above, he made a new Engliſh tranſlation of Herodotus, which was never publiſhed (m): And finiſhed, not long before his deceaſe, 'A New Syſtem of Anatomy,' which was firſt printed in 1707 [F]. He likewiſe publiſhed 'Hiſtoria Anglo-Scotica [G]; or an Impartial Hiſtory of all that happened between the Kings and Kingdoms of England and Scotland, from the Beginning of the Reign of William the Conqueror, to the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was a man of quick pregnant parts, well ſtored with learning, and improved by good converſation. He had a great maſtery of the Engliſh tongue, and wrote with eaſe and fluency in a manly ſtyle. Though various judgements were paſſed upon his political writings, according to people's different humours, paſſions, and intereſts, yet all agreed in commending his way of writing (n).

Illuſtrated with above 'fourſcore figures, drawn after the life. With a 'preface by W. Wagſtaffe, M. D. and reader of 'Anatomy at Surgeons-hall.' He does not behave himſelf like a meer deſcriber of the parts, but like an unprejudiced enquirer into nature, and an abſolute maſter of his 'profeſſion. And if Dr. Lower has been ſo much and 'ſo deſervedly eſteemed for his ſolution of the Syſtole 'of the heart, Dr. Drake, by accounting for the 'Diaſtole ought certainly to be allowed his ſhare of 'reputation, and to be admitted as a partner of his 'glory (10).' * [A correſpondent (referring to note B.) hath obſerved, that, whenever the fever of party ſhall have cooled in this iſland, it will be matter of amuſement to read the name of John of Bucks amongſt the beſt Friends of the Church. It is not, however, a very uncommon circumſtance for a perſon to be deſtitute of any principles of Religion, and yet to be very zealous for ſome particular form of eccleſiaſtical government. That a man may, at the ſame time, be an Infidel, a High-churchman, and a Perſecutor, we are afraid, has been too much confirmed by the Hiſtory of the World.

When the writer of this note was in the courſe of his academical education, he well remembers that Dr. Drake's Treatiſe on Anatomy was in ſome degree of celebrity. Whether it be ſtill held in eſtimation he is not able to ſay; but it is probable that its importance is now loſt in the elaborate productions and numerous diſcoveries of modern times.

Dr. Drake was not at all ſucceſsful as a dramatical writer. In the title page of his comedy, it is ſaid to be printed as it was damnably acted at Drury-lane (13). Whether the word ſignifies that the play was ill repreſented by the performers, or condemned by the audience, it is equally certain that it failed of ſucceſs upon the ſtage.] K.

DRAY-

DRAYTON (MICHAEL), a renowned Poet in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles I., was of an ancient and worthy family, originally deſcended from the town of Drayton in Leiceſterſhire; which gave name to his progenitors, as a learned Antiquary of his acquaintance has recorded (a). But his parents removing into the bordering county of Warwickſhire, he was born there, as we receive it from his own information (b); and, as it is remembered by his countryman Sir William Dugdale, as well as others, who have followed him, at Atherſton (c); but more particularly it appears, that the little village of Harſull, or Hartſhill, in that pariſh, will claim the honour of his birth; whereof it were the greater pity to deprive it, as it is repreſented to have been obſcure, till rendered conſpicuous for his nativity, by the author of thoſe Latin verſes at the bottom of his picture; which being publiſhed in the life-time, and under the inſpection of our Poet himſelf, before his own edition of his works, could not have eſcaped his correction had it been erroneous [A]. It may alſo be computed from the circumſcription upon the ſaid picture, which with all other circumſtances very agreeably correſponds, containing the year of our Lord, and that of his own age, when it was engraved, that he was born in the year 1563. In his tender age he was bleſſed with ſuch a forwardneſs of genius, ſuch a ſweetneſs of aſpect, temper, and deportment, as rendered him not only the delight of his inſtructors, but preferred him to the favour of ſome perſons of diſtinction. In the year 1573, being then but ten years of age, he appears to have been page to ſome perſon of honour, as we collect from his own words: and, as for his propenſity to learning, it no leſs evidently appears in the ſame place (d), that he would then conſtrue his Cato, and ſome other little collections of ſentences; which made him very anxious to know, What kind of ſtrange creatures theſe Poets were; and very ſolicitous with his Tutor, that, if he could, he would make him, of all things, a Poet. So he was put to the reading of Mantuan and Virgil's Eclogues, with others of the inſpired tribe; till, even then, he ſcorned any thing that looked like a ballad, though written by William Elderton [B]. If after this, he finiſhed not his education at the Univerſity of Cambridge, it is apparent, from the credible teſtimony of one of his own friends, that he was ſome time a ſtudent in that at Oxford [C]; and by the ſupport, it ſeems, of Sir Henry Goodere. However, he might not be ſo formally entered as to be remembered by Anthony Wood, though he has made greater digreſſions in the commemoration of ſeveral others, who were more diſtantly related to that Univerſity. In 1588, he ſeems, from his own deſcription of the Spaniſh Invaſion, which the Spaniards themſelves, with no leſs preſumption than arrogance, or vain-glory, had ſtyled Invincible, to have been a ſpectator, at Dover, of it's defeat (e); and might, poſſibly, be engaged in ſome military poſt or employment there; as we find ſome mention made of his being well ſpoken of by the Gentlemen of the Army. He took delight very early, as we have ſeen, in the ſtudy of Poetry: but how ſoon he delighted the public with any of his own, all thoſe who have written of him have been very incurious to learn or inform us. He was certainly eminent for ſome of his poetical publications, nine or ten years before the death of Queen Elizabeth, and how much ſooner, we have not yet diſcovered. At leaſt, ſo early as the year 1593, when he was but thirty years of age, he ſet forth, in print, a Collection of his Paſtorals: likewiſe ſome of the moſt grave and weighty poems, which have rendered him moſt memorable, and beſt ſupported his fame to poſterity, were, not longer after, publiſhed. His Barons Wars, and England's Heroical Epiſtles; His Downfalls of Robert of Normandy; Matilda and Gaveſton; for which laſt he is [A] Could not have eſcaped his Correction.] Theſe verſes, in the vein of Arioſto, have not been cited by any author who has written of our Poet that we have met with, and are as follow:

LUX HARESHULLA tibi (Warwici villa, tenebris Ante tuas cunas, obſita) prima fuit.
Arma, Viros, Veneres, Patriam modulamine dixti; Te Patriæ reſonant Arma, Viri, Veneres.

Thus in Engliſh:

HARSULL. ſmall town, where firſt your breath you drew,
Till by your birth renown'd, was known to few:
Albion, Arms, Legends, Love, with fame you crown'd;
Albion, Arms, Legends, Love, your Fame reſound.

[B] Though written by Will. Elderton.] This Elderton was a famous Comedian of thoſe days; a facetious ſuddling companion, who, having a great readineſs at rhiming, compoſed abundance of ſonnets and catches upon love and wine, which were then in great vogue among the light and merry part of the town; but he was not more notable for his drollery and his doggerel than he was for his drinking, inſomuch that he was ſeldom remembered for his ſingular faculty in either of the former, but his thorough practice in the latter was joined to it. Wherefore we find him called the Bachanalian Buffoon, the Red-noſed ballad-maker, and ſuch like. It ſeems by this exceſſive habit he indulged himſelf in, over his ſtrong drink, that he fell a martyr to Sir John Barleycorn, as ſome of his contemporary writers have hinted (†). We find he was dead before the year 1592, and Mr. Camden has preſerved this epitaph on him:

Hic ſitus eſt ſitiens, atque ebrius Eldertonus,
Quid dico, hic ſitus eſt? hic potius ſitis eſt (1).

Which may be thus rendered or imitated:

Dead drunk here Elderton does lie;
Dead as he is, he ſtill is drie:
So of him, it may well be ſaid,
Here he, but not his thirſt, is laid.

[D] Firſt of his ſaid Works, and other early compoſitions:] Firſt, of thoſe poems abovementioned. What is there called a Collection of his PASTORALS was firſt publiſhed under, at leaſt the oldeſt edition we have ſeen thereof was diſtinguiſhed with, the title of IDEA: "The Shepherd's Garland, faſhioned in nine "Eglogs; with Rowland's Sacrifice to the Nine "Muſes. Dedicated to Mr. Robert Dudley:" By M. Drayton, and printed in 4to, 1593. This "Shep-"herd's Garland, &c." is the ſame that was reprinted afterwards, with emendations by our author, in the firſt folio edition of his works, under the title of "PASTORALS: containing Eglogues: With the "Man in the Moon." They are nine in number, written in ſtanzas of various meaſures, adorned with tales, ſonnets, &c. and in this folio edition they are dated 1619. There are many of the true rural images, and much of the beautiful ſimplicity in theſe paſtorals, for which this ſpecies of poetry is ſo much admired. Our author has been therefore juſtly applauded for theſe eclogues, by ſome able judges of our time, and claſſed among the beſt paſtoral writers in his own, for the many new and beautiful varieties, embelliſhments, and improvements, that he has introduced therein: yet ſuch has been the juſtice as well as judgement of others in our time, that though they have, in the very title-page of a late edition, profeſſed to give us his Works complete in one volume (3), neither theſe, nor many others of his moſt conſiderable compoſitions, are therein reprinted, or ſo much as ſpoken of: But perhaps a ſecond volume was intended to ſupply the deficiencies of the firſt. As to his other poems abovementioned, they are hiſtorical. In an old edition of them in 8vo. without date, but printed nearly about the middle of King James's reign, our author's Dedication before the BARONS WARS, to Sir W. Aſton, is in verſe; and in the Preface he ſeems to hint as if his travels had not afforded the leiſure and ſtudy he deſired. In his folio edition of theſe poems with others, the Dedication before thoſe Wars, to his ſaid patron, is in proſe. In this latter edition, theſe Barons Wars in the reign of Edward II. are illuſtrated with marginal notes by the author, which have been all ſince omitted (4) by his late editor, though the author of the Preliminary Diſcourſe was deſirous of a more ample commentary (5). There are commendatory verſes before both editions, by Mr. Thomas Green, E. Heywood, John Beaumont, and the learned Mr. Selden. His "England's Heroical Epiſtles" were newly enlarged, and republiſhed in 8vo, 1598; which is the moſt antient edition we have ſeen or read of. Theſe Epiſtles are written in our heroic meaſure of ten ſyllables, and are very judiciouſly explained, in the neceſſary places, by ſhort notes drawn out of good authentic hiſtories, and printed at the end of each epiſtle. There are twenty-four of them, with a ſhort ſummary, in fourteen lines, of their titles, at the end. They are profeſſedly written in the vein of Ovid's Epiſtles: but of a much more ſubſtantial and affecting nature, as they concern ſo many real perſons of the higheſt rank in our Chronicles, and illuſtrate ſo much real matter of fact in their moſt unfortunate, perplexing, and often criminal loves, by the ſtrongeſt ſentiments, and moſt moving numbers. Beſides the author's Preface, there are three panegyrical poems prefixed, which were addreſſed to him by William Alexander, afterwards Earl of Sterline, a famous Poet of Scotland before ſpoken of in this work (6), Sir Edmond Scory, and Mr. Thomas Haſſel. In the undated 8vo. edition, abovementioned, there are near a dozen Dedications, before as many of the Epiſtles, to ſo many of the author's friends and patrons of both ſexes. The firſt Epiſtle of Fair Roſamond to King Henry II. (7), is dedicated to Lucy Counteſs of Bedford; to whom he ſays, 'I ſtrive not to affect ſingu-'laritie, yet would faine flye imitation, &c. Much 'would ſhe ſay to a King, much would I ſay to a 'Counteſs; but that, the method of my epiſtle muſt 'conclude the modeſty of her's; which I wiſh may 'recommend my ever vowed ſervice to your honour.' In his Dedication of another Epiſtle to Lady Anne Harrington, the wife of Sir John Harrington, he forbears to enlarge upon her excellences, becauſe 'de-'jected minds want that pure fire which would give 'vigour to virtue.' The next Dedication is to Sir Walter Aſton, Knight of the Bath (8). The next to Edward Earl of Bedford, contains the moſt perſonal particulars of our author (†). The next is to Sir John Swinerton, Alderman of London (9). The next is to his worthy and eſteemed friend Mr. James Huiſh, upon the ſubject of Dedications. The next is to Mrs. Elizabeth Tanfield, ſole daughter and heir of Laurence Tanfield, Eſq. a famous lawyer. The next is to Sir Thomas Monſon: before the Epiſtle of King Edward IV. to Jane Shore, and her Anſwer. Our Poet, in his notes of the Chronicle Hiſtory, upon the ſecond of theſe two letters, after having given Sir Thomas More's deſcription of Jane Shore, mentions a curious pourtrait of her in theſe words: 'That 'picture which I have ſeen of her was ſuch, as ſhe 'roſe out of her bed in the morning, having nothing 'on but a rich mantle, caſt under one arm over her 'ſhoulder, and ſitting in a chair, on which her arm 'did lie.' We remember a late publiſhed print of her, in metzotinto, in a light or looſe covering, very open at her boſom; whether copied from that, or one at Eaton-College, we cannot at preſent determine (†). The dedication to the next pair of theſe Epiſtles is to Sir Henry Goodere of Poleſworth (in Warwickſhire) Knight, the nephew of that worthy old Sir Henry Goodere, who was our Poet's moſt early patron (10), in reſpect to whom, he ſays, in this Dedication, 'Till ſuch time as I may in ſome more large 'meaſure make known my love to the happy and 'generous family of the Gooderes, to which I confeſs 'myſelf beholding for the moſt part of my education, 'I wiſh you all happineſs.' The next is to Henry, the Son of Edward Lucas, Eſq. of whoſe parents he acknowledges himſelf to have received great favours, though there were many in England of whom he might juſtly challenge greater; 'had I not been born 'in ſo evil an hour, ſays he, as to be poyſoned with 'that gall of ingratitude.' The laſt, which is the eleventh of theſe Dedications; the ſecond brace of epiſtles having none before them, but ſeem to be joined under the patronage of the firſt, is addreſſed to the Lady Frances Goodere (†). It were eaſy for thoſe as were written by authors who beſt knew the man, and were themſelves beſt qualified to judge of his talents; ſuch characters we hope may here, in this article, alſo apart, be acceptably aſſembled or referred to [E]. He was in theſe his younger, and indeed to his latter, years, much beloved and befriended by Sir Walter Aſton, of Tixhall in Staffordſhire, to whom, for his kind patronage, he gratefully dedicates many of his Poems, whereof thoſe who have been converſant in theſe Poems of our author, to obſerve how the moderns, even the late Mr. Pope himſelf, have imitated Drayton, and refined upon his pattern, in thoſe diſtinctions which are eſteemed the moſt delicate improvements of our Engliſh verſification at this day; ſuch as the turns, the pauſes, the contraſts, and elegant tautologies, &c. It is alſo eaſy for ſuch readers to point out ſeveral thefts and petty larcenies which have been committed upon our Poet, however obſolete and unfaſhionable he may have been accounted, by ſome writers of eminent character; and ſhew, where verſes have been appropriated to ſome famous wits, which were compoſed by him, even as many years before they were born as they attained to when they died. We ſhall here, for brevity's ſake, mention but one inſtance, and that is in theſe lines,

Th' Arabian bird which never is but one,
Is only chaſte, becauſe ſhe is alone:
But had our mother Nature made them two,
They would have done as Doves and Sparrows do (11).

(11) Heroic Epiſtles; in that of King John to Matilda.

Theſe are aſcribed to a famous nobleman, who was one of the brighteſt Wits in the reign of King Charles II. and have been admired, as worthy of him: In his works they are not otherwiſe materially altered than by the tranſpoſure of the rhymes in the firſt couplet, and the retrenchment of the meaſure in both (12). His other more early and famous Hiſtorical Poems, before mentioned to have been written in Queen Elizabeth's time, are intitled, His LEGENDS; firſt, of Robert, Duke of Normandy; in which is ſeen a picture of diſtreſſed integrity; ſecondly, Matilda, a Pattern of Chaſtity; and thirdly, Pierce Gaveſton, a Warning-Piece to Court Minions and Prime Miniſters againſt the abuſe of their Prince's favour. He afterwards added to them the Legend of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Eſſex, printed 4to. 1609, an example of ſpeedy advancement to grandeur, by politic advantages taken of his Prince's violent appetites and the troubled times (13). Our author had good encouragement for illuſtrating their hiſtories in this poetical manner; the like having been ſo well received before from other eminent hands (14). They are dedicated in his folio edition to Sir Walter Aſton; and therein are embelliſhed with ſhort and uſeful explanatory notes in the margin; which are left out in the late new folio edition. When his SONNETS were firſt publiſhed we cannot ſay, but it ſhould ſeem that he ſet them forth, or wrote ſome of them, before the death of Queen Elizabeth, becauſe among thoſe five additional ſonnets which he directed to ſome great and worthy perſonages, but never reviſed them himſelf in his folio edition, one is to James King of Scots, before he came into England; another, which might be written afterwards, is inſcribed to Lucy, Counteſs of Bedford, in which he ſays, "ſhe rain'd "upon him her ſweet ſhowers of gold;" and the laſt to Sir Anthony Cook, to whom he ſays of theſe rhymes, that, but for him, they had ſlept in ſable night; and that he had borrowed no man's conceits. The whole number ſhould be ſixty-eight or ſixty-nine. There was an edition of all, or moſt of thoſe poems abovementioned, publiſhed in 8vo. 1605, and another, as we have heard, in 1610, beſides the undated one of the ſame ſize before ſpoken of. His ODES (*) were written after Queen Elizabeth's death, as appears in one of them, and dedicated to Sir Henry Goodere, Gent. of the King's Privy-Chamber, in verſe. They are ſeventeen in number, and not one reprinted in the late new edition: nor is his Fable of the OWL, a pretty allegorical poem, therein preſerved. It was firſt printed ſoon after King James came to the Crown (15), and reprinted in the author's laſt edition in ſmall folio; in which there are title pages to every poem we have mentioned but the firſt, which are all dated 1619; wherefore we think this volume of them was all printed that year. The title of it is, "Poems "by Michael Drayton, Eſq; The Barons Wars, "England's Heroical Epiſtles, Idea, Odes, The Le-"gends of Robert Duke of Normandy, Matilda, "Pierce Gaveſton, and the Great Cromwell: The "Owl, Eglogues, with the Man in the Moon." The reſt of his compoſitions we ſhall mention under the years they were publiſhed.

[E] Such characters we hope may here be acceptably aſſembled or referred to.] And firſt, Mr. Charles Fitz-Geoffry, the learned Divine and Poet of Broadgates's Hall, in an Hiſtorical Poem he publiſhed at the time that ſome of Drayton's earlieſt pieces appeared, gives him the appellation of the "Golden-Mouth'd Poet, for the purity and preciouſneſs of his phraſe (16). And Mr. Francis Meers, alſo a Divine of no ſmall repute at that time for his moral and poetical writings, having mentioned all Drayton's hiſtorical poems recited as part of the title above, that is, all therein but the three laſt, in a work he publiſhed before the death of Queen Elizabeth, gives him this character: 'Michael Drayton, among Scholars, Soldiers, Poets, and 'all ſorts of people, is helde for a man of virtuous 'diſpoſition, honeſt converſation, and well-governed 'carriage, which is almoſt miraculous among good 'wits in theſe declining and corrupt times (17).' Two years after, Mr. Robert Allot, in his Common Place Book, of the Select Thoughts of our moſt eminent Engliſh Poets in that century, has many extracts from Michael Drayton's earlier pieces beforementioned, whereby he makes a figure as conſiderable as moſt of them (*). Another Poet of that time refers to an Elegiac Poem upon the death of Sir Philip Sidney, that was compoſed by Drayton; which was never reprinted in his works: and, if it was written ſoon after Sir Philip's death (18), it is likely to have been the earlieſt of his performances. That Poet calls him Noble Drayton! and obſerves, how well he bewailed our ſaid loſs in dreary verſe (19). A Divine of Cambridge at the ſame time publiſhed a dramatic performance, wherein a character being given of the Wits of that age, one of the interlocutors, in a dialogue between Ingenioſo and Judicio, ſays,

Drayton's ſweet Muſe is like a ſanguine die,
Able to raviſh the raſh gazer's eye.

And the other anſwers — 'However, he wants one 'true note of a Poet of our times, and that is this; 'he cannot ſwagger it well in a tavern, or domineer 'in a hot-houſe (20).' There is a deſcription of Drayton's quoted by two or three authors of thoſe times with applauſe; and one of them, who was the learned tranſlator of Arioſto's Satires, in his verſion of another Italian Wit, where he is deſcribing, in a note, how the Muſes were deſpiſed in that age by the ſtupid Midas's, and ſlaviſh jailors of their own pelf, has ſaid, 'He will ſet down the worth of a Poet, as 'that ſweet Muſe of his, who not unworthily beareth 'the name of the Chief Archangel, ſingeth, after his 'ſoul-raviſhing manner;' part of which verſes, as quoted from the earlier editions, are as follow:

The diff'rence only, 'twixt the God and Us,
Allow'd by them, is but diſtinguiſh'd thus;
They gave them breath, men by their pow'rs are born;
That life they give, the Poet doth adorn:
And from the world, when they diſſolve men's breath,
He in the world doth give men life in death (21).

Mr. W. Burton, the learned Antiquary of Lindley in Leiceſterſhire, ſpeaking of Mr. Drayton as his near countryman and old acquaintance, adds farther of him theſe words, 'Who, though thoſe Tranſalpines ac-'count whereof his Barons Wars was the firſt, in the ſpring of his acquaintance, as our Poet expreſſes it himſelf to him (g). Nevertheleſs, we have ſince gathered, from thoſe Epiſtles before-mentioned (h), and, till then, unobſerved by all who have written of him, that his moſt early dependence was upon another noble patron, named Sir Henry Goodere, of Poleſworth, in his own county; to whom he has liberally acknowledged himſelf obliged for the greateſt part of his education, and by whom, ſome time before his death, our Poet was recommended to the patronage of the Counteſs of Bedford; as may evidently appear in his Epiſtle to her Lord hereunder recited [F]. However, it is no leſs viſible, from his many dedications, and acknowledgements alſo, to Sir Walter Aſton, that he was for many years patronized by him, and accommodated with ſuch ſupplies as afforded him leiſure to furniſh ſome of his moſt elaborate compoſitions. Nay, it is intimated, we know not from what authority, that he was, by the intereſt of the ſaid Sir Walter with Sir Roger Aſton, Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to King James in his minority, made, in ſome meaſure, miniſterial to an intercourſe of correſpondence between the ſaid young King of Scots and Queen Elizabeth. The words of my author are theſe; ſpeaking of the ſaid Sir Roger Aſton, and of his being of the Bed-chamber to that King when a child, that 'He was the perſon principally entruſted with the meſſages and letters that paſſed between his Maſter and Queen Elizabeth; and, by the interpoſition of Sir Walter Aſton, Mr. Drayton was, in this reſpect, very uſeful in faithfully performing the various ſervices which he was commanded (i).' But, if theſe ſervices were performed by Mr. Drayton ſo early as in the childhood of that King, we fear it will be found too ſoon for him to have had the intereſt or recommendation of Sir Walter Aſton thereto, becauſe, at the publication of ſome, which were not his earlieſt poems, they were but in the ſpring of their acquaintance, as he has ſaid himſelf: ſo that, if he was in any ſuch ſort truſted, it muſt be much later than that King's childhood, and nearer the cloſe of the Queen's reign. He certainly had fair proſpects from his ſervices, labours, or other teſtimonies of early attachment to the King's intereſt, of ſome favour or preferment, beſides from what he had written among his Sonnets in his praiſe, as a Poet, while King of Scots. He was alſo one of the foremoſt of Apollo's train in England, who welcomed his Majeſty to his Britiſh dominions with A Congratulatory Poem to King James, &c. 4to, 1603; and how, through intereſt or ingratitude, it might have proved his ruin, but for his own patient and prudent conduct under the indignity, he has, with as much freedom as was then convenient, himſelf informed us both in proſe and verſe (k). The ſame year he was choſen, by Sir Walter Aſton, one of the Eſquires who attended him when he was, with others, created Knight of the Bath at the coronation of the ſaid King (l). We find not that our author ever reprinted thoſe poems in praiſe of his Majeſty; and the ungrateful reception they met with, as well as the diſagreeable ſcenes he might behold of ſuch wicked vices, and effeminate vanities, as afterwards prevailed at Court, ſo degenerating from that in the Muſe-nurſing Maiden Reign (m), might damp all deſires of raiſing himſelf there. We have not time to examine how far, in his Fable of "The Owl," publiſhed in 1604, he may have made any thing applicable to his preſent caſe (n). In 1613, he publiſhed the firſt part of his "Poly-Olbion [G]." In 1619, came out his firſt folio volume of poems, before before described. In 1622, the foregoing part of the "Poly-Olbion" was reprinted, together with the second part, making in all thirty books or songs. In 1626, we find him, before a copy of his own verses, styled "Poet-Laureat [H]." In 1627, was published the second part or volume of his poems; containing his "Battle of Agincourt," in stanzas of eight lines: "The Miseries of Queen Margaret," in the like stanza: "Nymphidia, or the Court of Fairies;" a master-piece in the grotesque kind (o): "The "Quest of Cynthia;" another beautiful piece; both reprinted in Dryden's Miscellanies; "The Shepherd's Sirena;" also, "The Moon Calf," a strong satire upon the masculine affectations of Women, and the effeminate disguises of the Men, in those times; as they were by others also then exposed in prose (p). Lastly, there are his Elegies upon sundry occasions. These are introduced by "The Vision of Ben Jonson" on the Muses of his friend Michael Drayton; wherein he is very particular in the enumeration and praise of his several compositions: also by another poem upon the "Battle of Agincourt," by J. Vaughan; and another by his friend Henry Reynolds, Esq. Those Elegies are twelve in number, though there are but eight reprinted in the late new edition. In 1630 he published another volume of poems, in 4to, intitled, "The Muses Elizium, in ten "fundry Nymphalls;" with three divine Poems, on Noah's Flood; Moses his Birth and "Miracles (†); and David and Goliah." The Pastoral Poems are dedicated to Edward Sackvile, Earl of Dorset, and Lord Chamberlain; whose durable Favours had now made him one of his Family; and these are written in verse of various measure. His Divine Poems are in English heroic measure, and are dedicated to the Countess of Dorset; and there are some images truly sublime in them. But there is not one of these poems revived, or so much as mentioned, in the late edition, pretending to have comprehended all the works of this celebrated Poet. At the end of the first Divine Poem, there are three copies of verses in praise of the author, by Beal Sapperton, in Latin; Mr. John Fletcher and Thomas Andrews, in English; which last has very expressly displayed the great extent of our Poet's renown. In 1631, he exchanged his laurel for a crown of glory, as it is expressed in his monumental inscription. He was buried in Westminster-Abbey among the Poets; and the handsome table-monument of blue marble, which was raised over his grave the same year (q), is adorned with his effigies in busto, laureated. On one side is a crest of Minerva's cap, and Pegasus in a scutcheon on the other (r). Among those poetical friends, who have lamented his death, was Sir Aston Cokain, who, in gratitude for his having brought him acquainted with Sir Thomas mated in his Preface, where he acknowledges that the means to finish it were owing to the bounty of Sir Walter Aston. There are eighteen songs in this volume, illustrated with the learned notes of Mr. Selden; and there are maps before every song, wherein the cities, mountains, forests, rivers, &c. are represented by the figures of men and women. His metre of twelve syllables being now antiquated, it is quoted more for the History than the Poetry in it; however, it contains many excellent lines, and is so exact, that, as Bishop Nicholson observes, 'Drayton's Poly-Ol-'bion affords a much truer account of this kingdom, 'and the dominion of Wales, than could well be ex-'pected from the pen of a Poet (25).' 'Tis interwoven with many fine episodes; of the conquest of this island by the Romans (26); of the coming of the Saxons (27), the Danes (28), and the Normans (29), with an account of their Kings; of the noble English Warriors in the conquest of France, &c. (30) our brave navigators (31); the Saints (32); and of the Civil Wars in England (33), &c. This volume was reprinted in 1622, with the Second Part, or Continuation of Twelve Songs more, making thirty in the whole, and dedicated to Prince Charles, to whom he gives hopes of bestowing the like pains upon Scotland. There are verses before this Second Part by William Brown, Geo. Wither, and John Reynolds. 'Tis as accurately written as the First Part; but Mr. Selden, being otherwise engaged, had not time to adorn this Second with notes, and perhaps the want of a friend to help out the expence may be the reason it was not adorned with maps. From the encomiums of those Poets we shall not make any extract; but add this short one, wherewith we have been favoured by the learned and ingenious translator into Latin of some of the finest essays written by Mr. Pope, out of a Poem that is now in the press, wherein there are these lines:

Drayton, sweet ancient Bard, his Albion sung,
With their own praise her echoing Valleys rung;
His bounding Muse o'er ev'ry Mountain rode,
And ev'ry River warbled where he flow'd (34).

[H] Before a copy of his own verses styled Poet Laureat.] Before the posthumous Poems of Abraham, the son of Dr. Philemon Holland, among the commendatory verses, the first copy of ten lines, bears this title, Michael Drayton, Esq; and Poet Laureat, in commendation of the author, &c. which ends with this distich:

Proceed, let not Apollo's stock decay,
Poets and Kings are not born ev'ry day (35).

(35) Hollandi Posthuma, &c. Cantab. impensis Hen. Holland, 4to. 1626.

It is likely this style or appellation of Poet Laureat was not formerly confined so strictly as it is now to his Majesty's servant, known by that title, who is presumed to have been at that time Ben Jonson (†); because we find it given to others only as a distinction of their excellence in the art of Poetry. So it was bestowed also upon our author's friend Mr. George Sandys; and we could produce an author who has called Francis Quarles by the same title. As for the pictures of our Poet appearing so constantly laureated, it may be a compliment also of the Painters and Gravers. The print of Mr. Drayton before the first volume of his Poems in folio, graved by W. Hole in 1613, has a wreath of bays above his head, and so has his bust in Westminster-abbey: the like had the painting of him, as we have heard, which was in the collections of the late Thomas Sclater Bacon, Esq. at his seat in Cambridgeshire; and so likewise another delicate portrait in miniature, said to be painted of him by Peter Oliver, which was in the possession of the late Lord Lansdown, and highly esteemed by him, as we have lately been satisfied, not only from an ample description (36), but also by the sight of it. And yet when we find, that the portraits of Joshua Sylvester, John Owen, and others, who never had any grant of the Poet Laureat's place, are as formally crowned with laurel as those who had

But I moleſt thy quiet; ſleep, while we,
That live, cou'd leave our lives to die like Thee (37).

The epitaph on his monument, aſcribed to Ben Jonſon, is in theſe words:

Doe, pious marble, let thy readers know
What they, and what their children owe
To Drayton's name; whoſe ſacred duſt
We recommend unto thy truſt;
Protect his memory, and preſerve his ſtory,
Remain a laſting monument of his glory;

His name, that cannot fade, ſhall be
An everlaſting monument to thee. O.

 [" Of Poets once known and admired," ſays Dr. Viceſimus Knox, ſeveral are fallen " into total " diſrepute. Drayton was honoured by a commen- " tator who muſt have given fame to any writer. If " Selden's taſte was equal to his learning, Drayton is " indeed moſt highly diſtinguiſhed. The Poly-Ol- " bion is, however, no more read: and the ſlow " length of the tedious Alexandrine in which it is " written will prevent its revival, as it has haſtened " its Oblivion (38)." It is true, that, comparatively ſpeaking, Drayton has only a few readers; but he does not appear to have fallen into ſuch total diſrepute as is inſinuated by Dr. Knox. So ſtrongly was the remembrance of him preſerved, that in 1748 a new edition of his poems was called for, which was publiſhed by ſubſcription. It was printed in folio, and there was prefixed to it an Hiſtorical Eſſay on the Life and Writings of Drayton. Such was the eſteem in which his Poetry continued to be held, that a farther and complete impreſſion of his works was demanded, which appeared in 1753, in four volumes, octavo. At the ſame time, the defects of the folio edition (which are juſtly animadverted upon by our learned predeceſſor) were ſupplied by an appendix, containing all the pieces that had before been omitted. Upon occaſion of the appearance of the octavo impreſſion, a periodical critic obſerved as follows; " It " muſt doubtleſs afford a ſenſible pleaſure to every " lover of Engliſh poetry, to ſee ſo great a regard " paid by the preſent age (light and trifling as its " taſte is by ſome deemed) to the works of this wor- " thy bard, as to call for two editions in five years' " time; an honour paid to few of our antient poets " beſides Shakeſpeare (39)."

Mr. Headley, in his " Select Beauties of ancient Engliſh Poetry," has brought Drayton into freſh notice. Beſides inſerting ſome of his poems in the collection, he has made ſeveral judicious remarks on his poetical character. The modern teſtimonies to Drayton's merits, Mr. Headley ſays, are few when compared with his deſerts. " The caſe is, moſt readers, " diſcouraged at his voluminouſneſs, content them- " ſelves with ſuperficially ſkimming him over, with- " out going deep enough to be real judges of his ex- " cellence. He poſſeſſed a very conſiderable fertility " of mind, which enabled him to diſtinguiſh himſelf " in almoſt every ſpecies of poetry, from a trifling " ſonnet to a long topographical poem. If he any- " where ſinks below himſelf, it is in his attempts at " ſatire. The goodneſs of his heart ſeems to have " produced in him that confuſed kind of honeſt in- " dignation which deprived him of the powers of diſ- " crimination. He therefore loſt the opportunities of " ſeizing on thoſe nice alluſions, ſituations, circum- " ſtances, and tracts of character, by which vice and " folly are rendered odious and contemptible. His " Poly-Olbion is one of the moſt ſingular works this " country has produced, and ſeems to me eminently " original. The information contained in it is in ge- " neral ſo acute, that he is quoted as an authority " both by Hearne and Wood. His perpetual alluſions " to abſolute traditions, remote events, remarkable " facts and perſonages, together with his curious gene- " alogies of rivers, and his taſte for natural hiſtory, " have contributed to render his work very valuable " to the antiquary. To many juſt objections it is " moſt certainly liable. His continual perſonifica- " tions of woods, mountains, and rivers, are tedious; " and, on the whole, we muſt be ſatisfied to read ra- " ther for information than pleaſure. In the Legends " and Heroical Epiſtes, both the time and the events " are properly limited; the attention is gratified, " but not ſatiated. In the Barons Wars, too extenſive " a ſubject is opened, and the province of the hiſto- " rian too far treſpaſſed upon. In order to be intro- " duced to good incident and reflection, we muſt toil " through dry facts, liſten with patience to the deve- " lopement of uncertain primary cauſes, and at laſt, " perhaps, are obliged to have recourſe to a proſe ex- " planation in the notes. Our author, who wants " neither fire nor imagination, poſſeſſed great com- " mand of his abilities. He has written no maſques; " his perſonifications of the paſſions are few; and " that allegorical vein, which the popularity of " Spenſer's works may be fairly ſuppoſed to have " rendered faſhionable, and which over-runs our ear- " lier poetry, but ſeldom occurs in him. While his " contemporary, Jonſon, ſtudied away his fancy, and, " unable to digeſt the maſs of his reading, peopled " his pages with the heathen mythology, and gave " our language new idioms by the introduction of " Latiniſms; Drayton adopted a ſtyle that, with a " few exceptions, the preſent age may peruſe " without difficulty, and not unfrequently miſtake " for its own offspring. In a moſt pedantic æra he " was unaffected, and ſeldom exhibits his learning at " the expence of his judgement (40)."

(40) Select Beauties of ancient Engliſh Poetry. Vol. I. Biographical Sketches, p. lii.

The writer of our author's life, prefixed to the folio edition of his works, ſays, that the Poly-Olbion has hitherto had no imitators. But this is not ſtrictly true; for there appeared, in 1621, the Palæ-Albion, by William Slatyer, a ſort of chronicle in Latin and Engliſh verſe, in which he has an addreſs to Drayton, containing the following acknowledgment.

" Thy Poly-Olbion did invite
" My Palæ-Albion thus to write;
" Thine, ancient Albion's modern glories;
" Mine, modern Albion's ancient ſtories (41)".

(41) Ibid.

" The reputation of Drayton," ſays Mr. Granger, " in the reigns of Elizabeth and James the Firſt, ſtood " much on the ſame level with that of Cowley, in " the reigns of Charles the Firſt and Charles " the Second; but it has declined conſiderably ſince " that period. He frequently wants that elevation of " thought which is eſſential to poetry, though, in ſome " of the ſtanzas of his " Barons Wars," he is " ſcarcely inferior to Spenſer. In his " England's " Heroical Epiſtles," written in the manner of Ovid, " he has been, in general, happier in the choice " than the execution of his ſubjects; yet ſome of his " imitations are more in the ſpirit of that Poet than " ſeveral of the Engliſh tranſlations of him. His " Nymphidia, or Court of Fayrie," ſeems to have " been

" been the greateſt effort of his imagination, and is " the moſt generally admired of his works (42)."

(42) Biographical Hiſtory. Vol. II. p. 11.

A more exquiſite judge of poetical merit (Dr. Warton) coincides in opinion with Mr. Granger. Of Drayton's Nymphidia he ſays, that it muſt be allowed to be a perfect pattern of paſtoral elegance; and that in his Barons Wars there are many ſtrokes not unworthy of Spenſer. He farther obſerves, that Drayton, whom he calls no deſpicable genius, attempted to revive the heroical epiſtle, and has left us ſome good ſubjects, though not very artfully handled. The beſt of his productions of this kind are King John to Matilda, Elinor Cobham to Duke Humphry, William de la Poole to Queen Margaret, Jane Shore to Edward the Fourth, Lord Surrey to Geraldine, and Lady Jane Grey to Lord Guilford Dudley (43).

(43) Eſſay on the Writings and Genius of Pope. Vol. I. p. 306. Firſt Edition.

The Nymphidia, to which ſo much praiſe is juſtly given, was ſeparately printed in 1751, under the title of " The Hiſtory of Queen Mabb; or, the " Court of Fairy." Its diſtinct publication was owing to its containing the ſtory on which was founded the entertainment of Queen Mabb, a favourite pantomime at that time exhibited at Drury Lane (44).

(44) Monthly Review. Vol. IV. p. 303.

The authors of the Biographia Dramatica have ranked Drayton amongſt our dramatic poets. But this, as they themſelves are fully ſenſible, is done upon very ſlender grounds. Neither Langbane, Jacob, nor any of the other writers, have mentioned him as a Dramatiſt; but Coxeter ſays, that he had ſeen an old manuſcript to the play called " The Merry Devil of " Edmonton," which declared it to be written by Michael Drayton. The ſame play is attributed by Kirkman to Shakeſpeare; but there doth not appear in the piece itſelf any ſufficient reaſon for ſuch a ſuggeſtion. Whoever was the author of the " Merry " Devil of Edmonton," it appears to have been a popular Comedy; for it went through five editions, from the year 1608 to 1655. Meres ſpeaks of Drayton as a writer of Tragedy (45).

Mr. Thomas Warton has mentioned a circumſtance relating to Drayton's tomb in Weſtminſter Abbey, which is erected near that of Spenſer. " Heylin in- " forms us, that Drayton was not buried in the South " Ile of the Church, where his monument is now to " be ſeen; but under the North wall, near a little " door which opens to one of the Prebendal houſes. " This Heylin affirms from his own knowledge, he " being invited to Drayton's funeral (46)."

We ſhall cloſe this article with one of Drayton's Sonnets, a ſpecies of poetry borrowed from Italy, and greatly cultivated by our older poets; which alſo has lately been revived amongſt us with uncommon eagerneſs, and in a few inſtances with remarkable ſucceſs. Mrs. Charlotte Smith, not to mention others, will immediately occur to the minds of our readers.

(47) Headley's ſelect Beauties of Ancient Engliſh Poetry.

Since this note was written, we have met with a paper in the " Gentleman's Magazine, entitled " Michael Drayton Defended;" in which, beſides pointing out ſeveral of the beauties of his poetry, the author goes ſo far as even to vindicate the Alexandrine meaſure of the Poly-Olbion (48). But in this point we can by no means agree with the anonymous critic. An Alexandrine line, in itſelf, may be very noble; but, as it almoſt uniformly requires the cæſura or pauſe to be placed on the ſixth ſyllable, it cannot admit that variety in the verſification which is abſolutely neceſſary in a long poem, and without which a poetical production, however excellent in other reſpects, muſt appear tedious in the reading.

 [DRUMMOND (William), an ingenious writer, and very eminently diſtinguiſhed by his poetical talents, was born in Scotland, on the 13th of December, 1585 (a). He was ſon to Sir John Drummond [A]; and was probably born at his father's ſeat at Hawthornden. He was ſent to the High School at Edinburgh, where his abilities rendered him conſpicuous even in his youth; and he was afterwards removed to the Univerſity of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (b). When he quitted the Univerſity, he was far from imagining that he had completed his ſtudies. He conſidered himſelf as having only commenced them; and, therefore, employed himſelf, for ſome years after, in the diligent peruſal of the beſt writers of antiquity (c). In 1606, when he had attained the age of twenty-one years, he was ſent by his father into France; and at Bourges he ſtudied the civil law with great diligence. He not only committed to writing the lectures of the profeſſors in that city, but alſo wrote down his own obſervations upon them; which afterwards communicating to the preſident Lockhart, he declared, that if Mr. Drummond had followed the practice of the law, " he might have made the beſt figure of any lawyer in his time (d)." Having continued four years abroad, he returned to Scotland again in 1610, in which year his father died. It was now ſuppoſed by his friends, who had conceived a high opinion of his talents, and who knew that he had made a conſiderable proficiency in the ſtudy of the law, that he would have engaged in that profeſſion, as affording the faireſt proſpect for the advancement of his fortune. But neither the ſtudy of the law, nor the fatigue

[A] Son to Sir John Drummond.] It is ſaid that his father, 'Sir John Drummond, of Hawthornden, 'was a man of great worth.' It is added, that 'he 'was Gentleman-Uſher to King James VI. but did 'not enjoy that place long, being in three months 'afterwards taken away by death. He was imme- 'diately deſcended of the Drummonds of Carnock; 'and they, 300 years before that, (about the ſame 'time that Annabella Drummond was Queen of 'Scotland), came of the houſe of Stobhall, the chief 'of the name of Drummond; which, for antiquity, 'honour, honeſty, and loyalty, is inferior to no 'family in the nation (1).' We are likewiſe informed, that our author's mother was 'Suſannah 'Fowler, daughter to Sir William Fowler, Secretary 'to Queen Anne. She was a woman of excellent 'breeding, and of a good and virtuous life (2).'

(1) Life of W. Drummond of Hawthornden, prefixed to his Works, p. i.
(2) Id. ibid.

Another writer obſerves, that the family of Drummond 'became firſt diſtinguiſhed by the marriage of 'Robert III. whoſe Queen was ſiſter to William 'Drummond of Carnock, their anceſtor, as appears 'by the patents of that King, and James I. the one 'calling him " our brother," the other, " our uncle " (3)."

attending the practice, were agreeable to his taſte, which led him to the cultivation of polite literature. He, therefore, retired to his houſe at Hawthornden, which is ſaid to have been "a ſweet and ſolitary ſeat, and very fit and proper for the Muſes (e);" and here he employed himſelf in reading Greek and Roman authors, and in the production of ſome of his own compoſitions. After a recovery from a dangerous fit of illneſs, he wrote here his "Cypreſs Grove," a proſe piece, containing reflections on death, and on the vanity of human life. About the ſame time he alſo wrote his "Flowers of Sion, or Spiritual Poems [B]." Theſe, together with ſome other poems, and his "Cypreſs Grove [C]," were printed in his life-time at Edinburgh (f).

(f) Ibid. p. 4.

His retirement, and application to his ſtudies, did not prevent his becoming enamoured with a young and beautiful lady of the name of Cunningham, who was deſcended from an antient and honourable family. He paid his addreſſes to her, obtained her conſent to their union, and the day was fixed for the celebration of their nuptials. But, unhappily, ſhe was ſuddenly taken with a fever, which put a period to her life (g). This event ſo much affected him, that he could no longer enjoy his retirement, nor proſecute his ſtudies with tranquillity. In order to diſſipate his melancholy, he, therefore, reſolved to travel into foreign countries; and he continued abroad about eight years. He travelled through all Germany, France, and Italy; but his chief places of reſidence were Rome and Paris. The moſt conſiderable foreign univerſities were viſited by him; and he converſed with many men eminent for literature in the courſe of his travels. He alſo made an excellent collection of the beſt Greek and Latin authors [D], and of valuable books

'Of this fair volume, which we world do name,
'If we the ſheets and leaves could turn with care,
'Of him who it corrects, and did it frame,
'We clear might read the art and wiſdom rare;
'Find out his power, which wildeſt powers doth tame,
'His providence extending every where,
'His juſtice which proud rebels doth not ſpare,
'In every page, no, period of the ſame.
'But ſilly we, like fooliſh children, reſt
'Well pleas'd with colour'd vellum, leaves of gold,
'Fair dangling ribbands, leaving what is beſt,
'On the great writer's ſenſe ne'er taking hold;
'Or if by chance we ſtay our minds on aught,
'It is ſome picture on the margin wrought (4).'

'Thrice happy he, who by ſome ſhady grove,
'Far from the clam'rous world, doth live his own,
'Tho' ſolitary, who is not alone,
'But doth converſe with that eternal love:
'O how more ſweet his birds harmonious moan,
'Or the hoarſe ſobbings of the widow'd dove,
'Than thoſe ſmooth whiſperings near a Prince's throne,
'Which good make doubtful, do the evil approve!
'O how more ſweet is Zephyr's wholeſome breath,
'And ſighs embalm'd, which new-born flow'rs unfold,
'Than that applauſe vain honour doth bequeath?
'How ſweet are ſtreams to poiſon drank in gold?
'The world is full of horrors, troubles, ſlights,
'Woods harmleſs ſhades have only true delights (5).'

'More oft than once, Death whiſper'd in mine ear,
'Grave what thou hear'ſt in diamond and gold,
'I am that monarch whom all monarchs fear,
'Who have in duſt their far-ſtretch'd pride uproll'd.
'All, all is mine beneath Moon's ſilver ſphere,
'And nought, ſave Virtue, can my power with-hold.
'This (not believ'd) experience true thee told,
'By danger late when I to thee came near.
'As bugbear then my viſage I did ſhow,
'That of my horrors thou right uſe might'ſt make,
'And a more ſacred path of living take:
'And ſtill walk armed for my ruthleſs blow.
'Truſt flattering life no more, redeem time paſt,

[C] His Cypreſs Grove.] This is ſaid, by the writer of his life, to be 'a piece of excellent proſe, 'both for the ſublimity and piety of the thoughts, 'and for the fineneſs of the ſtyle. In it he repreſents the vanity and inſtability of human affairs, 'teaches the contempt of the world, propoſes conſolations againſt the fears of death, and gives us a 'view of eternal happineſs (7).'

[D] An excellent Collection of the beſt Greek and Latin authors, &c.] It is obſerved, by the author of his life prefixed to his Works, publiſhed in 1711, that ſome of the books collected by Mr. Drummond were 'yet to be ſeen at Hawthornden, in the poſſeſſion 'of his ſon Sir William Drummond; who, as he 'poſſeſſes his father's eſtate, ſo he does inherit many 'of his virtues, eſpecially that great honour, honeſty, 'and loyalty, which were ſo conſpicuous in our 'author. He gave a noble preſent of rare books and 'manuſcripts to the College of Edinburgh, where 'he was educated; and it is one of the moſt curious 'collections of any in that library. The catalogue of 'the books is printed anno 1627, with an excellent 'preface in ornate Latin, about the advantage and 'honour of libraries, written by himſelf (8).'

(8) P. 3.

Among his proſe pieces, are alſo the following obſervations, in Engliſh, on Libraries:

'As we find republicks to have flouriſhed in power 'and glory, ſo do we find them to have been eminent 'and come to the height in knowledge and letters; 'and as they builded arſenals and ſtore-houſes for 'arms to ſerve in time of war, ſo did they libraries, 'furniſhed with books for peace and war. Wits, 'howſoever pregnant and great, without books, are 'but as valiant ſoldiers without arms, and artizans 'deſtitute of tools. Of theſe did ariſe the many 'ſchools in the world, and moſtly in Europe, which 'by the bounty of ſo many renowned Princes have 'been ſo amply privileged: and theſe great men were 'not ſo much beholden to arms and their conqueſts, 'whilſt they lived, as after their deaths to letters; 'for neither their monuments of marble, nor braſs, 'nor gold, no not the diamond itſelf, are able ſo 'to preſerve the glory of their actions, as are ſome 'few ſheets of paper. Eſtates and republicks owe 'much to thoſe, who like torches waſte themſelves 'to ſhine and give light to others; but without theſe 'fathers of their countries, who endeavour to preſerve 'and communicate to poſterity what theſe ingeniouſly 'have done, their works ſhould be little better than 'ſpiders' webs: for what availeth the writing of 'books, if they be not preſerved; and how many 'excellent pieces, by the barbarity and negligence of 'ages have periſhed? To omit ancient times, as 'Ptolemæus-Philadelphus, who erected that famous 'library in Alexandria, the Ulpian library of Trajan, 'and that of Piſiſtratus in Athens, how much is 'Florence adebted to the noble Laurentius of Medices, 'for his library, and to Beſſarion, once Biſhop of 'Nice, who at his death devouted to it a library, valued 'at Thirty Thouſand Crowns? And what oweth 'Oxford, nay this iſle, to the moſt worthy Bodley, 'whoſe library, perhaps, containeth more excellent 'books, than the ancients by all their curious ſearch 'could books in the French, Spaniſh, and Italian languages. Having made this long ſtay abroad, he returned again to his native country, which he found in a ſtate of great confuſion and anarchy. He retired, therefore, to the ſeat of his brother-in-law, Sir John Scot, of Scotſtarvat, who was a man of letters, and with whom he made ſome ſtay: and it is ſuppoſed to have been about this time that he wrote his "Hiſtory of "the Five James's, Kings of Scotland [E]." He lived the greateſt part of his life in an unmarried ſtate; but having accidentally fallen in company with Elizabeth Logan, grand-daughter of Sir Robert Logan, he fancied ſhe had a great reſemblance to his firſt miſtreſs, whoſe idea was ſtill deeply impreſſed upon his mind, he became enamoured of her, and married her, after he had attained his forty-fifth year, and had by her ſeveral children. After his marriage, he lived in a retired manner at Hawthornden, and repaired his houſe with this inſcription: Divino munere Gulielmus Drummondus ab Hawthornden, Joannis Equitis aurati filius, ut honeſto otio quieſceret, ſibi & ſucceſſoribus inſtauravit, 1638 (b). The civil war which broke out about this time was a ſubject of great affliction to him; for he was much attached to the king and to the church; and, therefore, wrote many pieces in ſupport of regal and eccleſiaſtical claims. His zeal for the royal cauſe often involved him in inconveniences [F]; and his grief, on account of King

(b) Life, ut ſupra; p. 4, 6.

'could find? Our academies in former times were 'much beholden to their founders and benefactors for 'many goodly books; but by the nonage of our 'Princes, and the fury of Civil Wars, they, with 'many other monuments, had their fatal period; 'which loſs, by the liberality of our Moſt Gracious 'Prince Charles (when we ſhall be ſo happy as to be 'remembered) may be repaired; under whom the 'riſing and growth of libraries may prove as fortu-'nate, portending good ſucceſs, as the burning of 'the library of Antioch was counted and proved 'ominous to the Emperor Jovian.

'To ſuch a worthy work all the lovers of learn-'ing ſhould conſpire and contribute; and of ſmall 'beginnings who is ignorant what great effects may 'follow? If, perhaps, we will conſider the beginnings 'of the greateſt libraries of Europe, (as Democritus 'ſaid of the world, that it was made up of atoms) 'we ſhall find them but ſmall; for, how great ſoever 'in their preſent perfection they are now, theſe Car-'thages were once Magalia.

'Libraries are as foreſts, in which not only tall 'cedars and oaks are to be found, but buſhes too 'and dwarfiſh ſhrubs; and, as in Apothecaries ſhops 'all ſorts of drugs are permitted to be, ſo may all 'ſorts of books be in a library; and as they, out of 'vipers and ſcorpions, and poiſoning vegetables, 'extract often wholeſome medicaments, for the life 'of mankind; ſo, out of whatſoever book, good in-'ſtructions and examples may be acquired.

'In ſundry parts of the earth there were but ſeven 'wonders diſperſed: in one noble library many more 'worthy of greater admiration, and of greater ex-'cellency, are together to be found.

'As good huſband-men plant trees in their times, 'of which the after-age may reap the fruit, ſo ſhould 'we; and, what antiquity hath done for us, do for 'poſterity, that letters and learning do not decay, 'but ever flouriſh to the honour of God, the publick 'utility, and the conſervation of Humane Society.

'One ſaid of good Princes, that all their names 'might be drawn within the gem of one ring; but, 'we hope, by time, a volume may be compoſed of 'the names of ſuch, who conſpiring againſt barbarity, 'and the roughneſs of the former age, have thought 'it no diſhonour to make the Muſes beholden to their 'liberality, which, that others (who will follow their 'example) may know they have not offered to ob-'livion and ingratitude; (leaving their due to be given 'them by the after-times) we have been daring to 'regiſter in the temple of memory; which can be no 'diſadvantage to the living, and may ſerve to the 'dead for an unpoliſhed epitaph, by which they 'ſhall not all die.'

[E] Hiſtory of the Five James's, Kings of Scotland.] This work was firſt publiſhed about ſix or ſeven years after the author's death; and it was re-printed, in 8vo. in 1681. It is ſomewhat amuſing to obſerve the different characters which have been given of this hiſtorical production. Mr. Granger ſays, 'William 'Drummond was a man of fine natural genius, which 'he aſſiduouſly improved with all the advantages of 'arts, languages, and travel. He was univerſally 'eſteemed one of the beſt poets of his age, and 'ſtands in the firſt rank of modern hiſtorians. He, 'for his excellence in telling a ſtory, and intereſting 'his reader in what he relates, is thought to be 'comparable to Livy. His poems conſiſt chiefly of 'Love-Verſes, Epigrams, and Epitaphs. His hiſtory is 'of Five Kings of Scotland of the name of James (9).' Mr. Pinkerton, on the contrary, ſays of this work, that it is 'the moſt deplorable performance that ever aſpired 'to the name of hiſtory, full of falſe orations, falſe 'brilliancy, falſe ſenſe, and falſe facts. But his 'poems amply eſtabliſh his fame (10).' We confeſs, that we do not think very highly of this production of Drummond's; nor can we find much reſemblance between Livy and Drummond as hiſtorical writers. Our author has certainly given a very partial account of the reigns of the Princes concerning whom he writes, and has vindicated or palliated ſome of their moſt atrocious actions. The work alſo contains very ſervile and abſurd political ſentiments and obſervations. In one place he ſays, 'The choice a Prince maketh 'of men, whom he advanceth to great employments, 'is not ſubject to any man's cenſure. And, were it 'bad, yet ought it to be paſſed over, if not approved, 'leſt the diſcretion and judgement of the Prince be 'queſtioned, and his reputation wounded (11).' And in another place he remarks, that 'the death of ſuch 'who are ſuſpected to be the authors of diſorders in 'a commonwealth ſpareth an infinite number of lives, 'and much civil blood when they are firſt ſurprized; 'neither are too ſtrict circumſtances of law to be obſerved, 'when a ſmall delay may aboliſh all obſerving of 'order and laws (12).'

[F] His zeal for the royal cauſe often involved him in inconveniences.] The writer of his life ſays, 'Being reputed a malignant, he was extremely har-'raſſed by the prevailing party; and for his verſes 'and diſcourſes frequently ſummoned before their 'circular tables (13).'

(13) P. 10.

We are alſo told, that though 'he was a great 'cavalier, and much addicted to the King's party; 'yet he was forced to ſend men to the army which 'fought againſt the King; and his eſtate lying in 'three different ſhires, he had not occaſion to ſend 'one entire man, but halfs and quarters, and ſuch 'like fractions; upon which he wrote extempore the 'following verſes to his Majeſty:

'Of all theſe forces rais'd againſt the King,
'Tis my ſtrange hap not one whole man to bring,
'From divers pariſhes, yet divers men,
'But all in halfs and quarters; great King, then,
'In halfs and quarters if they come 'gainſt thee,
'In halfs and quarters ſend them back to me.
'Or,
'In legs and arms ſend thou them back to me (14).'

In 1645, he received the following protection from the Marquis of Montroſe:

He died on the 4th of December, 1649, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age; and was interred in his own iſle, in the Church of Leſſwade, near to his houſe of Hawthornden (i). Throughout his whole life he was fond of literature and retirement, and had little inclination for riches or honours. He was well acquainted with the beſt Greek and Latin authors, and is ſaid to have been a maſter of the Italian, Spaniſh, and French languages. He ſometimes amuſed himſelf with playing at cheſs, and was a ſkilful player on the lute [G]. [H] Sir William Alexander, afterwards Earl of Stirling.] In a letter, written by Mr. Drummond to Sir William Alexander in 1623, he complains of the mortality of that year, and of the number of friends that he had loſt. It appears alſo from this letter, that he had ſome faith in aſtrology. The letter is as follows:

" To Sir William Alexander.

" SIR,

" MY ſilence this time paſt proceeded no ways of " any forgetfulneſs of you, but from my many new " cares and ſorrows. The loſs of ſo many friends " this ſeaſon hath eſtranged me from myſelf, and " turned my mirth into mourning; what civil arms " and diſcord have performed in other kingdoms of " Europe, a ſtill mortality hath done in this. So " many funerals theſe many years have not been ſeen " as in this one. There are few bands of kindred, " ſocieties, acquaintances, or friendſhip, which, by " death, are not broken here, without reſpect of " age, vigour, rank, or quality: and juſtly this " mortality might claim the name of peſtilence, if the " dead were deprived of cuſtomary burial. Weil " have ſome aſtrological Divines gueſſed that this " year ſhould be the great judgement. What is re- " corded of the years 100 and 120, that church-yards " were not ample enough to contain the dead bodies, " but that new ground was digged up, is true in " this; and what of the year 1348, that the third of " mankind was ſweeped from the earth; we may ſay, " that though this country hath not loſt the third, " yet that the Almighty Providence hath taken away " the tenth part of the people. This is (perhaps) a " part of that judgement which the late blazing " lights of Heaven did ſignify unto us, the defects " of the ſun, beſides the malignant influences of other " celeſtial bodies. This one year is enough to make " men hereafter, if not altogether believe, yet fear " aſtrological predictions; which, though they fail " in particulars, yet ſtrangely hold true in ſome " generals. Heavens, I hope, ſhall preſerve you " ad molliora et meliora tempora; to be a witneſs and " recorder of their juſt proceeding on this globe of " the earth, for the good of yourſelf, your friends, " and all that love you.

" W. Drummond (17)." (17) Works, p. 144.

It is, however, remarkable, that in another of his letters, to another perſon, probably written at a different time, Mr. Drummond expreſſes himſelf in very ſtrong terms againſt aſtrology. He ſays, 'I never 'found any greater folly in the actions of men than 'to ſee ſome buſy themſelves to underſtand the future 'accidents of their lives. This knowledge of things 'to come, not revealed to us, is no ways needful for 'us. Whereſoever this ſuperſtition is once received, 'men are driven, and, as it were, haunted with 'furies, and are deprived of all calmneſs, quietneſs 'and reſt. I never knew any who had recourſe to 'thoſe unlawful curioſities who lived the ordinary 'age of man. God omnipotent, removing his grace 'from them giveth them over to fall under the fate 'of their own fears. By the credulity and violent 'deſire of him who inquireth to know theſe things, 'aſtrological predictions come to paſs, not by the 'nature of the things themſelves, which are fortui- 'tous events, and have no natural cauſes, being 'voluntary. The miſtakings and uncertainties of 'theſe predictions ſhould make us contemn them, 'Aſtrologi fingunt, non docent (18).

(18) Ibid. p. 147.

[I] He correſponded with Drayton.] The following letters of Mr. Drummond to Drayton are publiſhed among our author's familiar epiſtles. They are both addreſſed " To the Right Worſhipful, Mr. Michael " Drayton, Eſq."

" SIR,

" I have underſtood by Mr. Davis, the direction " he received from you, to ſalute me here; which " undeſerved favour I value above the commenda- " tions of the greateſt and mightieſt in this iſle; " though I have not had the fortune to ſee you, " (which ſight, is but like the near view of pictures " in tapeſtry) yet, almoſt ever ſince I could know " any, ye have been to me known and beloved. " Long ſince, your amorous (and truly heroical) " epiſtles did raviſh me; and lately your moſt happy " Albion put me into a new trance; works (moſt " excellent portraits of a rarely indued mind) " which (if one may conjecture of what is to come) " ſhall be read, in ſpite of envy, ſo long as men " read books. Of your great love, courteſy, and " generous diſpoſition, I have been informed by " more than one, of the worthieſt of this country; " but what before was only known to me by fame, I " have now found by experience: your goodneſs " preventing me in that duty, which a ſtrange baſh- " fulneſs, or baſhful ſtrangeneſs, hindered me to " offer unto you. latter of whom had ſo high a reſpect for Drummond's abilities, and ſo great a deſire to ſee him, that, at the age of forty-five, he walked to Hawthornden to viſit him [K]. Their attachment, however, appears not to have been quite reciprocal; for the account given by Drummond of Jonſon, which is publiſhed in his works (k), is a very unfavourable one. The poetical talents of Drummond were very great; and it has been remarked by a late writer, that "among all the writers, at the beginning of the laſt "century, who flouriſhed after the death of Shakeſpeare, there is not one, whom a "general reader of the Engliſh poetry of that age will regard with ſo much, and ſo "deſerved attention, as William Drummond (l)." The ſame writer ſays, that "his "thoughts are often, nay generally, bold and highly poetical. He follows nature; "and his verſes are delicately harmonious (m) [L]." Mr. Pinkerton ſtiles Drummond "a Poet of the moſt amiable and exquiſite genius;" and remarks, that "it may ſafely "be ſaid, that if any poems poſſeſs a very high degree of that exquiſite Doric delicacy, "which we ſo much admire in Comus, &c. thoſe of Drummond do. Milton may often "be traced in him; and he had certainly read and admired him (n). Some of his Sonnets [M] and Poems were printed at Edinburgh in 4to. in 1616; and there is ſaid to

Mr. Boſwell ſays, 'We ſurveyed Roſlin Caſtle, the 'romantic ſcene around it, and the beautiful Gothic 'chapel, and dined and drank tea at the inn; after 'which we proceeded to Hawthornden, and viewed 'the caves; and I all the while had Rare Ben in my 'mind, and was pleaſed to think that this place was 'now viſited, by another celebrated wit of Eng-'land (20).'

[L] His verſes are delicately harmonious.] It is farther obſerved by the writer above referred to, that, 'on the death of Henry prince of Wales, in 1612, 'Drummond wrote an elegy intitled, "Tears on the "Death of Moeliades;" a name which that prince 'had uſed in all his challenges of martial ſport, as the 'anagram of "Miles a Deo." In this poem are lines, 'according to Denham's terms, as ſtrong, as deep, 'as gentle, and as full, as any of his or Waller's. 'The poet laments the fate of the prince, that he died 'not in ſome glorious cauſe of war. "Againſt the "Turk," he ſays, "thou hadſt ended the life and "the Chriſtian war together:

'Or, as brave Bourbon, thou hadſt made old Rome,
'Queen of the world, thy triumph and thy tomb.

'Of the lamentation of the river Forth,

'And, as ſhe ruſh'd her Cyclades among,
'She ſeem'd to 'plain that heav'n had done her wrong.

'Farther,

'Tagus did court his love with golden ſtreams,
'Rhine with her towns, fair Seine with all ſhe claims;
'But ah, poor lovers! death did them betray,
'And, unſuſpected, made their hopes his prey.

'And concludes,

'The virgins to thy tomb will garlands bear
'Of flow'rs, and with each flow'r let fall a tear.
'Moeliades ſweet courtly nymphs deplore,
'From Thule to Hydaſpes' pearly ſhore.

'Perhaps there are no lines in Pope, of which the 'eaſy flow may be more juſtly admired than of thoſe 'in his third paſtoral:

'Not bubbling fountains to the thirſty ſwain,
'Not balmy ſleep to lab'rers faint with pain,
'Not ſhow'rs to larks, or ſunſhine to the bee,
'Are half ſo charming as thy ſight to me.

'When king James, firſt after his acceſſion to the 'Engliſh throne, returned to Scotland in 1617, his 'arrival was celebrated by every effort of poetical 'congratulation. Upon this occaſion Drummond 'compoſed a panegyric, intitled "The Wandering "Muſes; or, The River of Forth Feaſting," in 'which are found four lines apparently imitated by 'Pope in the above paſſage, and which do not, in 'point of harmony, fall much ſhort of that imitation. 'He ſays,

"To virgins, flow'rs; to ſun-burnt earth, the rain;
"To mariners, fair winds amidſt the main;
"Cool ſhades to pilgrims whom hot glances burn,
"Are not ſo pleaſing as thy bleſt return."

'Of theſe two poems of Drummond, it is obſer-'vable, that the firſt was written in 1612, the laſt in '1617. The earlieſt piece of Waller is that to the 'King on his Navy, in 1625. The piece in which 'Sir John Denham's greateſt force lies, Cooper's 'Hill, was not written till 1640. The harmony of 'Drummond, therefore, at a time when thoſe, who 'are uſually called the firſt introducers of a ſmooth 'and poliſhed verſification, had not yet begun to 'write, is an honour to him that ſhould never be 'forgotten. Nor is his excellence half enough 'praiſed or acknowledged.

'Drummond and Petrarca had this in common, 'that each lamented, firſt the cruelty, and then the 'loſs, of his miſtreſs: ſo that their ſonnets are alike 'naturally divided into two parts; thoſe before, and 'thoſe after, their ſeveral miſtreſſes' deaths. It may 'juſtly be doubted that, among all the Sonneteers in 'the Engliſh language, any one is to be preferred to 'Drummond. He has ſhewn, in ſome of theſe com-'poſitions, nearly the ſpirit of Petrarca himſelf.

'The ſeventh ſonnet, of the firſt part, has much 'reſemblance to Sir William Wotton's elegant little 'Poem, on the Queen of Bohemia, Ye meaner beau-'ties, &c. Among Drummond's "Flowers of Sion," 'the Poem which begins, Amidſt the azure clear—Of 'Jordan's ſacred ſtreams, eminently diſtinguiſhes him, 'whether he be conſidered as a Philoſopher, or a 'Poet.' [N] Some political tracts.] One of theſe is a piece called "Irene: a Remonſtrance for Concord, Amity, "and Love, among his Majeſty's Subjects; written "after his Declaration publiſhed at Edinburgh, 22d. "of September, 1638." This performance contains very groſs flattery reſpecting Charles I. and the principles of paſſive obedience and non reſiſtance are ſtrongly inculcated in it. Among other paſſages of this kind are the following: 'Love naturally beginneth 'at the moſt perfect: God loved us before we could 'love him: the father loveth the children, and the 'children after love the father: it doth not conſiſt, 'except by a certain reflexion, and a reciprocal 'being. The Prince hath deſcended from his throne, 'laying down as it were his greatneſs and power 'ſovereign, ſeeming to diminiſh himſelf, only re-'taining his fatherly love to receive us into peace and 'amity with him, (whom, if his goodneſs had not 'balanced his greatneſs, he had never accepted but 'amidſt the horrors of arms) and ſhall not we run, 'nay, take wings, with acclamations, applauſes, 'lengthened ſhouts, and burſting joys to meet him; 'and carry that ſame affection towards him (though 'not of that height and extenſion) which he hath 'carried towards us? The Prince, that vital ſpirit 'of the commonwealth, which giveth life to ſo 'many millions of lives, the faireſt image of God 'upon earth; the beſt of all chriſtian Kings, who 'truly ſerveth the true God. What ſuſpicions, 'doubts, falſe fears, miſrepreſentations, have been 'amongſt us, they proceed and come all from our-'ſelves, and remain amongſt ourſelves; reſembling 'thoſe dampiſh fogs and miſts which maſk the ſons 'and

' and mountains, but never approach nor reach the ' clear body of the ſun, which is the Prince (28).'— ' Obedience being the ſtrongeſt pedeſtal of concord, ' and concord the principal pillar of ſtate, we ſhould ' always embrace and follow her, if we would enjoy ' civil happineſs; or, at leaſt, uſe her as a bridle, ' helm, and ſtay to our wild perturbations and diſ- ' ordered paſſions. Imagine in the ſtatutes, edicts, ' and ordinances of Princes, there be many things ' contrary to our opinions, and which do diſpleaſe ' us; to ſuch difficulties, contrarieties, and differences, ' let us apply the remedies of patience and obedience. ' For it is not lawful for a ſubject to be a ſyndick of ' the actions of his Prince in matters of ſtate, being ' for the moſt part ignorant of the ſecret cauſes and ' motives upon which they are grounded: it belong- ' ing only to God Almighty (the ſearcher of all ' hearts) to cenſure and judge the actions of Princes, ' from whom alone they have immediately their royal ' power and ſovereignty. In the proceedings of ' Princes, that which is unknown to the ſubject is ' often more pregnant in ſtate, and more expedient ' than that of which he findeth the reaſon. Princes ' having that preheminence and particular bleſſing ' from God, to be inſtructed in what is moſt for the ' weal of their people, more than the people them- ' ſelves; as phyſicians, who know what is convenient ' and moſt healthful for their patients, and more ' than they themſelves (29).'—' If the Prince holdeth ' not his crown of you, but of God (who diſtributeth ' honours as it ſeemeth beſt unto him) and the antient ' laws of his kingdom; if his crown be not by elec- ' tion, but by a lineal ſucceſſion; if he be not a con- ' ditional Prince, but an abſolute Sovereign; if he ' be lawfully inveſted, anointed, and crowned: why ' ſhould ye ſervants give a law to your maſter? What ' honours, riches, greatneſs, you enjoy, you have all ' from your Kings his anceſtors; and you owe him ' all ſubjection, ſervice, and obedience: who aſſume ' and uſurp the rights of their Sovereign, the laws of ' God and man proclaim worthy of death. Good ' Princes ſhould be obeyed, yea, evil Princes ſhould ' be tolerated. God, who raiſed Kings above you, ' holdeth himſelf wronged in their wrongs, and re- ' vengeth the injuries done unto them. Though ' they ſhould, in ſome things, go beyond their duties, ' they are not to be judged by their ſubjects; for no ' power within their dominions is ſuperior to theirs ' (30).'

(29) Ibid. p. 165, 166.

(30) Ibid. p. 168.

Mr. Drummond, however, exhorts the King, though in very ſervile language, to ſome degree of moderation, and not to carry matters to extremities againſt his ſubjects; 'Moſt gracious Sovereign, ' how thy prudence hath been great, thy goodneſs ' without example! The farther we are diſtant from ' thy preſence, the more bountifully haſt thou deigned ' to glance upon us, and give us the fairer aſpect of ' thy virtues. Thou haſt pitied our weakneſs; thou ' haſt not anſwered our ſtubborneſs; knowing that ' the beſt way not to be revenged of our inſolences ' was not to be like unto us. What couldeſt thou ' have done more, what ſhouldeſt thou have done ' leſs, for that diſtracted and diſtreſſed country in ' which thou waſt born? And now, ſir, (if ever this ' paper ſhall have the happineſs to kiſs your royal ' hands) as you have hitherto graciouſly caſt an eye ' upon your antient kingdom, diſdain not to liſten to ' theſe her humble ſupplications and laſt groans; ' behold her, proſtrate at your feet, come to ex- ' hibit and ſhew forth her woful eſtate and condition.

" Many (ſaith ſhe) have been my miſeries, many " my ſorrows: the open invaſions of foreigners in " antient times, the ſecret plots and conſpiracies of " mine own thereafter: the beholding of my ſanc- " tuaries defaced; my temples equalled with the " ground; my towns ranſacked; my painful " ſtruggles under the bondage of moſt terrible " governors, tolerating what their malice could in- " vent, or their boldneſs attempt; the calamities of " a rigorous and pitileſs heaven; the barbarous daily " feuds of mine inhabitants among themſelves at " home; the ſlaughters and deſtructions of them " among ſtranger-nations abroad. But no grievance, " no chance, no diſaſter, hath ſo perplexedly en- " cumbered me, and caſt me down, as that the many " merits, benefits, favours of your bleſſed father " forgot, the graciouſneſs, the goodneſs of yourſelf " deſpiſed in the midſt of your engagements in the " neighbour-wars and troubles of Europe; my " nurſelings (diſtaining themſelves with ingratitude) " ſhould have adventured to leave in the minds of " their race and poſterity a ſuſpicion, that they did " take their blood and deſcent from men branded " with any mark of Leſe Majeſty or rebellion. Alas, " ſir, they have not known about what they have " been diſquieting themſelves, what ſhould have been " the event of their raſh proceedings! This hath " been in them a fideration, the blaſting of ſome " unhappy influence, deſerving rather pity than " puniſhment: and though again deſpiſing the health- " ful counſels of their friends, they ſhould reject " your favours, refuſe fooliſhly your gracious offers, " continue in their ſtubborneſs, and eſſay to run " headlong to their perdition; prove not your power " againſt them; ſhake them not; for in a little time " they will decline and fall."—" Turn not, ſir, " your country into ſhambles, a deſert wilderneſs, a " ſepulchre, a monument of deſolation. By that " duty and reverence you owe to God Almighty, " who placed you to repreſent him upon earth; by " the aſhes and memories of ſo many Kings your " predeceſſors, who here ſo peaceably reigned; by " that charity which is due to me, your native " country: if there be no King ſo good as yourſelf; " if there be no people which more dearly love " their Kings (however now in an ague) than this? " if they have loſt any thing of what they feign to " be liberty, (which is only a power to do what is " convenient); reſtore it unto them; change their " troubles into reſt, their miſeries into proſperity, " their diſſenſions into concord and peace; which, " out of that chaos wherein they now ſtruggle, that " labyrinth wherein they are like to entangle and " loſe themſelves, ſhall relieve and wind them out, " and repair every thing to its firſt luſtre and beauty. " So God ſhall be ſerved, you of all obeyed, and " your deſolate country preſerved from thoſe many " miſeries and dangers which threaten her (31)."

[P] A Macaronic poem, entitled, " Polemo-Middinia inter Vitarvum et Nebernam.] Of this production Dr. Beattie ſpeaks in the following terms: 'There is 'a Poem well known in North Britain, which to a 'Scotchman who underſtands Latin is abundantly 'entertaining. It was written, in the beginning of 'the laſt century, by the famous Drummond of Haw-'thornden. The meaſure is hexameter, the numbers 'Virgilian, and the language Latin mixed with 'broad Scotch. Nothing can be more ludicrous than 'ſuch a jumble. It is dignity and meanneſs in the 'extreme;—dignity of ſound, and meanneſs of words 'and ideas. I ſhall not give a ſpecimen; as the 'humour is local, and rather coarſe, and the images 'though ſtrong, not quite delicate (33).']

 The late Mr. Headley, in his "Select Beauties of "Ancient Engliſh Poetry," though his deſign more particularly confined him to the poets of England, has very judiciouſly enriched his collection with ſeveral of Mr. Drummond's productions. Theſe are ten of his Sonnets, and four other pieces. With regard to the death of the lady whom Drummond was on the point of marrying, Mr. Headley remarks, that "this cir-"cumſtance, to a mind like his, previouſly expoſed "by nature to the anguiſh of the finer feelings, "and by a habit of retirement to reflections of a "ſerious and abſtracted caſt, muſt have had no ſmall "ſhare in tincturing his compoſitions with that in-"tereſting and tender melancholy that takes every "feeling reader with an irreſiſtible charm." "With-"out oſtentatious praiſe," adds Mr. Headley, "which "is always to be ſuſpected, it is but truth to obſerve, "that many of his Sonnets, thoſe more eſpecially which "are diveſted of Italian conceits, reſemble the beſt "Greek epigrams in their beſt taſte, in that exquiſite "delicacy of ſentiment, and ſimplicity of expreſſion, "for which our language has no ſingle term, but which "is known to all claſſical readers by the word ἀφελεια. "It is in vain we lament the fate of many of our "poets, who have undeſervedly fallen a victim to a "premature oblivion, when the finiſhed productions "of this man are little known, and ſtill leſs "read." Mr. Park, of Down-Sreet, Piccadilly, to whoſe obliging communications we are much indebted, (and of which we ſhould have made a larger uſe, had not our article been previouſly arranged), has pointed out ſome lines, wherein Drummond himſelf appears to have been aware of the neglect with which he would probably be attended.

" I know that all the Muſe's heavenly lays " Know what I liſt, this all cannot me move,

" But that, alas! I both muſt write and love."

" May not the following paſſage," ſays the ſame gentleman, " be a delicate alluſion to his having "ſlighted the profeſſion of the bar (which his father "wiſhed him to have purſued) for the charms of claſ-"ſical literature?"

" I changed countries new delights to find;
" But, ah! for pleaſure I did find new paine—
" Enchanting pleaſure ſo did reaſon blind,
" That Father's love and words I ſcorn'd as vaine."

Mr. Park has mentioned another inſtance (beſides that ſpecified in note L.) in which Pope was evidently an imitator of Drummond. It is in the epiſtle to Abelard:

" The crime was common, common be the pain."
POPE.
" The grief was common, common were the cries."

As Drummond was the firſt,—Drummond, that introduced into England the fine Italian vein of poetry,—Mr. Park is of opinion, that, if we had had no Drummond, perhaps we ſhould never have ſeen the delicacies of Comus, Lycidas, Il Penſeroſo, and L'Allegro. But Milton's ſmaller pieces, which, for a time, were neglected, at length have had juſtice done to them; whereas Drummond has not been ſo fortunate.

There have been other editions, in part or in whole, of Drummond's works, beſides thoſe mentioned above, but the principal ones are there deſcribed. The Polemo-Middinia is ſaid to have been reprinted at Oxford, with an excellent Latin preface concerning Macaronic Poetry. A new impreſſion of the ſame poem appeared at Glaſgow in 1779. In the ſame year, and in the ſame city, was publiſhed an indifferent edition of Drummond's Hiſtory of Scotland. One of

of his beſt ſonnets is prefixed to Patrick Gordon's famous "Hiſtory of Fernando and Lariſſa," 1615, and alludes both to Spenſer and Shakſpeare. Another is placed before Lord Stirline's Doomſday. They have not either of them been reprinted. Mr. Pennant intimates, that, at the time when he viſited Hawthornden, the portraits of the poet and his father were both there. The following verſes, by Drummond, were taken from a manuſcript in the author's hand-writing, in the collection of the Earl of Buchan, and are ſuppoſed to have been addreſſed to Drayton—probably on being preſented with a copy of his poems.

"Dum tua melliſlui ſpecto pigmenta libelli,
"Pendet ab eloquio mens mihi rapta tuo;
"At ſenſum expendens, tamque altæ pondera mentis,
"Senſus ab eximio me rapit eloquio:
"Sed mage dædales miror te pectore qui ſic
"Cogis ad Italicos Anglica Verba Modos.
"Eloquium, Senſus, Mentis vis dædala, longe
"Tollit Humo ad Superos te ſuper Aſtra Deos."

This manuſcript, and ſeveral others, were given by Mrs. Abernethy Drummond of Hawthornden, the Poet's heir, to Lord Buchan, and have ſince been depoſited by his Lordſhip in the library of the ſociety, for hiſtory and antiquities in Scotland (35).

(35) All this information we owe to Mr. Pink.

Though it is an undoubted fact that the beauty of Drummond's numbers preceded that of Waller and Denham, we are not hence to imagine that Engliſh poetry had been previouſly deſtitute of harmonious verſification. Spenſer excelled in it in a moſt eminent degree; and there are many muſical lines in Daniel Drayton and Sir John Beaumont, though with ſome harſh mixtures. The truth of the caſe is, that ſeveral of our Engliſh writers degenerated in their verſification, which was in a great meaſure owing to the wretched taſte of compoſition introduced by Donne, and the reſt of the metaphyſical poets. After ſome time, a reformation was begun by Waller, advanced by Denham, and completed by Dryden.

A pleaſant inſtance of macaronic poetry has lately been given by Dr. Geddes, in his humorous deſcription of the public dinner of the Diſſenters at the London Tavern, on occaſion of their attempts to obtain a repeal of the Corporation and Teſt Acts.] K.

DRYDEN (JOHN), one of the moſt eminent poets this country has produced, was ſon of Eraſmus Dryden, of Tichmerſh in Northamptonſhire, third ſon of Eraſmus Dryden, of Canons Aſhby, in the ſame county, Baronet; and was born at Aldwinkle near Oundle in that county, the ninth of Auguſt, 1631 (a). He was educated in grammar-learning at Weſtminſter-ſchool, being King's Scholar there, under the famous Dr. Buſby; and was thence elected, in 1650, a Scholar of Trinity-College in Cambridge (b). During his ſtay at ſchool, he tranſlated the "Third Satire of Perſius" [A] for a Thurſday-night's exerciſe (c); and, the year before he left it, wrote a poem "On "the Death of the Lord Haſtings;" a performance very unworthy of the great poet he afterwards proved. In 1658, he publiſhed "Heroic Stanzas on the late Lord Pro-"tector, written after his Funeral" (d). In 1660, came out his "Aſtræa Redux [B], "a Poem on the happy Reſtoration and Return of his ſacred Majeſty King Charles II" (e); and, the ſame year, his "Panegyrick to the King on his Coronation" (f). In 1662, he addreſſed a poem "To the Lord Chancellor Hyde, preſented on New-Year's-day" (g); and the ſame year publiſhed "A Satire on the Dutch" (h). His next piece was his "Annus Mirabilis: The Year of Wonders, 1666: An Hiſtorical Poem" (i). In 1668, Mr. Dryden, upon the death of Sir William Davenant, was made Poet Laureat and Hiſtoriographer to King Charles II. (k); and, the ſame year, publiſhed his "Eſſay "on Dramatick Poeſy" [C]. 'I remember I tranſlated this Satire, when I was a 'King's ſcholar at Weſtminſter-ſchool, for a Thurſ-'day-night's exerciſe; and I believe that it, and 'many other of my exerciſes of this nature, in Engliſh 'Verſe, are ſtill in the hands of my learned maſter, 'the Reverend Dr. Buſby" (1).

[C] His "Eſſay on Dramatic Poeſy."] It is dedicated to Charles Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex. Mr. Dryden tells his patron, that the writing this Eſſay had ſerved as an amuſement to him in the country when the violence of the plague (in 1665) had driven him from the town; but that he finds many things in it, which he does not now approve, his judgment being not a little altered ſince the writing it. Preſently after he ſays: 'For the way of writing plays in verſe, which 'I have ſeemed to favour, I have, ſince that time, 'laid the practice of it aſide, till I have more leiſure, 'becauſe I find it troubleſome and ſlow. But I am no 'way altered from my opinion of it, at leaſt with any 'reaſons which have oppoſed it. For, your lordſhip 'may eaſily obſerve, that none are very violent againſt 'it, but thoſe who have not either attempted it, or 'who have ill ſucceeded in their attempt.' In the preface to the reader, we are told, that the drift of this diſcourſe was to vindicate the honour of our Engliſh writers from the cenſure of thoſe who unjuſtly prefer the French before them. 'This (ſays Mr. Dryden) I 'intimate, leſt any ſhould think me ſo exceeding vain, 'as to teach others an art, which they underſtand much 'better than myſelf. But if this incorrect Eſſay, writ-'ten in the country, without the help of books, or ad-'vice of friends, ſhall find an acceptance in the world, 'I promiſe to myſelf a better ſucceſs of the ſecond part, 'wherein I ſhall more freely treat of the virtues and 'faults of the Engliſh poets, who have written either 'in this, the epic, or the lyric way.' The Eſſay is drawn up in the form of a dialogue between Eugenius, Crites, Liſideius and Neander. It was animadverted upon by Sir Robert Howard, in the Preface to his "Great Favourite or Duke of Lerma;" to which Mr. Dryden replied in a defence of it, prefixed to the ſecond edition of his "Indian Emperor"

To ſay the truth, this play is ſo indifferent a performance in itſelf, and was ſo ill received, that, if the author had not had a peculiar force of inclination to writing, he would have been ſufficiently diſcouraged from any farther progreſs. II. "The Indian Em-"peror, or, the Conqueſt of Mexico by the Spaniards: "being the Sequel of the Indian Queen:" a Tragi-Comedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal in 1670, and printed in 4to. It is dedicated to the Ducheſs of Monmouth and Buccleugh. It is written in heroic verſe, or rhyme, and appeared on the ſtage with great approbation. The ſtory may be found in Mariana's "Hiſtory of Spain," B. 26, ch. 3; and Sir Paul Ricaut's "Hiſtory of Peru." III. "An Evening "Love, or, The Mock Aſtrologer:" a Comedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to. 1671. It is dedicated to the Duke of Newcaſtle. The principal plot of this play is built on Calderon's "El "Aſtrologo fingido;" and the play is, for the moſt part, taken from Corneille's "Feint Aſtrologue," Moliere's "Dépit Amoureux and Precieuſes Ridicules," and Quinault's "Amant Indiſcret." IV. "Marriage "Alamode: a Comedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to 1673. It is dedicated to the Earl of Rocheſter. This play, though ſtyled a Comedy, is rather a Tragi-Comedy, and conſiſts of two actions, the one ſerious, and the other comic; both borrowed from two ſtories, which the author has tacked together. The ſerious part is founded on the ſtory of Seſoſtris and Timareta in the "Grand Cyrus," Pt. 9. B. 3. and the characters of Palamede and Rodophil on the ſtory of Timantes and Parthenia in the ſame romance, Pt. 6. B. 1. The character of Doralice ſeems borrowed from the ſtory of Norgaret, in a piece called "The Annals of Love;" and Melantha's making court to herſelf, in Rodophil's name, from "Les "Contes d'Ouville," Pt. 1. p. 13. V. "Amboyna:" a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to, 1673. It is dedicated to the Lord Clifford of Chudleigh. The plot of this play is chiefly founded on hiſtory, being an account of the cruelty of the Dutch to our countrymen in Amboyna, A. D. 1618; for which ſee Stubbs's "Relations of the "Dutch Cruelties," &c. and Wanley's "Hiſtory of "Man," B. 4 ch. 10. The Rape of Iſabinda, by Harman is built on a novel in Cynthio Gyraldi, Dec. 5. Nouv. 10. VI. "Miſtaken Huſband: a Comedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to. 1675. Mr. Langbaine tells us (5), Mr. Dryden was not the author of this play, 'though it was adopted by him, 'as an orphan, which might well deſerve the charity 'of a ſcene which he beſtowed on it.' It is in the nature of Low Comedy, or Farce, and written on the model of Plautus's "Menechmi." VIII. "Aurenge-"Zebe, or, The Great Mogul;" a tragedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to. 1676. It is dedicated to the Earl of Mulgrave. The ſtory is related at large in Tavernier's "Voyages in the Indies," Vol. I. Pt. 2. ch. 2. Mr. Langbaine (6) determines, that the characters of Aurenge-Zebe and Nourmahal are borrowed from Seneca's "Phædra and Hippolytus." But whoever conſiders them will ſee, that there is nothing alike through their whole ſtory, excepting only the love of a mother-in-law towards her ſon-in-law, and the ſon-in-law's averſion; and as to the characters (a thing Mr. Langbaine ſeems never to underſtand), Hippolytus has an averſion to love; Aurenge-Zebe is in love: Hippolytus is a hunter; Aurenge-Zebe is a warrior: as for Nourmahal, ſhe is a degree beyond the lewdneſs even of Seneca's Phædra, who degenerates extremely from her original in Euripides, and indeed has none of her qualities, but only revenge for diſappointed love. Mr. Langbaine accuſes our poet likewiſe of theft, in borrowing, or rather imitating, ſeveral paſſages of Seneca in this play. But, with his leave, a poet deſerves praiſe, rather than cenſure, who tranſplants the beauties of antient authors into his own works. This play is written in heroic verſe, or rhyme. VIII. "The Tempeſt, or, The Inchanted "Iſland:" a Comedy, acted at the Duke of York's Theatre, and printed in 4to. 1676. This is only an alteration of Shakſpeare's "Tempeſt," by Sir William Davenant and Mr. Dryden. The characters of the ſailors were chiefly the invention and writing of Sir William, as is acknowledged by Mr. Dryden in the preface. IX. "Feigned Innocence, or Sir Martin "Mar-all:" a Comedy, acted at the Duke of York's Theatre, and printed in 4to. 1678. The foundation of this play is originally French, the greateſt part of the plot, and ſome of the language of Sir Martin, being taken from Quinault's "Amant Indiſcret," and Moliere's "Etourdi." Warner's playing on the lute, inſtead of his maſter, is copied from Du Pare's "Fran-"cion," B. 7; and the hint of Old Moody and Sir John ſeems borrowed from Shakerly Marmion's (*) "Fine Companion." X. "The Aſſignation, or, "Love in a Nunnery:" a Comedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to. 1678. It is dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley. This play, Mr. Langbaine tells us (7), was damn'd on the ſtage, or, as the author expreſſes it in the epiſtle dedicatory, ſucceeded ill in the repreſentation: but, 'whether the fault was in 'the play itſelf, or in the lameneſs of the action, or in 'number of its enemies, who came reſolved to damn 'it for the title,' he will not pretend, any more than the author, to determine. Mr. Ravenſcroft, in the prologue to his "Careleſs Lovers," acted the year following, reflects on this and the preceding play, in theſe lines:

(*) A writer of plays in Charles the First's time.

And yet you wou'd not like the ſerenade;
Nay, and you damn'd his Nuns in maſquerade:
You did his Spaniſh ſing-ſong too abhor;
Ah! que locura con tanto rigor!
In fine, the whole by you ſo much was blam'd,
To act their parts the players were aſham'd.

(‡) Warr erplaying on the lute.

Several of the incidents and characters of this play are borrowed: thoſe of the Duke of Mantua, Frederick, and Lucretia, from the ſtory of Conſtance the Fair Nun, in the "Annals of Love," p. 81. thoſe of Aurelian, Camillo, Laura, and Violetta, from the ſtory of Deſtiny and Star, in Scarron's "Romance of the "Players" (*). Beneto's affectation of muſick is taken from Quinault's Jodelet, in his "Comédie ſans "Comédie;" and Frontona's throwing water on Laura, from Fontaine's "Contes," Pte. 1ère. n. 11. XI. "The State of Innocence, or, the Fall of Man:" an opera, written in heroic verſe, and printed in 4to. in 1678. It is dedicated to her Royal Highneſs the Ducheſs of York, on whom the author paſſes the following extravagant compliment: 'Your perſon is 'ſo admirable, that it can ſcarce receive addition, 'when it ſhall be glorified; and your ſoul, which 'ſhines through it, finds it of a ſubſtance ſo near her 'own, that ſhe will be pleaſed to paſs an age within 'it, and to be confined to ſuch a palace.' To this piece is prefixed "An Apology for Heroic Poetry and "poetic Licence." The ſubject is taken from Milton's "Paradiſe Loſt," and many of that excellent poet's thoughts and expreſſions are copied in this play; but with what ſucceſs the judicious reader will eaſily determine. Mr. Nat. Lee wrote commendatory verſes on this play: and ſpeaks of it in theſe terms:

(*) Or, Comical Romance, as it is miſ-tranſlated.

But theſe lines, as Mr. Dryden himſelf juſtly obſerves in the "Apology," &c. 'ought to be eſteemed the 'effect of Mr. Lee's love to him, rather than his de-'liberate and ſober judgment.' XII. "The Con-"queſt of Granada by the Spaniards," in two parts: two Tragi-Comedies, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to. in 1678. Theſe two plays are dedicated to his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, and were received on the ſtage with great applauſe. The ſtory is to be found in Mariana's "Hiſtory of Spain," B. 25. ch. 18. Thuanus's "Hiſtory," B. 48 and "Guicciardine," l. 12, &c. Mr. Langbaine tells us (8), the characters in theſe plays are all borrowed from French and Spaniſh Romances, particularly Almahide, Grand Cyrus, Ibrahim, and Guſman: but, in truth, that of Almanzor ſeems rather a copy of Homer's Achilles, ill underſtood. Theſe plays are written in heroic verſe, or rhyme. To the firſt is prefixed "An Eſſay on Heroic Plays;" and to the ſecond, "A Defence of the Epilogue, or, An Eſſay on "the Dramatic Poetry of the laſt age." Mr. Richard Leigh, a player in the Duke of York's Theatre, attacked Mr. Dryden's "Conqueſt of Grenada," in a pamphlet, intitled, "A Cenſure of the Rota: On Mr. "Dryden's Conqueſt of Granada:" Oxford 1673, in 4to. This occaſioned ſeveral other pamphlets, particularly, "The Friendly Vindication of Mr. Dryden "from the Cenſure of the Rota;" Cambridge, 1673, in 4to. "Mr. Dryden vindicated, in a Reply to the "Friendly Vindication of Mr. Dryden; with Reflex-"ions on the Rota;" London, 1673, in 4to; and "A Deſcription of the Academy of the Athenian "Virtuoſi, with a Diſcourſe held there in Vindication "of Mr. Dryden's Conqueſt of Grenada, againſt the "author of the Cenſure of the Rota;" London, 1673, in 4to. Mr. Elkenah Settle likewiſe criticiſed on theſe Plays of our author, in a Pamphlet, intitled, "Re-"flexions on ſeveral of Mr. Dryden's Plays; particu-"larly the Firſt and Second Part of the Conqueſt of "Granada; by E. Settle, Gent." London, 1687, in 4to. XIII. "All for Love, or The World well loſt:" a Tragedy, acted at the Theatre-Royal, and printed in 4to. 1678. It is dedicated to the Earl of Danby. This play is written in imitation of Shakſpeare's ſtyle, and is chiefly taken from that author's "Anthony and "Cleopatra." Mr. Dryden tells us (9), he prefers the ſcene betwixt Anthony and Ventidius, in the firſt Act, to any thing he had written in this kind. At the ſame time he acknowledges the introducing of Octavia to be an error in the contrivance of the drama. 'For, though,' ſays he, 'I might uſe the 'privilege of a Poet to introduce her into Alexandria, 'yet I had not enough conſidered, that the compaſſion 'ſhe moved to herſelf and children was deſtructive to 'that which I reſerved for Anthony and Cleopatra; 'whoſe mutual love, being founded upon vice, muſt 'leſſen the favour of the audience to them, when 'virtue and innocence were oppreſſed by it. And 'though I juſtified Anthony in ſome meaſure, by 'making Octavia's departure to proceed wholly from 'herſelf, yet the force of the firſt machine ſtill re-'mained, and the dividing of pity, like the cutting 'of a river into many channels, abated the ſtrength of 'the natural ſtream.' XIV. "Tyrannic Love, or, "The Royal Martyr:" a tragedy, acted at the theatre royal, and printed in 4to, 1679. This play is written in heroic verſe, or rhyme, and dedicated to the Duke of Monmouth. The plot founded on hiſtory. See Zoſim. l. 4. Socrat. l. 5. c. 14. Herodian, l. 7, 8. Jul. Capit. in Vit. Max. Jun. XV. "Troilus and "Creſſida, or, Truth found out too late:" a tragedy, acted at the Duke's theatre, and printed in 4to, 1679. It is dedicated to the Earl of Sunderland, and has a Preface prefixed concerning "the grounds of Criticiſm "in tragedy." This play is originally Shakſpeare's, and reviſed and altered by Mr. Dryden, who added ſeveral new ſcenes; among which the laſt in the third act is allowed, even by Langbaine (10), to be a maſter-piece. The plot was taken by Shakſpeare from Chaucer's "Troilus and Creſſida," which that poet (according to Mr. Dryden) tranſlated from the original ſtory, written in Latin verſe by one Lollius, a Lombard. Mr. R. Duke addreſſed a copy of verſes to our author on occaſion of this play; in which he thus compliments him at the expence of Shakſpeare:

(10) Ib. p. 173.

Shakſpeare, 'tis true, this tale of Troy firſt told;
But, as with Ennius Virgil did of old,
You found it dirt, but you have made it gold.
A dark and undigeſted heap it lay,
Like Chaos ere the dawn of infant-day;
But you did firſt the chearful light diſplay.
Confus'd it was as Epicurus' world
Of atoms, by blind chance together hurl'd;
But you have made ſuch order thro' it ſhine,
As loudly ſpeaks the workmanſhip divine.

XVI. "OEdipus, King of Thebes:" a tragedy, acted at the Duke's Theatre, and printed in 4to, 1679. It was written jointly by Mr. Dryden and Mr. Lee, and is juſtly eſteemed an excellent play. The ſubject has been treated by the beſt dramatic writers in all languages, particularly by Sophocles, Seneca, and M. Corneille. Mr. Dryden, in the Preface, taxes Seneca with 'running after Philoſophical Notions, more pro-'per for the ſtudy than the ſtage;' and accuſes Corneille of failing in the character of his hero, which he calls 'an error in the firſt concoction.' XVII. "Se-"cret Love, or the Maiden Queen:" a tragi-comedy, acted at the theatre-royal, and printed in 4to, 1679. The ſerious part of the plot is founded on the hiſtory of "Cleobuline, Queen of Corinth;" and the characters of Celadon, Florimel, Olinda, and Sabina, are borrowed from the ſtory of Piſiſtrates and Cerintha in the "Grand Cyrus," pt. 9. b. 3. XVIII. "The Ri-val Ladies:" a tragi-comedy, acted at the theatre royal, and printed in 4to, 1679. It is dedicated to the Earl of Orrery. The dedication is in the nature of a preface, in defence of Engliſh verſe, or rhyme. Mr. Langbaine (11) accuſes Mr. Dryden of a groſs miſtake in the preface, where he ſays, 'that the tra-'gedy of Queen Gorbuduc was written in Engliſh 'verſe, and conſequently that verſe was not ſo much a 'new way among us as an old way revived; and 'that this play was written by the late Lord Buckhurſt, 'afterwards Earl of Dorſet.' Mr. Langbaine obſerves, that Gorbuduc was not a Queen, but a King, of the race of Brute; and that the three firſt acts were written by Mr. Thomas Norton; and that the play itſelf is not in rhyme, but blank verſe. Sir Robert Howard, in the preface to his plays, anſwered this preface of Mr. Dryden's. In this play, the diſpute between Amideo and Hippolyto, and Gonſalvo's fighting with the Pirates, in the laſt act, are borrowed from the ſtory of Enclpious, Giton, &c. in Petronius Arbiter; and the cataſtrophe bears a near reſemblance to Scarron's "Rival Brothers." XIX. "The Kind Keeper, "or Mr. Limberham:" a comedy, acted at the Duke's theatre, printed in 4to, 1680. It is dedicated to John Lord Vaughan. Some of the incidents are borrowed from Cynthio Gyraldi's Novels, P. 1. Dec. 3. Nouv. 3. and from the Zelotide of M. de Pais. Mr. Langbaine, who takes this to be the beſt of Mr. Dryden's Comedies, tells us (12), that it ſo much ex-poſed the keeping part of the town, that it was ſtopped after the third night; but that the author took care to omit in the publication what had given offence on the ſtage. A writer of thoſe times concludes a ſhort "Sa-"tire againſt Keeping," with theſe lines (13):

(11) Ib. p. 168.

(12) Ib. p. 164.

(13) Cleve's Poems, p. 94.

Dryden,

Dryden, good man, thought Keepers to reclaim,

This all the herd of Letchers ſtraight alarms;
From Charing-Croſs to Bow was up in arms.
They damn'd the Play all at one fatal blow,
And broke the glaſs that did their picture ſhow.

XX. "The Spaniſh Friar, or, The Double Diſcove-"ry:" a tragi-comedy, acted at the Duke's theatre, and printed in 4to, 1681. It is dedicated to John Lord Haughton. Mr. Langbaine is very angry with Mr. Dryden for the character of the Friar. 'Whether,' (14) Ib. p. 171. ſays he (14), 'Mr. Dryden intended his character of 'Dominick as a ſatire on the Romiſh Prieſts only, or 'on the Clergy of all opinions in general, I know 'not; but ſure I am, that he might have ſpared his 'reflecting quotation in the front of his play;

'Ut melius poſſis fallere, ſume togam.'

'But the truth is, ever ſince a certain worthy Biſhop 'refuſed orders to a certain Poet, Mr. Dryden has de-'clared open defiance to the whole clergy; and, ſince 'the church began the war, he has thought it but 'juſtice to make reprifals on the church. But, what-'ever ſucceſs this way of writing may find from the 'ſparks, it can never be approved of by ſober men, '&c.' The comic parts of Elvira, Lorenzo, &c. are founded on a novel called "The Pilgrim," written by M. S. Bremond. XXI. "The Duke of Guiſe:" a tragedy, acted at the theatre royal, and printed in 4to, 1683. It was written by Mr. Dryden and Mr. Lee, and dedicated to the Earl of Rocheſter. The plot is taken from Davila, Mezerai, and other writers of the French affairs. See alſo Thuanus, I. 93. For the ſtory of Malicorn, the conjuror, read Roſſet's "Hiſ-"toires Tragiques," &c. p. 449. This play gave great offence to the Whigs, and was immediately attacked in a pamphlet, intituled, "A Defence of the "Charter and municipal Rights of the City of Lon-"don, and the Right of other municipal Cities and "Towns of England. Directed to the Citizens of "London. By Thomas Hunt." In this piece Mr. Dryden is charged with condemning the Charter of the City of London, and executing its magiſtrates in effigy, in his "Duke of Guiſe;" a play, 'moſt certainly in-'tended to provoke the rabble into tumults and diſ-'orders.' About the ſame time were printed "Some "Reflexions upon the pretended parallel in the Play "called The Duke of Guiſe." The author of this pamphlet tells us, 'he was wearied with the dulneſs of 'this play, and extremely incenſed at the wicked and 'barbarous deſign it was intended for; that the fierceſt 'Tories were aſhamed of this piece; in ſhort, that he 'never ſaw any thing, that could be called a Play, 'more deficient in wit, good character, or entertain-'ment, than this.' In anſwer to this, and Mr. Hunt's Pamphlet, Mr. Dryden publiſhed, "The Vin-"dication: or, The Parallel of the French Holy "League and the Engliſh League and Covenant, "turned into a Seditious Libel againſt the King and "his Royal Highneſs, by Thomas Hunt, and the "author of Reflexions, &c. London, 1683, 4to." In this Vindication, he tells us, that, in the year of the Reſtoration, the firſt play he undertook was "The "Duke of Guiſe," as the faireſt way, which the act of indemnity had then left, of 'ſetting forth the riſe 'of the late Rebellion;' that at firſt it was thrown aſide, by the advice of ſome friends, to whom he ſhewed it; but that, at the earneſt requeſt of Mr. Lee (with whom he had promiſed to join in another play, after the writing of OEdipus, and who now claimed his promiſe), it was afterwards produced between them; and that only the firſt ſcene, the whole fourth act, and ſomewhat more than half the fifth, belonged to him (Mr. Dryden), all the reſt being Mr. Lee's. XXII. "Albion and Albanius:" an opera, performed at the Queen's Theatre in Dorſet Garden, and printed in folio, 1685. The ſubject of it is wholly allegorical, and intended to expoſe the Lord Shafteſbury and his party, who are repreſented by the man on the pedeſtal, with a long pale face, &c. encompaſſed by ſeveral heads, which ſuck poiſon from his ſide. The muſick for this opera was made by one Grabut; and, Mr. (15) Ib. p 152. Langbaine tells us (15), the following ſatirical lines were made upon this occaſion:

Grabut his yoke-mate n'er ſhall be forgot,
Whom th' God of tunes upon a Muſe begot,
Bays on a double ſcore to him belongs,
As well for writing as for ſetting ſongs:
For ſome have ſworn (th' intrigue ſo odd is laid)
That Bays and he miſtook each other's trade,
Grabut the lines, and he the muſick made.

XXIII. "Don Sebaſtian, King of Portugal:" a tragedy, acted at the theatre-royal, and printed in 4to, 1690. It is dedicated to the Earl of Leiceſter. This play is generally eſteemed one of the beſt of Mr. Dryden's, and was received with great applauſe; though the actors were forced to curtail it after the firſt night, it being, as the author himſelf tells us in the Preface, 'inſupportably too long.' As for the ſtory, or plot, it is chiefly founded on a French novel of the ſame name. XXIV. "King Arthur: or, The Britiſh "Worthy," a tragedy, acted at the theatre in Dorſet Garden, and printed in 4to, 1691. It is dedicated to the Marquis of Halifax. This play is more remarkable for ſinging and fine ſcenery than for any excellence of the drama. The ſtory in general is founded upon Geoffrey of Monmouth's hiſtory: the "In-"chanted Grove," and the character of Oſmond, are taken from Taſſo. XXV. "Amphytrion, or, The "Two Socias," a comedy, acted at the theatre-royal, and printed in 4to. 1691. It is dedicated to Sir Leviſon Gower. This play is taken from Plautus and Moliere. XXVI. "Cleomenes, the Spartan Heroe," a tragedy, acted at the theatre-royal, and printed in 4to, 1692. It is dedicated to the Earl of Rocheſter. There is prefixed to it "The Life of Cleomenes," tranſlated from Plutarch by Mr. Creech. This play was at firſt prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain; but, upon examination, being found innocent of any deſign (as had been ſuggeſted) to ſatirize the government, it was ſuffered to be repreſented, and had great ſucceſs. In the Preface, the author tells us, a foolish objection had been raiſed againſt him by the Sparks, for Cleomenes not accepting the favours of Caſſandra. 'They,' ſays he, 'would not have refuſed a fair lady: 'I grant, they would not; but let them grant me, 'that they are not heroes.' He adds: 'Some have 'told me, that many of the fair ſex complain for want 'of tender ſcenes, and ſoft expreſſions of love. I 'will endeavour to make them ſome amends, if I 'write again; and my next hero ſhall be no Spartan.' XXVII. "Love Triumphant; or, Nature will Pre-"vail:" a tragi-comedy, acted at the theatre-royal, and printed in 4to, 1694. It is dedicated to the Earl of Shafteſbury, and is the laſt Mr. Dryden wrote or intended for the theatre. It met with but indifferent ſucceſs; though in many parts the genius of that great man breaks out, eſpecially in the diſcovery of Alphonſo's ſucceſsful love, and in the cataſtrophe, which is extremely affecting.—Thus, in the ſpace of twenty-five years, Mr. Dryden produced, beſides his other numerous poetical writings, twenty-ſeven plays. As to the character of Mr. Dryden's dramatic performances, we find that the Criticks, his contemporaries, made very free with them; particularly, Mr. Gerard Langbaine (16): and it muſt be confeſſed, they are not the leaſt exceptionable of his compoſitions. As to tragedy, the Criticks have obſerved, that Mr. Dryden ſeldom touches the paſſions, but deals rather in pompous language, poetical flights and deſcriptions. That this was his real taſte appears, not only from his tragedies themſelves, but from two inſtances mentioned by Mr. Gildon (17). The firſt is, that, it being recommended to him to turn his thoughts to a tranſlation of Euripides rather than of Homer, he replied, that 'he 'confeſſed he had no reliſh of that poet, who was a 'great maſter of tragic ſimplicity.' The other is, that he conſtantly expreſſed a very mean, if not contemptible, opinion of Mr. Otway, who is univerſally allowed to have ſucceeded very happily in affecting the paſſions; though, in the Preface to his tranſlation of M. Freſnoy, he ſpeaks more favourably of that Poet. The author, who mentions theſe inſtances, aſcribes this guſto in Mr. Dryden to his great converſation with French Romances. As to comedy, our Poet himſelf acknowledges his want of genius for that ſpecies of the drama. 'I know,' ſays he (18), 'I am 'not fitted by nature to write comedy: I want that 'gaiety of humour which is required in it. My con-'verſation his dramatic performances [E]. In 1671, Mr. Dryden was publicly ridiculed on the ſtage under the character of Bays, in the Duke of Buckingham's Comedy called "The "Rehearſal [F]. In 1679, was publiſhed "An Eſſay on Satire [G]," written jointly by Mr.

'verſation is ſlow and dull, my humour ſaturnine 'and reſerved. In ſhort, I am none of thoſe, who 'endeavour to break jeſts in company, or make re-'partees. So that thoſe, who decry my Comedies, 'do me no injury, except it be in point of profit: 'reputation in them is the laſt thing to which I ſhall 'pretend.' But perhaps Mr. Dryden would have written better in both kinds of the drama, had not the neceſſity of his circumſtances obliged him to conform himſelf to the popular taſte. Hence my Lord Lanſdowne (19):

(19) In his Eſſay on Unnatural Flights in Poetry. See his Works. Vol I. p. 93. edit. 1739.

Dryden himſelf, to pleaſe a frantic age,
Was forc'd to let his judgement ſtoop to rage:
To a wild audience he conform'd his voice,
Comply'd to cuſtom, but not err'd thro' choice.
Deem then the people's, not the writer's ſin,
Almanzor's rage, and rants of Maximin;
That fury ſpent, in each elaborate piece,
He vies for fame with ancient Rome and Greece.

And Mr. Dryden himſelf inſinuates as much in the following paſſage (20): 'I remember ſome verſes of 'my own Maximin and Almanzor, which cry vengeance upon me for their extravagance.——— 'All I can ſay for thoſe paſſages, which are, I hope, 'not many, is, that I knew they were bad enough 'to pleaſe, even when I writ them. But I repent of 'them among my ſins; and, if any of their fellows 'intrude by chance into my preſent writings, I draw 'a ſtroke over all thoſe Dalilahs of the theatre, and 'am reſolved I will ſettle myſelf no reputation by the 'applauſe of fools. 'Tis not that I am mortified to 'all ambition; but I ſcorn as much to take it from 'half-witted judges, as I ſhould to raiſe an eſtate 'by cheating of bubbles; neither do I diſcommend 'the lofty ſtyle in Tragedy, which is naturally 'pompous and magnificent. But nothing is truly 'ſublime, that is not juſt and proper.' He tells us elſewhere (21), that his Spaniſh Fryar was given to the people, and that he never wrote any thing (in the dramatic way) to pleaſe himſelf, but his "Anthony "and Cleopatra, i. e. his All for Love: or, The "World well loſt."

[E] Mr. Langbaine has treated Mr. Dryden with more ſeverity, than juſtice, on account of his dramatic performances.] He begins his account of our Poet with treating him as an errant plagiary. 'Mr. Dryden, 'ſays he (22), is the moſt voluminous writer of our 'age, he having already extant above twenty plays 'of his own writing, 'as the title-page of each 'would perſuade the world;' though ſome people 'have been ſo bold as to call the truth of this in 'queſtion, and to propagate in the world another 'opinion.' Speaking of Mr. Dryden's Comedies, he tells us (23), 'he is for the moſt part beholden to 'French romances and Plays, not only for his plots, 'but even a great part of his language.' Having obſerved, that Mr. Dryden, in the Preface to his "Conqueſt of Granada," magiſterially huffs at, and domineers over, the French writers, he deſires the reader to take notice, that all the characters of that play are ſtolen from the French: 'ſo that,' ſays he (24), 'Mr. Dryden took a ſecure way to conqueſt; for, 'having robbed them of their weapons, he might 'ſafely challenge them, and beat them too; eſpecially 'having gotten Pence de Leon (*) on his ſide, in 'diſguiſe, and under the title of Almanzor: and, 'ſhould Monſ. Voiture preſume to lay claim to his 'own ſong, l'Amour ſous ſa loy, &c. which Mr. Dryden has robbed him of, and placed in the play of 'Sir Martin Marr-all, (being that ſong, which begins 'Blind Love to this hour &c.) our Poet would go 'nigh to beat him with a ſtaff of his own rhimes, 'with as much eaſe, as Sir Martin defeated the 'Bailiffs in the reſcue of his rival.' Mr. Langbaine, next, undertakes the defence of Shakſpeare, Fletcher, and Jonſon, againſt the attacks of Mr. Dryden, whom he repreſents as treating the memory of thoſe great Poets with the utmoſt diſreſpect. 'Had he,

(*) The chief hero in a romance called Almahide.

'ſays he (25), only extended his conqueſts over the 'French Poets, I had not meddled in this affair; 'and he might have taken part with Achilles and Rinaldo, againſt Cyrus and Oroondates, without my 'engaging in this foreign war: but, when I found 'him flushed with his victory over the great Scudery, 'and with Almanzor's aſſiſtance triumphing over the 'noble kingdom of Granada; and, not content with 'conqueſts abroad, like another Julius Cæſar, turning his arms upon his own country; and, as if the 'proſcription of his contemporaries' reputation was 'not ſufficient to ſatiate his implacable thirſt after 'fame, endeavouring to demoliſh the ſtatues and 'monuments of his anceſtors, the works of thoſe 'his illuſtrious predeceſſors, Shakſpeare, Fletcher, 'and Jonſon; I was reſolved to endeavour the 'reſcue and preſervation of thoſe excellent trophies 'of wit, by raiſing the Poſſe Comitatus upon this 'Poetic Almanzor, to put a ſtop to his ſpoils upon 'his countrymen.' The foundation of this heavy charge is, ſome paſſages in the Poſtſcript to Mr. Dryden's Conqueſt of Granada; in which he ſpeaks of Shakſpeare, 'as writing, in many places, below 'the dulleſt writers of any age; of Fletcher, as a 'perſon, that neither underſtood correct plotting, 'nor what is called the decorum of the ſtage; of 'Jonſon, as a writer, whoſe chief excellency lay in 'the low characters of vice and folly; and of all 'three together, as guilty, in every page of their 'works, of ſome ſoleciſm in ſpeech, or ſome notorious 'flaw in ſenſe. And here Mr. Langbaine applies 'to Mr. Dryden the character, which an ingenious 'writer (†) draws of a malignant wit;' 'who, conſcious of his own vices, and ſtudious to conceal them, 'endeavours by detraction to make it appear, that 'others alſo, of great eſtimation in the world, are 'tainted with the ſame, or greater: as infamous 'women generally excuſe their perſonal debaucheries, 'by incriminating upon their whole ſex, calumniating the moſt chaſte and virtuous, to palliate their 'own diſhonour.' This is the ill natured turn Mr. Langbaine gives to our author's apology, in the ſame poſtſcript, where he begs the reader's pardon for accuſing thoſe authors, deſiring him to conſider, that 'he lives in an age wherein his leaſt faults are 'ſeverely cenſured, and that he has no way left to 'extenuate his failings, but by ſhewing as great in 'thoſe whom he admires.' Mr. Langbaine proceeds to cenſure Mr. Dryden for aſſaulting, with all the bitterneſs imaginable, not only the Church of England, but alſo the ſeveral profeſſions of the Lutherans, Calviniſts, Preſbyterians, &c. though I muſt obſerve, ſays he (26), 'by the way, that ſome people among 'the perſuaſions here mentioned might juſtly have 'expected better uſage from him on account of old 'acquaintance in the year 1659.' We ſhall not enter upon Mr. Langbaine's defence of Shakſpeare, Fletcher, and Jonſon; which he concludes with theſe words: 'As to his (Mr. Dryden's) reflexions on this triumvirate (Shakſpeare, Fletcher and Jonſon) in 'general; I might eaſily prove, that his improprieties 'in grammar are equal to theirs, and that he himſelf 'has been guilty of ſoleciſms in ſpeech, and flaws in 'ſenſe: but this would be to waſte paper and time; 'and, beſides I conſider, that Apollo's laws like thoſe 'of our own nation, allow no man to be tried twice 'for the ſame crime: and Mr. Dryden having already 'been arraigned before the wits, upon the evidence 'of the Rota, and found guilty by Mr. Clifford the 'foreman of the jury; I ſhall ſuppreſs my farther 'evidence, 'till I am ſerved with a ſubpœna by him 'to appear before that Court, or have an action 'clapped upon me by his Proctor, as guilty of a 'Scandalum Archi-Poetæ; and then I ſhall readily 'give in my depoſitions (27).'

ſtop to by the breaking out of the plague in 1665, it was laid by for ſeveral years, and not exhibited on the ſtage till 1671: in which interval Mr. Dryden being advanced to the Laurel, the noble author changed the name of his Poet from Bilboa to Bays, and made great alterations in his play, in order to ridicule ſeveral dramatic performances, which had appeared ſince the firſt writing of it. Thoſe of Mr. Dryden, which fell under his grace's laſh, are "The Wild Gallant," "Tyrannic Love," "The Conqueſt of Granada," "Marriage Alamode," and "Love in a Nunnery;" and how juſtly, may be ſeen in the following extracts.

Conqueſt of Granada. Part ii. p. 48.

So two kind turtles, when a ſtorm is nigh,
Look up, and ſee it gathering in the ſky;
Each calls his mate to ſhelter in the groves,
Leaving, in murmurs, their unfiniſh'd loves:
Perch'd on ſome dropping branch, they ſit alone,
And coo, and hearken to each other's moan.

Rehearſal. p. 18.

So boar and ſow, when any ſtorm is nigh,
Snuff up, and ſmell it gathering in the ſky;
Boar beckons ſow to trot in cheſnut groves,
And there conſummate their unfiniſh'd loves;
Penſive, in mud they wallow all alone,
And ſnore and gruntle to each other's moan.

Conqueſt of Granada. Part i. p. 55.

As ſome fair tulip, by a ſtorm oppreſt,
Shrinks up, and folds it's ſilken arms to reſt;
And bending to the blaſt, all pale and dead,
Hears from within the wind ſing round it's head:
So ſhrouded up your beauty diſappears;
Unveil, my love, and lay aſide your fears;
The ſtorm that caus'd your fright is paſt and gone.

Rehearſal. p. 28.

As ſome tall pine, which we on Ætna find
T'have ſtood the rage of many a boiſt'rous wind,
Feeling without that flames within do play,
Which would conſume his root and ſap away;
He ſpreads his worſted arms unto the ſkies,
Silently grieves, all pale, repines, and dies:
So ſhrouded up your bright eye diſappears;
Break forth, bright ſcorching ſun, and dry my tears.

Tyrannic Love. p. 25.

——————— My earthly part,
Which is my tyrant's right, death will remove.
I'll come all ſoul and ſpirit to your love.
With ſilent ſteps I'll follow you all day;
Or elſe before you in the ſun-beams play.
I'll lead you hence to melancholy groves,
And there repeat the ſcenes of our paſt loves.
At night I will within your curtains peep:
With empty arms embrace you, while you ſleep.
In gentle dreams I often will be by,
And ſweep along before your cloſing eye.
All dangers from your bed I will remove:
But guard it moſt from any future love.
And when at laſt in pity you will die,
I'll watch your birth of immortality:
Then, turtle-like, I'll to my mate repair,
And teach you your firſt flight in open air.

Rehearſal. p. 55.

Since death my earthly part will thus remove,
I'll come a humble-bee to your chaſte love;
With ſilent wings I'll follow you, dear cuz,
Or elſe before you in the ſun-beams buz;
And when to melancholy groves you come,
An airy ghoſt, you'll know me by my hum:
For ſound being air, a ghoſt does well become.
At night into your boſom I will creep,
And buz, but ſoftly, if you chance to ſleep;
Yet in your dreams I will paſs ſweeping by,
And then both hum and buz before your eye.

Mr. Dryden affected to deſpiſe the ſatire levelled at him in the Rehearſal, as appears from his Dedication of the tranſlation of Juvenal and Perſius (29), where ſpeaking of the many lampoons and libels, that had been written againſt him, he ſays: 'I 'anſwered not the Rehearſal, becauſe I knew the 'author ſat to himſelf when he drew the picture, 'and was the very Bays of his own farce: becauſe 'alſo I knew, that my betters were more concerned 'than I was in that ſatire; and, laſtly, becauſe 'Mr. Smith and Mr. Johnſon, the main pillars of 'it, were two ſuch languiſhing gentlemen in their 'converſation, that I could liken them to nothing 'but to their own relations, thoſe noble characters of 'men of wit and pleaſure about town.' But it is impoſſible our Poet could be inſenſible of the force of that admirable ſatire; and we ſhall be convinced that he felt its edge, if we reflect on the character of Zimri, in his Abſalom and Achitophel (30), in which he took a full revenge on the author of the Rehearſal.

[H] His Abſalom and Achitophel.] This poem, which was at firſt printed without the author's name, is a ſevere ſatire on the contrivers and abettors of the rebellion, againſt King Charles II, under the Duke of Monmouth; and may ſerve to convince us of what Mr. Dryden ſays in the preface, that he could write ſeverely with more eaſe than he could gently. 'The 'violent,' ſays he, 'on both ſides, will condemn the 'character of Abſalom (*), as either too favourably, 'or too hardly drawn: but they are not the violent 'whom I deſire to pleaſe. The fault on the right-'hand, is to extenuate, palliate, and indulge; and, 'to confeſs freely, I have endeavoured to commit it. 'Beſides the reſpect, which I owe his birth, I have 'a greater for his heroic virtues; and David him-'ſelf (†) could not be more tender of the young man's 'life, than I would be of his reputation. But, 'ſince the moſt excellent natures are always the moſt 'eaſy; and, as being ſuch, are the ſooneſt perverted 'by ill counſels, eſpecially when baited with fame 'and glory; 'tis no more a wonder that he withſtood 'not the temptations of Achitophel (||), than it was 'for Adam to have reſiſted the temptation of the two 'devils, the ſerpent and the woman (32).' Mr. Dryden goes on to aſſign the reaſon why he left the ſubject unfiniſhed. 'The concluſion of the ſtory,' ſays he, 'I purpoſely forbore to proſecute, becauſe I could 'not obtain from myſelf to ſhew Abſalom unfor-'tunate. The frame of it was cut out but for a 'picture to the waiſt; and if the draught be ſo far 'true, 'tis as much as I deſigned. Were I the 'inventor, who am only the Hiſtorian, I ſhould 'certainly conclude the piece with the reconcilement 'of Abſalom to David. And who knows but this 'may come to paſs? Things were not brought to 'extremity where I left the ſtory: there ſeems, yet, 'to be room left for a compoſure; hereafter, there 'may be only for pity. I have not ſo much as an 'uncharitable wiſh againſt Achitophel; but am con-'tent to be accuſed of a good-natured error, and 'to

An Anſwer was publiſhed to Mr. Dryden's "Abſalom "and Achitophel," intitled, "Azariah and Huſhai," a Poem, Lond. 1682, in 4to, ſaid to be written by Mr. Elkanah Settle. "A Second Part of Abſalom "and Achitophel was undertaken, and written, by Mr. Tate, at the requeſt, and under the direction, of Mr. Dryden, who wrote nearly two hundred lines of it himſelf, beginning with

[I] His Medal, a Satire againſt Sedition.] This poem was occaſioned by the ſtriking of a medal, on account of the indictment againſt the Earl of Shaftesbury, for high-treaſon, being found ignoramus by the Grand-Jury at the Old Bailey, in November 1681; for which the Whig party made great rejoicings, by ringing of bells, bonfires, &c. in all parts of London (41). The poem is introduced with a very ſatirical "Epiſtle to the Whigs;" in which the author ſays: 'I have one favour to deſire of you at parting, 'that, when you think of anſwering this poem, you 'would employ the ſame pens againſt it, who have 'combated with ſo much ſucceſs againſt "Abſalom "and Achitophel;" for, then you may aſſure your-'ſelves of a clear victory without the leaſt reply. 'Rail at me abundantly; and, not to break a cuſtom, 'do it without wit. By this method you will gain a 'conſiderable point, which is wholly to wave the 'anſwer of my arguments.——If God has not bleſſed 'you with the talents of rhiming, make uſe of my 'poor ſtock and welcome: let your verſes run upon 'my feet; and, for the utmoſt refuge of notorious 'blockheads, reduced to the laſt extremity of ſenſe, 'turn my own lines upon me, and, in utter deſpair 'of your own ſatire, make me ſatirize myſelf (42).' The whole poem is a ſevere invective againſt the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the Whig party. Mr. Elkanah Settle wrote an anſwer to this poem, intitled, "The Medal Revers'd." Lond. 1681, 4to.

[K] His Religio Laici.] The whole title is: "Religio Laici; or, A Lay-man's Faith." This piece is intended as a defence of Revealed Religion, and the excellency and authority of the Scriptures, as the only Rule of faith and manners, againſt Deiſts, Papiſts, and Preſbyterians. The author acquaints us, in the preface, that it was written for an ingenious young gentleman, his friend, upon his tranſlation of father Simon's "Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſta-"ment;" and that the ſtyle of it is epiſtolary. Whereupon he adds: 'If any one be ſo lamentable a 'critick, as to require the ſmoothneſs, the numbers, 'and the turn of heroic poetry in this Poem, I 'muſt tell him that, if he has not read Horace, I 'have ſtudied him, and hope the ſtyle of his Epiſtles 'is not ill imitated here. The expreſſions of a poem, 'deſigned purely for inſtruction, ought to be plain 'and natural, and yet majeſtic; for here the Poet 'is preſumed to be a kind of Law-giver; and thoſe 'three qualities, which I have named, are proper to 'the legiſlative ſtyle (43).'

[M] His Defence of the Papers written by the late King of bleſſed Memory, and found in his ſtrong box.] This piece was written in oppoſition to Dr. Stillingfleet's " Anſwer to ſome Papers lately printed, con- " cerning the Authority of the Catholic Church in " Matters of Faith, and the Reformation of the " Church of England." London, 1686, in 4*to*. Mr. Dryden, in the above-mentioned piece, takes occaſion, from the two Papers, publiſhed by King James II. and by him affirmed to have been found in the ſtrong Box of the deceaſed King Charles II. (44), to vindicate the authority of the Catholic Church, in decreeing matters of faith, upon this principle, that, 'The Church is more viſible than the Scripture, 'becauſe the Scripture is ſeen by the Church (45);' and to abuſe the Reformation in England, which, he affirms (46), was erected on the Foundation of Luſt, Sacrilege, and Uſurpation. Dr. Stillingfleet hereupon publiſhed " A Vindication of the Anſwer to ſome late " Papers," London, 1687, in 4*to*; in which he treats Mr. Dryden with ſome ſeverity; and another author (47) obſerved, that this tract of Mr. Dryden 'is very light, and in ſome places even ridiculous; 'and ſhews that the author's talent lay towards con- 'troverſy no more in proſe, than it appears by the " Hind and Panther it did in Verſe."

(47) The author of the Continuation of the preſent State of the Controverſy between the Church of Rome, &c. Lond. 1688, 4to. p. 28.

[N] His Hand and Panther.] It is divided into three parts, and is a direct defence of the Romiſh Church, chiefly by way of dialogue between a Hind, who repreſents the Church of Rome, and a Panther, who ſuſtains the character of the Church of England. Theſe two beaſts very learnedly diſcuſs the ſeveral points controverted between the two Churches, as, Tranſubſtantiation, Church-Authority, Infallibility, &c. In the preface, the author tells us, 'this Poem 'was neither impoſed on him, nor ſo much as the 'ſubject given him by any man. It was written,' ſays he, 'during the laſt winter, and the beginning of 'this ſpring, though with long interruptions of ill 'health, and other hindrances. About a fortnight 'before I had finiſhed it, his Majeſty's " Declaration 'for Liberty of Conſcience" came abroad; which, if 'I had ſo ſoon expected, I might have ſpared myſelf 'the labour of writing many things which are con- 'tained in the third Part of it. But I was always in 'ſome hope, the Church of England might have been 'perſuaded to have taken off the Penal Laws, and the 'Teſt, which was one deſign of the Poem, when I 'propoſed to myſelf the writing of it. 'Tis evident 'that ſome part of it was only occaſional, and not firſt 'intended: I mean that defence of myſelf, to which 'every honeſt man is bound, when he is injuriouſly 'attacked in print (48).' Mr. Dryden then lets us into the ſubject-matter of the Poem, and the ſtyle in which it is written. 'The firſt part,' ſays he, 'conſiſting moſt in general characters and narration, I 'have endeavoured to raiſe, and give it the majeſtic 'Poeſy. The ſecond, being matter of diſpute, and 'chiefly concerning Church-Authority, I was obliged 'to make as plain and perſpicuous as poſſibly I could; 'yet not wholly neglecting the numbers, though I 'had not frequent occaſions for the magnificence of 'verſe. The third, which was more of the nature of 'domeſtic converſation, is, or ought to be, more 'free and familiar than the two former. There are 'in it two Epiſodes or Fables, which are interwoven 'with the main deſign; ſo that they are properly 'parts of it, though they are alſo diſtinct ſtories of 'themſelves. In both of theſe I have made uſe of the 'common-places of ſatire, whether true or falſe, 'which are urged by the members of the one Church 'againſt the other (49).' In the Firſt Part, Mr. Dryden ſpeaks of his own converſion in the following terms:

(48) Original Poems, &c. p. 247, 248.

(49) Ib. p. 249, 250.

But, gracious God, how well do'ſt thou provide
For erring judgments an unerring guide!
Thy throne is darkneſs in th' abyſs of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the ſight.
O teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd,
And ſearch no farther than thyſelf reveal'd;
But her alone for my director take,
Whom thou haſt promiſs'd never to forſake!
My thoughtleſs youth was wing'd with vain deſires;
My manhood, long miſled by wand'ring fires,
Follow'd falſe lights; and, when their glimpſe was gone,
My pride ſtruck out new ſparkles of her own.
Such was I, ſuch by nature ſtill I am;
Be thine the glory, and be mine the ſhame.
Good life be now my taſk; my doubts are done——(50).

(50) Ib. p. 258.

The Third Part begins with an apology for the Fable or contrivance of this Poem; as if Mr. Dryden foreſaw the ridicule to which it would expoſe him.

Much malice, mingled with a little wit,
Perhaps, may cenſure this myſterious writ;
Becauſe the Muſe has peopled Caledon
With Panthers, Bears, and Wolves, and Beaſts unknown,
As if we were not ſtock'd with monſters of our own.
Let Æſop anſwer, who has ſet to view
Such kinds as Greece and Phrygia never knew;
And mother Hubbard, in her homely dreſs,
Has ſharply blam'd a Britiſh Lioneſs——
Led by theſe great examples, may not I
The wanted organs of their words ſupply (51)?

(51) Ib. p. 90.

This Poem was immediately attacked by the wits, particularly by Mr. Charles Montagu, afterwards Earl of Halifax, and Mr. Matthew Prior, who joined in writing " The Hind and Panther tranſverſed to the " Story of the Country Mouſe and the City Mouſe." London, 1687, 4to. In the preface to which, the authors obſerve, That Mr. Dryden's Poem 'naturally 'falls into ridicule,' and that, in this burleſque, 'nothing is repreſented as monſtrous, and unnatural, 'which is not equally ſo in the original.' They afterwards remark, that 'We have this comfort under 'the ſeverity of Mr. Dryden's Satire, to ſee his abili- 'ties equally leſſened with his opinion of us; and 'that he could not be a fit champion againſt the Pan- 'ther, 'till he had laid aſide all his judgment.' Dr. Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Biſhop of Saliſbury, ſpeaks with great ſeverity of this Poem, as well as of its author (52).

[O] He was ſuppoſed to have been engaged in tranſlating M. Varillas's Hiſtory of Hereſies, but to have dropped that deſign.] This we learn from a paſſage in Dr. G. Burnet's " Defence of the Reflexions on the " Ninth Book of the firſt Volume of M. Varillas's Hiſtory of Hereſies. Being a Reply to his Anſwer (53)." The Doctor ſays: 'I have been informed from Eng- 'land, that a Gentleman, who is famous both for 'poetry, and ſeveral other things, has ſpent three 'months in tranſlating M. Varillas's Hiſtory; but 'that, as ſoon as my Reflexions appeared, he diſcon- 'tinued reat [P], in which he was ſucceeded by Mr. Thomas Shadwell; againſt whom he wrote his "Mac Flecknoe [Q]." The ſame year he publiſhed "The Life of St. Francis Xavier;" tranſlated from the French of Father Dominic Bouhours. In 1693, came out a Tranſlation of Juvenal and Perſius [R]; in which, the firſt, third, ſixth, tenth, and ſixteenth Satires of Juvenal, and Perſius entire, were done by Mr. Dryden, who prefixed a long and beautiful Diſcourſe, by way of Dedication to the Earl of Dorſet (x). He contributed likewiſe to the tranſlation of "Ovid's Metamorphoſes," publiſhed, ſeveral years after his death, by Dr. Garth; in which, the firſt book; the ſtory of Meleager and Atalanta in the eighth; that of Baucis and Philemon in the ſame; the fable of Iphis and Ianthe in the ninth; that of Pygmalion and the Statue in the tenth; the ſtory of Cinyras and Myrrha, in the ſame; that of Ceyx and Alcyone in the eleventh; the twelfth book; the Speeches of Ajax and Ulyſſes, and the Death of Ajax, in the thirteenth; the ſtory of Acis and Galatea, in the ſame; and the Pythagorean Philoſophy in the fifteenth; are Mr. Dryden's (y). In 1695, he publiſhed a tranſlation, in proſe, of "M. Du Freſnoy's Art of Painting" [S]; and, in 1697, a tranſlation of all Virgil's

'tinued his labour, finding the credit of his author was 'gone. Now, if he thinks it is recovered by his Anſwer, he will perhaps go on with his tranſlation; 'and this may be, for aught I know, as good an 'entertainment for him, as the converſation he has ſet 'on foot between the Hinds and Panthers, and all the 'reſt of the animals; for whom M. Varillas may 'ſerve well enough as an author; and this Hiſtory 'and that Poem are ſuch extraordinary things of 'their kind, that it will be but ſuitable to ſee the author of the worſt Poem become likewiſe the tranſlator 'of the worſt Hiſtory that the age has produced. If 'his grace and his wit improve both proportionably, 'we ſhall hardly find, that he has gained much by the 'change he has made, from having no religion to 'chooſe one of the worſt. It is true, he had ſomewhat to ſink from in matter of wit; but, as for his 'morals, it is ſcarce poſſible for him to grow a worſe 'man than he was. He has lately wreaked his malice 'on me for ſpoiling his three months' labour; but in 'it he has done all the honour that a man can receive 'from him, which is to be railed at by him. If I had 'ill-nature enough to prompt me to wiſh a very bad 'wiſh for him, it ſhould be, that he would go on and 'finiſh his tranſlation. By that it will appear, whether the Engliſh nation, which is the moſt competent 'judge in this matter, has, upon the ſeeing our debate, pronounced in M. Varillas's favour or me. It 'is true, Mr. D. will ſuffer a little by it; but at leaſt 'it will ſerve to keep him in from other extravagances; and, if he gains little honour by this work, 'yet he cannot loſe ſo much by it as he has done by 'his laſt employment.' This paſſage, beſides the fact it lets us into, ſhews how ill an opinion Dr. Burnet had entertained of Mr. Dryden (54).

(54) See the remark [Z].

[P] He was diſmiſſed from the office of Poet-Laureat.] Mr. Matt. Prior, in the Dedication of his Poems to the Earl of Dorſet and Middleſex, having ſaid of the great Earl of Dorſet, that 'he was ſo inviolable 'in his friendſhip, and ſo kind to the character of 'thoſe whom he had once honoured with a more intimate acquaintance, that nothing leſs than a demonſtration of ſome eſſential fault could make him break 'with them; and then too his good nature did not 'conſent to it without the greateſt reluctance and difficulty:' adds; 'Let me give one inſtance of this 'among many. When, as Lord Chamberlain, he 'was obliged to take the King's penſion from Mr. 'Dryden, who had long before put himſelf out of a 'poſſibility of receiving any favour from the Court; 'my Lord allowed him an equivalent out of his own 'eſtate. However diſpleaſed with the conduct of his 'old acquaintance, he relieved his neceſſities; and 'while he gave him his aſſiſtance in private, in public he extenuated and pitied his error.'

[Q] His Mac Flecknoe.] This is one of the beſt, and ſevereſt, ſatires in the Engliſh language. Mr. Richard Flecknoe, with whoſe name it is inſcribed, was a very indifferent Poet of thoſe times (55), or rather as Mr. Dryden expreſſes it (56),

[R] The Tranſlation of Juvenal and Perſius.] In the Dedication to the Earl of Dorſet, Mr. Dryden gives us the following account of this tranſlation: 'I 'would excuſe,' ſays he (57), 'the performance of 'this tranſlation, if it were all my own; but the better, though not the greater, part being the work of 'ſome gentlemen, who have ſucceeded very happily 'in their undertaking; let their excellences atone for 'my imperfections, and thoſe of my ſon's. I have peruſed ſome of the Satires, which are done by other 'hands; and they ſeem to me as perfect in their 'kind as any thing I have ſeen in Engliſh verſe. The 'common way, which we have taken, is not a literal 'tranſlation, but a kind of paraphraſe; or ſomewhat 'which is yet more looſe, betwixt a paraphraſe and 'imitation. It was not poſſible for us, or any men, 'to have made it pleaſant any other way. If rendering the exact ſenſe of theſe authors, almoſt line for 'line, had been our buſineſs, Barten Holiday had done 'it already to our hands.——But he wrote for 'fame, and wrote to ſcholars. We write only for the 'pleaſure and entertainment of thoſe Gentlemen and 'Ladies, who, though they are not ſcholars, are not 'ignorant: perſons of underſtanding and good ſenſe; 'who, not having been converſant in the original, or 'at leaſt not having made Latin verſe ſo much their 'buſineſs, as to be Criticks in it, would be glad to 'find, if the wit of our two great authors be anſwerable to their fame and reputation in the world.——'This muſt be ſaid for our tranſlation, that if we give 'not the whole ſenſe of Juvenal, yet we give the 'moſt conſiderable part of it: we give it, in general, 'ſo clearly, that few notes are ſufficient to make us 'intelligible.——If ſometimes any of us (and it is 'but ſeldom) make him expreſs the cuſtoms and manners of our native country rather than of Rome, 'it is either when there was ſome kind of analogy betwixt their cuſtoms and ours, or when, to make him 'more eaſy to vulgar underſtandings, we give him 'thoſe manners, which are familiar to us.'

[S] His Tranſlation of M. Du Freſnoy's Art of Painting.] The 'Second Edition, corrected and enlarged,' was publiſhed at London, in 1716. The Title is: "The Art of Painting; by C. A. Du Freſnoy: with Remarks: tranſlated into Engliſh; with an Original Preface, containing a Parallel between Painting and Poetry: by Mr. Dryden. As alſo a ſhort account of the moſt eminent Painters, both ancient and modern; by R. G. (*) Eſq." It is dedicated to the Earl of Burlington. The editor acquaints us (58), that ſome liberties have been taken with this excellent tranſlation; of which he gives the following account. 'The misfortune that attended 'him (Mr. Dryden) in that undertaking was, that, 'for want of a competent knowledge in painting, he 'ſuffered himſelf to be miſled by an unſkilful guide. 'Monſ. de Piles told him, that his French Verſion was 'made at the requeſt of the author himſelf, and altered by him till it was wholly to his mind. This 'Mr. Dryden taking upon content, though there 'was nothing more incumbent on him than to put it 'into the beſt Engliſh he could, and accordingly performed his part here (as in every thing elſe) with

Virgil's Works [T]. Beſides the Original Pieces and Tranſlations hitherto mentioned, Mr. Dryden wrote many others, publiſhed in the Six Volumes of Miſcellanies (z), and in other collections. 'accuracy. But, it being manifeſt that the French 'tranſlator has frequently miſtaken the ſenſe of his 'author, and very often alſo not ſet in the moſt ad'vantageous light; to do juſtice to Monſ. du Freſnoy, 'Mr. Jervas (a very good Critick in the language, as 'well as in the ſubject of the Poem) has been prevail'ed upon to correct what was found amiſs; and his 'amendments are every where diſtinguiſhed with pro'per marks.' Mr. Dryden, in his preface (59), tells us, it was not of his own choice that he undertook this work. 'Many,' ſays he, 'of our moſt ſkilful 'Painters, and other Artiſts, were pleaſed to recom'mend this author to me as one who perfectly under'ſtood the rules of painting, who gave the beſt and 'moſt conciſe inſtructions for performance, and the 'ſureſt to form the judgment of all who loved this 'noble art.' He freely owns, he thought himſelf incapable of performing this tranſlation, either to the ſatisfaction of others, or his own credit. 'Not,' ſays he (60), 'but that I underſtood the original Latin, 'and the French author, perhaps as well as moſt Eng'liſhmen: but I was not ſufficiently verſed in the 'Terms of Art.' However, having obtained the aſſiſtance of others in this particular, he tells the reader, he may aſſure himſelf of a tolerable tranſlation. 'In 'this one particular only,' ſays he, 'I muſt beg the 'reader's pardon: the proſe tranſlation of the poem 'is not free from poetical expreſſions, and I dare not 'promiſe, that ſome of them are not fuſtian, or at 'leaſt highly metaphorical; but this being a fault in 'the firſt digeſtion (that is, the original Latin) was 'not to be remedied on the ſecond, viz. the tranſla'tion.' When Mr. Dryden undertook this work, he was already engaged, he tells us (61), in the Tranſlation of Virgil, from whom he borrowed only two months; and he acquaints us (62), that his preface was begun and ended in twelve mornings; and 'perhaps,' ſays he, 'the judges of Painting and Poetry, 'when I tell them how ſhort a time it coſt me, may 'make the ſame anſwer, which my Lord Rocheſter 'made to one, who, to commend a bad Tragedy, ſaid 'it was written in three weeks: How the devil could 'he be ſo long about it?' Mr. Pope has addreſſed a copy of verſes "To Mr. Jervas, with Freſnoy's Art "of Painting, tranſlated by Mr. Dryden," in which are theſe lines:

[T] His Tranſlation of Virgil.] It has paſſed through ſeveral editions, and appeared in various forms. The Paſtorals (or Eclogues) are dedicated to Hugh Lord Clifford, Baron of Chudleigh. Mr. Dryden tells his patron, 'What he now offers his Lord'ſhip is the wretched remainder of a ſickly age (*), worn 'out with ſtudy, and oppreſſed by fortune; without 'other ſupport than the conſtancy and patience of a 'Chriſtian (64);' and he adds (65), that he began this work in his grand climacterick. The Life of Virgil, which follows this Dedication, the two Prefaces to the Paſtorals and Georgicks, and all the Arguments in proſe to the whole tranſlation, were given him, he tells us (66), by two worthy friends of his (||); who, ſeeing him ſtraitened in his time, took pity on him, and lent him their aſſiſtance. Beſides this, Mr. Dryden had the advantage of peruſing the Earl of Lauderdale's tranſlation of the Æneis; of which he gives us the following account: 'The late Earl of 'Lauderdale ſent me over his new tranſlation of the 'Æneis; which he had ended before I engaged in 'the ſame deſign. Neither did I then intend it: but 'ſome propoſals being afterwards made me by my 'Bookſeller, I deſired his Lordſhip's leave that I 'might accept them; which he freely granted, and 'I have his letter yet to ſhew for that permiſſion. He 'reſolved to have printed his work; which he might 'have done two years before I could publiſh mine; 'and had performed it, if death had not prevented 'him (†). But, having his manuſcript in my hands, 'I conſulted it as often as I doubted of my author's 'ſenſe. For, no man underſtood Virgil better than 'that learned nobleman (67).' Mr. Congreve, likewiſe, he tells us (68), did him the favour to reviſe the Æneis, and compare his verſion with the original. And, 'I ſhall never be aſhamed to own,' adds Mr. Dryden, 'that this excellent young man has ſhewed 'me many faults, which I have endeavoured to cor'rect.' The tranſlation of the Georgicks is dedicated to the Earl of Cheſterfield; and that of the Æneis to the Earl of Mulgrave. This latter dedication contains the author's thoughts on Epic Poetry, particularly that of Virgil. At the end of the Æneis, is a Poſtſcript to the reader; in which Mr. Dryden acquaints him (69), that the Firſt Georgick, and the greateſt part of the laſt Æneid, were tranſlated at Denham-Court, the houſe of Sir William Bowyer; and the Seventh Æneid, at Burleigh, the ſeat of the Earl of Exeter. And, ſpeaking of ſome particular parts of Virgil, tranſlated by other hands, he ſays: 'Whoever has given the world the tranſlation of part 'of the Third Georgic, which he calls 'The Power 'of Love,' has put me to ſufficient pains to make my 'own not inferior to his. As my Lord Roſcommon's 'Silenus had formerly given me the ſame trouble. 'The moſt ingenious Mr. Addiſon of Oxford has alſo 'been as troubleſome to me as the other two, and on 'the ſame account: After his Bees, my little ſwarm 'is ſcarcely worth the hiving. "Mr. Cowley's Praiſe 'of a Country Life" is rather an imitation of Virgil 'than a verſion (70).' Mr. Dryden likewiſe informs us (71), that, when he began this work, Gilbert Dolben, Eſq; ſon of Dr. Dolben, Archbiſhop of York, made him a preſent of all the ſeveral editions of Virgil, and all the Commentaries of thoſe Editions in Latin: 'Amongſt which,' ſays he, 'I could not but 'prefer the Dauphin's as the laſt, the ſhorteſt, and the 'moſt judicious. Fabrini I had alſo ſent me from 'Italy; but either he underſtands Virgil very imper'fectly, or I have no knowledge of my author.' The Poſtſcript is followed by ſome Notes and Obſervations on Virgil's Works in Engliſh, which the author tells us (72), he wrote par maniere d'acquit, becauſe he had obliged himſelf by articles to do ſomewhat of that kind.——It is generally allowed, that Mr. Dryden's tranſlation of Virgil is, upon the whole, extremely well performed; at leaſt, better than by any other Poet in any other language. Dr. Felton ſays in its commendation, that 'Thoſe who excel him, where 'they obſerve he hath failed, will fall below in a 'thouſand inſtances where he hath excelled (73): And Mr. Pope, the beſt Poet of his times, ſpeaking of Mr. Dryden's tranſlation of ſome part of Homer, ſays, 'Had he tranſlated the whole work, I would no 'more have attempted Homer after him than Virgil; 'his verſion of whom (notwithſtanding ſome human 'errors) is the moſt noble and ſpirited tranſlation I 'know in any language (74).' Dr. Trapp (75) charges Mr. Dryden with groſſly miſtaking his author's ſenſe in many places; with adding or retrenching, as his turn is beſt ſerved by either; and with being leaſt a tranſlator, where he ſhines moſt as a Poet: and whereas it is a juſt rule laid down by my Lord Roſcommon, that a tranſlator, in regard to his author, ſhould

Fall as he falls, and as he riſes riſe;

Mr. Dryden, he tells us, frequently acts the very reverſe of this precept; of which he produces ſome inſtances, and remarks in general, that the firſt ſix Books of the Æneis, which are the beſt and moſt perfect in the Original, are the leaſt ſo in the Tranſlation, and the ſix laſt Books vice verſa.

[U] His Fables.] To this work is prefixed, by way of Preface, a critical Account of the authors, from whom the Fables are tranſlated. Among the original pieces, the "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" is juſtly eſteemed one of the moſt perfect in any language, and has been ſet to muſick more than once; particularly, in the winter of the year 1735, by that great maſter Mr. Handel; and publicly performed, with the utmoſt applauſe, on the theatre in Covent-Garden. Mr. Pope has celebrated this Ode in the following lines:

Hear how Timotheus' vary'd lays ſurprize,
And bid alternate paſſions fall and riſe!
While, at each change, the ſon of Libyan Jove
Now burns with glory, and then melts with love:
Now his fierce eyes with ſparkling fury glow;
Now ſighs ſteal out, and tears begin to flow:
Perſians and Greeks like turns of nature found,
And the world's victor ſtood ſubdu'd by ſound:
The power of muſick all our hearts allow;
And what Timotheus was, is Dryden now (76).

All the other parts of the Miſcellany are ſo excellent, that the reader muſt think Mr. Dryden (as, he tells us (77), he thought himſelf) 'as vigorous as ever in the 'faculties of his ſoul,' though he was ſixty-eight years of age at the publication of this his laſt work.

(77) In the Preface.

[W] Original Poems and Tranſlations, by John Dryden, Eſq; now firſt collected and publiſhed together.] The editor acquaints us in the Preface with the motives to the publication of this collection. 'It was 'thought,' he tells us, 'but juſtice to the productions 'of ſo excellent a poet, to ſet them free, at laſt, from 'ſo diſadvantageous, if not unnatural, an union (viz. 'of being blended with the Compoſitions of inferior 'Writers); an union, which, like the cruelty of Mezentius in Virgil, was no leſs than a junction of living and dead bodies together.' And a little farther: 'It is now high time the partnerſhip ſhould be diſſolved, and Mr. Dryden left to ſtand upon his own 'bottom. His credit, as a Poet, is out of all danger, 'though the withdrawing his ſtock may, probably, 'expoſe many of his co-partners to the hazard of a 'Poetical Bankruptcy.' There is a collection of "Original Poems and Tranſlations by Mr. Dryden," publiſhed by J. Tonſon, in 1701, in a thin folio: but, as it contains not much above half the pieces, ſo it does not at all anſwer the deſign of this collection, which, with the author's Plays, Fables, and Tranſlations of Virgil, Juvenal, and Perſius, is intended to complete Mr. Dryden's works in twelves. The firſt volume of this collection conſiſts of our author's larger poems; and the ſecond, of his Tranſlations, Epiſtles, Prologues, Epilogues, Elegies, Epitaphs, and Songs. Particular care, we are told, has been taken to render this edition as correct as poſſible, by reforming numberleſs errors of the preſs, which have been continued down through all editions hitherto publiſhed; but eſpecially by obſerving the ſtricteſt accuracy in the pointing: 'An article of correctneſs,' ſays the editor very juſtly, 'too generally neglected, though ſo much of 'the beauty, as well as the perſpicuity, of language 'depends upon it.'

[X] He was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey.] There are ſome more circumſtances, relating to the funeral of Mr. Dryden, recorded in the "Memoirs of the Life of "Mr. Congreve (78);" with which we ſhall entertain the reader. The day after Mr. Dryden's death, the Dean of Weſtminſter (79) ſent word to the Lady Elizabeth Howard, Mr. Dryden's widow, that he would make a preſent of the ground, and all the other Abbey Fees. The Lord Halifax likewiſe ſent to the Lady Elizabeth, and Mr. Charles Dryden her ſon, offering to defray the expences of our Poet's funeral, and afterwards to beſtow 500 pounds on a monument in the Abbey; which generous offer was accepted. Accordingly, on the Sunday following, the company being aſſembled, the corpſe was put into a velvet hearſe, attended by eighteen mourning coaches. When they were juſt ready to move, the Lord Jefferies, ſon of the Lord Chancellor Jefferies, with ſome of his rakiſh companions, coming by, aſked whoſe funeral it was; and, being told it was Mr. Dryden's, he proteſted he ſhould not be buried in that private manner; that he would himſelf, with the Lady Elizabeth's leave, have the honour of his interment, and would beſtow a thouſand pounds on a monument in the Abbey for him. This put a ſtop to the proceſſion, and Lord Jefferies, with ſeveral of the gentlemen, who had alighted from the coaches, went up ſtairs to the Lady Elizabeth, who was ſick in bed. His Lordſhip repeated the purport of what he had ſaid below; but the Lady Elizabeth abſolutely refuſing her conſent, he fell on his knees, vowing never to riſe till his requeſt was granted. The Lady, under a ſudden ſurprize, fainted away; the Lord Jefferies, pretending to have obtained her conſent, ordered the body to be carried to Mr. Ruſſel's an undertaker in Cheapſide, and leave it there till farther orders. In the mean time, the Abbey was lighted up, the ground opened, the Choir attending, and the Biſhop waiting ſome hours to no purpoſe for the corpſe. The next day, Mr. Charles Dryden waited upon the Lord Halifax, and the Biſhop, and endeavoured in vain to excuſe his mother, by relating the truth. Three days after, the undertaker, having received no orders, waited on the Lord Jefferies, who pretended it was a drunken frolic, that he remembered nothing of the matter, and he might do what he pleaſed with the body. Upon this, the undertaker waited on the Lady Elizabeth, who deſired a day's reſpite, which was granted. Mr. Charles Dryden immediately wrote to the Lord Jefferies, who returned for anſwer, That he knew nothing of the matter, and would be troubled no more about it. Mr. Dryden applied again to the Lord Halifax, and the Biſhop of Rocheſter, who abſolutely refuſed to do any thing in the affair. In this diſtreſs, Dr. Garth ſent for the corpſe to the College of Phyſicians, and propoſed a funeral by ſubſcription: which ſucceeding about three weeks after Mr. Dryden's deceaſe, Dr. Garth pronounced a fine Latin Oration over the body; which was conveyed from the College, attended by a numerous train of coaches, to Weſtminſter-Abbey. After the funeral, Mr. Charles Dryden ſent a challenge to the Lord Jefferies, which the latter refuſed; and Mr. Dryden publickly declaring, he would watch every opportunity to meet and fight him, his Lordſhip thought fit to leave the town upon it.

[Y] A Monument has been ſince erected over him by John late Duke of Buckinghamſhire.] Mr. Dryden had no monument erected to him for ſeveral years; to which Mr. Pope alludes in his Epitaph intended for Mr. Rowe (80), in which is this line, ſpeaking of Dryden:

[Z] Mr. Dryden's Character, as represented by different writers.] To shew our impartiality, we shall begin with Bishop Burnet, who, speaking of the corruption of the times, says, 'The Stage was defiled 'beyond all example, Dryden, the great master of 'Dramatic Poesy, being a monster of immodesty and 'impurities of all sorts (81).' The late Lord Lansdown took upon himself to vindicate Mr. Dryden's character from this severe imputation. He observes (82), that, 'He was so much a stranger to immo-'desty, that modesty in too great a degree was his 'failing. A monster of impurities of all sorts!' adds his Lordship: 'Good God! What an idea must that 'give! Is there any wickedness under the sun, but 'what is comprized in those few words? But, as it 'happens, he was the reverse of all this, a man of 'regular life and conversation, as all his acquaintance 'can vouch. And I cannot but grieve that such 'rash expressions should escape from a Bishop's pen. 'If bearing false witness against one's neighbour is a 'breach of the Commandment, can there be a more 'flagrant one than this?' His Lordship concludes with observing, that Mr. Dryden's writings 'will do 'honour to his name and country, and his Poems last 'as long as the Bishop's Sermons.' Mr. Burnet, the Bishop's son, in reply to this passage of my Lord Lansdown's, observes (83), that immodesty, in the Bishop's words, is not opposed to modesty, but chastness, and that this expression, as well as that of "Impurities of "all sorts," can only be meant of Dramatic Poesy, of which only the Bishop was speaking; and have nothing to do with Mr. Dryden's life and conversation. Indeed, he acknowledges, a writer more accurate in his style would rather have used the term obscenities. Whereupon he asks: 'Are not Dryden's Comedies 'then full of obscenities, of immodesty, and impuri-'ties?' He instances in his "Limberham, or The "Kind Keeper;" and then says: 'Where is the Cler-'gyman, who would not merit his Lordship's esteem 'instead of censure, for calling this play 'a monster 'of immodesty and impurities of all sorts?' And 'this, this only is Dr. Burnet's crime, for which he 'is to be unbishoped, unchristianed, and stigmatized, 'as a flagrant false witness against his neighbour.' Mr. Congreve, in the Dedication of our Poet's Dramatic Works to the Duke of Newcastle, has drawn his character to very great advantage. 'Mr. Dryden,' he tells us, 'had personal qualities to challenge both 'love and esteem from all who were truly acquainted 'with him. He was of a nature exceedingly humane 'and compassionate; easily forgiving injuries, and 'capable of a prompt and sincere reconciliation with 'them who had offended him.——His friendship, 'where he professed it, went much beyond his pro-'fessions.——As his reading had been very extensive, 'so was he very happy in a memory tenacious of every 'thing that he had read. He was not more possessed 'of knowledge than he was communicative of it. 'But then his communication of it was by no means 'pedantic, or imposed upon the conversation; but 'just such, and went so far, as by the natural turns 'of the discourse, in which he was engaged, it 'was necessarily promoted or required. He was 'extreme ready and gentle in his correction of the 'errors of any writer who thought fit to consult 'him; and full as ready and patient to admit of the 'reprehensions of others in respect of his own over-'sights or mistakes. He was of very easy, I may say 'of very pleasing, access; but something slow, and 'as it were diffident in his advances to others. He 'had something in his nature that abhorred intrusion 'in any society whatsoever. Indeed it is to be re-'gretted, that he was rather blameable in the other 'extreme: for by that means he was personally less 'known, and consequently his character might be-'come liable both to misapprehensions and misrepre-'sentations.——He was, of all the men that ever I 'knew, one of the most modest, and the most easily to 'be discountenanced, in his approaches, either to his 'superiors, or his equals.———As to his Writings '——I may venture to say in general terms, that no 'man hath written in our language so much, and so 'various matter, and, in so various manners, so well. 'Another thing I may say very peculiar to him; 'which is, that his parts did not decline with his 'years; but that he was an improving writer to 'the last, even to near seventy years of age, im-'proving even in fire and imagination as well as in 'judgment: witness his "Ode on St. Cecilia's 'Day," and his "Fables," his latest performances. 'He was equally excellent in verse and in prose. His 'prose had all the clearness imaginable, together with 'all the nobleness of expressions, all the graces and 'ornaments proper and peculiar to it, without devi-'ating into the language or diction of poetry.—I 'have heard him frequently own with pleasure, that, 'if he had any talent of English prose, it was owing 'to his having often read the writings of the great 'Archbishop Tillotson. His versification and his 'numbers he could learn of nobody: for he first pos-'sessed those talents in perfection in our tongue; and 'they who have best succeeded in them since his time 'have been indebted to his example; and, the more 'they have been able to imitate him, the better have 'they succeeded.——In his Poems, his diction is, 'wherever his subject requires it, so sublimely and so 'truly poetical, that its essence, like that of pure 'gold, cannot be destroyed. Take his verses, and 'divest them of their rhimes, disjoint them in their 'numbers, transpose their expressions, make what ar-'rangement and disposition you please of his words, 'yet shall there eternally be poetry, and something 'which will be found incapable of being reduced to 'absolute prose.——What he has done in any one 'species, or distinct kind (of writing), would have 'been sufficient to have acquired him a great name. 'If he had written nothing but his Prefaces, or no-'thing but his Songs, or his Prologues, each of them 'would have entitled him to the preference and dis-'tinction of excelling in his kind.' It should be remembered, that Mr. Congreve, in drawing this character of Mr. Dryden, discharged an obligation laid upon him by our Poet in these lines (84):

(84) See his verses to Mr. Congreve on his Comedy called The Double Dealer; prefixed to that play.

Dr. Garth, in his Preface to the translation of "Ovid's "Metamorphoses," in which Mr. Dryden's share is considerable, speaks of him as follows: 'I cannot pass by 'that admirable English Poet, without endeavouring 'to make his country sensible of the obligations they 'have to his Muse. Whether they consider the flow-'ing grace of his versification; the vigorous sallies of 'his fancy; or the peculiar delicacy of his periods; 'they will discover excellences never to be enough 'admired. If they trace him from the first pro-'ductions of his youth, to the last performances of 'his age, they will find, that, as the tyranny of rhyme 'never imposed on the perspicuity of the sense, so a 'languid ried the Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Earl of Berkſhire, who ſurvived him about eight years, and by whom he had three ſons, Charles, John, and Henry [AA]. B.

'languid ſenſe never wanted to be ſet off by the har'mony of rhyme: and as his early works wanted no
'force or ſpirit.——As a tranſlator, he was juſt;
'as an inventor, he was rich.——With all theſe
'wondrous talents, he was libelled in his life-time by 'the very men, who had no other excellences, but
'as they were his imitators. Where he was allowed 'to have ſentiments ſuperior to all others, they 'charged him with theft. But how did he ſteal? no
'otherwiſe than, like thoſe that ſteal beggars chil'dren, only to cloath them the better.' The teſtimony of ſo great a Poet, and ſo good a judge, as Mr. Pope, muſt not be omitted, when we are ſetting down the praiſes of Mr. Dryden. In a letter to Mr. Wycherley, dated December the 26th, 1704 (85), he ſays: 'It was certainly a great ſatisfaction to me, to ſee and
'converſe with a man, whom in his writings I had ſo
'long known with pleaſure. But it was a high addi'tion to it, to hear you at our very firſt meeting doing
'juſtice to your dead friend Mr. Dryden. I was not
'ſo happy as to know him; Virgilium tantum vidi.
'Had I been born early enough, I muſt have known 'and loved him. For I have been aſſured, not only
'by yourſelf, but by Mr. Congreve and Sir William
'Trumbull, that his perſonal qualities were as amiable
'as his poetical, notwithſtanding the many libellous
'miſrepreſentations of them; againſt which the for'mer of thoſe gentlemen has told me he will one day
'vindicate him (*). I ſuppoſe thoſe injuries were be'gun by the violence of party; but it is no doubt
'they were continued by envy at his ſucceſs and fame.
'And theſe ſcribblers, who attacked him in his latter
'times, were only like gnats in a ſummer's evening,
'which are never troubleſome, but in the fineſt and
'moſt glorious ſeaſon; for, his fire, like the ſun's, 'ſhone cleareſt towards its ſetting.' The Editor of "Original Poems and Tranſlations by John Dryden, "Eſq; &c." (86), ſpeaking, in the Preface, of his character, ſays: 'Poſterity has been juſt to his fame,
'and he ſtands now in full poſſeſſion of that eſtabliſhed
'reputation, ſo juſtly due to the ſprightlineſs of his 'wit, the livelineſs of his imagination, the beauty of 'his ſentiments and expreſſion, but eſpecially that im'proved harmony of his numbers, ſo happily begun
'by his predeceſſor Mr. Waller; and, if ſince brought 'to a greater perfection by a POET of our own times
'(†), it is what he himſelf always owned to be ow'ing to the foundation laid by Mr. Dryden. To this 'honour may be added another, that he improved
'our Proſe as much as our Verſe, and is, in that way
'too, one of the moſt correct writers in the Engliſh
'Language.'

[AA] He had three ſons, Charles, John, and Henry.] Charles became uſher of the palace to Pope Clement XI. and, upon his return to England, left his brother John to officiate in his room, and was drowned in ſwimming croſs the Thames near Windſor, in 1704. He wrote ſeveral pieces, and tranſlated the Sixth Satire of Juvenal. Mr. John Dryden tranſlated the Fourteenth Satire of Juvenal, and was author of a Comedy intituled, "The Huſband his own Cuckold" (87). He died at Rome not many months after his father. Mr. Henry Dryden entered into a religious Order.

 [Since the preceding article was written, Dryden has been the ſubject of much and various obſervation. Both the applauſes of his works, and the ſtrictures upon them, have been very numerous; and his poetical reputation has been widely extended and encreaſed. To recite every thing which we have met with, and even marked down, with regard to him, would carry us to too great a length. Our additions will be ſufficiently copious, if we only advert to the remarks which come from writers of diſtinguiſhed ability. Dr. Johnſon's admirable life, in particular, will demand a minute attention and various extracts.

Though, concerning the perſonal Hiſtory of Dryden, little new matter can now be collected, Dr. Johnſon has made upon it many intereſting obſervations. Dryden is reported by Derrick, one of his Biographers, to have inherited from his father an eſtate of two hundred a year, and to have been bred an Anabaptiſt. 'For either of theſe particulars,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'no authority is given. Such a 'fortune ought to have ſecured him from that poverty
'which ſeems always to have oppreſſed him; or, if 'he had waſted it, to have made him aſhamed of 'publiſhing his neceſſities. But though he had many 'enemies, who undoubtedly examined his life with a
'ſcrutiny ſufficiently malicious, I do not remember
'that he is ever charged with waſte of his patrimony.
'He was indeed ſometimes reproached for his firſt
'religion. I am therefore inclined to believe that
'Derrick's intelligence was partly true, and partly 'erroneous (88).'

(88) Lives of the moſt eminent Engliſh Poets. Vol. ii. p. 2.

When Dryden was at the Univerſity, he does not appear to have been eager of Poetical Diſtinction, or to have laviſhed his early wit either on fictitious ſubjects or public occaſions. 'He probably conſidered,' obſerves Dr. Johnſon, 'that he, who purpoſed to be 'an author, ought firſt to be a ſtudent. He obtained,
'whatever was the reaſon, no Fellowſhip in the 'College. Why he was excluded cannot now be 'known, and it is vain to gueſs; had he thought
'himſelf injured, he knew how to complain. In 'his Life of Plutarch he mentions his education in 'the College with gratitude; but in a Prologue at 'Oxford he has theſe lines:

'Oxford to him a dearer name ſhall be
'Than his own mother Univerſity:
'Thebes did his rude unknowing youth engage;
'He chooſes Athens in his riper age (89).

(89) Ibid. p. 3, 4.

There is a circumſtance, hitherto wholly unnoticed by Dryden's Biographers, which ſhews his early reputation for knowledge; and that is, his having been choſen a member of the Royal Society ſoon after the formation of that inſtitution. He was elected a Fellow of that Society on the nineteenth of November, 1662, and admitted on the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month (90). Few Poets, we believe, have ſolicited an introduction into that learned body, ſince Cowley, Denham, and Dryden.

(90) Birch's Hiſtory of the Royal Society. Vol. I. p. 125, 127.

It was at the time of Dryden's publiſhing his "Annus Mirabilis" that he began to exerciſe the domination of conſcious genius, by recommending his own performance: 'I am ſatisfied that as the 'Prince and General (Rupert and Monk) are in'comparably the beſt ſubjects I ever had, ſo what I 'have written on them is much better than what I
'have performed on any other. As I have endea-
'voured to adorn my Poem with noble thoughts, ſo
'much more to expreſs thoſe thoughts with elocution.'
It was, throughout his life, his cuſtom to recommend his works, by a repreſentation of the difficulties that he had encountered, without appearing, ſays Dr. Johnſon, ſufficiently to have conſidered, that where there is no difficulty there is no praiſe.

The "Annus Mirabilis" was addreſſed to Sir Robert Howard, nearly at the time in which he and Dryden had their controverſy concerning dramatic rhyme, which circumſtance has drawn from Dr. Johnſon the following remarks: 'There ſeems to be, in 'the conduct of Sir Robert Howard and Dryden to 'each other, ſomething that is not now eaſily to be 'explained. Dryden, in his Dedication to the Earl 'of Orrery, had defended dramatic rhyme; and How'ard, in a Preface to a Collection of Plays, had cen-
'ſured his opinion. Dryden vindicated himſelf in 'his "Dialogue on Dramatic Poetry." Howard, in 'his Preface to the "Duke of Lerma," animad-
'verted on the vindication; and Dryden, in a Preface
'to the "Indian Emperor," replied to the animad-
'verſions with great aſperity, and almoſt with con-
'tumely. The dedication to this play is dated the 'year in which the "Annus Mirabilis" was pub-
'liſhed. Here appears a ſtrange inconſiſtency: but
'Langbaine affords ſome help, by relating that the 'anſwer

'anſwer to Howard was not publiſhed in the firſt 'edition of the Play, but was added when it was 'afterwards reprinted; and as the "Duke of Lerma" 'did not appear till 1668, the ſame year in which 'the Dialogue was publiſhed, there was time enough 'for enmity to grow up between authors, who, 'writing both for the theatre, were naturally rivals. '(91).'

Dr. Johnſon has taken particular notice of Dryden's Controverſy with Settle. As Dryden's pamphlet has never been thought worthy of republication, and is not eaſily to be found, the Doctor has endeavoured to gratify the curioſity of his readers, by giving large extracts from it; larger, indeed, than the performance merited. Our great Biographer's concluding remark is admirable. "Such was the 'criticiſm to which the genius of Dryden could be 'reduced between rage and terrour; rage with little 'provocation, and terrour with little danger. To 'ſee the higheſt minds thus levelled with the mean-'eſt may produce ſome ſolace to the conſciouſneſs 'of weakneſs, and ſome mortification to the pride 'of wiſdom. But let it be remembered, that minds 'are not levelled in their powers but when they are 'firſt levelled in their deſires. Dryden and Settle had 'both placed their happineſs in the claps of mul-'titudes.' Elkanah Settle's Tragedy, entitled, "The "Empreſs of Morocco," which was written in rhyme, and for a while was much applauded, is ſaid to have been the firſt play embelliſhed with Sculptures. Even this circumſtance ſeems to have given poor Dryden great diſturbance (92).

(92) Ibid. p. 13, 21, 23.

Dr. Warton, from a communication of Mr. Pope to Mr. Spence, has related a circumſtance that farther illuſtrates our Poet's behaviour to contemporary dramatiſts. 'Old Jacob Tonſon uſed to ſay, that Dry-'den was a little jealous of rivals. He would com-'pliment Crown when a play of his failed, but was 'very cold to him if he met with ſucceſs. He ſome-'times uſed to ſay that Crown had ſome genius, but 'then he added always, that his father and Crown's 'mother were very well acquainted (93).'

We are indebted to Dr. Warton for an anecdote of a far more intereſting nature relative to the compoſition of the famous Ode for St. Cæcilia's Day. Mr. 'St. John, afterwards Lord Bolingbroke, happening 'to pay a morning-viſit to Dryden, whom he always 'reſpected, found him in an unuſual agitation of 'ſpirits, even to a trembling. "I have been up all "night," replied the old Bard: "my muſical friends 'made me promiſe to write them an Ode for the 'feaſt of St. Cæcilia. I have been ſo ſtruck with 'the ſubject which occurred to me, that I could not 'leave it till I had completed it: here it is, finiſhed 'at one ſitting." And immediately he ſhewed him 'this Ode, which places the Britiſh Lyric Poetry 'above that of any other nation. This anecdote, as 'true as it is curious, was imparted by Lord Boling-'broke to Pope, by Pope to Mr. Gilbert Weſt, by 'him to the ingenious friend who communicated it 'to me (94). The rapidity; and yet the perſpicuity 'of the thoughts, the glow and the expreſſiveneſs of 'the images, thoſe certain marks of the firſt ſketch of 'a maſter, conſpire to corroborate the truth of the 'fact (95).'

There is an Anecdote in the Gentleman's Magazine, not only of leſs conſequence, but of leſs authority, as we know not from what quarter it comes. We ſhall, however, inſert it, and leave it to take its chance with our readers. 'Dryden being with the 'Earl of Mulgrave (afterwards Duke of Bucks) at 'his ſeat near Whitby in Yorkſhire, they agreed to 'play at bowls for a wager, and promiſed that neither 'of them ſhould try the ground before-hand. But 'in the night Dryden's ſervant happened to diſcover 'his Lordſhip by moon-light taking his diſtances, 'and meaſuring his caſts, and informed his maſter. 'He took no notice of it; but the next day, after he 'had bowled, Lord Mulgrave, as he delivered his 'bowl, cried out, "My life, Dryden, to a horſe-"t——d that I beat you." "Lay me an even "wager, my Lord," ſaid the poet, "and I will take "it up (96)."

As one of the greateſt events of Dryden's life was his converſion to Popery, we ſhall tranſcribe Dr. Johnſon's candid and ſagacious reflections upon that tranſaction. 'Soon after the acceſſion of King James, 'when the deſign of reconciling the nation to the 'Church of Rome became apparent, and the religion 'of the Court gave the only title to its favours, 'Dryden declared himſelf a convert to Popery. This 'at any other time might have paſſed with little 'cenſure. Sir Kenelm Digby embraced Popery; the 'two Rainolds reciprocally converted one another; 'and Chillingworth himſelf was awhile to entangled 'in the wilds of controverſy as to retire for quiet to 'an infallible Church. If men of argument and 'ſtudy can find ſuch difficulties, or ſuch motives, as 'may either unite them to the Church of Rome, or 'detain them in uncertainty, there can be no wonder 'that a man, who perhaps never enquired why he 'was a Proteſtant, ſhould by an artful and experienced 'diſputant be made a Papiſt, over-borne by the 'ſudden violence of new and unexpected arguments, 'or deceived by a repreſentation which ſhews only 'the doubts on one part, and only the evidence on 'the other.

'That converſion will always be ſuſpected that 'apparently concurs with intereſt. He, that never 'finds his error till it hinders his progreſs towards 'wealth or honour, will not be thought to love 'truth only for herſelf. Yet it may eaſily happen 'that information may come at a commodious time; 'and as truth and intereſt are not by any fatal neceſ-'ſity at variance, that one may by accident introduce 'the other. When opinions are ſtruggling into 'popularity, the arguments by which they are 'oppoſed or defended become more known; and he 'that changes his profeſſion would perhaps have 'changed it before, with the like opportunities of 'inſtruction. This was then the ſtate of Popery; 'every artifice was uſed to ſhew it in its faireſt form; 'and it muſt be owned to be a religion of external 'appearance ſufficiently attractive.

'It is natural to hope that a comprehenſive is like-'wiſe an elevated ſoul, and that whoever is wiſe is 'alſo honeſt. I am willing to believe that Dryden, 'having employed his mind, active as it was, upon 'different ſtudies, and filled it, capacious as it was, 'with other materials, came unprovided to the con-'troverſy, and wanted rather ſkill to diſcover the 'right than virtue to maintain it. But enquiries into 'the heart are not for man: we muſt now leave him 'to his judge (97)."

(97) Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra. p. 60—62.

Dryden had once formed the deſign of writing an epic Poem on the actions either of Arthur or the Black Prince. 'He conſidered," ſays D. Johnſon, 'the epick as neceſſarily including ſome kind of 'ſupernatural agency, and had imagined a new kind 'of conteſt between the Guardian Angels of king-'doms, of whom he conceived that each might be 'repreſented zealous for his charge, without any in-'tended oppoſition to the purpoſes of the Supreme 'Being, of which all created minds muſt in part be 'ignorant. This is the moſt reaſonable ſcheme of 'celeſtial interpoſition that ever was formed. The 'ſurprizes and terrors of enchantments, which have 'ſucceeded to the intrigues and oppoſitions of Pagan 'Deities, afford very ſtriking ſcenes, and open a 'vaſt extent to the imagination; but, as Boileau 'obſerves, and Boileau will ſeldom be found miſtaken, 'with this incurable defect, that in a conteſt between 'Heaven and Hell we know at the beginning which is 'to prevail: for this reaſon we follow Rinaldo to 'the enchanted wood with more curioſity than terror. 'In the ſcheme of Dryden there is one great difficulty, which yet he would perhaps have had addreſs 'enough to ſurmount. In a war, juſtice can be but of 'one ſide; and to entitle the hero to the protection 'of angels, he muſt fight in the defence of indubi-'table right. Yet ſome of the celeſtial beings, thus 'oppoſed to each other, muſt have been repreſented 'as defending guilt. That this Poem was never 'written is reaſonably to be lamented. It would 'doubtleſs have improved our numbers, and enlarged 'our language, and might perhaps have contributed 'by pleaſing inſtruction to rectify our opinions, and 'purify

'purify our manners.' A public ſtipend was required by him as the indeſpenſable condition of ſuch an undertaking; but this was not likely in thoſe times to be obtained; as riches were not become familiar to us, nor had the nation yet learned to be liberal (98).

(98) Life, &c. p. 71—73.

Dryden had ſome time before his deceaſe been a cripple in his limbs, and at length died in Gerard-ſtreet of a mortification in his leg. Concerning the ſtory of his funeral, related in Note [X], Dr. Johnſon juſtly obſerves, that it appears with no great evidence. All the confirmation of it, he has met with, is in a letter of Farquhar, and he only relates that Dryden's funeral was tumultuary and confuſed. 'Suppoſing 'the ſtory true," ſays the Doctor, 'we may remark 'that the gradual change of manners, though im-'perceptible in its proceſs, appears great, when dif-'ferent times, and thoſe not very diſtant, are com-'pared. If at this time a young drunken Lord 'ſhould interrupt the pompous regularity of a mag-'nificent funeral; what would be the event, but 'that he would be joſtled out of the way, and com-'pelled to be quiet? If he ſhould thruſt himſelf 'into a houſe, he would be ſent roughly away; and, 'what is yet more to the honour of the preſent time, 'I believe that thoſe, who had ſubſcribed to the fune-'ral of a man like Dryden, would not, for ſuch 'an accident, have withdrawn their contributions '(99).'

(99) Ibid. p. 75, 80.

Dr. Johnſon's remarks on the perſonal character of Dryden, in addition to thoſe of Congreve, are too important to be omitted. 'To this account of Con-'greve nothing can be objected but the fondneſs of 'friendſhip; and to have excited that fondneſs in 'ſuch a mind is no ſmall degree of praiſe. The 'diſpoſition of Dryden, however, is ſhewn in this 'character rather as it exhibited itſelf in curſory 'converſation, than as it operated on the more im-'portant parts of life. His placability and his 'friendſhip indeed were ſolid virtues; but courteſy 'and good-humour are often found with little real 'worth. Since Congreve, who knew him ſo well, 'has told us no more, the reſt muſt be collected as 'it can from other teſtimonies, and particularly from 'thoſe notices which Dryden has very liberally given 'of himſelf.

'The modeſty which made him ſo ſlow to advance, 'and ſo eaſy to be repulſed, was certainly no ſuſ-'picion of deficient merit, or unconſciouſneſs of his 'own value: he appears to have known, in its whole 'extent, the dignity of his character, and to have 'ſet a very high value on his own powers and per-'formances. He probably did not offer his conver-'ſation, becauſe he expected it to be ſolicited; and 'he retired from a cold reception, not ſubmiſſive but 'indignant, with ſuch reverence of his own greatneſs 'as made him unwilling to expoſe it to neglect or 'violation.

'His modeſty was by no means inconſiſtent with 'oſtentatiouſneſs: he is diligent enough to remind 'the world of his merit, and expreſſes with very 'little ſcruple his high opinion of his own powers; 'but his ſelf-commendations are read without ſcorn 'or indignation: we allow his claims, and love his 'frankneſs,

'Tradition, however, has not allowed that his 'confidence in himſelf exempted him from jealouſy 'of others. He is accuſed of envy and inſidiouſneſs; 'and is particularly charged with inciting Creech to 'tranſlate Horace, that he might loſe the reputation 'which Lucretius had given him. Of this charge 'we immediately diſcover that it is merely conjec-'tural; the purpoſe was ſuch as no man would con-'feſs; and a crime, that admits no proof, why ſhould 'we believe?

'He has been deſcribed as magiſterially preſiding 'over the younger writers, and aſſuming the diſtri-'bution of poetical fame; but he who excels has a 'right to teach, and he whoſe judgement is incon-'teſtable may, without uſurpation, examine and 'decide.

'Congreve repreſents him as ready to adviſe and 'inſtruct; but there is reaſon to believe that his 'communication was rather uſeful than entertaining. 'He declares of himſelf that he was ſaturnine, and 'not one of thoſe whoſe ſprightly ſayings diverted 'company; and one of his cenſurers makes him ſay;

'Nor wine nor love could ever ſee me gay;
'To writing bred, I knew not what to ſay.

'There are men whoſe powers operate only at 'leiſure and in retirement, and whoſe intellectual 'vigour deſerts them in converſation; whom merri-'ment confuſes, and objection diſconcerts; whoſe 'baſhfulneſs reſtrains their exertion, and ſuffers them 'not to ſpeak till the time of ſpeaking is paſt; or 'whoſe attention to their own character makes them 'unwilling to utter at hazard what has not been con-'ſidered, and cannot be recalled.

'Of Dryden's ſluggiſhneſs in converſation it is vain 'to ſearch or to gueſs the cauſe. He certainly wanted 'neither ſentiments nor language; his intellectual 'treaſures were great, though they were locked up 'from his own uſe. His thoughts, when he wrote, 'flowed in upon him ſo faſt, that his only care was 'which to chuſe, and which to reject. Such rapidity 'of compoſition naturally promiſes a flow of talk; 'yet we muſt be content to believe what an enemy 'ſays of him, when he likewiſe ſays it of himſelf. 'But, whatever was his character as a companion, it 'appears that he lived in familiarity with the higheſt 'perſons of his time. It is related by Carte of the 'Duke of Ormond, that he uſed often to paſs a night 'with Dryden, and thoſe with whom Dryden con-'ſorted. Who they were Carte has not told; but 'certainly the convivial table at which Ormond ſat 'was not ſurrounded with a Plebeian Society. He 'was indeed reproached with boaſting of his famili-'arity with the great; and Horace will ſupport him 'in the opinion, that to pleaſe ſuperiors is not the 'loweſt kind of merit.

'The merit of pleaſing muſt, however, be eſti-'mated by the means. Favour is not always gained 'by good actions or laudable qualities. Careſſes and 'preferments are often beſtowed on the auxiliaries of 'vice, the procurers of pleaſure, or the flatterers of 'vanity. Dryden has never been charged with any 'perſonal agency unworthy of a good character; 'he abetted vice and vanity only with his pen. One 'of his enemies has accuſed him of lewdneſs in his 'converſation; but if acculation without proof be 'credited, who ſhall be innocent?

'His works afford too many examples of diſſolute 'licentiouſneſs, and abject adulation; but they were 'probably, like his merriment, artificial and con-'ſtrained; the effects of ſtudy and meditation, and 'his trade rather than his pleaſure. Of the mind 'that can trade in corruption, and can deliberately 'pollute itſelf with ideal wickedneſs for the ſake of 'ſpreading the contagion in Society, I wiſh not to 'conceal or excuſe the depravity.—Such degradation 'of the dignity of genius, ſuch abuſe of ſuperlative 'abilities, cannot be contemplated but with grief 'and indignation. What conſolation can be had, 'Dryden has afforded, by living to repent, and to 'teſtify his repentance.

'Of dramatic immorality he did not want exam-'ples among his predeceſſors, or companions among 'his contemporaries: but, in the meanneſs and ſervi-'lity of hyperbolical adulation, I know not whether, 'ſince the days in which Roman Emperors were 'deified, he has been ever equalled, except by Afra 'Behn in an addreſs to Eleanor Gwyn. When once 'he has undertaken the taſk of praiſe, he no longer 'retaines ſhame in himſelf, nor ſuppoſes it in his 'patron. As many odoriferous bodies are obſerved 'to diffuſe perfumes from year to year, without ſen-'ſible diminution of bulk or weight, he appears 'never to have impoveriſhed his mint of flattery by 'his expences, however laviſh. He had all the 'forms of excellence, intellectual and moral, com-'bined in his mind, with endleſs variation; and when 'he had ſcattered on the hero of the day the golden 'ſhower of wit and virtue, he had ready for him, 'whom he wiſhed to court on the morrow, new wit 'and virtue with another ſtamp. Of this kind of 'meanneſs he never ſeems to decline the practice, or 'lament the neceſſity: he conſiders the great as 'entitled to encomiaſtic homage, and brings praiſe 'rather as a tribute than a gift, more delighted with the fertility of his invention than mortified by the ‘ proſtitution of his judgment. It is indeed not cer- ‘ tain, that on theſe occaſions his judgment much ‘ rebelled againſt his intereſt. There are minds ‘ which eaſily ſink into ſubmiſſion, that look on ‘ grandeur with undiſtinguiſhing reverence, and diſ- ‘ cover no defect where there is elevation of rank ‘ and affluence of riches.

‘ With his praiſes of others and of himſelf is always ‘ intermingled a ſtrain of diſcontent and lamentation, ‘ a ſullen growl of reſentment, or a querulous murmur ‘ of diſtreſs. His works are under-valued, his merit ‘ unrewarded, and he has few thanks to pay his ſtars ‘ that he was born among Engliſhmen. To his cri- ‘ tics he is ſometimes contemptuous, ſometimes re- ‘ ſentful, and ſometimes ſubmiſſive. The writer, ‘ who thinks his works formed for duration, miſtakes ‘ his intereſt when he mentions his enemies. He ‘ degrades his own dignity by ſhewing that he was ‘ affected by their cenſures, and gives laſting im- ‘ portance to names, which, left to themſelves, would ‘ vaniſh from remembrance. From this principle ‘ Dryden did not oft depart; his complaints are for ‘ the greater part general; he ſeldom pollutes his ‘ page with an adverſe name. He condeſcended in- ‘ deed to a controverſy with Settle, in which he ‘ perhaps may be conſidered rather as aſſaulting than ‘ repelling; and, ſince Settle is ſunk into oblivion, ‘ his libel remains injurious only to himſelf. Among ‘ anſwers to critics, no poetical attacks, or altera- ‘ tions, are to be included: they are, like other ‘ poems, effuſions of genius, produced as much to ‘ obtain praiſe as to obviate cenſure. Theſe Dryden ‘ practiſed, and in theſe he excelled (100).” Of Collier, Blackmore, and Milbourne, he only took ſome general notice, in the preface to his Fables.

(100) Ibid. p. 83—91.

The malignity which Dryden often expreſſed againſt the clergy is imputed by Langbaine to a repulſe which he ſuffered when he ſolicited ordination; but he ‘ denied that he ever deſigned to enter into the Church; ‘ and ſuch a denial,’ obſerves Dr. Johnſon, ‘ he ‘ would not have hazarded, if he could have been ‘ convicted of falſehood. Malevolence to the clergy,’ adds the Doctor, ‘ is ſeldom at a great diſtance from ‘ irreverence of religion, and Dryden affords no excep- ‘ tion to this obſervation. His writings exhibit many ‘ paſſages, which, with all the allowance that can ‘ be made for characters and occaſions, are ſuch as ‘ piety would not have admitted, and ſuch as may ‘ vitiate light and unprincipled minds. But there is ‘ no reaſon for ſuppoſing that he diſbelieved the ‘ religion which he diſobeyed. He forgot his duty ‘ rather than diſowned it. His tendency to pro- ‘ faneneſs is the effect of levity, negligence, and ‘ looſe converſation, with a deſire of accommodating ‘ himſelf to the corruption of the times, by venturing ‘ to be wicked as far as he durſt. When he pro- ‘ feſſed himſelf a convert to Popery, he did not pre- ‘ tend to have received any new conviction of the ‘ fundamental doctrines of Chriſtianity (101).”

(101) Ibid. P. 94, 95.

The perſecution of critics was not the worſt of Dryden's vexations; for he was much more diſturbed by the importunities of want. His complaints of poverty are ſo frequently repeated, that it is impoſſible not to deteſt the age which could impoſe on ſuch a man the neceſſity of ſolicitations, or not to deſpiſe the man who could ſubmit to ſolicitations without neceſſity. It is to be feared that the greater part of his life was paſſed in exigences, though of his ſupplies or his expences it is not now eaſy to form a probable eſtimate. Excepting the ſalary of the Laureate, to which King James added the office of Hiſtoriographer, perhaps with ſome additional emolument, his whole revenue ſeems to have been caſual; ‘ and it is well known,’ adds Dr. Johnſon, ‘ that he ſeldom lives frugally who ‘ lives by chance. Hope is always liberal, and they ‘ that truſt her promiſes make little ſcruple of re- ‘ velling to-day on the profits of the morrow (102).’

(102) Ibid. p. 95, 96.

The advantage which Dryden derived from his plays was not great. Dr. Warton ſays, that he generally got twenty-five pounds for the copy, and ſeventy-pounds for his benefits (103). From the number of his theatrical performances it might naturally be ſuppoſed that he muſt have improved his fortune, or, at leaſt, that he muſt have ſet penury at defiance. ‘ But in Dryden's time,’ obſerves Dr. Johnſon, ‘ the drama was very far from that univerſal ‘ approbation which it has now obtained. The ‘ play-houſe was abhorred by the Puritans, and ‘ avoided by thoſe who deſired the character of ‘ ſeriouſneſs or decency. A grave lawyer would have ‘ debaſed his dignity, and a young trader would ‘ have impaired his credit, by appearing in thoſe ‘ manſions of diſſolute licentiouſneſs. The profits of ‘ the Theatre, when ſo many claſſes of the people ‘ were deducted from the audience, were not great; ‘ and the Poet had for a long time but a ſingle night. ‘ The firſt that had two nights was Southern, and ‘ the firſt that had three was Rowe. There were, ‘ however, in thoſe days, arts of improving a Poet's ‘ profit, which Dryden forebore to practiſe; and a ‘ play therefore ſeldom produced him more than a ‘ hundred pounds, by the accumulated gain of the ‘ third night, the dedication, and the copy (104).’

(104) Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra. P. 47, 48.

Of the produce of his other works much intelligence cannot now be obtained. By diſcourſing with the late Mr. Tonſon, Dr. Johnſon could not find that any memorials of the tranſactions between his predeceſſor and Dryden had been preſerved, excepting the following papers:

“ I do hereby promiſe to pay to John Dryden, Eſq. “ or order, on the 25th of March 1699, the ſum of “ two hundred and fifty guineas, in conſideration of “ ten thouſand verſes, which the ſaid John Dryden, “ Eſq. is to deliver to me Jacob Tonſon when “ finiſhed, whereof ſeven thouſand five hundred verſes, “ more or leſs, are already in the ſaid Jacob Tonſon's “ poſſeſſion. And I do hereby farther promiſe, and “ engage myſelf to make up the ſaid ſum of two “ hundred and fifty guineas three hundred pounds “ ſterling to the ſaid John Dryden, Eſq. his execu- “ tors, adminiſtrators, or aſſigns, at the beginning of the “ ſecond impreſſion of the ſaid ten thouſand verſes.

“ In witneſs whereof I have hereunto ſet my hand “ and ſeal, this 20th day of March, 1698-9

“ JACOB TONSON.

“ Sealed and delivered, being firſt “ duly ſtampt, purſuant to the “ act of parliament for that “ purpoſe, in the preſence of “ Ben. Portlock. “ Will. Congreve.”

“ March 24th, 1698.

“ Received then of Mr. Jacob Tonſon the ſum of “ two hundred ſixty-eight pounds fifteen ſhillings, “ in purſuance of an agreement for ten thouſand “ verſes, to be delivered by me to the ſaid Jacob “ Tonſon, whereof I have already delivered to him “ about ſeven thouſand five hundred more or leſs; “ he the ſaid Jacob Tonſon being obliged to make “ up the foreſaid ſum of two hundred ſixty-eight “ pounds fifteen ſhillings three hundred pounds, at “ the beginning of the ſecond impreſſion of the afore- “ ſaid ten thouſand verſes; I ſay, received by me

“ JOHN DRYDEN.

“ Witneſs, Charles Dryden.”

Two hundred and fifty guineas, at 1*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* is 268*l.* 15*s.*

From the dates of this contract, it is manifeſt that it relates to the volume of Fables, which contains about twelve thouſand verſes, and for which therefore the payment muſt have been afterwards enlarged. Dr. Johnſon was told of a letter yet remaining, in which Dryden deſires Tonſon to bring him money, to pay for a watch which he had ordered for his ſon, and which the maker would not leave without the price. He had probably no recourſe in his exigences but to his Bookſeller; and the general conduct of traders was much leſs liberal in thoſe times than in our own; their views being narrower, and their manners groſſer. That the delicacy of the Poet was ſometimes expoſed to the mercantile ruggedneſs of that race appears from the teſtimony of Lord Bolingbroke, who related to Dr King of Oxford, that one day, when he viſited Dryden, they heard, as they were converſing, another perſon entering the houſe. ‘ This,’ ſaid Dryden, ‘ is Tonſon. You will take ‘ care not to depart before he goes away; for I have 'not completed the ſheet which I promiſed him; and, 'if you leave me unprotected, I muſt ſuffer all the 'rudeneſs to which his reſentment can prompt his 'tongue.' What rewards he obtained for his Poems, beſides the payment of his bookſeller, cannot be aſcertained. Mr. Derrick was informed, by ſome of Dryden's relations, that his Fables obtained five hundred pounds from the Dutcheſs of Ormond; a preſent not unſuitable to the magnificence of that ſplendid family. The ſame writer quotes Moyle, as relating that forty pounds were paid by a muſical ſociety for "Alexander's Feaſt." There is reaſon to believe that in thoſe days, when the payments of the Exchequer were dilatory and uncertain, the Laureat ſometimes felt the effects of this diſorder; for he complains, in one of his prefaces, of thoſe, who, being intruſted with the diſtribution of the Prince's bounty, ſuffer ſuch as depend upon it to languiſh in penury. Tradition has preſerved little of his petty habits or ſlight amuſements. Dr. Johnſon found two men to whom Dryden was perſonally known; one of whom ſaid, that at the houſe which he frequented, called Will's Coffee houſe, the appeal upon any literary diſpute was made to him; and the other related, that his armed chair, which in the winter had a ſettled and preſcriptive place by the fire, was in the ſummer placed in the balcony. The two places were called by him his winter and his ſummer ſeat (105).

(105) Lives of the Poets, ubi ſupra. p. 96—100.

Dr. Johnſon ſays, that he knows not any account of the perſon of Dryden (106). But from the State Poems we learn that he was a ſhort thick man. The nick-name given him by his enemies was Poet Squab. His head by Kneller, which was in the poſſeſſion of the late James Weſt, Eſq. would lead a ſpectator to imagine that he was graceful in his perſon; but Kneller was a great mender of nature. From his picture of Lady Eſſex Moſtyn, one would ſuppoſe her to have been a well-ſhaped woman, whereas ſhe was very crooked (107).

(106) Ibid. p. 82.

(107) From a very reſpectable correſpondent.

Concerning Dryden's private character he himſelf thus ſpeaks, in a letter to Dennis, written in 1694. 'For my principles of religion, I will not juſtify 'them to you: I know yours are far different. For 'the ſame reaſon, I ſhall ſay nothing of my princi-'ples of ſtate: I believe you, in yours, follow the 'dictates of your reaſon, as I, in mine, do thoſe of 'my conſcience: if I thought myſelf in an error, I 'would retract it. For my morals, between man and 'man, I am not to be my own judge. I appeal to 'the world if I have deceived or defrauded any man; 'and for my private converſation, they who ſee me 'every day can be the beſt witneſſes whether or no 'it be blameleſs and inoffenſive (108)."

(108) Davies's Dramatic Miſcellanies. Vol. III. p. 174, 175.

From the circumſtances of a more perſonal nature, we proceed to conſider Dryden in his intellectual and literary character. And here he preſents himſelf to us as a Dramatic Author, a Critic, a Scholar, a Writer of proſe, and a general poet. Concerning each of theſe objects we ſhall collect the principal obſervations, of a later date than the original article, which we have met with in the courſe of our reading.

That the fame of Dryden does not at preſent reſt on his dramatic productions, but depends on conſiderations of a more important nature, is now univerſally underſtood. Nevertheleſs, as his plays were twenty ſeven, or twenty-eight in number, and were the chief employment of twenty-five years of his life, his character as a Dramatiſt is a matter of conſequence; for which reaſon we ſhall attend to the remarks on ſome of his pieces for the ſtage, that have been made by Dr. Johnſon and the authors of the "Biographia Dramatica."—"The Wild Gallant." In this he began with no happy auſpices; 'for, his 'performance was ſo much diſapproved, that he was 'compelled to recal it, and change it from its im-'perfect ſtate to the form in which it now appears, 'and which is yet ſufficiently defective to vindicate 'the critics (109)."—"The Rival Ladies." This, which was Dryden's ſecond play, and publiſhed in 1664, is numbered xviii. in the liſt inſerted in note [D]. It was dedicated to the Earl of Orrery; and here our Poet made his firſt Eſſay of Dramatic Rhyme, which he defends in the Dedication with ſufficient certainty of a favourable hearing; for, Orrery was himſelf a writer of rhyming Tragedies (110).—The ſcene of the play lies in Alicant; and the diſpute betwixt Amideo and Hypolito, and Gonſalvo's fighting with the pirates, are borrowed from Encolpius, Giton, Eumolphus, and Tryphena's boarding the veſſel of Lycas in Petronius Arbiter. In the cataſtrophe there is a near reſemblance to that of Scarron's "Rival Brothers (111)"—"The Indian Emperor." Of the connection of this Tragedy with Howard's "Indian Queen," notice was given to the audience by printed bills, diſtributed at the door; an expedient ſuppoſed to be ridiculed in the "Rehearſal," when Bays tells how many reams he has printed, to inſtil into his auditory ſome conception of his plot. There is in this play the deſcription of night, which Rymer has made famous by preferring it to thoſe of all other Poets (112).—"Secret Love: or, the Maiden Queen." It is numbered xvii in Note [D], and repreſented as having been acted in 1679; whereas it was firſt performed in 1668. In the Preface, Dryden diſcuſſes a curious queſtion, whether a Poet can judge well of his own productions: and determines very juſtly, that, of the plan and diſpoſition, and all that can be reduced to principles of ſcience, the author may depend upon his own opinion; but that, in thoſe parts where fancy predominates, ſelf-love may eaſily be deceived. 'He might have obſerved,' adds Dr. Johnſon, 'that what is good only becauſe it pleaſes, can-'not be pronounced good till it has been found to 'pleaſe (113)."—"Sir Martin Mar-all." It was firſt performed in 1668, and not in 1678, as ſaid in note [D]. Downes ſays, that the Duke of Newcaſtle gave this play to Dryden, who adapted it to the ſtage; and it is remarkable that it is entered on the books of the Stationers' Company as the production of that Nobleman (114.)—"The Tempeſt." Acted at Dorſet-Gardens, in 1670. The whole groundwork of this Play is built on the Tempeſt of Shakſpeare; and the greateſt part of the language and ſome entire ſcenes are copied from it verbatim. Dryden, however, has made a conſiderable alteration in the plot and conduct of the play, and introduced three new characters, viz. a ſiſter to Miranda who, like her, has never ſeen a man; a youth, who has never beheld a woman; and a female monſter, ſiſter and companion to Caliban. Beſides all this, he has ſomewhat enlarged the characters of the ſailors, greatly extended the muſical parts, and terminated the whole with a kind of Maſque. In ſhort, he has rendered it, in ſeveral reſpects, more ſhowy, more intricate, and fitter to keep up the general attention of the audience; and yet, to the immortal evidence of the ſuperiority of Shakſpeare's abilities over every other genius, the work of Dryden, interwoven as it is with the very texture of the original play, and fine as it muſt be conſidered taken ſingly, appears here but as patch-work, or as fruit entirely unequal to the noble ſtock on which it is engrafted (115).—"An Even-"ing's Love; or, the Mock Aſtrologer." This Comedy is dedicated to the illuſtrious Duke of Newcaſtle, whom Dryden courts by adding to his praiſes thoſe of his lady, not only as a lover but partner of his ſtudies. 'The Preface,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'ſeems 'very elaborately written, and contains many juſt 'remarks on the fathers of the Engliſh Drama. 'Shakſpeare's plots, he ſays, are in the hundred 'Novels of Cinthio; thoſe of Beaumont and Fletcher 'in Spaniſh ſtories; Jonſon only made them for 'himſelf. His criticiſms upon Tragedy, Comedy, 'and Farce, are judicious and profound. He endea-'vours to defend the immorality of ſome of his 'Comedies by the example of former writers; which 'is only to ſay, that he was not the firſt nor perhaps 'the greateſt offender. Againſt thoſe that accuſed 'him of plagiariſm, he alleges a favourable ex-'preſſion of the King: 'He only deſired that they, 'who accuſe me of thefts, would ſteal him plays like 'mine;' and then relates how much labour he ſpends 'in fitting for the Engliſh ſtage what he borrows 'from others (116).'—"Tyrannic Love." 'This,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'was another Tragedy in rhyme, 'conſpicuous for many paſſages of ſtrength and 'elegance, and many of empty noiſe and ridiculous 'turbulence. The rants of Maximin have been 'always the ſport of criticiſm; and were at length, 'if his own confeſſion may be truſted, the ſhame of 'the writer. Of this play he takes care to let the 'reader know, that it was contrived and written in 'ſeven

'seven weeks. Want of time was often his excuſe, 'or perhaps ſhortneſs of time was his private boaſt 'in the form of an apology.'—"The Conqueſt of "Granada." The two parts of which this performance conſiſts 'are written with a ſeeming determination 'to glut the public with dramatic wonders; to exhibit 'in its higheſt elevation a theatrical meteor of incredible love and impoſſible valour, and to leave 'no wilder flight to the extravagance of poſterity. 'All the rays of romantic heat, whether amorous or 'warlike, glow in Almanzor by a kind of concentration. He is above all laws; he is exempt from 'all reſtraints; he ranges the world at will, and 'governs wherever he appears. He fights without 'enquiring the cauſe, and loves in ſpite of the 'obligations of juſtice, of rejection by his miſtreſs, 'and of prohibition from the dead. Yet the ſcenes 'are, for the moſt part, delightful; they exhibit a 'kind of illuſtrious depravity, and majeſtic madneſs: 'ſuch as, if it is ſometimes deſpiſed, is often reverenced, 'and in which the ridiculous is mingled with the 'aſtoniſhing.' The extravagance of this play naturally drew upon it the cenſures of the critics, one of whom was Martin Clifford, to whom Sprat addreſſed the Life of Cowley, with ſuch veneration of his critical powers as might naturally excite great expectations of inſtruction from his remarks; but, from the ſpecimens produced by Dr. Johnſon, it appears that honeſt credulity ſhould beware of receiving characters from contemporary writers (117). Whatever objections might juſtly be made to the two parts of the "Con- "queſt of Granada," they both of them met with great ſucceſs in the repreſentation. Langbaine has taken uncommon pains to point out how much Dryden, in the formation of theſe pieces, has borrowed from the celebrated romances of Almahide, Grand Cyrus, Ibrahim and Guzman. Yet ſurely this envy was unneceſſary; ſince, as the plot of the whole was built on hiſtory, 'it ſhould rather be eſteemed as a 'merit,' obſerve the writers of the Biographia Dramatica, 'than a blemiſh in the author, that he has, 'like an induſtrious bee, collected his honey from 'all the choiceſt flowers which adorned the field he 'was traverſing, whether the more cultivated ones 'of ſerious, or the wilder of romantic hiſtory (118).'—"Ambovna." 'This,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'is a tiſſue 'of mingled dialogue in verſe and proſe, and was 'perhaps written in leſs time than the "Virgin- "Martyr;" though the author thought not fit, either 'oſtentatiouſly or mournfully, to tell how little labour 'it coſt him, or at how ſhort a warning he produced 'it. It was a temporary performance, written in 'the time of the Dutch war, to inflame the nation 'againſt their enemies; to whom he hopes, as he 'declares in his Epilogue, to make his Poetry 'not leſs deſtructive than that by which Tyrtæus of 'old animated the Spartans (119).'—"State of "Innocence." Though Dryden calls this an Opera, it is rather a Tragedy in heroic rhyme, but of which the perſonages are ſuch as cannot decently be exhibited on the ſtage. 'Some ſuch production was 'foreſeen by Marvel, who thus writes to Milton:

'Or if a work ſo infinite be ſpann'd,
'Jealous I was leſt ſome leſs ſkilful hand,
'Such as diſquiet always what is well
'And by ill-imitating would excel,
'Might hence preſume, the whole creation's day,
'To change in ſcenes, and ſhew it in a play.'

"The State of Innocence" is another of our Poet's haſty productions, the heat of his imagination having raiſed it in a month. Dr. Johnſon has animadverted with juſt ſeverity on the extravagance of the Dedication, and the falſehood of the Preface (120).—"Aureng-Zebe." This Tragedy is founded on the actions of a great Prince then reigning, but over nations not likely to be acquainted with the tranſactions of the Engliſh ſtage. The country is at ſuch a diſtance, that the manners might be ſafely falſified, and the incidents feigned; remoteneſs of place affording the ſame conveniences to a Poet as length of time. This play has the appearance of being the moſt elaborate of all the Dramas of Dryden that are written in rhyme. Though the perſonages are imperial, the dialogue is often domeſtic, and therefore ſuſceptible of ſentiments accommodated to familiar incidents. There are many paſſages that may be read with pleaſure, and the complaint of Life is celebrated (120). It is ſpoken by Aureng-Zebe, and is as follows:

'When I conſider life, 'tis all a cheat;
'Yet, fool'd with hope, men favour the deceit:
'Truſt on, in hopes tomorrow will repay,
'To-morrow's falſer than the former day;
'Lies more; and, when it ſays we ſhall be bleſs'd
'With new joys, cuts off what we poſſeſs'd.
'Strange cozenage! None would live paſt years again,
'Yet all hope pleaſure from what yet remain;
'And from the dregs of life hope to receive
'What the firſt ſprightly runnings cannot give.
'I'm tired of waiting for this chemic gold,
'Which fools us young, and beggars us when old.

The reply of Nourmahul is not unworthy of notice:

'Tis not for nothing that we life purſue:
'It pays our hopes with ſomething that is new.
'Each day's a miſtreſs unenjoy'd before;
'Like travellers, we're pleas'd with ſeeing more.
'Did you but know what joys your way attend,
'You would not hurry to your journey's end (122).'

"All for Love; or, the World Well Loſt." This is the only play of Dryden's which he wrote for 'himſelf; the reſt were given to the people. 'It is,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'by univerſal conſent accounted 'the work in which he has admitted the feweſt im- 'proprieties of ſtyle or character; but it has one fault 'equal to many, though rather moral than critical, 'that, by admitting the romantic omnipotence of 'love, he has recommended as laudable and worthy 'of imitation that conduct which, through all ages, 'the good have cenſured as vicious, and the bad 'deſpiſed as fooliſh (123).' It is obſerved, in the Biographia Dramatica, that there needs, perhaps, no other reaſon to be aſſigned for the 'All for Love's' being the moſt complete of Dryden's dramatic pieces, than that it was the only one which he was permitted to bring to that perfection which leiſure and application, added to a moſt capital degree of genius, might be expected to attain. Though the plot and general deſign of it are borrowed from Shakſpeare, and he has fallen ſhort of his firſt model in fire and originality, he has ſurpaſſed him in point of regularity and poetic harmony. Indeed, it may poſſibly ſtand hereafter as a matter of conteſt, whether this Tragedy is or is not to be eſteemed an invincible maſter-piece of the power of Engliſh Poetry (124).—"Troilus and "Creſſida." The laſt ſcene in the third act is a maſter-piece. It may be ſuſpected that the Eſſay on the Grounds of Criticiſm in Tragedy, prefixed to this play, was occaſioned by Rymer's Book on the ſame ſubject (125).—"Oedipus King of Thebes." The firſt and third acts of this Tragedy were written by Dryden, and he drew the machinery of the whole. It is one of the beſt executed pieces that either of the two celebrated authors were concerned in, though it is not without its faults. The writers have happily availed themſelves of ſeveral beauties both in Sophocles and Seneca. Whenever the Oedipus has been revived, it has never failed to affect the audience in a very powerful manner. Some years ago, at a repreſentation of it in Dublin, where Elringham acted the part of Oedipus, one of the inſtrumental performers, who was ſitting in the orcheſtra to ſee the piece, was ſo violently affected with the feigned diſtraction of that monarch, that he was immediately ſeized with a real-madneſs, which is ſaid never to have left him through life (126).—"The Spaniſh Fryar." Of this Tragi-Comedy Dr. Johnſon remarks, that it is eminent for the happy coincidence and coalition of the two plots. 'As it was written,' he adds, 'againſt the Papiſts, 'it would naturally at that time have friends and 'enemies; and partly by the popularity which it 'obtained at firſt, and partly by the real power both 'of the ſerious and riſible part it continued long a 'favourite of the public. It was Dryden's opinion, 'at leaſt for ſome time, and he maintains it in the 'Dedication of this play, that the Drama required an 'alternation of comic and tragic ſcenes, and that it is 'neceſſary to mitigate, by alleviations of merriment, 'the preſſure of ponderous events, and the fatigue of 'toilſome

'toilsome passions. Whoever, says he, cannot perform 'both parts, is but half a writer for the stage (127).' The writers of the Biographia Dramatica have entered into a particular vindication of Dryden against Langbaine's charge of his casting a reflection upon the whole body of the clergy in his character of Dominic the Friar; and contend that the satire thrown out in the play is only general against such ecclesiastical men as disgrace their cloth by wicked and unreasonable actions (128).—"The Duke of Guise." Dr. Johnson is of opinion that this Tragedy deserves notice only for the offence which it gave to the remnant of the Covenanters, and in general to the enemies of the Court, who attacked him with great violence and were answered by him, though at last he seemed to withdraw from the conflict, by transferring the greater part of the blame or merit to his partner. The play was professedly written for the party of the Duke of York, whose succession was then opposed; and a parallel was intended between the Leaguers of France and the covenanters of England, which intention produced the controversy (129).—"Albion and Albanius." Downes tells us, that this Opera happening to be performed at an unlucky time, being the very day on which the Duke of Monmouth landed in the West, and the kingdom in a great consternation, it ran but six nights, which, not answering half the charge the company had been at in getting it up, involved them very deeply in debt (130).—"Don Sebastian King of Portugal." This, Dr. Johnson observes, is commonly esteemed either the first or second of Dryden's dramatic performances. 'It is,' adds the Doctor, 'too long to 'be all acted, and has many characters and many 'incidents; and though it is not without sallies of 'frantic dignity, and more noise than meaning, yet 'as it makes approaches to the possibilities of real 'life, and has some sentiments which leave a strong 'impression, it continued long to attract attention. 'Amidst the distresses of Princes, and the vicissitudes 'of Empire, are inserted several scenes which the 'writer intended for comic; but which, I suppose, 'that age did not much commend, and this would not 'endure. There are, however passages of excellence 'universally acknowledged: the dispute and the re'conciliation of Dorax and Sebastian have always been 'admired.'—"Amphytrion." This is a Comedy which succeeded at its first appearance, and was long considered as a very diverting entertainment. It has of late years been occasionally revived.—"King Ar"thur." Dr. Johnson says, that this was the last work which Dryden performed for King Charles, who did not live to see it exhibited; and that it does not seem to have been ever brought upon the stage. Nevertheless, in the next sentence but one the Doctor adds, that, when it was first brought upon the stage, news that the Duke of Monmouth had landed was told in the Theatre; upon which the company departed, and "Arthur" was exhibited no more. Our great Biographer has here committed a singular act of inadvertence; besides which, he has mistaken what befell the "Albion and Albanius" as happening to "Ar"thur." "King Arthur" appears to have been first represented in 1691, and has within these few years been revived, with alterations, as a musical Drama. The dedication to the Marquis of Halifax contains a very elegant character of King Charles, and a pleasing account of his latter life (131). In the "King Ar"thur" the contrast of character between Philadel, a gentle aërial spirit, friendly to the Christians, and Grimbald, a fierce earthly goblin, engaged on the adverse party, is not only well designed, but executed with the hand of a master (132).—"Cleomenes." This Tragedy, says Dr. Johnson, 'is only remark'able as it occasioned an incident related in the "Guardian," and allusively mentioned by Dryden 'in his Preface. As he came out from the repre'sentation, he was accosted thus by some airy strip'ling: "Had I been left alone with a young beauty I "would not have spent my time like your Spartan." "That Sir, said Dryden, perhaps is true; but give "me leave to tell you, that you are no hero."—"Love "Triumphant." In the Dedication of this piece, to the Earl of Salisbury, Dryden mentions the lowness of fortune to which he has voluntarily reduced himself, and of which he has no reason to be ashamed. The catastrophe of the play, proceeding merely from a change of mind, is confessed by the author to be defective. It must, however, be acknowledged, that in several parts of the piece the genius of Dryden breaks forth, especially in the discovery of Alphonso's victorious Love, and in the very last scene, the catastrophe of which is extremely affecting, notwithstanding that it is brought about contrary to the rules of Aristotle. As the "Love Triumphant" was not well received upon the stage it happened that our Poet began and ended his dramatic labours with ill success (133).

That Dryden's talent was not Dramatic poetry is generally agreed, and the opinion is sanctioned by Dr. Warton (134). There has not been wanting, however, a critic who has been a vindicator of Dryden in his character of a writer for the stage. After remarking that Lee and Otway have only left some Dramatic pieces, while Dryden has composed with success in every species of poetry, and that they cannot be compared with him in extent of genius, the work we refer to goes on as follows: 'But, waving 'this claim, we shall only consider him in his theatri'cal capacity, although he himself thought his genius 'less adapted to the Drama than to Epic poetry. 'The business of the tragic muse is to melt the 'audience into pity, or fill them with terror. Lee 'has frequently effected the latter, but it is a fear 'often blended with horror. Otway was successful 'in exciting the tender passions. This power he, in 'a great measure, gained from his subjects, which, 'though seldom regularly conducted, yet, from their 'domestic nature, have a strong influence on the 'spectator. But does Dryden never thaw the soul 'into commiseration, nor freeze it with terror? We 'shall not mention the noble flights of poetry, which 'are scattered so profusely through all his plays, and 'which shew more of the fervidum ingenium, and 'os magna sonaturum, than any thing in Otway. 'We shall not instance his many beautiful descrip'tions, which are so pleasing to the fancy; nor his 'high and finished colouring, which is essential to 'poetry; but shall only observe, that Dryden raises 'the dramatic passions in the "Conquest of Mexico," '"Don Sebastian," and "All for Love," more than 'most critics are willing to allow. But is not the 'Drama too much circumscribed in its province? 'Let us hazard an opinion.—Is not man a compound 'of reason as well as of passion, and may not one 'weep and start at a Tragedy, without being either 'the wiser or the better? But, at a representation of 'a play of Dryden's, besides being properly moved, 'there are sentences, every where, which improve, 'and on which the mind may ruminate with satis'faction in the closet. And is not that dramatic 'composition the most excellent, which equally im'presses the mental œconomy? There is certainly 'more distress in Banks's Queen Mary than in 'Johnson's Irene; but will any one presume to say, 'that Banks is as good a Poet as Johnson? Were 'there no other monument of Dryden's poetical 'talents than his description of a ship in the Con'quest of Mexico, and of Cleopatra on the Cydnus in '"All for Love," we should not hesitate one moment 'to prefer him to Otway and Lee, and to station 'him after Milton, longo sed proximus intervallo (135).' Though this passage might admit of some strictures, it must be allowed, on the whole, to be an ingenious, as well as a candid defence of Dryden's dramatic character.

The catalogue of Dryden's plays, which, in appearance, is so elaborately given in note [D], is remarkably erroneous with respect to chronological order; nor did Dr. Johnson think it worth while to attend accurately to the subject. We shall, therefore, insert, from the Biographia Dramatica, a List of them, specifying the years in which they were first represented or published.

(136) Biog. Dram. Vol. II. p. 140, 141.

It is generally ſaid, by Dryden's Biographers, that, about the time of his ſucceeding Sir William Davenant as Poet Laureat, he engaged himſelf by contract to write four plays in each year. If, however, he entered into ſuch an engagement, it is evident that he never carried it into execution (137). "It is certain," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "that in one year he publiſhed "Love for Love, Aſſignation, two parts of the Con- "queſt of Granada, Sir Martin Mar-all, and the "State of Innocence, ſix complete plays; with a celerity of performance, which, though all Langbaine's "charges of plagiariſm ſhould be allowed, ſhews "ſuch facility of compoſition, ſuch readineſs of language, and ſuch copiouſneſs of ſentiment, as, ſince "the time of Lopez de Vega, perhaps no other author has poſſeſſed (138)." It is to be regretted, that ſo ingenious a remark ſhould be totally built on a wrong foundation. The ſix plays mentioned by Johnſon are, indeed, repreſented (with ſome degree of inaccuracy) in note D. and in Langbaine, as having been publiſhed in 1678; but moſt of them were only then reprinted, and it is an undoubted fact, that they were not written in that year. Nay, it is remarkable, that Dryden produced only one dramatic performance in 1678, and this, after an interval of two years from the appearance of his laſt work of the ſame kind, his "Aurengzebe" The performance we ſpeak of was his "All for Love," his beſt play; the play which he wrote at leiſure; which he wrote for himſelf, and not for the people.

(137) Ib. p. 138.

(138) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 49.

We come next to Dryden's character as a Critic, which is ſo admirably deſcribed by Dr. Johnſon, that we ſhall lay it before our readers at large "Dryden," ſays the Doctor, "may be properly, conſidered as the father of Engliſh criticiſm, as the writer who firſt taught us to determine upon principles the merit of compoſition. Of our former poets, the greateſt dramatiſt wrote without rules, conducted through life and nature by a genius that rarely miſled, and rarely deſerted him. Of the reſt, thoſe who knew the laws of propriety had neglected to teach them.

"Two "Arts of Engliſh Poetry" were written in the days of Elizabeth by Webb and Puttenham, from which ſomething might be learned, and a few hints had been given by Johnſon and Cowley; but Dryden's "Eſſay on Dramatic Poetry" was the firſt regular and valuable treatiſe on the art of writing.

"He who, having formed his opinions in the preſent age of Engliſh literature, turns back to peruſe this dialogue, will not perhaps find much increaſe of knowledge, or much novelty of inſtruction; but he is to remember that critical principles were then in the hands of a few, who had gathered them partly from the Antients, and partly from the Italians and French. The ſtructure of dramatic poems was then not generally underſtood. Audiences applauded by inſtinct, and poets perhaps often pleaſed by chance.

"A writer who obtains his full purpoſe loſes himſelf in his own luſtre. Of an opinion which is no longer doubted the evidence ceaſes to be examined. Of an art univerſally practiſed, the firſt teacher is forgotten. Learning once made popular is no longer learning; it has the appearance of ſomething which we have beſtowed upon ourſelves, as the dew appears to riſe from the field which it refreſhes.

"To judge rightly of an author, we muſt tranſport ourſelves to his time, and examine what were the wants of his contemporaries, and what were his means of ſupplying them. That which is eaſy at one time was difficult at another. Dryden at leaſt imported his ſcience, and gave his country what it wanted before; or rather, he imported only the materials, and manufactured them by his own ſkill.

"The dialogue on the Drama was one of his firſt eſſays of criticiſm, written when he was yet a timorous candidate for reputation, and therefore laboured with that diligence which he might allow himſelf ſomewhat to remit, when his name gave ſanction to his poſitions, and his awe of the public was abated, partly by cuſtom, and partly by ſucceſs. It will not be eaſy to find, in all the opulence of our language, a treatiſe ſo artfully variegated with ſucceſſive repreſentations of oppoſite probabilities, ſo enlivened with imagery, ſo brightened with illuſtrations. His portraits of the Engliſh dramatiſts are wrought with great ſpirit and diligence. The account of Shakſpeare may ſtand as a perpetual model of encomiaſtic criticiſm; being lofty without exaggeration. The praiſe laviſhed by Longinus on the atteſtation of the heroes of Marathon, by Demoſthenes, fades away before it. In a few lines is exhibited a character, ſo extenſive in its comprehenſion, and ſo curious in its limitations, that nothing can be added, diminiſhed, or reformed; nor can the editors and admirers of Shakſpeare, in all their emulation of reverence, boaſt of much more than of having diffuſed and paraphraſed this epitome of excellence, of having changed Dryden's gold for baſer metal, of lower value though of greater bulk.

"In this, and in all his other eſſays on the ſame ſubject, the criticiſm of Dryden is the criticiſm of a poet; not a dull collection of theorems, not a rude detection of faults, which perhaps the cenſor was not able to have committed; but a gay and vigorous diſſertation, where delight is mingled with inſtruction, and where the author proves his right of judgment by his power of performance,

"The different manner and effect with which critical knowledge may be conveyed was perhaps never more clearly exemplified than in the performances of Rymer and Dryden. It was ſaid of a diſpute between two mathematicians, "malim cum Scaligero errare quam cum Clavio recte ſapere;" that it was more eligible to go wrong with one than right with the other. A tendency of the ſame kind every mind muſt feel at the peruſal of Dryden's Prefaces and Rymer's Diſcourſes. With Dryden we are wandering in queſt of Truth; whom we find, if we find her at all, dreſt in the graces of elegance; and, if we miſs her, the labour of the purſuit rewards itſelf; we are led only through fragrance and flowers: Rymer, without taking a nearer, takes a rougher, way; every ſtep is to be made through thorns and brambles; and Truth, if we meet her, appears repulſive by her mien and ungraceful by her habit. Dryden's criticiſm has the majeſty of a queen; Rymer's has the ferocity of a tyrant.

"As he had ſtudied with great diligence the art of poetry, and enlarged and rectified his notions by experience perpetually increaſing, he had his mind ſtored with principles and obſervations; he poured out his knowledge with little labour; for, of labour, notwithſtanding the multiplicity of his productions, there is ſufficient reaſon to ſuſpect that he was not a lover. To write con amore, with fondneſs for the employment, with unwillingneſs to take leave of his own idea, and an unwearied purſuit of unattainable perfection, was, I think, no part of his character.

"His Criticiſm may be conſidered as general or occaſional. In his general precepts, which depend upon the nature of things, and the ſtructure of the human mind, he may doubtleſs be ſafely recommended to the confidence of the reader; but his occaſional and particular poſitions were ſometimes intereſted, ſometimes negligent, and ſometimes capricious. It is not without reaſon that Trapp, ſpeaking of the praiſes which he beſtows on Palamon and Arcite, ſays, "Novimus "judicium Drydeni de poemate quodam Chauceri, pul-

"chro

" chro ſane illo, et admodum laudando, nimirum quod

" He is therefore by no means conſtant to himſelf. His defence and deſertion of dramatic rhyme is generally known. Spence, in his remarks on Pope's Odyſſey, produces what he thinks an unconquerable quotation from Dryden's preface to the Eneid, in favour of tranſlating an epic poem into blank verſe; but he forgets that when his author attempted the Iliad, ſome years afterwards, he departed from his own deciſion, and tranſlated into rhyme.

" When he has any objection to obviate, or any licence to defend, he is not very ſcrupulous about what he aſſerts, nor very cautious, if the preſent purpoſe be ſerved, not to entangle himſelf in his own ſophiſtries. But, when all arts are exhauſted, like other hunted animals, he ſometimes ſtands at bay; when he cannot diſown the groſſneſs of one of his plays, he declares that he knows not any law that preſcribes morality to a comic poet (139)."

(139) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 103—109.

Dr. Johnſon's obſervations on the learning of Dryden are particularly curious. " His remarks," ſays the Doctor, " on ancient or modern writers are not always to be truſted. His parallel of the verſification of Ovid with that of Claudian has been very juſtly cenſured by Sewel (140). His compariſon of the firſt line of Virgil with the firſt of Statius is not happier. Virgil, he ſays, is ſoft and gentle, and would have thought Statius mad if he had heard him thundering out (140) Preface to Ovid's Metamorphoſes.

Quæ ſuperimpoſito moles geminata coloſſo.

" Statius perhaps heats himſelf, as he proceeds, to exaggerations ſomewhat hyperbolical; but undoubtedly Virgil would have been too haſty, if he had condemned him to ſtraw for one ſounding line. Dryden wanted an inſtance, and the firſt that occurred was impreſſed into the ſervice.

" What he wiſhes to ſay, he ſays at hazard; he cited Gorboduc, which he had never ſeen; gives a falſe account of Chapman's verſification; and diſcovers, in the preface to his Fables, that he tranſlated the firſt book of the Iliad, without knowing what was in the ſecond.

" It will be difficult to prove that Dryden ever made any great advances in literature. As having diſtinguiſhed himſelf at Weſtminſter under the tuition of Buſby, who advanced his ſcholars to a height of knowledge very rarely attained in grammar-ſchools, he reſided afterwards at Cambridge, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that his ſkill in the ancient languages was deficient, compared with that of common ſtudents; but his ſcholaſtic acquiſitions ſeem not proportionate to his opportunities and abilities. He could not, like Milton or Cowley, have made his name illuſtrious merely by his learning. He mentions but few books, and thoſe ſuch as lie in the beaten track of regular ſtudy; from which if ever he departs, he is in danger of loſing himſelf in unknown regions.

" In his Dialogue on the Drama, he pronounces with great confidence that the Latin tragedy of Medea is not Ovid's, becauſe it is not ſufficiently intereſting and pathetic. He might have determined the queſtion upon ſurer evidence; for, it is quoted by Quintilian as the work of Seneca; and the only line which remains of Ovid's play, for one line is left us, is not there to be found. There was therefore no need of the gravity of conjecture, or the diſcuſſion of plot or ſentiment, to find what was already known upon higher authority than ſuch diſcuſſions can ever reach.

" His literature, though not always free from oſtentation, will be commonly found either obvious, and made his own by the art of dreſſing it; or ſuperficial, which, by what he gives, ſhews what he wanted; or erroneous, haſtily collected, and negligently ſcattered.

" Yet it cannot be ſaid that his genius is ever unprovided of matter, or that his fancy languiſhes in penury of ideas. His works abound with knowledge, and ſparkle with illuſtrations. There is ſcarcely any ſcience or faculty that does not ſupply him with occaſional images and lucky ſimilitudes; every page diſcovers a mind very widely acquainted both with art and nature, and in full poſſeſſion of great ſtores of intellectual wealth. Of him that knows much, it is natural to ſuppoſe that he has read with diligence; yet I rather believe that the knowledge of Dryden was gleaned from accidental intelligence and various converſation, by a quick apprehenſion, a judicious ſelection, and a happy memory, a keen appetite of knowledge, and a powerful digeſtion; by vigilance that permitted nothing to paſs without notice, and a habit of reflection that ſuffered nothing uſeful to be loſt. A mind like Dryden's, always curious, always active, to which every underſtanding was proud to be aſſociated, and of which every one ſolicited the regard, by an ambitious diſplay of himſelf, had a more pleaſant, perhaps a nearer, way, to knowledge than by the ſilent progreſs of ſolitary reading. I do not ſuppoſe that he deſpiſed books, or intentionally neglected them; but that he was carried out, by the impetuoſity of his genius, to more vivid and ſpeedy inſtructors; and that his ſtudies were rather deſultory and fortuitous than conſtant and ſyſtematical.

" It muſt be confeſſed that he ſcarcely ever appears to want book-learning but when he mentions books; and to him may be transferred the praiſe which he gives his maſter Charles:

His converſation, wit, and parts,
His knowledge in the nobleſt uſeful arts,
Were ſuch, dead authors could not give,
But habitudes of thoſe that live;
Who, lighting him, did greater lights receive:
He drain'd from all, and all they knew,
His apprehenſion quick, his judgment true:
That the moſt learn'd with ſhame confeſs
His knowledge more, his reading only leſs.

" Of all this, however, if the proof be demanded, I will not undertake to give it; the atoms of probability of which my opinion has been formed, lie ſcattered over all his works; and, by him who thinks the queſtion worth his notice, his works muſt be peruſed with very cloſe attention (141)."

(141) Johnſon," ubi ſupra, p. 109—114.

Perhaps this account of Dryden's Literature is rather below what was its real ſtandard. Dr. Beattie thinks that his learning was great, but that he did not avail himſelf of it ſo much as might have been expected; which was owing to his unhappy circumſtances, or perhaps to the faſhion of his age, alike unfriendly to good morals and good writing. That he has been guilty of many miſtakes, in regard to the ancient mythology, has been ſhewn by the author of " Polymetis;" and it muſt be allowed, by his impartial readers, that it would have been of great uſe to him to have poſſeſſed ſomething of a more claſſical taſte (142).

(142) Beattie's Eſſays, p. 741.

Dryden's compoſitions in proſe have frequently been the juſt object of applauſe. " His Prefaces," ſays Dr. Johnſon, " have not the formality of a ſettled " ſtyle, in which the firſt half of the ſentence betrays " the other. The clauſes are never balanced, nor " the periods modelled; every word ſeems to drop by " chance, though it falls into its proper place. No- " thing is cold or languid; the whole is airy, ani- " mated, and vigorous; what is great, is ſplendid. " He may be thought to mention himſelf too fre- " quently; but, while he forces himſelf upon our " eſteem, we cannot refuſe him to ſtand high in his " own. Every thing is excuſed by the play of images " and ſprightlineſs of expreſſion. Though all is eaſy, " nothing is feeble; though all ſeems careleſs, there " is nothing harſh; and though, ſince his earlier " works, more than a century has paſt, they have " nothing yet uncouth or obſolete. He who writes " much will not eaſily eſcape a manner, ſuch a re- " currence of particular modes as may be eaſily noted. " Dryden is always another and the ſame; he does " not exhibit a ſecond time the ſame elegances in " the ſame form, nor appears to have any art other " than that of expreſſing with clearneſs what he " thinks with vigour. His ſtyle could not eaſily be " imitated, either ſeriouſly or ludicrouſly; for, be- " ing always equable and always varied, it has no " prominent or diſcriminative characters. The beauty, " who is totally free from diſproportion of parts or " features,

" features, cannot be ridiculed by an overcharged re-
" ſemblance (143)."

(143) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 114, 115.

The proſe of Dryden, in Dr. Warton's opinion, is the moſt numerous and ſweet, the moſt mellow and generous, of any our language has yet produced (144). " Dry-
" den," obſerves a late anonymous author, " never " wrote much in proſe; but what he did write is ca" pital in its kind. It is nervous in the ſenſe, and " highly adorned in the periods."(145) " There is " no modern writer," ſays Dr. Beattie, " whoſe ſtyle
" is more diſtinguiſhable. Energy and eaſe are its " chief characters. The former is owing to a happy
" choice of expreſſions, equally emphatical and plain;
" the latter to a laudable partiality in favour of the
" idioms and radical words of the Engliſh tongue;
" the native riches and peculiar genius whereof are
" perhaps more apparent in him than in any other
" of our poets. In Dryden's more correct pieces, we " meet with no affectation of words of Greek or Latin
" etymology, no cumberſome pomp of epithets, no
" drawling circumlocutions, no idle glare of images,
" no blunderings round about a meaning: his Engliſh
" is pure and ſimple, nervous and clear, to a degree
" which Pope has never exceeded, and not always " equalled. Yet his attachment to the vernacular
" idiom, as well as the faſhion of his age, often be" trays him into a vulgarity, and even meanneſs of
" expreſſion (146)." Theſe remarks of Dr. Beattie extend to the character of Dryden's ſtyle in verſe, as well as in proſe.

Eminent as Dryden is in the views we have already conſidered, it is in his capacity as a general poet that his luſtre is principally apparent. " From his proſe," obſerves Dr. Johnſon, " he derives only ſecondary
" praiſe. The veneration, with which his name is " pronounced by every cultivator of Engliſh litera" ture, is paid to him as he refined the language,
" improved the ſentiments, and tuned the numbers
" of Engliſh poetry." Some advances towards nature and harmony had already been made by Waller and Denham; but, though they had done much, they left much to do. " More examples of more modes of " compoſition were neceſſary for the eſtabliſhment of " regularity, and the introduction of propriety in
" word and thought." Before the time of Dryden there was no poetical diction, no ſyſtem of words at once refined from the groſſneſs of domeſtic uſe, and free from the harſhneſs of terms appropriated to particular arts. The happy combinations of words which diſtinguiſh poetry from proſe had been rarely attempted; and it may be doubted whether Waller and Denham could have over-borne the prejudices which had long prevailed, and which had been ſanctioned by Cowley, had not Dryden appeared. To him was owing the eſtabliſhment of the new verſification, as it was called; and from his time Engliſh poetry has had no tendency to relapſe to its former ſavageneſs. Poetical tranſlation, in particular, in which the affluence and comprehenſion of our language are illuſtriouſly diſplayed, had been conducted in a very ſervile manner. Cowley, indeed, had aſſerted his liberty; but he ſpread his wings ſo boldly that he left his authors. It was reſerved for Dryden to fix the limits of this liberty, and to give us juſt rules and examples of tranſlation (147).

(147) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 115. 119.

After theſe and other excellent remarks, eſpecially on occaſional poetry, Dr. Johnſon proceeds to a critical examination of Dryden's Poems, in their due order. To purſue our admirable Biographer through the courſe of his criticiſms, would carry this article to an unreaſonable length. We muſt, therefore, quit the ſubject, though with reluctance, and content ourſelves with inſerting the reſult of the whole, in Dr. Johnſon's elaborate and ſagacious deſcription of Dryden's mind.

" In a general ſurvey of Dryden's labours, he appears to have a mind very comprehenſive by nature, and much enriched with acquired knowledge. His compoſitions are the effects of a vigorous genius operating upon large materials.

" The power that predominated in his intellectual operations, was rather ſtrong reaſon than quick ſenſibility. Upon all occaſions that were preſented, he ſtudied rather than felt, and produced ſentiments not ſuch as nature enforces, but meditation ſupplies. With the ſimple and elemental paſſions, as they ſpring ſeparate in the mind, he ſeems not much acquainted; and ſeldom deſcribes them but as they are complicated by the various relations of ſociety, and confuſed in the tumults and agitations of life.

" What he ſays of love may contribute to the explanation of his character:

Love various minds does variouſly inſpire;
It ſtirs in gentle boſoms gentle fire,
Like that of incenſe on the altar laid;
But raging flames tempeſtuous ſouls invade;
A fire which every windy paſſion blows,
With pride it mounts, or with revenge it glows.

" Dryden's was not one of the gentle boſoms: love, as it ſubſiſts in itſelf, with no tendency but to the perſon loved, and wiſhing only for correſpondent kindneſs; ſuch love as ſhuts out all other intereſt; the Love of the Golden Age, was too ſoft and ſubtle to put his faculties in motion. He hardly conceived it but in its turbulent efferveſcence with ſome other deſires; when it was inflamed by rivalry, or obſtructed by difficulties: when it invigorated ambition, or exaſperated revenge.

" He is therefore, with all his variety of excellence, not often pathetic; and had ſo little ſenſibility of the power of effuſions purely natural, that he did not eſteem them in others. Simplicity gave him no pleaſure; and for the firſt part of his life he looked on Otway with contempt, though at laſt, indeed very late, he confeſſed that in his play there was Nature, which is the chief beauty.

" We do not always know our own motives. I am not certain whether it was not rather the difficulty which he found in exhibiting the genuine operations of the heart, than a ſervile ſubmiſſion to an injudicious audience, that filled his plays with falſe magnificence. It was neceſſary to fix attention; and the mind can be captivated only by recollection or by curioſity; by reviving natural ſentiments, or impreſſing new appearances of things: ſentences were readier at his call than images; he could more eaſily fill the ear with ſome ſplendid novelty than awaken thoſe ideas that ſlumber in the heart.

" The favourite exerciſe of his mind was ratiocination; and, that argument might not be too ſoon at an end, he delighted to talk of liberty and neceſſity, deſtiny and contingence; theſe he diſcuſſes in the language of the ſchool with ſo much profundity, that the terms which he uſes are not always underſtood. It is indeed learning, but learning out of place.

" When once he had engaged himſelf in diſputation, thoughts flowed in on either ſide: he was now no longer at a loſs; he had always objections and ſolutions at command; verbaque proviſam rem—give him matter for his verſe, and he finds without difficulty verſe for his matter.

" In Comedy, for which he profeſſes himſelf not naturally qualified, the mirth which he excites will perhaps not be found ſo much to ariſe from any original humour, or peculiarity of character nicely diſtinguiſhed and diligently purſued, as from incidents and circumſtances, artifices and ſurprizes; from jeſts of action rather than of ſentiment. What he had of humourous or paſſionate, he ſeems to have had not from himſelf, but from other poets; if not always as a plagiary, at leaſt as an imitator.

" Next to argument, his delight was in wild and daring ſallies of ſentiment, in the irregular and excentric violence of wit. He delighted to tread upon the brink of meaning, where light and darkneſs begin to mingle; to approach the precipice of abſurdity, and hover over the abyſs of unideal vacancy. This inclination ſometimes produced nonſenſe, which he knew; as,

Move ſwiftly, ſun, and fly a lover's pace,
Leave weeks and months behind thee in thy race.
Amariel flies
To guard thee from the demons of the air;
My flaming ſword above them to diſplay,
All keen, and ground upon the edge of day.

And ſometimes it iſſued in abſurdities, of which perhaps he was not conſcious:

Then

Then we upon our orb's laſt verge ſhall go,
And ſee the ocean leaning on the ſky;
From thence our rolling neighbours we ſhall know,
And on the lunar world ſecurely pry.

Theſe lines have no meaning; but may we not ſay, in imitation of Cowley on another book,

'Tis ſo like ſenſe 'twill ſerve the turn as well?

"This endeavour after the grand and the new produced many ſentiments either great or bulky, and many images either juſt or ſplendid:

I am as free as Nature firſt made man,
Ere the baſe laws of ſervitude began,
When wild in woods the noble ſavage ran.

—'Tis but becauſe the Living death ne'er knew,
They fear to prove it as a thing that 's new:
Let me th' experiment before you try,
I 'll ſhew you firſt how eaſy 'tis to die.

—There with a foreſt of their darts he ſtrove,
And ſtood like Capaneus defying Jove;
With his broad ſword the boldeſt beating down,
While Fate grew pale leſt he ſhould win the town,
And turn'd the iron leaves of his dark book
To make new dooms, or mend what it miſtook.

—I beg no pity for this mouldering clay;
For if you give it burial, there it takes Poſſeſſion of your earth;
If burnt, and ſcatter'd in the air, the winds
That ſtrew my duſt diffuſe my royalty,
And ſpread me o'er your clime; for where one atom
Of mine ſhall light, know there Sebaſtian reigns.

Of theſe quotations the two firſt may be allowed to be great, the two latter only tumid.

"Of ſuch ſelection there is no end. I will add only a few more paſſages; of which the firſt, though it may perhaps not be quite clear in proſe, is not too obſcure for poetry, as the meaning that it has is noble:

No, there is a neceſſity in Fate,
Why ſtill the brave bold man is fortunate;
He keeps his object ever full in ſight,
And that aſſurance holds him firm and right;
True, 'tis a narrow way that leads to bliſs,
But right before there is no precipice;
Fear makes men look aſide, and ſo their footing miſs.

"Of the images which the two following citations afford, the firſt is elegant, the ſecond magnificent; whether either be juſt, let the reader judge:

What precious drops are theſe,
Which ſilently each other's track purſue,
Bright as young diamonds in their infant dew?

—Reſign your caſtle—
—Enter, brave Sir; for when you ſpeak the word,
The gates ſhall open of their own accord;
The genius of the place its Lord ſhall meet,
And bow its towery forehead at your feet.

"Theſe burſts of extravagance Dryden calls the Dalilahs of the Theatre; and owns that many noiſy lines of Maximin and Almanzor call out for vengeance upon him; "but I knew," ſays he, "that they were bad "enough to pleaſe, even when I wrote them." There is ſurely reaſon to ſuſpect that he pleaſed himſelf as well as his audience; and that theſe, like the harlots of other men, had his love, though not his approbation.

"He had ſometimes faults of a leſs generous and ſplendid kind. He makes, like almoſt all other poets, very frequent uſe of mythology, and ſometimes connects religion and fable too cloſely without diſtinction.

"He deſcends to diſplay his knowledge with pedantic oſtentation; as when, in tranſlating Virgil, he ſays, "tack to the larboard"—and "veer ſtarboard" —and talks, in another work, of "virtue ſpooming "before the wind." His vanity now and then betrays his ignorance;

They Nature's king through Nature's opticks view'd;
Revers'd they view'd him leſſen'd to their eyes.

He had heard of reverſing a teleſcope, and unluckily reverſes the object.

"He is ſometimes unexpectedly mean. When he deſcribes the Supreme Being as moved by prayer to ſtop the Fire of London, what is his expreſſion?

A hollow cryſtal pyramid he takes,
In firmamental waters dipp'd above,
Of this a broad extinguiſher he makes,
And hoods the flames that to their quarry ſtrove.

"When he deſcribes the Laſt Day, and the deciſive tribunal, he intermingles this image:

When rattling bones together fly,
From the four quarters of the ſky.

"It was indeed never in his power to reſiſt the temptation of a jeſt. In his Elegy on Cromwell:

No ſooner was the Frenchman's cauſe embrac'd,
Than the light Monſieur the grave Don outweigh'd;
His fortune turn'd the ſcale—

"He had a vanity, unworthy of his abilities, to ſhew, as may be ſuſpected, the rank of the company with whom he lived, by the uſe of French words, which had then crept into converſation; ſuch as fraicheur for coolneſs, fougue for turbulence, and a few more, none of which the language has incorporated or retained. They continue only where they ſtood firſt, perpetual warnings to future innovators.

"Theſe are his faults of affectation; his faults of negligence are beyond recital. Such is the unevenneſs of his compoſitions, that ten lines are ſeldom found together without ſomething of which the reader is aſhamed. Dryden was no rigid judge of his own pages; he ſeldom ſtruggled after ſupreme excellence, but ſnatched in haſte what was within his reach; and, when he could content others, was himſelf contented. He did not keep preſent to his mind an idea of pure perfection; nor compare his works, ſuch as they were, with what they might be made. He knew to whom he ſhould be oppoſed. He had more muſick than Waller, more vigour than Denham, and more nature than Cowley; and from his contemporaries he was in no danger. Standing therefore in the higheſt place, he had no care to riſe by contending with himſelf; but, while there was no name above his own, was willing to enjoy fame on the eaſieſt terms.

"He was no lover of labour. What he thought ſufficient, he did not ſtop to make better; and allowed himſelf to leave many parts unfiniſhed, in confidence that the good lines would overbalance the bad. What he had once written, he diſmiſſed from his thoughts; and, I believe, there is no example to be found of any correction or improvement made by him after publication. The haſtineſs of his productions might be the effect of neceſſity; but his ſubſequent neglect could hardly have any other cauſe than impatience of ſtudy.

"What can be ſaid of his verſification will be little more than a dilatation of the praiſe given it by Pope:

Waller was ſmooth; but Dryden taught to join
The varying verſe, the full-reſounding line,
The long majeſtic march, and energy divine.

"Some improvements had been already made in Engliſh numbers; but the full force of our language was not yet felt; the verſe that was ſmooth was commonly feeble. If Cowley had ſometimes a finiſhed line, he had it by chance. Dryden knew how to chuſe the flowing and the ſonorous words; to vary the pauſes, and adjuſt the accents; to diverſify the cadence, and yet preſerve the ſmoothneſs of his metre.

"Of Triplets and Alexandrines, though he did not introduce the uſe, he eſtabliſhed it. The triplet has long ſubſiſted among us. Dryden ſeems not to have traced it higher than to Chapman's Homer; but it is to be found in Phaer's Virgil, written in the reign of Mary, and in Hall's Satires, publiſhed five years before the death of Elizabeth.

"The

"The Alexandrine was, I believe, firſt uſed by Spenſer, for the ſake of cloſing his ſtanza with a fuller ſound. We had a longer meaſure of fourteen ſyllables, into which the Eneid was tranſlated by Phaer, and other works of the ancients by other writers; of which Chapman's Iliad was, I believe, the laſt.

The two firſt lines of Phaer's third Eneid will exemplify this meaſure:

When Aſia's ſtate was overthrown, and Priam's kingdom ſtout,
All guiltleſs, by the power of gods above was rooted out.

"As theſe lines had their break, or cæſura, always at the eighth ſyllable, it was thought, in time, commodious to divide them; and quatrains of lines, alternately, conſiſting of eight and ſix ſyllables, make the moſt ſoft and pleaſing of our lyric meaſures; as,

Relentleſs Time, deſtroying pow'r,
Which ſtone and braſs obey,
Who giv'ſt to every flying hour
To work ſome new decay.

"In the Alexandrine, when its power was once felt, ſome poems, as "Drayton's Polyolbion," were wholly written; and ſometimes the meaſures of twelve and fourteen ſyllables were interchanged with one another. Cowley was the firſt that inſerted the Alexandrine at pleaſure among the heroic lines of ten ſyllables, and from him Dryden profeſſes to have adopted it.

"The Triplet and Alexandrine are not univerſally approved. Swift always cenſured them, and wrote ſome lines to ridicule them. In examining their propriety, it is to be conſidered that the eſſence of verſe is regularity, and its ornament is variety. To write verſe, is to diſpoſe ſyllables and ſounds harmonically by ſome known and ſettled rule; a rule however lax enough to ſubſtitute ſimilitude for identity, to admit change without breach or order, and to relieve the ear without diſappointing it. Thus a Latin hexameter is formed from dactyls and ſpondees differently combined; the Engliſh heroick admits of acute or grave ſyllables variouſly diſpoſed. The Latin never deviates into ſeven feet, or exceeds the number of ſeventeen ſyllables; but the Engliſh Alexandrine breaks the lawful bounds, and ſurpriſes the reader with two ſyllables more than he expected.

"The effect of the Triplet is the ſame: the ear has been accuſtomed to expect a new rhyme in every couplet; but is on a ſudden ſurprized with three rhymes together, to which the reader could not accommodate his voice, did he not obtain notice of the change from the braces of the margins. Surely there is ſomething unſkilful in the neceſſity of ſuch mechanical direction.

"Conſidering the metrical art ſimply as a ſcience, and conſequently excluding all caſualty, we muſt allow that Triplets and Alexandrines, inſerted by caprice, are interruptions of that conſtancy to which ſcience aſpires. And though the variety which they produce may very juſtly be deſired, yet to make our poetry exact, there ought to be ſome ſtated mode of admitting them.

"But till ſome ſuch regulation can be formed, I wiſh them ſtill to be retained in their preſent ſtate. They are ſometimes grateful to the reader, and ſometimes convenient to the poet. Fenton was of opinion that Dryden was too liberal and Pope too ſparing in their uſe.

"The rhymes of Dryden are commonly juſt, and he valued himſelf for his readineſs in finding them; but he is ſometimes open to objection.

"It is the common practice of our poets to end the ſecond line with a weak or grave ſyllable:

Together o'er the Alps methinks we fly,
Fill'd with ideas of fair Italy.

"Dryden ſometimes puts the weak rhyme in the firſt:

Laugh all the powers that favour tyranny,
And all the ſtanding army of the ſky.

"Sometimes he concludes a period or paragraph with the firſt line of a couplet, which, though the French ſeem to do it without irregularity, always diſpleaſes in Engliſh poetry.

"The Alexandrine, though much his favourite, is not always very diligently fabricated by him. It invariably requires a break at the ſixth ſyllable; a rule which the modern French poets never violate, but which Dryden ſometimes neglected:

And with paternal thunder vindicates his throne.

"Of Dryden's works it was ſaid by Pope, that "he "could ſelect from them better ſpecimens of every "mode of poetry than any other Engliſh writer could "ſupply." Perhaps no nation ever produced a writer that enriched his language with ſuch variety of models. To him we owe the improvement, perhaps the completion, of our metre, the refinement of our language, and much of the correctneſs of our ſentiments. By him we were taught ſapere & fari, to think naturally and expreſs forcibly. Though Davies has reaſoned in rhyme before him, it may be perhaps maintained that he was the firſt who joined argument with poetry. He ſhewed us the true bounds of a tranſlator's liberty. What was ſaid of Rome, adorned by Auguſtus, may be applied by an eaſy metaphor to Engliſh poetry embelliſhed by Dryden, lateritiam invenit, marmoream reliquit, he found it brick, and he left it marble (148)."

(148) Ibid. p. 173. 189.

Dr. Beattie's opinion of Dryden, which he has given ſomewhat at large, muſt not be omitted. What he has ſaid concerning our Poet's ſtyle has already been quoted; after which the doctor goes on as follows: "In fact, Dryden's genius did not lead him to the ſublime or pathetic. Good ſtrokes of both may doubtleſs be found in him; but they are momentary, and ſeem to be accidental. He is too witty for the one, and too familiar for the other. That he had no adequate reliſh for the majeſty of Paradiſe Loſt is evident to thoſe who have compared his opera called "The State of Innocence" with that immortal poem; and that his taſte for the true pathetic was imperfect, too manifeſtly appears from the general tenor of his Tranſlations as well as Tragedies. His Virgil abounds in lines and couplets of the moſt perfect beauty; but theſe are mixed with others of a different ſtamp: nor can they, who judge of the original by this tranſlation, ever receive any tolerable idea of that uniform magnificence of ſound and language, that exquiſite choice of words and figures, and that ſweet pathos of expreſſion and of ſentiment, which characteriſe the Mantuan Poet.——In delineating the more familiar ſcenes of life, in clothing plain moral doctrines with eaſy and graceful verſification, in the various departments of Comic Satire, and in the ſpirit and melody of his Lyric poems, Dryden is inferior to none of thoſe who went before him. He exceeds his maſter Chaucer in the firſt: in the three laſt he rivals Horace; the ſtyle of whoſe epiſtles he has happily imitated in his "Religio Laici," and other didactic pieces; and the harmony and elegance of whoſe odes he has proved that he could have equalled, if he had thought proper to cultivate that branch of the poetic art. Indeed, whether we conſider his peculiar ſignificancy of expreſſion, or the purity of his ſtyle; the ſweetneſs of his lyric, or the eaſe and perſpicuity of his moral poems; the ſportive ſeverity of his ſatire, or his talents in wit and humour; Dryden, in point of genius, (I do not ſay taſte,) ſeems to be a cloſer affinity to Horace than to any other ancient or modern, author. For energy of words, vivacity of deſcription, and appoſite variety of numbers, his "Feaſt of Alex-"ander" is ſuperior to any ode of Horace or Pindar now extant.

"Dryden's verſe, though often faulty, has a grace, and a ſpirit, peculiar to itſelf. That of Pope is more correct, and perhaps upon the whole more harmonious; but it is in general more languid, and leſs diverſified. Pope's numbers are ſweet, but elaborate; and our ſenſe of their energy is in ſome degree interrupted by our attention to the art diſplayed in their contexture: Dryden's are natural and free; and, while they communicate their own ſprightly motion to the ſpirits of the reader, hurry him along with a gentle and pleaſing violence, without giving him time either to animadvert on their faults, or to analyſe their beauties. Pope excels in ſolemnity of ſound; Dryden, in an eaſy melody, and boundleſs variety of rhythm. In this laſt reſpect I think I could prove, that he is ſupefor to all other Engliſh poets, Milton himſelf not excepted. Till Dryden appeared, none of our writers in rhime of the laſt century approached in any meaſure to the harmony of Fairfax and Spenſer. Of Waller it can only be ſaid, that he is not harſh; of Denham and Cowley, if a few couplets were ſtruck out of their works, we could not ſay ſo much. But, in Dryden's hands, the Engliſh rhiming couplet aſſumed a new form; and ſeems hardly ſuſceptible of any farther improvement. One of the greateſt poets of this century, the late and much-lamented Mr. Gray of Cambridge, modeſtly declared to me, that, if there was in his own numbers any thing that deſerved approbation, he had learned it all from Dryden (148)."

(148) Beattie's Eſſays, p. 359. 360.

Since the appearance of Pope, a compariſon of him with Dryden has been a natural exertion of critical ſkill. The ſubject has not been forgotten by Dr. Johnſon. As, however, he hath not introduced it in the life of Dryden, but in that of Pope, we ſhall refer his obſervations to what he himſelf has conſidered as their proper place. In the mean while, not to diſappoint our readers upon a matter which is curious and intereſting, we ſhall gratify them with Dr. Beattie's ingenious remarks upon the point in queſtion.

"Critics have often ſtated a compariſon between Dryden and Pope, as poets of the ſame order, and who differed only in degree of merit. But, in my opinion, the merit of the one differs conſiderably in kind from that of the other. Both were happy in a ſound judgment and moſt comprehenſive mind. Wit, and humour, and learning too, they ſeem to have poſſeſſed in equal meaſure; or, if Dryden may be thought to have gone deeper in the ſciences, Pope muſt be allowed to have been the greater adept in the arts. The diverſities in point of correctneſs and delicacy, which aroſe from their different ways of life, I do not now inſiſt upon. But, ſetting thoſe aſide, if Dryden founds any claim of preference on the originality of his manner, we ſhall venture to affirm, that Pope may found a ſimilar claim, and with equal juſtice, on the perfection of his taſte; and that, if the critical writings of the firſt are more voluminous, thoſe of the ſecond are more judicious; if Dryden's inventions are more diverſified, thoſe of Pope are more regular, and more important. Pope's ſtyle may be thought to have leſs ſimplicity, and leſs of the purity of the mother-tongue; but it is at the ſame time more uniformly elevated, and leſs debaſed by vulgariſm, than that of his great maſter:—and the ſuperior variety, that animates the numbers of the latter, will perhaps be found to be compenſated by the ſteadier and more majeſtic modulation of the former. Thus far their merits would appear to be pretty equally balanced.—But if the opinions of thoſe critics be true, who hold that the higheſt regions of Parnaſſus are appropriated to pathos and ſublimity, Dryden muſt after all confeſs, that he has never aſcended ſo far as his illuſtrious imitator, there being nothing in the writings of the firſt ſo deeply pathetic as the "Epiſtle of Eloiſa," or the "Elegy of the Unfortunate Lady;" nor ſo uniformly ſublime as the "Eſſay on Man" or the "Paſtoral of "the Meſſiah." This laſt is indeed but a ſelection and imitation of choice paſſages; but it beſpeaks a power of imitation, and a taſte in ſelection, that Dryden does not ſeem to have poſſeſſed. To all which may I not be permitted to add, what I think I could prove, that the pathos of Homer is frequently improved by Pope, and that of Virgil very frequently debaſed by Dryden?

The writings of Dryden are ſtamped with originality, but are not always the better for that circumſtance. Pope is an imitator profeſſedly, and of choice; but to moſt of thoſe whom he copies he is at leaſt equal, and to many of them ſuperior: and it is pleaſing to obſerve how he riſes in proportion to his originals. Where he follows Denham, Buckingham, Roſcommon, and Rocheſter, in his Windſor Foreſt, Eſſay on Criticiſm, and Poem on Silence, he is ſuperior indeed, but does not ſoar very high above them. When he verſifies Chaucer, he catches, as by inſtinct, the eaſe, ſimplicity, and ſpirit, of Dryden, whom he there emulates. "In the Rape of the Lock" he outſhines Boileau, as much as the ſylphs that flutter round Belinda exceed, in ſprightlineſs and luminous beauty, thoſe mechanical attendants of the goddeſs of luxury, who knead up plumpneſs for the chin of the canon, and pound vermilion for the cheek of the monk (149). His Eloiſa is beyond all compariſon more ſublime and more intereſting than any of Ovid's letter-writing ladies. His imitations of Horace equal their archetypes in elegance, and often ſurpaſs them in energy and fire. In the lyric ſtyle, he was no match for Dryden: but when he copies the manner of Virgil, and borrows the thoughts of Iſaiah, Pope is ſuperior not only to himſelf, but to almoſt all other poets (150)."

Our readers will not expect us to enter into the long controverſy which has been carried on between Miſs Seward and Mr. Weſton, relative to the comparative merits of Dryden and Pope. It will be found in the volumes of the Gentleman's Magazine for the years 1789 and 1790. Much ingenuity is diſplayed on both ſides; and Mr. Weſton fights with inextinguiſhable ardour in the cauſe of his favourite, Dryden.

We ſhall here take notice of two or three circumſtances that might have been mentioned before, but which eſcaped our attention. Dr. Warton, as we have ſeen, has related that the "Alexander's Feaſt" was ſtruck off in the heat of a ſingle night. But, if credit is to be given to a letter which was communicated to Dr. Birch, Dryden ſpent a fortnight in compoſing and correcting this famous Ode (151). Dr. Warton's narrative appears, however, to ſtand upon ſuperior evidence. Lord Monboddo, though ſo adverſe to the moderns, has paid a high compliment to this poem, particularly on account of its numbers (152). But who is there that can be inſenſible to its excellence?

(151) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 74.

(152) Monboddo on the Origin and Progreſs of Language, vol. II. p. 400.

Dr. Johnſon, in ſpeaking of the "Rehearſal," obſerves, that it was played in 1671, "and yet is re-"preſented as ridiculing paſſages in the "Conqueſt "of Granada" and "Aſſignation," which were not "publiſhed till 1678; in "Marriage Alamode," pub-"liſhed in 1673; and in "Tyrannic Love" of 1677. "Theſe contradictions ſhew how raſhly Satire is ap-"plied." Though the Doctor is miſtaken in his dates, excepting in a ſingle inſtance, his general remark is well founded; for, all theſe productions were ſubſequent to the appearance of the "Rehearſal." Of this celebrated performance Dr. Johnſon did not entertain any very high opinion (153)

(153) Johnſon, ubi ſupra, p. 50. 51.

Mr. Garrick had in his poſſeſſion ſome obſervations which were made by Dryden on the blank leaves of Rymer's "Remarks on the Tragedies of the laſt Age." Theſe, that no particle of him might be loſt, Dr. Johnſon has communicated to the public; and they were worthy of communication (154).

(154) Ibid. p. 193. 210.

At the end of Dr. Johnſon's life of Dryden is inſerted, from a manuſcript in the Lambeth Library, the copy of an original letter which our great Poet wrote to his ſons in Italy. From this letter it appears that he was ſincere in his converſion to Popery, and that he retained to the laſt his abſurd attachment to Judicial Aſtrology (155).

(155) Ibid. p. 211. 214.

The poetical character of Dryden, as given by two modern poets, ſhall conclude the preſent article. The firſt is by Mr. Hayley, after having ſpoken of Milton:

"Of humbler mien, but not of mortal race,
"Ill-fated Dryden, with imperial grace,
"Gives to th' obedient lyre his rapid laws:
"Tones yet unheard, with touch divine, he draws,
"The melting fall, the riſing ſwell ſublime,
"And all the magic of melodious rhyme.
"See with proud joy imagination ſpread
"A wreath of honour round his aged head!
"But two baſe ſpectres, though of different hue,
"The bard unhappy in his march purſue;
"Two vile diſgraceful fiends, of race accurſt,
"Conceived by ſpleen, by meagre famine nurſt,
"Malignant ſatire, mercenary praiſe,
"Shed their dark ſpots on his immortal bays."

The ſame poet has characterized Milton's and Dryden's verſification in the following lines:

"'Tis thus that Milton's verſe, and Dryden's rhyme,
"Are proof alike againſt the rage of time.
"Each maſter modell'd, with a touch ſo bold,
"The rude materials which he choſe to mold,
"That each his portion to perfection brought,
"Accompliſhing the glorious end he ſought (156)."

(156) Hayley on Epic Poetry, p. 65, 66. 108.

The next is from Churchill.

" Here let me bend, great DRYDEN, at thy ſhrine,
" Thou deareſt name to all the tuneful Nine.
" What if ſome dull lines in cold order creep,
" And with his theme the poet ſeems to ſleep,
" Still, when his ſubject riſes proud to view,
" With equal ſtrength the poet riſes too.
" With ſtrong inv ention, nobleſt vigour fraught,
" Thought ſtill ſprings up and riſes out of thought;
" Numbers ennobling numbers in their courſe,
" In varied ſweetneſs flow, in varied force;
" The powers of genius and of judgment join,
" And the whole art of poetry is thine (157)."]

 [DUCAREL (ANDREW COLTEE), an eminent Engliſh civilian and antiquary, was born in Normandy; whence his father, who was deſcended from an ancient family at Caen in that province, came to England, ſoon after the birth of his ſecond ſon James, and reſided at Greenwich.

The early rudiments of inſtruction he probably received in his own country. In 1729, being at that time a ſcholar at Eton, he was three months under the care of Sir Hans Sloane, on account of an accident which deprived him of the ſight of one eye. In 1731, he was admitted a gentleman-commoner of St. John's College, Oxford; proceeded LL. B. June 1, 1738; went out a grand compounder, Oct. 21, 1742 (a); became a member of the college of Doctors Commons in November, 1743; and married, in 1749, Suſanna ....., a worthy woman, who had been his ſervant; and who ſurvived him till Oct. 6, 1791, when ſhe died in an advanced age.

(a) Catalogue of Oxford Graduates, p. 106.

Though diſappointed in his wiſhes of entering into holy orders, he became intimately connected with the church. He was elected commiſſary or official of the peculiar and exempt juriſdiction of the collegiate church or free chapel of St. Katharine, near the Tower of London, 1755; was appointed commiſſary [A] and official of the city and dioceſe of Canterbury, by archbiſhop Herring, in December, 1758; and of the ſub-deanries of South Malling, Pagham, and Terring, in Suſſex, by archbiſhop Secker, on the death of Dr. Dennis Clarke, in 1776. He was elected F. A. S. Sept. 22, 1737, and was one of the firſt fellows of the Society nominated by the preſident and council on its incorporation 1755. He was alſo elected Aug. 29, 1760, member of the Society of Antiquaries at Cortona [B]; on which occaſion he ſent them a Latin letter drawn up by his friend the late Rev. Philip Morant [C]. He was admitted F. R. S. Feb. 18, 1762; became an honorary fellow of the Society of Antiquaries of Caſſel, by diploma, dated in November, 1778; and of that of Edinburgh in 1781. In 1755, he ſolicited the place of ſub-librarian at the Muſeum, in the room of Mr. Empſon; but it was pre engaged.

The Doctor's firſt publication, though without his name, was " A Tour through " Normandy, deſcribed in a Letter to a Friend, 1754," 4to. This tour through part of his native country was undertaken, in company with Dr. Bever, in the ſummer of 1752; and his account of it, conſiderably enlarged, was re-publiſhed under the title of " Anglo-Norman Antiquities, conſidered, in a Tour through part of Normandy, by Dr. " Ducarel, illuſtrated with 27 Copper Plates [D], 1767," fol. inſcribed to Dr. Lyttelton, biſhop of Carliſle, then preſident of the Society of Antiquaries. His Lordſhip had firſt remarked, 1742, the difference between the mode of architecture uſed by the Normans in their buildings and that practiſed by the contemporary Saxons in England; and the Doctor's obſervations, actually made on the ſpot ten years afterward, confirmed the rules then laid down. This ancient dependance of the Engliſh crown, with the many memorials in it by the Engliſh, was a favourite object of his contemplation. Its coinage was his next reſearch; and he publiſhed " A Series of above 200 Anglo-Gallic or " Norman and Aquitaine Coins of the Antient Kings of England, exhibited in Sixteen

" Copper Plates, and illuſtrated in Twelve Letters, addreſſed to the Society of Anti" quaries of London, and ſeveral of its Members [E]; to which is added, a Map of " the Antient Dominions of the Kings of England and France, with ſome adjacent " Countries, 1757," 4to. His portrait, engraved by Perry, from a painting by A. Soldi [F], 1746, was firſt prefixed to this work; which was the reſult of his acquaintance with M. de Boze, keeper of the French King's medals, and ſecretary of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Belles Lettres; who publiſhed ſo many learned diſſertations on antient coins and medals in their Memoirs, and a ſeparate treatiſe on the coins of the prelates and barons of France, of which only two copies came to England, as preſents from their author; one to Dr. Mead, purchaſed at his ſale by Dr. Gifford; the other of Dr. Ducarel, at whoſe ſale it was purchaſed by Mr. Gough. A third, in the library of Chancellor Lamoignon, is now in that of the Society of Antiquaries of London. Of the 527 coins in the 45 plates of this work the Doctor copied ſeveral into his own. He had, beſides, a copy of that ſcarce book, " Figures des monnoyes de France, 1619," 4to, by John Baptiſt Haultin, containing upwards of 500 French and other coins, in 126 wooden cuts, of which, in the year 1786, only three copies had been known to have come to ſale (b). But the Doctor's copy had the addition of many MS notes, taken from a copy in the French King's library, containing the metals, weight, and dates, of moſt of them. This is now in the Britiſh Muſeum [G]. In this undertaking the Doctor found himſelf ſeconded by Sir Charles Frederick, who engraved all the Aquitaine coins in his poſſeſſion, in 36 quarto plates, but without any deſcription or letter-preſs, and intended only for private uſe, being little known before their circulation on his deceaſe, and that of his two numiſmatic friends before-mentioned [H]. " Sir Charles had deſired Mr. North [I] would take his papers concerning Aquitaine coins, and digeſt and fit them for the preſs. Mr. North waited on him, and they talked over the affair. He earneſtly preſſed it; but was deſirous Mr. North's own piece on Henry the Third's coins [K] ſhould firſt be publiſhed. Upon this Mr. North ſet about to finiſh it, till the unfortunate affair of Wormley happened [L] (in which Mr. Frederick ſhewed himſelf his warm friend), which gave near two years delay to his work; during which time, a brother of the Society, who ſhall be nameleſs, came and told Mr. North, that Mr. Frederick had determined Mr. Folkes ſhould have the management of them, and had put them into his hands for that purpoſe. This report quite damped his pleaſing expectations; but he was in hopes, that, through the Doctor's interpoſition, he might have that agreeable employ (c)." Here the matter ſeems to have reſted.

(c) MS Letter to Dr. Ducarel.

Dr. Ducarel had ſome view to forming a ſeries of Engliſh medals, which, by admitting ſuch as have been ſtruck abroad relative to the hiſtory of this kingdom, he thought could be carried beyond the Conqueſt, provided the medals proved genuine. But when he engaged Francis Perry to engrave a ſeries, of which the late Mr. Hollis gave the outline, he began no earlier than Henry VIII. and cloſed it with James I. in 10

Of this work Mr. Gough has the Doctor's own copy, with MS obſervations by Mr. Hocker, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Loveday. To it is prefixed a copy of the Doctor's letter of thanks to Mr. Loveday, in the following terms:

'DEAR SIR, Doctors Commons, May 5, 1761.

'I received a few days ago a parcel directed to me, 'on the back of which was written " Mr. Hocker's 'papers, with Mr. Loveday's, relating to Dr. Ducarel's Aquitaine coins," ſigned by the late learned 'Dr. Ward, with whoſe hand I am well acquainted. 'As I hear with great pleaſure that all Dr. Ward's 'papers are fallen into your hands, I know not whom 'to return my thanks to for that piece of politeneſs 'but yourſelf, and I am, Sir, greatly obliged to you 'for thoſe papers. They contain ſome miſtakes and 'ſeveral faults, which I ſhall be ready to correct 'whenever I am able to diſcover coins enough to add 'another letter to the one already publiſhed. Hitherto 'I have met with only one Anglo-Gallic coin ſince 'that book was publiſhed; but having lately heard 'that Mr. Snelling, a dealer in Engliſh Coins 'and medals, intends ſhortly to publiſh a plate of 'twenty-five coins of the black money, which the 'late Mr. Joſeph Ames, ſecretary to the Society of 'Antiquaries, has, at different times, cauſed to be 'engraved, I called upon his ſon, and told him that 'I would endeavour to explain them; and that, if 'there was room in the plate, I might add my unpubliſhed coins thereto. This will be done very 'ſoon.' From this we may probably date his correſpondence with Mr. Loveday.

[F] From a painting by A. Soldi.] In this ſtate of the plate he is called " ANDREW COLTEE DU-
" CAREL, LL. D. COMMISSARY OF ST. KA-
" THARINE'S, ADVOCATE IN DOCTORS

[G] This is now in the Britiſh Muſeum.] The late Mr. Tutet had another, purchaſed at his ſale by Samuel Tyſſen, Eſq; F. A. S.; and the late Sir Charles Frederick, bart. had a third, now in the hands of Mr. Gough.

[H] And that of his two numiſmatic friends beforementioned.] A copy with a few MS. notes bought at the ſale of Sir Charles's library, 1786, is in that of the Society of Antiquaries

[I] Sir Charles had deſired Mr. North.] The Rev. George North, M. A. F. S. A. was vicar of Codicote, Herts, where he died June 27, 1772. See more of him in Nichols's Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 113.

[K] Mr. North's own piece on Henry the Third's coins.] What became of this piece is not now known. Two plates of coins for it were bought by Mr. Gough at the ſale of Dr. Lort's curioſities, 1791.

plates. Three ſupplemental ones were afterwards publiſhed of the ſame period. Mr. Hollis intended it ſhould be more extenſive, by taking in the Roman medals: he, however, aſſiſted Perry in his own way. It was taken up by Mr. Snelling, who did not publiſh it in Mr. Hollis's life-time (d).—Mr. Snelling's being a poſthumous publication, there is no letter-preſs to accompany his 33 plates, which reach from the Conqueſt to 1742. It will be eaſily ſeen that the medals of the firſt five kings are by Daſſier [M].

(d) Memoirs of Hollis, p. 105.

Another work which the Doctor patronized was the "Series of antient Windows," engraved by Francis Perry [N], from the rude ſketches of Aubrey in his MS. collections, from a tranſcript made by Mr. Ames of an abſtract of Aubrey's four volumes of Collections, taken by Mr. Hutchins for his private uſe, from the larger work in the hands of Mr. Awnſham Churchill, of Henbury.

In 1760 he printed, for private uſe, in 4to, an account of his friend Browne Willis, read at the Society of Antiquaries that year. Of this Mr. Loveday, in a letter to him, remarks, "It is really to be wiſhed that every eminent member of the Antiquarian "Society were on his deceaſe as well accounted for." This and ſome few more may ſerve in lieu of the flattering elogies drawn up for the deceaſed members of the Academy of Sciences and Belles Lettres, printed at the expence of the reſpective bodies. A thick quarto volume of Dr. Willis's letters to Dr. Ducarel is in the hands of Mr. Gough.

A queſtion being ſtarted by the hon. Daines Barrington, concerning trees indigenous to Great Britain, in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions (e)," and the cheſnut, elm, lime and ſycamore, box, abele, and yew, accounted non-indigenous; the Doctor undertook he defence of the firſt of theſe trees, and to prove it a native here; in which he was ſupported by his antiquarian friends, Thorpe [O] and Haſted, who, as Kentiſhmen, ſeem to have thought themſelves more particularly intereſted in the diſpute. His and their letters on the ſubject were printed in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions (f)"; and Mr. Barrington, in the next article, gave up the controverſy. If this defence was ſoftened in the printing below what it was in its original ſtate, we muſt extenuate the champion's ſeverity by the goodneſs of his cauſe [P]. He received great congratulations on his victory. The Doctor's account of the early cultivation of botany in England [Q], and more particularly of John Tradeſcant, a great promoter of that ſcience, and of his monument and garden at Lambeth, appeared originally in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions (g);" whence it is copied, in the "Hiſtory of Lambeth," with ſeveral improvements, communicated by the Doctor to Mr. Nichols. [M] The firſt five kings by Daſſier.] Of the ſame kind is probably that of judge Gaſcoigne mentioned by Oldys, in the Britiſh Librarian, p 267, who referred the Doctor to an impreſſion of it in a folio pedigree of the Wentworth family, in the poſſeſſion of the late Marquis of Rockingham.

The Medallic Hiſtory of England to the Revolution in plates, collected by Mr. Pinkerton, and printed for Edwards 1790, is the firſt complete ſeries. It improves on Mr. Snelling's plan, by ſupplying his deficiency, and giving a deſcription with the plates; more than one third of which now appear for the firſt time, containing ſome of the moſt rare and curious medals. "If we except the medals of the Popes, this collection may boaſt of being the firſt genuine and complete one of its kind. Notwithſtanding the eminence of France in books of ſcience muſt be acknowledged, that country has as yet only the fabulous and imaginary works of Du Bie and Typotius, and a few detached plates by Le Clerc. Germany, Spain, and the other countries of Europe have no collection of this kind, though all muſt allow that its importance to the hiſtory and arts of a country ought to render it a natioual object every where. The medallic Hiſtory of the United Provinces begins at ſo late a period, that it hardly deſerves to form an exception. The publiſhers beg leave to acknowledge, with gratitude, the liberality of that eminent medalliſt, Dr. Combe, in favour of this work. To his capital collection of prints and drawings of Engliſh medals they are entirely indebted for many of the curious articles here publiſhed; to him they alſo owe ſeveral explanations in the deſcription." Preface. Daſſier's medals, from the Conqueror to Henry VIII. incluſive, are admitted, we think, improperly, notwithſtanding the obſervation that there "are no contemporary medals of Engliſh ſovereigns till the reign of Henry VIII. Even in the Papal ſeries, the earlieſt and beſt in Europe, there are no contemporary medals till Paul II. 1464. Thoſe from Martin V. 1417, were only executed in 1655."

[N] Engraved by Francis Perry.] The Doctor was a great patron to F. Perry, whoſe abilities were not ſo highly deſerving of his patronage. He employed him on the Aquitaine coins (though, by a letter of George Vertue, 1755, that abler artiſt ſeems to have been applied to for them), encouraged him in ſome Kentiſh views, and recommended him to Dr. Burton, of York, for whom he engraved the plan of Fountaine's abbey; and another drawing was coming for him, though, ſays Dr. Burton, "his performance "was not much approved of by connoiſſeurs in this "part of the world." The windows were a poſthumous work, publiſhed by Perry's adminiſtrator, one Stevens, a hatter, at Iſlington; the ſame perhaps who is diſtinguiſhed in the will of the celebrated author of the "Night Thoughts," under the title of "my "friend Henry Stevens, a hatter, at the Temple Gate."

[O] Supported by his antiquarian friends, Thorpe and Haſted.] Of John Thorpe, Eſq. of Bexley, M. A. F S. A (who died in Auguſt 1792, whilſt this article was preparing for the preſs), and of his father Dr. Thorpe, ſome account will be given in their proper order of alphabet (1).

(1) Gent. Mag. vol. LXII. p. 769.

[P] By the goodneſs of his cauſe.] Mr. Barrington's obſervation on the regular plantation of cheſnut-trees at Newington, in Kent, was ſhewn by Mr. Thorpe, in a letter to Dr. Maty for the Royal Society, but never printed, to be a miſtake for ſome modern plantations within memory for hop-poles.

[Q] Account of the early cultivation of botany] Dr. Fothergill, in a letter to the Doctor, expreſſes his "hope that his learned friend will do that for the "lovers of plants, which they are unable to do for "themſelves—make them acquainted with the hiſtory "of their predeceſſors in this country." This has been ably done for the environs of Leiceſter by Dr. Pulteney, in the "Philoſophical Tranſactions (2);" and ſince, by the ſame gentleman, with great improvements, in Mr. Nichols's (as yet unpubliſhed) Hiſtory of that County.

cerning Corſellis, as the firſt printer in England [R], read at the Society of Antiquaries, 1760, and tranſlated into Latin by Dr. Muſgrave, with Mr. Meerman's anſwer, were publiſhed in the ſecond volume of Meerman's "Originis Typographicæ, 1765," and, with a ſecond letter from Mr. Meerman, were given to the publick by Mr. Nichols in a Supplement to his learned partner's "Two Eſſays on the Origin of Printing, 1776." Upon printing the new edition of biſhop Gibſon's "Codex," at the Clarendon preſs, 1761, the Doctor collated the MS collections of precedents annexed to it with the originals at Lambeth, and elſewhere; in return for which, at his own deſire, the delegates of the preſs preſented him with two copies of the new edition handſomely bound. From the time of Dr. Ducarel's appointment to be keeper of the library at Lambeth, his purſuits took a different turn—to the eccleſiaſtical antiquities of this kingdom, and more particularly to thoſe of the province of Canterbury, for which he was ſo well ſupplied with materials from that library. In 1761 he circulated printed propoſals for publiſhing a general repertory of the endowments of vicarages, for the ſervice both of vicars and their pariſhioners, as nothing conduces ſo much to aſcertain their mutual rights as antient original endowments. Theſe are to be found in the regiſtries of the biſhop or dean and chapter of the dioceſe, or in the chartularies and regiſter books of religious houſes. Many of the former are loſt, and the latter diſperſed into various hands. He had proceeded ſo far as to ſet down, in alphabetical order, the name and date of every endowment in the regiſters of the ſee of Canterbury; and all ſuch as he could diſcover in the public libraries, or in printed books. He therefore next ſolicited the like communications from the other dioceſans, or from poſſeſſors of antient records; and ſubjoined a ſpecimen of his method, and a liſt of the endowments already diſcovered. In this enquiry he was aſſiſted by all the regiſters, &c. at Lambeth, and in the archives of the dean and chapter of Canterbury; ſome from the regiſtry of Wells by means of biſhop Willes, from notes taken by archbiſhop Secker when biſhop of Briſtol; from the late dean Ball, Mr. Clarke the reſidentiary, and Dr. (now Sir William) Burrell, for Chicheſter. All the regiſters of Coventry and Lichfield to the time of Henry VIII. which alſo help much as to Cheſter dioceſe, were ſent to Lambeth by biſhop Cornwallis, at the deſire of archbiſhop Secker, and examined by the Doctor. The few regiſters of St. David's were brought to London by biſhop Squire, and examined by the Doctor There are no old regiſters extant of the other three Welſh dioceſes. For Ely, the principal aſſiſtance, came from Mr. Cole. Dr. Milles dean of Exeter, and biſhop Lyttelton, procured him almoſt every thing for that dioceſe. Glouceſter he had principally from Atkins and the Worceſter regiſter. For Hereford, great aſſiſtance from Mr. Clark, regiſtrar there. The regiſter-book of Remigius, which had been lent to archbiſhop Wake when biſhop of Lincoln, and by his executors ſent to Chriſt-church, Oxford, having been reſtored to biſhop Green, partly by the Doctor's means, was lent to him, with that of Hugh Wells, and they were of great ſervice to him. He had London from Newcourt, and ſome papers communicated by Dr. Burrell. Biſhop Young ſent for, and lent him, the two volumes of biſhop Tanner's Collections for the Norwich regiſtry. Oxford was furniſhed from biſhop Secker's notes left to his ſucceſſors in that ſee. He had good aſſiſtance for Roche ſter from the late archdeacon Denne, and Mr. Thorpe's Regiſtrum Roffenſe. For Saliſbury he had ſome notes from the late regiſtrar Froome. Biſhop Thomas ſent for all the old regiſters of Winche ſter to Chelſea, and lent them one by one. Mr. regiſtrar Clarke gave great aſſiſtance for Worceſter. York was collected moſtly from the MS notes of the late Dr. Burton. Carliſle from biſhop Lyttelton. Cheſter, from the Lichfield, regiſters. For Durham he had not the leaſt aſſiſtance from any perſon, except from his own accidental collections (b). It is in contemplation to print an account of all theſe ſeveral regiſters, in a volume of his Epiſtolary Correſpondence with ſome of the firſt characters in literature, which is purpoſed to be accompanied with ſeveral valuable antiquarian tracts collected by Dr. Ducarel (i). [R] As the firſt printer in England.] 'I have very 'lately conſidered this affair about early printing. 'There is not the leaſt hint of it in Bourgchier's re'giſters. It is a piece of roguery in Atkins to ſay ſo. 'His book was printed in 1664; and all the regiſter'books of the ſee of Canterbury, and other books 'and MSS. in the Lambeth library, were removed 'from thence, and carried to Cambridge, ſoon after 'archbiſhop Laud's death, and were not brought 'back to Lambeth-houſe till after the Revolution.'

Dr. Ducarel, MS.

Mr. Wiſe was of a contrary opinion. In his letters to the Doctor, Jan. 22, and March 5, 1757, he ſays, 'I am convinced, almoſt to demonſtration, that the 'ſtory is true, only I want a copy of the regiſter. 'Whether it is to be found in the regiſter, or elſe'where, I know not; but I have good grounds to 'think that Atkins told truth. I am confident that 'ſuch a thing was once in being.'

'The arguments on both ſides may be ſeen in "Two 'Eſſays on the Origin of Printing, with the Appendix 'and Supplement, by Bowyer and Nichols, 1774," '8vo. Mr. Bowyer, whoſe learning and particular 'knowledge in his profeſſion ſeem to qualify him for 'being at leaſt as good a judge of this diſpute as any 'man that ever lived, was of opinion that the Oxford 'preſs was prior to Caxton, and thought that thoſe who 'have called Mr. Caxton the firſt printer in England 'meant that he was the firſt who practiſed the art 'with fuſile types, and conſequently brought it to 'perfection, which is not inconſiſtent with Corſellis 'having printed earlier at Oxford with ſeparate types 'cut in wood, which was the only method he had 'learnt at Haerlem.' Herbert's Ames, p. 1391.

originally circulated, with a ſpecimen annexed, in a ſingle ſheet, 4to, dated Dec. 3, 1761, was prefixed (with a new date, Dec. 23, 1762) to "A Repertory of the "Endowments of Vicarages in the Dioceſe of Canterbury, 1763," 4to, printed for the benefit of the charity-ſchool at Canterbury; of which Mr. Gough has the Doctor's copy, with conſiderable additions in MS. by him, which were all incorporated into a ſecond edition [S] in 8vo, 1782; to which were added, Endowments of Vicarages in the dioceſe of Rocheſter. In a letter to the Rev. Mr. Cole, of Milton, 1757 (k), he ſays, "I hope, "within this year, to have about twelve dioceſes ready for the preſs;" and in another, to the Rev. Dr. Cox Macro, 1763, he tells him he had eleven other dioceſes then ready. In 1768 he appears to have entertained thoughts of going to preſs with theſe collections. He had a copy of the "Notitia Parochialis," formerly belonging to the Earl of Oxford [T], which he bought at T. Oſborne's, and preſented to Lambeth library; a particular and very intereſting account of the value of a great number of ſmall livings and others in England, moſtly ſigned by the Rectors and Vicars 1705; as an anſwer to ſome printed queries tacked by order of Mr. Harley, afterwards Lord Treaſurer Oxford, at the bottom of a brief ſent that year for the repairs of the Church of All Saints in Oxford; ſix oblong volumes, and a ſeventh volume of index to the reſt. They contain a collection of private papers, and can only be conſidered as deſigned for uſeful and certain information (and not as legal evidence) of the ſtate of ſmall pariſhes at that time, and many of them ſigned by the then incumbents. He drew up, 1763, an account of the MSS. in the Norfolk library belonging to the Royal Society, amounting to 563, including 45 then firſt catalogued. On this occaſion he was of a committee with Lord Charles Gavendiſh and the late Dr. Birch. In the ſame year he was appointed by the Lords Commiſſioners of the Treaſury, at the head of whom Mr. Grenville then was [U], in conjunction with Sir Joſeph Ayloffe, Bart. and Mr. Aſtle, to digeſt and methodize the records of the State Paper Office at Whitehall; and afterwards thoſe in the Augmentation-office [W]. A calendar of the records of the latter, in two volumes, folio, was purchaſed at his ſale by Mr. Cook, for the Bodleian library. In 1766, he communicated to the Society of Antiquaries a paper on Bezants; which Biſhop Lyttelton, in a letter to him, ſtyled "curious and elaborate." He was one of the committee for extracting papers from the minutes of the Society for preſs, 1762 [X].

The ſhare he took in the Rowleian diſcovery and controverſy, 1771 and 1772, may be ſeen in the Gentleman's Magazine, Vol. LVI. pp. 361, 362. 461—464. 544—547. 580. 859; where are printed, his correſpondence with Mr. Chapman, Rector of Weſton near Bath, Biſhop Percy, Mr. Barrett, the Hiſtorian of Briſtol, whoſe credulity and ſimplicity in theſe matters was notorious, and Mr. Whitaker. The Doctor entertained great doubts on the originality of the Poems, &c. aſcribed to Rowley. In 1776 was printed, for private uſe, "A Liſt of various Editions of the Bible and "parts thereof, in Engliſh, from the year 1526 to 1776," in a ſingle ſheet, 8vo; and an improved edition, 1778, at the expence of Archbiſhop Cornwallis. This little tract owed its riſe to a liſt of Engliſh Bibles copied from one compiled by Mr. Ames, from 1526 to 1757, preſented by Dr. Gifford to the Lambeth library. It was completed by Dr. Ducarel from his own obſervations, and the later diſcoveries of his learned friends, Dr. Percy Biſhop of Dromore, and Mr. Tutet. Mr. Nichols alſo, and Mr. Herbert, editor of the new edition of Ames's "Typographical Antiquities," contributed not a few articles from their own collections. The account of Dr. Stukeley and his writings prefixed to the ſecond volume of his Itinerary publiſhed 1776, was drawn up by Dr. Ducarel, who alſo prepared an epitaph for him, which will be given in the future publication above mentioned.

The Doctor gave a MS abſtract of the large hiſtory of the Benedictine Abbey of Bec in Normandy, drawn up by Dom John Bourget, monk of that houſe, and F.A.S. of London, to Mr. Nichols, who printed it in 1779, 8vo, with an Appendix of original deeds [Y]; and who likewiſe printed, in the ſame year, in two volumes, 8vo. "Some

'From the Abbey of Bec, 20 Auguſt, 1764.

'SIR,

'The greateſt glory of a nation is certainly that of 'producing men of ſuch generous principles as to 'ſacrifice their labours to the cultivation of the 'ſciences and arts. The Engliſh nation, Sir, ſurpaſſes 'all others in this particular; and we may aſſert, 'with great truth, that it is, like Rome and Athens, 'as celebrated for its learning as it is for its power and 'riches. Who can juſtly number the great geniuſes 'who excite the attention of aſtoniſhed Europe by the 'luſtre of their merit and the ſolidity of their eruditi'on; by their penetration into the moſt abſtruſe 'ſecrets of nature; and by their wonderful art of diſ'covering and tranſmitting to future ages the ſuperb 'monuments of venerable antiquity?

'This, Sir, is the teſtimony which all Europe 'renders to your nation; and the unanimity of voices 'on this particular was the ſubject of my moſt ſerious 'reflection when a happy occaſion procured me the 'honour of your brother's acquaintance. To ſee him 'a ſecond time after having ſeen him once, was the 'firſt ſentiment which immediately ſtruck me, and 'which ſince has continually increaſed; and I will 'take the liberty to aſſure you, that this ſentiment 'muſt equally ſtrike all who are ſenſible of true 'merit. Be not then ſurpriſed, Sir, that I exerted 'my utmoſt application to cultivate with advantage a 'friendſhip with a man of ſo much merit, and to 'avail myſelf of the ſhort time he ſtayed in this city.

'In the courſe of his learned converſations, I diſ'covered, with ſecret ſatisfaction, that the great re'putation your nation enjoys in the republic of letters 'increaſes in proportion as we approach it, and can 'judge from its true originals. And ſuch was my 'prepoſſeſſion in this reſpect, that, abſent from him, I 'hardly knew mankind, and I reckoned every moment 'loſt. Undoubtedly, Sir, the correſpondence of 'taſte and humour, and our congenial way of thinking 'and judging of many things, did not a little con'tribute to eſtabliſh that harmony of ſentiment which 'united us ſo ſtrictly together; but his perſonal merit, 'the amiableneſs of his character, and the excellent 'qualities of his mind and heart, were the ſtrongeſt 'inducements with me to gain his friendſhip. I 'delighted to hear him ſpeak of the laws, the man'ners, and the cuſtoms, of the different nations where 'he had travelled; his remarks on the characters 'which diſtinguiſh them from their neighbours; 'more eſpecially of the ſciences which they cultivate; 'of their foundations; and of their antient and 'ſuperb monuments.

'He dwelt longer on thoſe of Great-Britain, as 'the kingdom which exhibits the greateſt number of 'objects intereſting to a lover of letters and of noble 'antiquity. He enumerated thoſe magnificent monu'ments and foundations which immortalize a nation, 'as univerſities, academies, ſocieties, &c. He did 'not forget the Society of Antiquaries of London; 'and it was on this occaſion I learnt, Sir, that it has 'the happineſs to eſteem you as one of its moſt 'valuable members; that you are intimately verſed 'in the ſtudy of antiquities, and that your reſearches 'have more particularly for their object all that the 'province of Normandy can furniſh on that point 'worthy the attention of the learned, and deſerving to 'be tranſmitted to poſterity.

'He impoſed on me the taſk of giving him a ſhort 'account of all I could diſcover curious or remarkable 'in the Abbey of Bec; no doubt, Sir, with a view 'to ſecond the happy diſpoſition you poſſeſs to en'rich the republic of letters with your learned and 'uſeful reſearches. I yielded to his requeſt with 'great pleaſure, as it enabled me to ſatisfy my deſire 'to oblige him or his friends, and to apply myſelf to 'a ſtudy for which I have for a long time had a 'ſtrong inclination.

'I ſhould long ſince have purſued this ſtudy, if the 'ſuperior generals of the order of St. Benedict, of 'which I am a member, had not taken from me my 'liberty, by giving me different offices, both ſpiritual 'and temporal, which they obliged me to hold.

'I was firſt appointed prior to the Abbey of St. 'Martin de Seez, and continued ſix years in that 'office; from thence tranſlated to the Abbey of St. 'Stephen at Caen, founded by Duke William, where, 'as ſub-prior, I managed the temporalities during 'the two firſt years, and the ſpiritualities the third 'year. The three years ended, I reſigned, according 'to cuſtom, the place to another, to paſs in order to 'the Royal Abbey of Bec, where I now actually reſide.'

Dr. Ducarel enables us to take up this worthy Benedictine's hiſtory a little earlier. He was born at the village of Beaumais near Falaiſe, in the dioceſe of Seez, in 1724; and educated at the grammar-ſchool at Caen, whence he was removed to that univerſity, 'and purſued his ſtudies with great diligence and ſucceſs till 1745, when he became Benedictine monk of the Abbey of St. Martin de Seez, then en regle, that is, under the direction of a conventual Abbot (3). We proceed with the letter.

(3) Memoirs prefixed to the "Hiſtory of the Abbey of Bec."

'This Abbey, ſituated in Tournois, in the dioceſe 'of Roan, and nine leagues from that city, was 'founded by Helloüin, ſon of Anſgot, a Dane. It 'may be conſidered as one of the moſt celebrated of 'the kingdom, as much for its ſpiritual as temporal 'privileges, immunities, &c. and which it obtained, 'ſoon after its foundation, from the Kings of France 'and England, from Princes, Dukes, Earls, Biſhops, 'Chapters, particular Barons, &c. as by the famous 'ſchool, which Lanfranc, afterwards Archbiſhop of 'Canterbury, eſtabliſhed there, which produced men, 'ſome of whom ſerved the Church, and others the 'ſtate, with honour and diſtinction.

'It is no leſs remarkable for its fortifications than 'for the ſieges it ſuſtained againſt the forces of the 'Kings of England.

'A little before the death of its founder, the num'ber of monks who had ſubmitted to its juriſdiction 'was already ſo great, that ſome modern writers have 'not heſitated to apply to this devout perſon this 'paſſage of the royal prophet, 'Ab ubertate domûs 'tuæ inebriâſti faciem terræ, et a torrente ſapientiæ 'eorum replêſti orbem terrarum.' All theſe recluſes 'were employed either in the ſtudy of the Sacred 'Writings, the ſinging of Pſalms, or in manual exer'ciſes. To them, but more eſpecially to the Monks 'of the Abbey of Jumieges, is owing the draining 'of the fens of Upper Normandy, and the cultivation 'of the lands, till then neglected. But ſuch is the 'nature of all human eſtabliſhments, that thoſe, which 'appear the moſt ſolid and the moſt reſpectable to 'the eyes of mankind, are liable to the injuries of 'time: if unexpected revolutions do not totally over'turn them, at leaſt they ſhake their very foundations, 'and occaſion them to undergo ſuch conſiderable 'changes, that they are hardly to be known again. 'The Abbey of Bec experienced this in a remarkable 'manner.

'Some few centuries were ſcarcely elapſed, before 'the monks, countenanced by the evil examples of 'the idleneſs, luxury, and licentiouſneſs, of their 'Abbots, loſt ſight of all the ſanctity of their ſtation, 'degenerated from the virtues of their predeceſſors, 'and inſenſibly fell into a total oblivion of their 'obligation. Without doubt it was to ſtop the pro'greſs of theſe enormities, and to hinder the bad 'uſes which perhaps the Abbots made of their great 'revenues, that the King took away two-thirds,

'which

The very uſeful and excellent Collection of Royal and Noble Wills, from the Conqueror to Henry VII. printed by Mr. Nichols in 1780, was given to the world in conſequence of the ſuggeſtions of Dr. Ducarel; from whoſe ſtores the far greater part of the materials was purchaſed by the printer at a very conſiderable price.

Of

'which he diſpoſed of in favour of ſome ſecular 'eccleſiaſtics of high birth and ſmall fortune.

'Nevertheleſs, as the relaxation of monaſtic diſ-'cipline increaſed, it became neceſſary to put a ſtop 'to the torrent of licentiouſneſs. To this effect, 'they ſubſtituted monks of the ſame order reformed, 'known by the name of Benedictines of the congre-'gation of St. Maur. This congregation, compoſed 'of near two hundred Abbeys or different revenues, 'is governed by a general ſuperior, aſſiſted by two 'aſſiſtant ſuperiors, all appointed by a general chap-'ter, which prolongs or diſmiſſes them every three 'years. They reckon in the ſingle province of Nor-'mandy thirty-two of theſe Abbeys richly endowed. 'The income of this of Bec, one of the richeſt of 'the order, is about two hundred thouſand livres, 'two thirds whereof belong to the Abbots, and the 'remaining part maintains between forty and fifty 'Monks, which is our number at preſent.

'I am actually at work on the Hiſtory of this 'Abbey. There is not, Sir, any manuſcript, titles, 'charters, &c. which have not paſſed under my hands, 'that I may not advance any fact which I cannot 'prove. I expect this work will be badly received 'by the falſe devotees and the ignorant ſuperſtitious, 'who will not find therein one word mentioned of 'the pious extravagances of certain melancholy brains, 'who preached to the people the fruit of a diſtempered 'imagination, and made them go down by favour of 'the barbarity of the times and of ſuperſtition, which 'it was their intereſt to ſupport as men inſpired and 'gifted with ſupernatural powers; but I declare it is 'not for ſuch I write. You will receive by the next 'opportunity a ſhort abridgement of it, my time not 'having permitted me to prove numbers of facts that 'I intended to add. I ſhall likewiſe ſend you the 'plan of the antient building of this monaſtery, and 'of that of Jumieges: the firſt was entirely rebuilt 'within theſe twenty years, and is eſteemed one of 'the fineſt monaſteries in France.

'I ſhall, in the courſe of my work, mention the 'antiquities of other moſt remarkable Abbeys in 'Normandy, as that of St. Peter of Jumieges, 'founded in the year 655; St. Stephen and Trinity 'of Caen, both founded about the middle of the 'eleventh century; the firſt by Duke William the 'Conqueror, the latter by Queen Mathilda his wife. 'But I ſhould exceed the bounds of a letter; perhaps 'I have already too much intruded on your patience: 'I beg the favour however to be ſtill heard in the 'following article; it intereſts me greatly.

'The high character your Society of Antiquaries 'of London bears in the learned world flattered me, 'Sir, with an earneſt deſire to participate with ſuch 'reſpectable members the glory they have already 'gained, and ſtill daily acquire. But, for that, it 'was neceſſary to have a known perſonal merit, of 'which I can preſume but to a ſmall ſhare; Patrons 'of dignity, and I know not any one in England 'capable of protecting me. Theſe difficulties have, 'as it were, ſtifled my deſire, and even prevented my 'mentioning it to you. There certainly is no obſtacle 'too great, nor, which is more, unſurmountable by 'any one who aſpires to the glorious title of Fellow 'of ſo illuſtrious a Society as yours is. As for my 'rank, my monaſtic vow, and the different manner of 'our honouring the Deity, and rendering him our 'due worſhip; I do not imagine, Sir, they could be 'any hindrance to my reception, if I had the happi-'neſs to poſſeſs the neceſſary talents required to fill 'my place with ſome degree of honour and dignity. 'It only belongs to the ignorant vulgar, and to the 'ſuperſtitious fanatick, to live and die under the yoke 'of opinion and prejudice. The country of men of 'letters knows no other bounds than the limits of the 'literary and enlightened world. Wherever they 'meet, they are countrymen, becauſe they every 'where concur in common to the diſcovery of truth. 'My uneaſineſs therefore, on this head, perhaps, has 'as little foundation as it is injurious to men who are 'the living ornaments of their age, and who will be 'the admiration of future ages. A little genius, few 'talents, and a narrow capacity, are the true motives 'of my fears; and they are, Sir, but too juſtly 'founded, unleſs your learned and reſpectable Society 'judges of me with great indulgence. Your brother 'encourages my hope, by promiſing to honour me 'with his recommendation to you, and to his other 'friends; without which I never ſhould have pre-'ſumed to offer myſelf as Fellow of the Royal Society 'of Antiquaries of London, and yet leſs to trouble 'you on that ſubject. But, whether the Society judges 'me worthy of ſo diſtinguiſhed an honour, or whe-'ther they ſhall think fit to refuſe my application 'and moſt reſpectful deſire, you ſhall not find me leſs 'ready to uſe my utmoſt endeavours to ſerve you; 'having not any thing more deſirable at heart than 'to demonſtrate to you, by my actions, my perfect 'attachment, and the great reſpect with which I 'have the honour to be, Sir, your very humble and 'very obedient ſervant,

'Dom JOHN BOURGET.

'P. S. I will ſend to your brother, ſome time next 'week, the Abridgement above mentioned; and will 'add to it the Proſpectus of the Hiſtory of Normandy, 'on which we are now at work, that he may ſend 'them to you by a leſs expenſive way than that of 'the poſt.'

To this letter the Doctor returned an anſwer in French, of which the following is a tranſlation:

'SIR, Doctors Commons, Nov. 30, 1764.

'I duly received the honour of your obliging letter 'of Auguſt 20, which gave me great pleaſure. I 'thought it neceſſary to execute the commiſſion con-'tained in it before I anſwered it. As ſoon, there-'fore, as I had got it tranſlated into Engliſh, I com-'municated it to the members of the Society of An-'tiquaries (who are not maſters of the French lan-'guage) previous to the meeting of the Society, 'November 7. Buſineſs of conſequence having pre-'vented me from attending on the Society before the '22d inſtant, I on that day read publicly the tranſ-'lation of your letter, which was unanimouſly ap-'proved by a very numerous meeting: after a ſhort 'introductory ſpeech by myſelf, I propoſed you as a 'member. Having preſented a recommendation in 'your favour, it was immediately read, and ſigned 'by the Preſident, Lord Willoughby of Parham, and 'the oldeſt and moſt reſpectable members, till the 'paper was quite filled with names. Thus, Sir, in 'five or ſix weeks I hope to congratulate you on your 'being choſen an honorary member of this learned 'body.

'I am deſired, Sir, to inform you, that the labour 'which you have undertaken of the Hiſtory of the 'Abbies of Normandy is a work of the greateſt con-'ſequence, as it will tell us a thouſand particulars 'equally intereſting to the Hiſtory of England and 'France, which could be only known by your 'means; and that you, Sir, are conſidered as a real 'acquiſition to our Society, of whom there are very 'few French members, and not one Norman.

'The compliments you are pleaſed to pay to my 'brother and myſelf are too great; and you have 'carried too far your panegyric on the Engliſh nation. 'There are learned men in all parts of the world. 'Normandy has furniſhed a prodigious number. If 'ſo many continually iſſue from the two univerſities 'of this kingdom, it muſt be owned it ariſes from 'the different plans of education adopted in them 'from that in the other univerſities of Europe. I may 'add, that here men dare to think; and to think 'without conſtraint is one of the greateſt bleſſings of 'this happy kingdom. The Engliſh have naturally 'a high eſteem for the Normans; and, if we examine

Of all the honours Dr. Ducarel enjoyed, none gave him greater ſatisfaction than the Commiſſariate of St. Katharine's [Z], a place to which he has done due honour in "The Hiſtory of the Royal Hoſpital and Collegiate Church of St. Katharine, near the "Tower of London, from its Foundation, in the year 1273, to the Preſent Time, 1782," 4to, adorned with ſeventeen plates. "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, No. V." This hiſtory was originally compiled by the Doctor for the uſe of our preſent very amiable Queen, to whom a copy of it was preſented in MS. a ſhort time after her acceſſion to the patronage of this Collegiate Church, the only Eccleſiaſtical preferment in the gift of the Queen Conſort of England. On a thorough repair of this curious old church in 1778, an empty vault was diſcovered in the chancel, of a ſize that would hold two coffins, and no more. This ſpot the Doctor claimed in virtue of his office; and has often pointed out to the writer of this article, and to many others of his friends, as a reſting-place for his aſhes and thoſe of his lady; and the remains of both have been actually there depoſited. Two additional plates to the Hiſtory of St. Katharine's, repreſenting the curious groteſque carvings under the old ſtalls there, were engraved a little before his death, at his particular requeſt, and were given to the publick in 1790, with a ſhort Appendix to that Hiſtory in the "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, No. LII."

"Some Account of the Town, Church, and Archiepiſcopal Palace of Croydon, in "the County of Surrey, from its foundation to the Year 1783," 4to, originally drawn up by him in 1754, at the requeſt of Archbiſhop Herring, was publiſhed in 1783, 4to.

'the character of the two people cloſely; we may ſay, 'without breach of truth, that the Engliſh are half 'Normans, and the Normans half Engliſh. From 'this time, Sir, I ſhall conſider a literary correſpon-'dence as eſtabliſhed between us, if you think proper; 'and if, in the continuance of your work, I can ſend 'you any aſſiſtance, I ſhall do it with pleaſure. 'M. de Brequigny (4) has been here five or ſix 'months, ſent by the Court of France, to diſcover, 'in the Exchequer at Weſtminſter, all the antient 'deeds and charters relating to Normandy, to com-'pile a hiſtory of that province. He has obtained 'admittance, and made his ſearch, but hitherto with-'out finding any thing of great conſequence. He 'ſtill continues his ſearches. I have ſeen him once. 'He tells me, that a Benedictine monk, named Dom 'le Noire, is now writing the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory 'of Normandy (5). If you are acquainted with this 'work, let me know his plan, and if his deſign be 'different from yours. Favour me with an anſwer 'as ſoon as you can after the receipt of this. I have 'the honour to be with perfect eſteem," &c.

(5) It was a General Hiſtory of Normandy.

To this Dom Bourget returned an anſwer of thanks, Dec. 17, 1764.

In a ſecond letter, dated Jan. 25, 1765, the Doctor announced to his friend his election as an honorary member of the Society unanimouſly, at a very numerous meeting the 10th inſtant, and deſiring him to acknowledge it in a letter of civility, which the good father did in an anſwer, dated March 8, 1765, containing remarks on Rouſſeau's Emile, and Voltaire on Toleration, and withal expreſſing his ſurprize at not receiving an official letter (lettres d'Aggregation); as, if it was neceſſary to pay any money for theſe kind of diſpatches, he was ready to make the purchaſe: but his friend aſſured him neither the forms were cuſtomary, nor any money expected; but, if he required a certificate of his election, he ſhould have it.

This letter, and another of May 15, the ſame year, deſcribing his promotion to the Abbey of Evreux, never came to the Doctor's hand, but were ſuſpected of being intercepted; as appears by the laſt letter from Dom Bourget, June, 1765: the Doctor's anſwer to which, July 5, 1765, was incloſed under cover to his brother Monſieur Bourget, merchant, at Rouen: and here, as far as we have learnt, ended the correſpondence. In 1765, he returned to the Abbey of St. Stephen and Caen, where he continued to the time of his death. The honourable offices to which he was promoted, on account of his great abilities, enabled him not only to purſue his favourite ſtudy of the Hiſtory and Antiquities of ſome of the principal Benedictine Abbeys in Normandy, but likewiſe gave him acceſs to all their charters, deeds, regiſter-books, &c. &c. Theſe he examined with great care, and left behind him in MS. large and accurate accounts of the Abbeys of St. Peter de Jumieges, St. Stephen, and the Holy Trinity at Caen (founded by William the Conqueror and his Queen Matilda), and a very particular Hiſtory of the Abbey of Bec. Dom Bourget's death, which happened on New Year's day, 1764, at the age of 5., was occaſioned by his unfortunate neglect of a hurt he got in his leg by falling down two or three ſteps in going from the hall to the cloiſter of the Abbey of St. Stephen at Caen, being deceived by the ambiguous feeble light of a glimmering and dying lamp that was placed in that paſſage. He was buried, in the church of the ſaid Abbey, Jan. 3, 1776.

'This is about as good an imitation of the ſtyle of 'Elizabeth's time, as Chatterton's Rowley's of that 'of Edward IV.'

He alſo drew up in the "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica, No. XXVII." "The "Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Archiepiſcopal Palace of Lambeth [AA], from its "foundation to the preſent time, 1785, 4to," which was dedicated, by permiſſion, to Archbiſhop Moore; and, in 1786, he contributed largely to "The Hiſtory and An- "tiquities of the Pariſh of Lambeth, in the County of Surrey; including Biographical "Anecdotes of ſeveral eminent perſons; compiled from original Records, and other au- "thentic ſources of information [BB]." Some Additions to this Hiſtory were alſo, in 1790, printed in the ſame collection.

His memoirs of Archbiſhop Hutton and his family, fairly written, were purchaſed at his ſale, by the Rev. Dr. Lort, for the Hutton family. His appointment to the place of Librarian at Lambeth (to which a ſalary of £30. per annum is annexed) took place under Archbiſhop Hutton, May 3, 1757 [CC]; and the catalogues of that valuable collection (m) are not a little benefited by his diligence and abilities. The catalogue begun by Biſhop Gibſon, while librarian [DD] here, and continued by Dr. Wilkins with the greateſt minuteneſs, has been by him perfected to the preſent time; a diſtinct catalogue made of the books of Archbiſhop Secker, who expended above 300l. in arranging and improving the MS. library and printed books here; and another, in three volumes folio, of the pamphlets and tracts bound up by the direction of Archbiſhop Cornwallis [EE]. And in the library of MSS. the catalogue begun by Dr. Wilkins, 720, and continued by ſucceeding librarians to No. 888, he extended to No. 1147, in two volumes [FF]. Dr. Birch, who was an excellent judge of ſuch merit, expreſſes his obligations to 'the learned librarian, A. C. Ducarel; to whoſe knowledge, induſtry, 'and love of hiſtory and antiquity, the valuable library of MSS. of the Archiepiſcopal 'ſee of Canterbury is highly indebted for the order in which it is now arranged, and by 'whoſe obliging and communicating temper it is rendered generally uſeful (n).' In this library are 13 large volumes of 1506 Antient Charters, all originals, with many fine ſeals. In 1757, he addreſſed to Archbiſhop Secker a letter concerning the firſt edition of Archbiſhop Parker's valuable book, "De Antiquitate Britannicæ Eccleſiæ," now in the MS. library at Lambeth, N°. 959, giving an account of a great many antient deeds, MS. notes, &c. &c. contained therein. This letter is printed at large in the Appendix to his "Hiſtory of Lambeth Palace."

He was engaged alſo in arranging and indexing above 30 folio volumes of leaſes, papers, &c. and he could have greatly eaſed the Archbiſhop in diſpatching and anſwering an infinite number of letters, and have been truly uſeful. Such was the Doctor's aſſiduity in whatever he undertook, that, beſides the fair copy of the index by him taken of all the Lambeth regiſters, and the general index which he made to them, he

[AA] The Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Archiepiſcopal Palace of Lambeth.] To this hiſtory is prefixed the head of the Doctor, with the addition of the painter's name; and the legend altered to "ANDREW COLTEE DUCAREL, LL. D. COMMISSARY OF ST. KATHARINE'S, and of the DIOCESE OF CANTERBURY, &c. &c. F.R. and A.SS. 1784."

[BB] Sources of information.] In the Preface to this volume, Mr. Nichols ſays, 'It was begun, and 'a conſiderable portion of it printed, under the im- 'mediate inſpection of Dr. Ducarel, who earneſtly 'wiſhed that the preſent publication ſhould be the 'companion of his "Hiſtory of Lambeth Palace." 'From the Doctor's ſituation as Librarian to five 'ſucceſſive Archbiſhops, he had every opportunity 'of conſulting ſuch records and early tranſactions as 'related to this pariſh; and his ample ſources of 'intelligence were at all times readily opened to the 'compiler of this work, of which the original ſug- 'geſtion was entirely owing to his ardent zeal for the 'ſtudy of local antiquities.'

[CC] Took place under Archbiſhop Hutton, May, 3, 1757.] Previous to this, he ſeems to have been recommended by Dr. Topham, of York, to Archbiſhop Herring, from whom we find the following letter to Dr. Topham: 'I can have no objection to any favour- 'able countenance you think fit to ſhew to Dr. Du- 'carel; I have the higheſt opinion of his integrity 'and uſefulneſs. I will moſt undoubtedly pay atten- 'tion to him in the capacity you mention him to me 'at his own deſire. You knew my reaſons for keep- 'ing myſelf in very general expreſſions on that head. 'I approve of his deſign moſt extremely of regulating 'and making an index to the papers and regiſters at 'Lambeth. They are now a treaſure; a good index 'will convert them into ready caſh. I will take care 'the Doctor and his friend Mr. Rowe Mores ſhall be 'accommodated at Lambeth when they ſet about the 'work. Tho. Cant. Croydon-houſe, Dec. 23, 1754.'

[DD] The catalogue begun by Biſhop Gibſon, while librarian.] In which place he was ſucceeded by 'Dr. Benjamin Ibbot, who died 1725. The regular 'ſucceſſion, with memoirs of the librarians, is given 'in the Hiſtory of Lambeth Palace, p. 63—76.

[EE] Bound up by the direction of Archbiſhop Cornwallis.] Biſhop Gibſon's papers were ſorted and bound up in 14 volumes. Many of them belonged to Archbiſhop Teniſon, who gave them to Dr. Gibſon, while his Chaplain; who, in his life time, directed his executors, the late Dr. Betteſworth, and his ſon, George Gibſon, Eſq; to depoſit them in the MS. library at Lambeth, with many more of his own collecting. They were actually delivered by the executors to Archbiſhop Herring, Oct. 21, 1748; and depoſited in this library the 23d of February following, where they lay undigeſted till June 1758; when Archbiſhop Secker ordered them to be methodized and bound up as they now appear. Upon peruſal of the firſt volume, the Archbiſhop recommended to his librarian to put as many as could be into chronological order, or a proper aſſortment, with an account of their ſubjects, with leiſure and more aſſiſtance. 'And thus,' ſays his Grace, 'by means 'of a little delay, the collection will do more honour 'to the giver and the compiler.' But the hint came too late; the whole collection was bound; and the only amends the librarian could make, was by adding an alphabetical index to every volume; and a complete alphabetical repertory, in chronological order, of every paper and inſtrument in the whole ſet.

[FF] He extended to N°. 1147, in 2 vols.] The original catalogue of MSS. of Henry Warton in Lambeth library, in his own hand-writing, is now in the poſſeſſion of Dr. Loveday, ſon of the late John Loveday, Eſq. of Caverſham, Berks.

reſerved for himſelf another, which at his ſale became the property of Mr. Gough. It contains, in 47 volumes, folio, neatly bound, an account of every inſtrument relative to the ſee, province, and dioceſe of Canterbury, from Pecham to Herring; and, together with a great variety of other materials amaſſed by the Doctor, may be juſtly ſtyled, a fund of eccleſiaſtical antiquities for that province in particular, and for the kingdom at large. In this laborious undertaking he was materially aſſiſted by the induſtry of his friend Mr. Rowe-Mores [GG]; by Mr. Hall [HH], his predeceſſor in the office of Librarian; and by Mr. Pouncey, who for many years was his aſſiſtant as clerk and deputy-librarian, the latter of which poſts he held alſo under Dr. Ducarel's ſucceſſor, Dr. Lort.

On the death of Archbiſhop Secker, the Doctor would gladly have held the office of Secretary to his ſucceſſor, "the income of which, after paying one-third to a deputy, would have made him ample amends for all the pains, trouble, and expence, he had been at many years in digeſting the regiſters, in 68 volumes, folio [II]." To Mr. Hall he was indebted for much aſſiſtance from the archives and records of the church at Canterbury, as well as in the regiſters at Lambeth. A quarto volume of Mr. Hall's letters, whence ſome extracts have been given in the above mentioned Hiſtory of the Hoſpitals, p. 188, 189, was lent by the Doctor for that purpoſe to the writer of this article and was ſince purchaſed at his ſale by Dr. Lort.

[II] 'The regiſter-books of the archbiſhops of 'Canterbury were antiently kept near their palace in 'the priory of St. Gregory at Canterbury; but having for many years been removed from thence to 'Lambeth, they are now commonly called the Lambeth regiſters. The oldeſt of theſe is the regiſter of 'archbiſhop Peckham; and thoſe of all his ſucceſſors 'to the preſent time are in being, except thoſe of 'the archbiſhops Mepeham and Stratford (of which 'ſome few tranſcripts only are preſerved at Lambeth, 'in a book called Album Regiſtrum, taken, I believe, 'about the time of King Henry VI.) and thoſe of the 'archbiſhops Ufford, and Bradwardin, which, by 'ſome unknown accident, have been unfortunately 'loſt. Ufford was archbiſhop for ſo ſhort a time, only 'ſix months, that nothing can be expected: nay, by 'ſome he is omitted; for he never received either pall 'or conſecration. Archbiſhop Bradwardyn was never 'inthronized (7).

'The regiſters of the ſee of Canterbury do not reach 'ſo high as thoſe of ſome other Sees.

'Archbiſhop Pecham's regiſter begins on the 4th of 'the ides of June, in the year 1279, and ends on the '15th of the kalends of September, 1292.

'Thoſe of Lincoln begin in the year 1218

'And this ſeems to be occaſioned by Archbiſhop 'Kilwardby, who was the immediate predeceſſor of 'Archbiſhop Pecham; and upon his reſignation of 'the ſee of Canterbury (when he became a Cardinal 'and Biſhop of Portua) carrying the regiſters of his 'ſee to Rome 1278.

'Pecham, in the fourth year of his conſecration, 'endeavoured, but without ſucceſs, to recover them; 'and it is not improbable that they are ſtill in being in 'the Datary at Rome, where, to this day, every thing 'that relates to the affairs of this kingdom are, as 'I am informed, preſerved with great care.' [The Doctor wrote to Abbè Barthelemy, keeper of the King of France's medals, Feb. 12, 1756, to aſk, whether theſe regiſters were at Rome? how many there were of them? and in what place depoſited? whether it were poſſible, by the indexes at the end of each, to diſcover any letters or directions from theſe Archbiſhops to their mint-maſters at Canterbury, whoſe names are always put at the beginning of theſe letters.]

'The Pecham regiſter contains 249 leaves, making '498 ſides; the beginning is divided into 11 quaterni; but that method is not continued through-'out. A quaternus, properly ſpeaking, is a ſkin of 'parchment, divided into 8 leaves, making 16 ſides; 'but ſome of theſe are longer than others.

'And

The Doctor had an intention of publiſhing his Abſtract of archbiſhop Peckham's regiſter; and the rough draught of a Latin Title, with a Preface or Dedication to archbiſhop Herring [KK], together with a copy of the Abſtract, and various notes by Mr. Mores, is now in Mr. Gough's hands by purchaſe at Mr. Mores's ſale. Extracts from Pechams's regiſter by Dr. Ducarel were bought at the ſale by Dr. Lort.

The Doctor's great reſearches into antiquities occaſioned his aſſiſtance to be courted on many publications, particularly that of Dr. Burton's "Monaſticon Eboracenſe," which one cannot help regretting ſhould be left incomplete, after the unwearied pains and application beſtowed on it, ſo that he has been juſtly ſtyled "one of our firſt men in "monaſtic antiquities, and his firſt volume infinitely ſurpaſſing Sir William Dug-"dale's (o)." He alſo entered the liſts for arranging Mr. Bridges's Northamptonſhire papers with the late Rev. Peter Whalley [LL], of Courten-hall, an excellent ſcholar, of St. John's college, Oxford, who was deſired to produce ſome ſpecimen of his talents in the way of Antiquity, at the county-meeting, 1755; and with the late Rev. Mr. Buckler (p), of All Souls college, a gentleman of abilities, and general erudition. A catalogue of the MSS. was ſent him; but the general ſenſe of the committee was in favour of Mr. Buckler: but at the meeting, on the ballot, Mr. Whalley had five votes, Mr. Buckler four, and Dr. Ducarel three, out of the thirteen who attended. He had drawn up alſo an account of Doctors Commons, and, as an Appendix to it, complete liſts of the different Chancellors of the ſeveral dioceſes of this kingdom, as high as the regiſters go, in folio, which were ſo nearly ready for publication, that he repeatedly promiſed them with that expreſs intention to Mr. Nichols, who, at the Doctor's requeſt, cauſed complete indexes to be made to both [MM]; and it is to be hoped ſome

'And here it may not be improper to obſerve, that 'the books where wills are regiſtered in the Prerogative Office at Doctors Commons are to this day 'divided into quaterni.

'Beſides the acts and inſtruments of Archbiſhop 'Pecham, there are alſo ſome few homages made to 'his ſucceſſor, Archbiſhop Winchelſey.

'The Pecham regiſter is written in a ſtrong hand, 'full of abbreviations, which are grown quite obſo-'lete, ſince the fourth year of King George II. from 'the 25th of March, 1733, (except in the Court of 'Exchequer, where they are preſerved by Act of 'Parliament the ſixth of that reign), and both the 'hand and the abbreviations are now almoſt unknown 'to any but the officers of the Exchequer, and ſome 'few antiquarians; nevertheleſs this very hand will 'endure much longer than the preſent common hand 'and character; ſeveral modern records, produced in 'Courts of juſtice, having already been found to be 'almoſt illegible through the weakneſs of the cha-'racter.

'It is therefore humbly hoped, that an attempt to 'bring to light the treaſure contained in this regiſter 'may prove not unacceptable to his preſent Grace of 'Canterbury, and alſo be of ſome uſe to poſterity.

'It appears from this regiſter, that Archbiſhop 'Pecham was conſtantly attended by a notary pub-'lic, who took down all the acts, and tranſmitted 'them to the Regiſtrarius, whoſe buſineſs it was to 'enter them properly; though they now are a little 'diſordered in this regiſter book, and ſome ſeem to 'be wanting, which may be owing to the book's not 'being bound till after Pecham's death.

'This regiſter contains an infinite variety of in-'ſtruments relating to abſolutions, accounts of exe-'cutors, popes' bulls, grants of adminiſtration, many 'appeals, ſome appropriations of churches, a great 'variety of cauſes relating to benefices, divorces, 'incontinency, marriages, ex officio buſineſs, ſepul-'ture, laſt wills and teſtaments, and many com-'miſſions and commendams, ſeveral compoſitions 'with Deans and Chapters, convocation buſineſs, 'diſpenſations, inſtitutions and collations, a very great 'number of letters to the King, Queen, Pope, and 'Cardinals, beſides many about common buſineſs, 'many proxies, ſome penancies impoſed, privileges 'of the See of Canterbury, regulations in religious 'houſes, the ſtatutes of Wengeham College in Kent 'founded and endowed by this prelate, many ſentences, 'and ſeveral original wills, which, in antient times, 'were always proved before the Archbiſhop of Can-'terbury.

'This is ſufficient to give a general idea of this 'antient regiſter; whatever elſe there is in it will be 'found in the Index; and as Archbiſhop Pecham 'viſited his whole province, many of the litteræ 'communes will be found to relate to that viſitation, 'and, together with other inſtruments, ſhew the ſtate 'of the Church in his days. It alſo gives us ſeveral 'particulars relating to many pariſhes which are at 'preſent unknown; ſeveral appropriations are here 'preſerved, and ſeveral ſentences of the Pope's dele-'gates (uſually pronounced in churches) are here re-'corded. As the rights of Rectors to their proportion 'of tythes of their pariſhes were always ſettled upon 'theſe appropriations, and the Lambeth regiſters are 'perhaps the only records of them now in being, it 'is preſumed this index may hereafter be of great 'ſervice to the preſent incumbents of ſuch Churches 'in caſe any diſpute ſhould ariſe, becauſe they are 'undoubted records, which muſt always be received 'as evidence in every Court of juſtice.

'It may be further obſerved, that the Canterbury 'regiſters muſt neceſſarily be much more uſeful to the 'publick than thoſe of any other See, ſince they 'comprehend the tranſactions of the whole province 'of Canterbury, and neceſſarily contain many acts 'done in different Dioceſes during vacancies.

'A complete index to the regiſters of every Arch-'biſhop and Biſhop in this kingdom is nevertheleſs 'greatly to be deſired; and, till ſuch a one is made, 'no very complete hiſtory of the Church of England 'can be expected; and it is not improbable, but that 'too many of the Clergy have already been great 'ſufferers for want of knowing where to find the 'original titles of their juſt demands; which, had 'there been ſuch indexes, might eaſily have been 'diſcovered.'

learned Civilian will yet perfect and give them to the world. The materials [NN] for both these are among his collections in Mr. Gough's hands. Another work which he intended for Mr. Nichols's press, and for which an index was in like manner made, was "Testamenta Lambethana; being a complete List of all the Wills and Testa-"ments recorded in the Archiepiscopal Register at Lambeth, from A. D 1312 to "A. D. 1636 extracted by Dr. Ducarel, F. R. and A. SS. Lambeth librarian, &c. "with a complete Index, A. D. 1779."

For many years it was his custom to travel incognito in August with his friend Samuel Gale, Esq; attended only by his own coachman and Mr. Gale's footman George Monk. Twenty miles was their usual stage on the first day, and every other day about fifteen. It was a rule, not to go out of their road to see any of their acquaintance. The coachman was directed to say, "it was a job; and that he did not know their names, "but that they were civil gentlemen;" and the footman, "that he was a friend of the "coachman's, who gave him a cast." They usually took up their quarters at an inn; and penetrated into the country for three or four miles round. After dinner Mr. Gale smoked his pipe, whilst Dr. Ducarel took notes, which he regularly transcribed, and which since his death were purchased by Mr. Gough. They constantly took with them Camden's Britannia, and a set of maps. In Vertue's plate of London-bridge chapel, the figure measuring is Dr. Ducarel; that standing is Mr. Samuel Gale [OO].

Among the other MSS purchased by Mr. Gough, are Dr. Ducarel's "Notes taken "during his Tour in Holland, 1775."

Dr. Ducarel closed a life of unremitted industry and application in antiquarian pursuits at his house at South Lambeth, May 29, 1785, after he had been returned only three days from a fortnight's journey into Kent, where he had held a visitation for himself, and three different ones for his friend archdeacon Backhouse. He was a stout, athletic man, and had a strong prepossession that he should live to a great age. He frequently said, that he had the stamina of long life; and that, if he escaped any violent accident, or a stroke of the palsy, "he should take a peep into the next century." The immediate cause of the disorder which carried him off was a sudden surprize on receiving, whilst at Canterbury, a letter informing him that Mrs. Ducarel was at the point of death. He hastened home; took to his bed, and died in three days. He was buried in his favourite church of St. Catharine, on the North side of the altar, in a vault which (as has been already mentioned) he had many years ago selected for that purpose; and over his grave is this inscription:

"To the memory of ANDREW COLTEE DUCAREL, LL.D.
Commissary of St. Catharine's, and of the Diocese of Canterbury; who died May the 29th, 1785, aged 72 (q)."

(q) Bibl. Top. Brit. No. LII.

He had appointed his old and intimate friends, Mr. Fountaine and Mr. Tutet [PP], executors to his will; but, from some informality in the wording of it, both these gentlemen thought it prudent to decline the trust, which of course devolved upon his nephew, Gerard Gustavus Ducarel, Esq; whom he had made his heir.

The Doctor had the happiness of enjoying the esteem of five successive primates, and lived to be the oldest officer in the palace of Lambeth. His official attendance to the duties of Doctors Commons was uncommonly remarkable; and his attachment to the study of English antiquities formed his principal amusement. His collection of books and MSS. in that particular line was valuable; and his indexes [NN] The materials for both these.] In a letter to Mr. Wise, Sept. 3, 1756, he says, the former was so far finished as to let the archbishop of Canterbury and Sir George Lee have a copy of it; which he had ever since greatly improved as to his own copy. It made one large volume, folio, closely written, containing an account of all the advocates, also deans, prebendaries, priors, abbots, &c. formerly members of this society.

[OO] That standing is Mr. Samuel Gale.] This whole paragraph was literally dictated from his own mouth. "The house over the chapel," he added, "belonged to Mr. Baldwin, haberdasher, who was "born there; and when, at 71, he was ordered to "go to Chiselhurst for a change of air, he could not "sleep in the country for want of the noise he had "been always used to hear." This chapel was demolished in the alterations of London bridge, 1757, when two arches were laid into one.

[PP] Mr. Fountaine and Mr. Tutet.] Mark Cephas Tutet, Esq; F. S. A. the partner of Mr. Vidall, an eminent merchant in Pudding-lane, united to the integrity and skill of a man of business the accomplishments of a polite scholar and an intelligent antiquary. He was elected a member of the Society of Antiquaries, June 26, 1755. In 1771, he married a cousin, but had not any issue. On the 5th of July, 1785, presently after supper, he received a sudden and unexpected paralytic stroke, which, in a few hours, deprived him of speech and senses; in which state he lay till the 9th of July, being the day on which he had accomplished 52 years and 11 months. By his will, he ordered his coins, medals, books and prints, to be sold by auction (which was done from the 11th of January to the 18th of February, 1786, inclusive); the produce thereof to be added to the principal part of his estate, which his industry and extreme frugality had increased to a pretty fortune, the interest of which he bequeathed to his widow for her life; and after her to a female cousin of the same condition; the ultimate reversion equally amongst the children of his brother. Few of his survivors understood better the rare secret of collecting only what was truly valuable; a circumstance which invincible modesty alone prevented from being more generally known. To those who were favoured with his intimacy his treasures and his judicious communications were regularly open. His select and valuable library was remarkable for the neatness of the copies; and many of the books were improved by notes written in his own small but elegant hand-writing.

and catalogues ſo exact as to render them highly convenient to himſelf and the friends he was deſirous to oblige. All theſe, with a good collection of coins and medals, he gave, by his laſt will, to his nephew Gerard Guſtavus, in the fond hopes of their being preſerved as heir-looms in his family. But they have all been ſince conſigned to the hammer of the auctioneer [QQ], and the greater part of the MSS. paſſed into the hands of Mr. Gough. In the latter part of life he was too much immerſed in profeſſional engagements to enter into new attachments of friendſhip; but with thoſe who were admitted to an intimacy he aſſociated on the moſt liberal terms. Though he never ate meat till he was 14, nor drank wine till he was 18, as he was frequently heard to declare, yet it was a maxim which he religiouſly obſerved, that "he was an old Oxonian, and therefore never knew a man till he had "drunk a bottle of wine with him." His entertainments were in the true ſtyle of the old Engliſh hoſpitality; and he was remarkably happy in aſſorting the company he not unfrequently invited to his table. Mr. Hollis, 1762, preſenting him with a renewed medal of the Ugonotorum ſtrages, calls him, "ANTIQUARY, Aſſertor of liberty "civil and religious [RR]." Adrian Coltée Ducarel, a conſiderable merchant, and a South-Sea Director, who was the Doctor's younger brother, died July 1, 1745, leaving a widow, ſtill living, and two ſons, James Ducarel, who died at Culcutta, a major in the Eaſt-India Company's ſervice; and Gerard Guſtavus Ducarel, Eſq; who was on-board the Chicheſter at the ſiege of Louiſburg, 1758, with his uncle Hamilton, on board the Warſpite in Gibraltar Bay, 1762, at the age of 17 midſhipman on-board the Windſor man of war, Capt. Cleveland, which carried home the Algerine embaſſador to Tunis, where Mr. Ducarel ſtayed five weeks, and ſaw the ruins of Carthage, and collected coins for his uncle [SS], and is not long ſince returned from the Eaſt Indies with a good fortune; and two daughters, one married to ——— Sutton, Eſq; of Scofton, in the county of Nottingham; and the other to the Rev. A particular account of his Engliſh coins, with many hiſtorical notes by Mr. North and the Doctor himſelf, was purchaſed by Mr. Gough. A collection of antient deeds and ſeals, in two volumes, were purchaſed by Mr. Auſtin; others relating to Herefordſhire, from Mr. Hill the antiquary of that county, were purchaſed with a view to a new Hiſtory of it, which we earneſtly wiſh and hope may ſtill proceed.

That gentleman muſt have uſed the terms, "Aſſertor of liberty civil and religious," in a much more qualified ſenſe than that in which they are now frequently applied by the violence of party.

 [DUCHAL (JAMES), a divine of conſiderable reputation among the Proteſtant Diſſenters in Ireland, ſeems entitled to ſome notice, on account of his having been the author of ſeveral volumes of ſermons, which are held in great eſtimation. Our article of him muſt, however, be very imperfect, ſo far as dates are concerned; for, though an eſſay on his character is prefixed to one of the volumes of his diſcourſes, we never met with a piece of biographical writing more idly declamatory, or leſs ſpecific in the narration. It is not even related in what kingdom Dr. Duchal was born. There was an idea in this country, at the time when he began to be talked of as an author, that he was a native of Scotland; but it is probable that Ireland was the place of his birth. It is, at leaſt, certain that his early life muſt have been ſpent in the northern part of that kingdom. From his age at the period of his deceaſe, it is evident that he was born in the year 1697. The firſt part of his education was under the direction of an uncle, who is ſaid to have been a venerable and learned man. But, beſides the inſtructions of his uncle, young Duchal had the advantage of having his preparatory ſtudies greatly aſſiſted by the wiſe counſels of Abernethy; and he derived no ſmall benefit from the precepts and example of ſuch an adviſer (a). From this circumſtance it may be collected that the place of his reſidence was Antrim. Having finiſhed his grammatical education, he was removed to the Univerſity of Glaſgow, where he completed his theological courſe, and took the degree of Maſter of Arts. Soon after his entering upon the miniſtry, he was ſettled with a ſmall congregation at Cambridge, which was a very advantageous ſituation for a young man of Mr. Duchal's literary turn. Here he enjoyed the benefit of books, and of learned converſation; and here it was that he laid up a great part of that ſtock of knowledge in Ethics and Divinity for which he became eminently diſtinguiſhed. It was during ten or eleven years that he had the happineſs of poſſeſſing opportunities ſo precious to a genuine ſcholar (b). Whilſt Mr. Duchal was at Cambridge, he publiſhed, in octavo, three Sermons, entitled, "The Practice of Religion recommended." This was in 1728; and the texts are taken from Pſalm lxxxiv. 10. Proverbs xii. 28. and Proverbs viii. 6. (c). Theſe diſcourſes we remember to have been very rational, and very excellent in point of matter, but not to have had the advantage of elegant compoſition. Indeed, in reſpect of ſtyle, they are much inferior to the author's later productions. From Cambridge Mr. Duchal was called to his own country. The place to which he removed was Antrim, where he was invited, in 1730, to ſucceed Mr. Abernethy, who had accepted of a congregation in Dublin. After continuing at Antrim ſomewhat more than ten years, Mr. Duchal again became the ſucceſſor of Mr. Abernethy; for, on the deceaſe of that gentleman in December 1740, he was choſen in his ſtead paſtor of the Proteſtant Diſſenting Society in Wood-ſtreet (d). When Mr. Duchal ſettled in Dublin, he had exceeded the meridian of life, and was of a valetudinary habit of body; circumſtances which, united with change of place, might have encouraged the love of eaſe, and tempted him to abate of the ardour of application. But ſo far was this from being the caſe, that, on the contrary, he began, as it were, his career anew. Inſtead of availing himſelf of the rich treaſure he had before laid up, he applied with ſuch diligence to his preparations for the pulpit, that, during a courſe of twenty years, which he ſurvived from his firſt ſettlement in Dublin, he compoſed and wrote more than ſeven hundred ſermons. This was undoubtedly a rare inſtance of unremitting induſtry and labour, and as ſuch deſerves to be recorded (e). We remember, however, our having once been in company with a diſſenting miniſter, who, upon the mention of this fact, boaſted that he had made two thouſand ſermons; and he was not then at a time of life which precluded him from farther exertions of the ſame kind. But his diſcourſes were not the diſcourſes of a Duchal.

In the latter end of 1752, Mr. Duchal publiſhed what may be conſidered as his prime work; which was entitled, "Preſumptive Arguments for the Truth and divine Authority of the Chriſtian Religion. In ten Sermons. To which is added, a Sermon upon God's moral Government." octavo. As theſe ſermons are peculiarly excellent, and are now become very ſcarce, we ſhall inſert an account of them below [A]. Soon after [A] We ſhall inſert an account of them below.] There is prefixed to the Sermons an introduction of very conſiderable length, in which the author gives a judicious view of the general evidences in favour of Chriſtianity. This is preparatory to his main deſign, which is to lay before his readers the ſtrong preſumptions of its truth and divine authority, that ariſe from the genius of our holy religion, and the characters of our Saviour and his Apoſtles, as diſplayed in the New Teſtament. Our Lord's general character is conſidered in the firſt Sermon; and Dr. Duchal obſerves, that we find every thing excellent in it; exalted piety, perfect ſimplicity of ſpirit, a greatneſs of mind which became the Son of God, the utmoſt meekneſs and lowlineſs of heart, and, what crowns all, tranſcendent benevolence. It is particularly ſhewn, that, to frame ſuch a character as that of our Saviour; to invent ſuch a grand deſign to be ſerved by him, together with the means of ſerving it; and to ſupport the character through innumerable incidents and ſpeeches, as they are recorded in the Goſpels; was abſolutely beyond the abilities of the Apoſtles; and, indeed, beyond the powers of the brighteſt genius that ever lived.

The inventive talents of a Homer and a Milton would not have been equal to the taſk. All that was done by the ſacred writers, and all which it was in their power to do, was to give true and ſimple repreſentations of facts. This part of Dr. Duchal's diſcourſe is peculiarly curious and valuable; and we well remember its having made a deep impreſſion upon us when we firſt read it; and the impreſſion has never been effaced. In the ſecond and third Sermons the Doctor proceeds to conſider more particularly our Lord's character as a teacher of morality. Under this head, he takes occaſion to enquire what is to be expected from a teacher who is ſent by God to be the moral inſtructor of mankind, and obſerves, that ſuch a teacher muſt proceed upon the foundation which the author of nature has laid; that original powers or principles, new ſimple ideas or ſenſations, are not to be expected from him; and that his proper office is to eſtabliſh conſcience upon the throne, as the ſupreme governing power in man; to deliver men from thoſe prejudices which ſpring from evil affections, cuſtom, and human authority; to teach them to avoid vice; to point out to them their duty, and thus bring them back to a juſt ſenſe of the obligations of virtue. Theſe rules are applied by Dr. Duchal to our Saviour's inſtructions in morality; ſome general obſervations are made concerning our duty, as Chriſt and his Apoſtles have ſet it before us; the principal things are pointed out that are moſt eſſential to a good and happy life; and from the whole it is ſhewn that there is the ſtrongeſt preſumptive evidence of our Lord's having been, what he profeſſed himſelf to be, the Son of God, and ſent of him; as for other purpoſes, ſo particularly to inſtruct men in their moral obligations, and to lead them in the way of ſalvation.

Our author's fourth Sermon contains ſeveral obſervations upon the laſt diſcourſes of Jeſus with his Diſciples. It is here pointed out, that manifold abſurdities muſt follow from the ſuppoſition of theſe diſcourſes not being genuine; and it is evinced, that they are ſo much in character, ſo worthy of our divine Maſter, and breathe ſuch a ſpirit as to furniſh a ſtrong argument for the truth and divine authority of the Chriſtian Religion.

The fifth and ſixth Sermons are devoted to a view of the life and character of St. Paul; and Dr. Duchal has endeavoured to ſhew, in the former, that this Apoſtle was no impoſtor, and, in the latter, that he was no enthuſiaſt. Our readers will recollect how admirably Lord Lyttelton had, a few years before, treated on the ſame ſubject. Dr. Duchal's remarks, however, which are very judicious, appear to be the reſult of his own enquiry and obſervation.

In the ſeventh Sermon is conſidered St. Paul's deſcription of the "Man of Sin." The point contended after this publication, the Univerſity of Glaſgow, in conſideration of Mr. Duchal's merit, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Toward the cloſe of his life, Dr. Duchal applied himſelf more aſſiduouſly than he had formerly done to the ſtudy of the Hebrew language, to which he appears to have been led from the great attention paid to that language by Hutchinſon and his followers. He did not, however, coincide with them in their peculiar notions. On the contrary, he thought that their extraction of myſterious doctrines and ſyſtems from Hebrew and Greek roots was hurtful to the cauſe of genuine truth and religion (f).

(f) Ibid. p. xxiv.

Dr. Duchal's conſtitution was not naturally ſtrong, and it was much worn down by inceſſant labour. In the decline of age, he was urged by his friends to leſſen his application to his ſtudies; but nothing could prevail upon him to abate the fervour of his ſpirit. He rather choſe "to wear out with honourable toil than with the ruſt of in-"activity." His death took place on the fourth of May, 1761, when he had completed his ſixty-fourth year; and he died deeply regretted by his numerous friends (g). Dr. Duchal's character appears to have been truly excellent. It was compoſed of piety, purity, modeſty, humility, candour, and benevolence. A more particular delineation of his virtues, though mixed with too much digreſſive matter, may be ſeen in the eſſay to which we have frequently referred. In his ſentiments of religion the doctor was very liberal; he was an ardent friend to freedom of enquiry; and he ſuſtained no mean rank among the rational divines of the kingdom of Ireland.

(g) Ibid. p. xxix, xxx.

Dr. Duchal was often ſolicited to ſelect and prepare from his ſtock of ſermons what he thought fitteſt for the preſs: but, from his own good taſte, and his deference to that of the public, he probably felt that this would engage him in a taſk too heavy for his many avocations, and his growing years and infirmities. However, he gave ſome hopes of gratifying the requeſt of his friends, when death intervened. After his deceaſe, three volumes of his ſermons were publiſhed. Theſe, the firſt thirteen excepted, were taken nearly at a venture from the mighty maſs of diſcourſes which he left behind him; becauſe ſuch a vein of ſtrong manly ſenſe, and of rational piety, was found to run through the whole, as made it difficult to find any principle of ſelection. They were all the firſt flow of thought; ſometimes committed to paper at one ſitting; and without any view to the public at large. The firſt volume appeared in 1762; the ſecond and third in 1764. Another edition was called for in 1765. Though the ſermons do not ſeem, in a ſingle inſtance, to have been written anew, or to have been reviſed by the author, they are, nevertheleſs, entitled to much commendation. There will be found in them a rich variety of intereſting matter, ſtrong reaſoning, and juſt views of religion, which are often enforced in a pathetic animated manner, happily conſpiring to enlighten the underſtanding, and to perſuade the heart (h). What particularly diſtinguiſhes them is an union of ſound philoſophy with genuine devotion, to which is added no ſmall fund of original ſentiment. The ſubjects are univerſally important and well choſen [B].

(h) Ibid. p. xxvi—xxviii.

With

tended for by our author is, that the papal Hierarchy anſwers exactly to this deſcription; and that there is no poſſible way of accounting for the Apoſtles knowledge of it, without having recourſe to the inſpiration of the Almighty. Dr. Benſon has an elaborate diſſertation on the ſame ſubject. The interpretation of the two proteſtant Divines will not be acceded to by our Roman Catholic brethren; but rationally and fully to deſtroy the force of it would require, in our eſtimation, a ſtrong exertion of critical ability.

The character and writings of the Apoſtle St. John are examined in the eighth Sermon. In treating upon this ſubject, our author makes it his buſineſs to ſhew, in the firſt place, that the religion of Chriſt, as St. John hath repreſented it, is very worthy of ſuch a teacher ſent of God: after which he proceeds to make ſome remarks upon the ſimplicity and artleſs manner with which the Apoſtle writes; and concludes with laying before his readers what may be collected from theſe things in favour of Chriſtianity.

In the ninth diſcourſe, Dr. Duchal conſiders the debates among Chriſtians in the apoſtolic age; and the concluſion he hence draws is, that there is nothing which ſavours of falſhood or diſſimulation in the manner in which the Apoſtles conducted themſelves, and carried on their deſign; but, on the contrary, the ſtrongeſt appearances of truth and ſincerity.

It is the object of the tenth Sermon to prove, that the liberty of enquiring into and judging concerning the truth in matters of religion, which is eſtabliſhed in the New Teſtament, and our being accountable in theſe matters only to God, may juſtly be regarded as affording a ſtrong preſumptive evidence of the divine original of the Goſpel (1). The diſcourſe upon God's moral government, which is annexed to the volume, is a very rational and judicious compoſition.

(1) Preſumptive Arguments, &c. paſſim. Monthly Review, vol. viii. p. 24, 25. 31, 32.

We are perſuaded that the republication of Dr. Duchal's work would be a valuable preſent to the religious world. Few books have been read by us that appear better calculated to impreſs a thinking mind with a deep ſenſe of the excellence of Chriſtianity, and the ſolid foundation upon which its truth is ſupported. The accumulation of internal and direct arguments forms, in our opinion, an irreſiſtible chain of evidence, were it but properly conſidered. In the preſumptive line, Mr. Paley's late publication, intitled "Horæ Paulinæ," is of ineſtimable value. If ſceptical perſons could be prevailed upon to read with attention ſuch works as thoſe now deſcribed, they would be led to form different views of things from what they at preſent entertain.

[B] The ſubjects are univerſally important and well choſen.] We ſhall here inſert a liſt of them; partly as it may ſerve to point out the nature of Doctor Duchal's diſcourſes, and partly as it may ſuggeſt to clerical men ſome excellent hints for directing their choice in their topics of pulpit compoſition.

With regard to elegance of compoſition, Dr. Duchal's ſermons are not entitled to equal applauſe. The ſtyle of them, however, if ſomewhat diffuſe, and not always ſtrictly correct, is, in general, eaſy, unaffected, and ſufficiently perſpicuous. There is one reſpect in which excellent uſe might be made of them by divines. What we mean is, that it might be of no ſmall ſervice to a preacher to digeſt well, in his mind, the ſentiments contained in any of the Diſcourſes in queſtion, and then to expreſs the ſame ſentiments in his own manner; aiming to improve upon them in point of arrangement, language, and ſpirit. Thus might the admirable and inſtructive matter of Dr. Duchal's ſermons be conveyed to an audience with additional recommendations. The experiment has been tried by the writer of the preſent article in four caſes; and it might have been advantageous to have made the attempt in a greater number of inſtances. There is ſome reſemblance between three ſermons of Dr. Duchal, on the Spirit of Chriſtianity, as the ſpirit of power, of love, and of a ſound mind, and a long diſcourſe on the ſame ſubject, and the ſame text publiſhed in 1768, by Dr. Leechman, and inſerted in the late edition of his works. geniality of Dr. Duchal's ſentiments with his own, might have combined theſe ſentiments ſo thoroughly in his mind, as not to be ſenſible of any prior obligation. But that he muſt originally have read Duchal is plain from the ſimilarity of method as well as in the general train of thinking.

Dr. Duchal is ſaid to have been the Author of various occaſional publications, both in Ireland and in England (i). In England we apprehend that nothing was printed by him, excepting three Sermons, before mentioned. What the tracts were which were written by him in Ireland we are not able to aſcertain. They probably related to the controverſies of the times, which were principally concerning the Trinity, Subſcription to Articles of Religion, and the Teſt-Act.

 [DUCK (Stephen), a Poet, who, by the force of unaſſiſted abilities, raiſed himſelf from a low ſtation to a conſiderable degree of temporary celebrity, was born in the beginning of the preſent century. Who and what his parents were is, from their humble condition, not recorded; and his Biographers have been ſo inattentive, as not to mention either the place of his birth, or the County in which he drew his firſt breath. It is, however, well known that he was a native of Wiltſhire. Originally he had no other inſtruction than what enabled him to read and write in his mother-tongue; and as Arithmetic is generally joined with this degree of learning, ſome little knowledge of it was acquired by him. When he was nearly fourteen years of age he was taken from ſchool, and was afterwards ſucceſſively engaged in the ſeveral loweſt employments of a country life. He was a labouring huſbandman, and when he came into notice was univerſally diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Threſher. In the courſe of his laborious occupations he almoſt forgot all the arithmetic he had formerly learnt. Nevertheleſs, he ſometimes read, and thought oftener. He retained a ſtrong inclination for knowledge, and began to be particularly uneaſy when he reflected on his want of education, and eſpecially that he ſhould have loſt any thing of what had been taught him at ſchool. Theſe ſentiments ſo much occupied his mind, that at laſt he determined to try his own ſtrength, and, if poſſible, to recover his Arithmetic again. When he formed this deſign he was married and at ſervice; he had little time to ſpare; he had no books, and no money to procure any; notwithſtanding which he reſolved to proceed. Accordingly, he uſed to work more than other labourers, and by that means got ſome little matter added to his pay. With this overplus, which was at his own diſpoſal, he bought firſt a book of vulgar Arithmetic, then one of decimal, and a third of meaſuring of land, of all which he made himſelf a tolerable maſter, in the hours he could ſteal from his ſleep, after the labours of the day (a).

(a) Account of the author, by Mr. Spence, prefixed to Duck's Poems. p. xviii. xix. Third Edition.

In a ſituation ſo unfavourable to improvement, and particularly to the opportunities of converſation, Stephen Duck had the good fortune to meet with one friend who was animated with the ſame deſire of knowledge. This friend, had been for two or three years in a ſervice at London, had acquired an inclination for reading, and had purchaſed ſome books, which he had brought down with him into the country. Of his ſmall library Stephen had always the uſe. The two friends, when they could get a little time for it, uſed to talk and read together, by which they mutually improved each other. As they were both of them endued with natural good ſenſe, it would have been an agreeable circumſtance to have been concealed within hearing, when they were in the midſt of ſome of their moſt knotty debates.

It will probably be acceptable to our readers to know of what books their library conſiſted. They had Milton, the Spectator, and Seneca, which were Stephen Duck's firſt favourites. His next favourites were Telemachus, another piece of Fenelon's, and Addiſon's Defence of Chriſtianity. They had an Engliſh Dictionary, a kind of Engliſh Grammar, an Ovid, and a Byſhe's Art of Poetry. Seneca's Morals had made the name of L'Eſtrange dear to them; and this was probably the occaſion of their getting his Joſephus in folio, which was the largeſt purchaſe in their collection. They had one volume of Shakſpeare, containing ſeven of his plays. Stephen had read, beſides theſe, three or four other plays; and ſome parts of Epictetus, Waller, Dryden's Virgil, Prior, Hudibras, Tom Brown, and the London Spy.

With theſe aſſiſtances Stephen Duck became ſomething of a Poet, and ſomething of a Philoſopher. From his infancy he had a caſt in his mind towards poetry. He delighted in verſes and in ſinging, and felt ſtrange emotions on the top performances of the little choir of ſongſters in a country Chancel. The firſt time of his hearing an organ was mentioned by him as a remarkable epocha of his life. He ſoon became a pretty good judge of a muſical line, ſo as to feel the harmony of it in his own mind; but his pronunciation of it was by no means correſpondent to his inward ſenſations.

The circumſtance, that firſt gave him a higher taſte of poetry than he had hitherto acquired, was his accidentally meeting with Milton's "Paradiſe Loſt." Stephen read it over twice or thrice with a Dictionary, before he could thoroughly underſtand its language. Indeed, he appears to have gotten his Engliſh as others get Latin. The "Paradiſe Loſt" was ſtudied by him as thoſe who have a liberal education ſtudy the claſſics; and the new beauties in that poem, which were continually opening upon his mind, rendered his labour eaſy and pleaſant. All the day he worked for his maſter, and ſet to his books at night. The pains he took to improve himſelf were almoſt incredible, and he was ſucceſsful beyond what could have been expected. At length he underſtood ſome of the great and deeper beauties of the "Paradiſe Loſt" tolerably well; and could even point out ſeveral of thoſe particular excellences of it which it required a good nice eye to diſcover. By his friend he was helped to the volumes of the Spectator, which they read often together and often by themſelves.

Stephen uſed frequently to carry them with him to his work; and, when he did ſo, his method was to labour harder than any body elſe, that he might get half an hour to read a Spectator, without injuring his maſter. By this practice he was accuſtomed to ſit down all over ſweat and heat, without regard to his own health, and often to its prejudice. His conduct in this reſpect exhibits a beautiful inſtance of honeſty and induſtry united. Nothing improved him ſo much as the reading of the Spectator. The copies of verſes ſcattered in that performance helped on his natural bent that way, and made him try whether he could not do ſomething of the ſame kind. Sometimes he turned his own thoughts into verſe, whilſt he was at work; and at laſt he ventured to commit his thoughts to paper. What he did of this ſort was very inconſiderable; and as there was no one near him that cared for verſes, nor any perſon who could tell him whether they were good or bad, he generally flung them into the fire, when he had ſufficiently pleaſed himſelf with peruſing them (b).

(b) Account of the Author, &c. p. xix—xxiv.

Whatever care Stephen Duck took to burn theſe little pieces, his writing of them could not be concealed. The thing took air; and Stephen, who had before the reputation among the country-people of being a ſcholar, was now ſaid to be able to make verſes likewiſe. This circumſtance being accidentally mentioned before a young gentleman from Oxford, he ſent for Stephen, and, after ſome converſation with him, deſired him to write him a letter in verſe. That letter is the Epiſtle which ſtood laſt in the firſt edition of Duck's poems, but which now more properly ſtands at the beginning of the later impreſſions. It was the firſt whole copy of verſes that he ever wrote; and, happening to fall into the hands of ſome clergy in the neighbourhood, they were ſo well pleaſed with it that they were led to enquire particularly concerning the author, whom, upon examination, they found to be a man who had a good deal of merit. Accordingly, they made him ſome preſents, which, as things then ſtood, were of great ſervice to him; and they zealouſly encouraged him to go on in his mental exertions. One clergyman in particular, the Reverend Mr. Stanley, made his life more comfortable as ſoon as he knew him (c).

Stephen Duck, being thus patronized, proceeded with greater courage in his poetical career. As he had before written ſome ſcattered verſes on poverty, he now carried on his thoughts on the ſubject, and completed it as we have it in the printed collection. Little, however, can be ſaid in praiſe of the Poem. The compoſition next in order was that upon his own labours. The ſubject was propoſed to him by Mr. Stanley, to whom the piece is inſcribed. It is entitled "The Threſher's Labour," and is ſuperior in merit to any thing which Stephen had before written. There is ſomething not amiſs in the lines which deſcribe the dulneſs of the employment of threſhing.

"Nor yet, the tedious labour to beguile,
"And make the paſſing minutes ſweetly ſmile,
"Can we, like ſhepherds, tell a merry tale;
"The voice is loſt, drown'd by the louder flail.
"But we may think—alas! what pleaſing thing,
"Here, to the mind, can the dull fancy bring?
"Our eye beholds no pleaſing object here,
"No cheerful ſound diverts our liſtening ear.
"The ſhepherd well may tune his voice to ſing,
"Inſpir'd with all the beauties of the Spring.
"No fountains murmur here, no lambkins play,
"No linnets warble, and no fields look gay;
"'Tis all a gloomy, melancholy ſcene,
"Fit only to provoke the Muſe's ſpleen.
"When ſooty peas we threſh, you ſcarce can know
"Our native colour, as from work we go:
"The ſweat, the duſt, and ſuffocating ſmoke,
"Make us ſo much like Ethiopians look,

"We

" We ſcare our wives, when ev'ning brings us home;
" And frighted infants think the bugbear come (d)."

(d) Duck's Poems, ubi ſupra, p. 9, 10.

A performance ſtill more conſiderable was undertaken by Stephen Duck at the requeſt of Mrs. Stanley. This was " The Shunamite," which exceeded his former productions, and from the appearance of which may be dated the æra of his riſing in character and circumſtances. Now it was that perſons of diſtinction began to ſend for him different ways. In ſhort, it got him fame enough to be pretty troubleſome to him at firſt; though the matter ended in a more proſperous ſettlement of him and his affairs than could ever have originally been expected. At the period we are ſpeaking of, he was particularly indebted to a clergyman of Wincheſter. This gentleman, after giving Stephen ſeveral teſtimonies of his bounty and goodneſs, preſented his firſt poetical Eſſays to a lady of quality attending on the Queen, who acquainted her Majeſty with the ingenuity and low condition of the author (e). So well pleaſed was Queen Catharine with the intellectual endeavours of the threſher, that ſhe took him under her protection, and ſettled upon him, ſome ſay, thirty pounds a year, but we have always underſtood it to be fifty. Nor was her Majeſty's benevolence confined to this circumſtance; for it was, no doubt, in conſequence of her diſpoſition in favour of Stephen Duck, that, in April 1733, he was made one of the Yeomen of the Guards (f). Another advantage which he derived from the patronage of the Queen, was his obtaining a large ſubſcription to a quarto edition of his poems, publiſhed in 1736. In his dedication of them he thus expreſſes his gratitude to his patroneſs: " The great honour your Majeſty has done me, " in giving me leave to prefix your royal name to the following poems, does not en- " courage me to preſume they are worthy to be laid at your feet on any other account, " but only as they are an humble tribute of duty, offered from a thankful heart to a " gracious benefactreſs. Your Majeſty has indeed the ſame right to them, as you have " to the fruits of a tree, which you have tranſplanted out of a barren ſoil into a fertile " and beautiful garden. It was your generoſity which brought me out of obſcurity, " and ſtill condeſcends to protect me; like the Supreme Being, who continually ſup- " ports the meaneſt creatures which his goodneſs has produced."

(e) Spence's Account, p. xxvi. Preface to the Poems, p. xiv.

(f) Gentleman's Magazine, vol. iii. p. 216.

The notice taken by the Queen of Stephen Duck could not eſcape the ridicule of thoſe wits who were adverſe to the court. Several alluſions to the ſubject occur in the writings of the times; and Swift, in particular, was very ſevere upon the occaſion. Perhaps he might be piqued at this generoſity in the Queen, while his own friends were neglected. Whatever was his motive, he wrote the following quibbling epigram, as he calls it, " On Stephen Duck, the Threſher and favourite Poet:"

" The Threſher Duck could o'er the Queen prevail;
" The proverb ſays, ' No fence againſt a flail.'
" From threſhing corn, he turns to threſh his brains,
" For which her Majeſty allows him grains.
" Though 'tis confeſs'd, that thoſe, who ever ſaw
" His poems, think them all not worth a ſtraw.
" Thrice happy Duck, employed in threſhing ſtubble!
" Thy toil is leſſen'd, and thy profit's double (g)."

(g) New Univerſal Dictionary, vol. iv. P. 333.

Another copy of verſes, which we remember to have been written about the ſame period, was leſs ſatirical:

" Old Homer, though a bard divine,
" If not by fame belied,
" Stroll'd about Greeee, old ballads ſung,
" A beggar liv'd and died.

" Fam'd Milton too, our Britiſh bard,
" Who as divinely wrote,
" Sung like an angel, but in vain;
" He died not worth a groat.

" Thrice happy Duck! a milder fate
" Thy genius does attend;
" Well haſt thou threſh'd thy barn and brains,
" To make a queen thy friend."

From ſome imitations of Horace, and one of Claudian, which are inſerted in Mr. Duck's collection of poems, it appears that, ſo early as in 1736, he had applied himſelf to the cultivation of the Latin language; and ſuch was the progreſs which he at length made in literature, that he was deemed qualified to be admitted to holy orders.

This

This event took place in June, 1746, when, if our information be accurate, he was ordained prieſt (b). We believe it was a number of years before this, and indeed in the Queen's life-time, that he was appointed keeper of her Majeſty's ſelect library at Richmond, called Merlin's Cave, probably with an additional ſalary, certainly with the advantage of ſuitable apartments, which were continued to his daughter after his deceaſe. What immediate preferment Mr. Duck obtained after his ordination, we are not able to aſcertain; but we find that in Auguſt, 1751, he was promoted to be preacher at Kew Chapel (i). It is ſaid that he employed himſelf as diligently in making Sermons as Poems, and that in the pulpit he was much followed by the people (k). In January, 1752, he was preferred to the rectory of Byfleet, in Surrey; a living of conſiderable value (l). The laſt production of Mr. Duck's, with which we are acquainted, was a poem of conſiderable length, entituled, "Cæſar's Camp, or, St. George's Hill." It appeared in the latter end of 1754, and is in the manner of Denham's "Cooper's Hill, being, "in ſome meaſure, an imitation of that celebrated work." There are in it ſeveral deſcriptions and paſſages not unworthy of approbation. Mr. Duck, after continuing rector of Byfleet ſomewhat more than four years, fell into a dejection of ſpirits, and, in a fit of inſanity ariſing from the diſorder, drowned himſelf at Reading, in Berkſhire. The accounts before me ſay, that he flung himſelf into the Thames, from a bridge near that town (m): but this was not the caſe. I know, from particular enquiry, made near the time, that he was drowned in a trout-ſtream which runs at the back of the Black-Lion Inn, at Reading; and I have ſeen the very ſpot where he met with his unhappy fate. This event took place between the thirtieth of March and the ſecond of April, 1756 (n).

The writers of the New Univerſal Dictionary conclude their account of Mr. Duck with the following reflection. "In the preface to his "Poems," he makes his acknow-"ledgments to ſome gentlemen, "who firſt took notice of him in the midſt of poverty "and labour." What thoſe gentlemen did was highly generous and praiſe-worthy, and "it was but gratitude in Stephen to acknowledge it: yet it is more than probable, "that if he had been ſuffered to paſs the remainder of his life, after he had paſſed ſo "much of it, in poverty and labour, he had not only miſſed the unhappy end he "came to, but alſo been a ſtranger to many years of melancholy and miſery which pre-"ceded it; ſince it may all be reaſonably imputed to the want of that exerciſe and "labour, to which he had been accuſtomed from his earlieſt youth (o)." It is by no means certain that theſe remarks are well founded. We have not a ſufficient account of Mr. Duck's dejection of ſpirits, to be able to aſſign the cauſe from which it proceeded. To ſay that he endured many years of melancholy and miſery before his death, ſeems to be aſſerted without a ſhadow of proof. Neither is there any reaſon to believe, conſidering the activity of his mind, that it would have been poſſible for him to have remained contented in that low ſphere of life in which he was originally placed. An idea prevailed, at the time of his deceaſe, that he fancied himſelf not to be ſufficiently provided for; and, if that was the caſe, he had formed a falſe eſtimate of his own merit. But perhaps there was no real ground for the ſuggeſtion.

(o) New Univerſal Dictionary, ubi ſupra.

As a poet, Stephen Duck is far from ſuſtaining a high rank; and yet it might be queſtioned whether he is not nearly upon a level with ſome who have obtained a place in Dr. Johnſon's collection. In ſimilies he is frequent, and not unhappy in the application of them. Though never great, he is often not unpleaſing. In ſhort, he may be regarded as having become a poet more from the bent of a ſtrong inclination, and an imitative talent, than from the power of real genius.

The perſonal character of Mr. Duck appears to have been very reſpectable. There are evident traces in his writings of an upright and pious mind; and he always ſpeaks of his poetical productions with great humility. His gratitude to his benefactors breaks out on many occaſions; and with one ſpecimen of it, addreſſed to Mr. Stanley, we ſhall conclude the article.

"O STANLEY! if, forgetful of thy love,
"I e'er to gratitude rebellious prove,
"Still may I want a friend, but never find!
"May FORTUNE, PHOEBUS, STANLEY, prove unkind (p)."]

DUDLEY, the ſurname of a noble family in England, formerly Viſcounts L'Iſle, Earls of Warwick and Leiceſter, and Dukes of Northumberland (a). In order to give the reader a clear and diſtinct account of this great Houſe, concerning which many of our beſt writers have fallen into palpable errors, it is requiſite to obſerve, that this ſurname was taken from the caſtle of Dudley, and aſſumed, as the antient cuſtom of England was, by the younger children of the Barons of that place (b). This caſtle ſtands upon the very edge of Staffordſhire, on the ſummit of a lofty rock, affording a free and pleaſant pleaſant proſpect over a vaſt extent of country (c). So much as remains of it (for, in ſpite of the injuries of time, and of men far leſs merciful, there are ſtill ſome remains) may claim the honour of being part of one of the oldeſt fortreſſes in this iſland (d). Dudo, an Engliſh Saxon, beſtowed his name upon it about the year 700 (e). At the time of the Norman Conqueſt it was granted to a Norman Baron, whoſe name was Fitz-Auſculph (f), but did not remain long in his family; for, the daughter of William Fitz-Auſculph being married to Fulk Paganel, brought with her the inheritance of Dudley-Caſtle, which deſcended to her ſon Ralph Paganel, who took up arms for the Empreſs Maud againſt King Stephen (g). His ſon Gervaſe Paganel married Iſabel, daughter to Robert Earl of Leiceſter, by whom he had a daughter Hawiſe, who was firſt married to John de Somery, and afterwards to Roger de Berkeley, of Berkeley-Caſtle (h). Her ſon by the firſt marriage, Ralph de Somery, was Baron of Dudley in right of his mother, and flouriſhed in the reign of Richard I. The male heirs of this family ended in John de Somery, who died in the fifteenth of Edward II. leaving his ſiſters, Margaretta and Joan, coheireſſes. The eldeſt of theſe ſiſters, Margaret, married Sir John Sutton, of the antient Saxon family of Sutton in Nottinghamſhire, who became, in her right, Baron of Dudley (i). This noble perſon, taking part with Thomas Earl of Lancaſter againſt the evil Miniſters of Edward II. was compelled, in order to ſave his life, to convey all his right and title in the caſtle and manor of Dudley, and many other large eſtates, to Hugh le Deſpencer, ſon to Hugh Earl of Wincheſter; but, in the firſt of Edward III. he obtained reſtitution of them all (k). His ſon John married Iſabel, daughter to John de Charlton, Lord of Powis, by whom he had a ſon named John, concerning whom there occurs little either in Records or Hiſtory, except that he inherited a great eſtate from his grandmother (l). He died in the eighth of Henry IV. leaving a ſon of the ſame name, who was then five years of age, and who carried the ſtandard at the ſolemn funeral of Henry V (m). He was in great favour with King Henry VI. or rather with his uncle the good Duke of Glouceſter, by whom he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and ſworn into that high office in the month of January, 1428 (n). According to Sir William Dugdale's account, this noble perſon was honoured with many other high employments in that reign, and lived much beyond it; of which there is ſome reaſon to doubt, ſince we have the poſitive authority of Sir Philip Sydney to the contrary (o), who ſeems to have been well acquainted with, and to have taken great pains about, the genealogy of his family. It is therefore highly probable, that his ſon John Sutton, Baron of Dudley (p), ſucceeded him in that title pretty early in that reign, and was employed in many great affairs during the continuance of it, and particularly in an embaſſy to France, where he was attended by Leon d'Or, a Purſuivant of his own (q). After his return he obtained ſeveral large grants from the Crown, was advanced to be Treaſurer of the King's houſehold, and, in the 39th year of his reign, was elected one of the Knights Companions of the moſt noble Order of the Garter (r). After the acceſſion of King Edward IV. he grew likewiſe into great favour with that Prince, and, in the very firſt year of his reign, obtained a ſpecial diſcharge, under the Broad Seal, for all ſuch ſums of money as might be due and owing from him on account of the poſt he held in the former reign (s). In the fourth year of the ſame King he obtained a grant of one hundred marks per annum, out of the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, for his great integrity, and in conſideration of his large expences in the King's ſervice; and the year following had another grant of one hundred pounds a year for life, out of the cuſtoms of the port of Southampton (t). He was alſo employed, together with the Earl of Arundel, and other noble perſons, to treat with the French King for a continuance of peace, and intruſted in many other affairs of great conſequence by his royal maſter (u). Sir William Dugdale was of opinion, that he died towards the cloſe of that reign, and mentions his being ſucceeded in his barony by his grandſon John, who, he aſſures us, was ſummoned to Parliament the firſt of Richard III (w). It is however evident, from the Regiſter of the Order of the Garter, that the old Lord lived not only through that reign, but even ſo low as that of Henry VII (x), and that there was never ſuch grandſon as Sir William Dugdale, miſled by more antient writers, ſuppoſes [A]. On the contrary, this John Sutton,

[A] As Sir William Dugdale, miſled by more antient writers, ſuppoſes.] It is a point that enters ſtrictly within the plan of this work, and muſt at the ſame time be of much public utility, to correct, where it can be done, the genealogies of great families, more eſpecially when the miſtakes about them receive countenance from authors of great character. This happens to be the caſe of the Suttons, Barons of Dudley, whoſe ſucceſſion the learned Sir William Dugdale found recorded in the Heralds books, particularly in the collections of Glover, who was a man of great reputation; and to theſe he laboured, as well as he could, to reconcile the circumſtances he met with in the patent rolls, and thoſe of Parliament. Now, there being great miſtakes in thoſe collections, it was impoſſible that Sir William Dugdale, reducing the facts he met with to theſe erroneous pedigrees, ſhould fail of adding to the miſtakes, as we ſhall plainly prove he did: but firſt let us ſee what that great man has ſaid.

After obſerving that John Sutton Baron of Dudley, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Sir John Berkeley, and widow of the Lord Powis, had iſſue three ſons, Edmund,

Sutton, Lord Dudley, was appointed, by King Edward V. which is very remarkable, to hold the feaſt of St. George at Windſor; which he accordingly did on the 24th of May 1483 (y). He was alſo preſent in a Chapter of the Order held in King Richard the Third's palace in Weſtminſter, in the firſt year of his reign. In the third year of King Henry VII. the feaſt of St. George being held with extraordinary ſolemnity, and offerings then made for the Knights Companions deceaſed, according to the cuſtom of the Order, we find the ſword of John Lord Dudley, or, as they ſpelt it in thoſe days, Dudely, offered by the Earl of Shrewſbury and the Lord Denham (z). This noble perſon eſpouſed Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Berkeley, of Beverſton in the county of Glouceſter, Knight, by whom he had iſſue three ſons and one daughter; his eldeſt ſon Edmund Sutton (a), from whom the Barons Dudley deſcended; which title remains to our times, as will be ſhewn in the notes [B]; William, who became, in proceſs

Edmund, John, and William, and a daughter Margaret (1), in which he is certainly right, he proceeds thus: "Which Edmund, in 7 Edward IV. being then 'a Knight, accompanied (2) John Earl of Worceſter, 'Deputy to George Duke of Clarence, Lieutenant of 'Ireland, into that realm, for the ſafeguard thereof: 'and the thirteenth of the ſame reign, in conſidera- 'tion of his expences (3) in the King's ſervice, as 'well in this realm as in Ireland, obtained the ſtew- 'ardſhip of the manor of Aberbury in the county of 'Salop, then in the King's diſpoſal, by reaſon of the 'minority of George, ſon and heir to John Earl of 'Shrewſbury, but died in his father's life-time, lea- 'ving iſſue by Joyce, his firſt wife, ſiſter and co-heir to 'John Tiptoft Earl of Worceſter, John his ſon and 'heir, as alſo four other ſons, viz. The firſt error that occurs in this account is, that Edmund did not die in the life-time of his father John, Baron of Dudley, but ſucceeded him in that honour. The next, that by his wife Joyce he was not father of any of the children mentioned by Dugdale, but had by her an only ſon whom he does not mention, viz. Edward, who ſucceeded him in the barony, and was Knight of the Garter, whom Dugdale makes his grandſon. As to the children by the ſecond marriage they are right, except the firſt, whoſe name was Jane and not Joyce. With reſpect to the grants made to, and the will made by, John Lord Sutton, ſon to Edmund, they really relate to his father; and whereas he ſays, that this John married Cecily, daughter to Sir William Willughby, the truth is, that Edward Sutton, Lord Dudley, ſon of Edmund Lord Dudley, married that Lady, and had by her John Sutton Lord Dudley, and alſo a daughter Eleanor, who married Charles Somerſet Earl of Worceſter, which Lady, Dugdale makes to have been the daughter of Edmund Sutton Lord Dudley, by his firſt wife. Theſe facts are ſet right from a manuſcript Peerage of England written in the year 1596 (11); and that they are really ſet right will appear hence; that, whereas Dugdale makes John, Baron of Dudley, ſon to Edmund, deceaſe in the beginning of the reign of Henry VII. it is evident beyond all contradiction from the regiſter of that moſt noble Order, this was John Sutton Lord Dudley (12), Knight of the Garter, not the ſon, but the father, of Edmund. The reaſon of theſe miſtakes was this: Sir William Dugdale was perſuaded, that John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, who was born in the third year of Henry IV. was Knight of the Garter in the reign of Henry VI. and father to Edmund Sutton; whereas, in truth, he was his grandfather by another John whom he does not mention at all. Farther ſtill, whereas Dugdale ſays that John Sutton married Cecily, daughter of Sir William Willughby, Knt. and had by her Edward his ſon and heir; whereas the manuſcript before cited ſays, that Edward Lord Dudley married that Lady, and had by her a ſon John and a daughter Alianore, we can prove from Sir William Dugdale himſelf, that the account in the manuſcript is right, and his own is wrong; for, ſpeaking of Charles Somerſet Earl of Worceſter, he tells us, that his third wife was Eleanor, daughter of Edward Lord Dudley (13), and not John Lord Dudley, as ſet forth in the article of that noble family. But, notwithſtanding theſe miſtakes, and thoſe that have been diſcovered by others, his work is truly valuable, ſince, before it appeared, we had nothing upon the ſubject in any degree worthy of it, and we ſhould have had, in all probability, nothing worthy of it yet, if Sir William Dugdale's labours had never appeared; but the moſt diligent and careful man living may be miſled if he truſts to bad guides, or if he travels at a time when none but bad guides are to be had.

His ſon Edward, Lord Dudley, eſpouſed Theodoſia, daughter of Sir James Harrington, Knight, by whom he had a ſon, Ferdinando, and three daughters; Mary, married to James Earl of Hume, in Scotland; Anne, who was the wife of Baron Schomberg, and the mother of the great Marſhal Schomberg; and Margaret, who married Sir Miles Hobart, Knight of the Bath (18). ſon Ferdinando, he was made Knight of the Bath at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales, and eſpouſing Honora daughter to the Lord Beauchamp, and granddaughter to the earl of Hertford, had iſſue by her an only daughter, Frances (19). He died November 22, 1621, in his father's life-time. The old Baron of Dudley, being a man of very diſſolute life, ruined the large eſtate which deſcended to him from his anceſtors, and to repair it married his grand-daughter Frances to Humble Ward, Eſq; (20), the ſon of a rich Goldſmith of London, deſcended from the ancient family of the Wards, in Norfolk. This gentleman adhering ſteadily to his Sovereign, King Charles the Firſt, in all his troubles, was by him knighted at Oxford, June 24, 1643, and on the 23d of March, the ſame year, was created Baron Ward of Birmingham, in the County of Warwick, and in that year, likewiſe, deceaſed the old Lord Dudley, by which the honour deſcended to Lady Ward (21). Humble, Lord Ward, died October 4, 1670, having had iſſue three ſons and four daughters; Edward, the eldeſt ſon, ſucceeded in the honour and eſtate, John died an infant, and William, the third ſon, ſettled at Willingſworth in the County of Stafford (22). Edward, Lord Ward, became, a very little before his death, Lord Dudley, by the deceaſe of his mother in 1701; by his Lady Frances, daughter of Sir William Brereton of Cheſhire, Baronet, and ſole heireſs to her brother, he had three ſons, John, William, and Ferdinand, and three daughters; the eldeſt and youngeſt of his ſons died unmarried, William, the ſecond ſon, married Frances, daughter of Thomas Dilkes, Eſq; by whom he had three ſons and a daughter, Frances, who married William Lea, Eſq; of Hales Owen, in the County of Salop, and died in the life-time of his father; upon the demiſe therefore of Edward, Lord Dudley and Ward, the titles deſcended to the eldeſt ſon of William, beforementioned: which Edward Lord Dudley and Ward married Dianna, daughter of Thomas Howard of Aſhſted, in the County of Surrey, Eſq; and dying March 28, 1704, under age, left his Lady big with child of a ſon, who was Edward Lord Dudley and Ward. He dying September 6, 1731, unmarried, his honours and eſtate devolved upon his uncle William, ſon to William Ward, Eſq; ſecond ſon to Edward, firſt Lord Dudley and Ward, and he dying unmarried, the title of Dudley deſcended to Ferdinando Dudley Lea, ſon of Frances, daughter of William Ward, Eſq; beforementioned (23). As for the barony of Ward, it deſcended to John Ward of Sedgley Park in the county of Stafford, Eſq; grandſon of William Ward of Wilinſworth, third ſon of Humble, firſt Lord Ward of Birmingham. C.

 [The remark of our ingenious predeceſſor, that it is a point which enters ſtrictly within the plan of this work to correct the genealogies of great families, muſt be taken with ſome degree of limitation. There are, indeed, inſtances in which ſuch a conduct may be proper; and, when they occur, a due attention ſhould be paid to them. If it was neceſſary to give at all the account of the Dudley family which is here given, it was expedient to ſpecify Sir William Dugdale's Miſtakes: but, in general, it is not deſirable to turn the Biographia into a peerage. Nice diſquiſitions of this kind rather belong to the works peculiarly appropriated to the ſubject. The detail in note B might have been omitted without any apparent diſadvantage, as it only collaterally relates to the Dudleys whoſe lives are ſucceſſively recorded.] K.

[A] Is equally groundleſs and ridiculous.] We cannot ſet this matter in a clearer light than by giving the reader what the famous Dr. Fuller has ſaid upon this ſubject (1). 'Edmund Dudley, Eſq. ſays he 'was ſon to John Dudley, Eſq. ſecond ſon to John 'Sutton firſt Baron of Dudley, as a learned Antiquary 'hath beheld his pedigree derived. But his deſcent is 'controverted by many, condemned by ſome, who 'have raiſed a report that John, father to this Edmund, was but a Carpenter, born in Dudley town, '(and therefore called John Dudley), who, travelling 'ſouthward to find work for his trade, lived at Lewes 'in Suſſex, where they will have this Edmund born, 'and, for the pregnancy of his parts, brought up by 'the Abbot of Lewes in learning. But probably ſome, 'who afterwards were pinched in their purſes by this 'Edmund, did in revenge give him this bite in his reputation, inventing this tale to his diſparagement. 'I muſt believe him of noble extraction, becauſe qualified to marry the daughter and heir of the Viſcount 'L'Iſle, and that before this Edmund grew ſo great 'with King Henry VII. as by the age of John his 'ſon, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, may probably be collected.' This writer is frequently unhappy in his accounts, in which he is too often followed by ſuch as have written ſince his time. He ſays that Edmund Dudley was the grandſon of John Sutton, firſt Baron of Dudley. In the very page before this he informs us, that William Dudley Biſhop of Durham, who died in 1483, was the ſon of John Dudley, the eighth Baron of Dudley, of Dudley caſtle in the county of Stafford (2). Now there is nothing more certain than that this William Dudley was the uncle of our Edmund Dudley, and that his father John Dudley, the eighth Baron of Dudley, was the very ſame perſon with John Sutton the firſt Baron of Dudley, which Dr. Fuller might eaſily have diſcerned, if he had conſidered the time when theſe Dudleys lived. The ſtory of the Carpenter he had out of a manuſcript intituled "A View "of Staffordſhire, by Samſon Erdeſwick, Eſq." which he highly commends (3). This tale, which Fuller treats as it deſerves, paſſed for true Hiſtory with all the enemies of the Leiceſter family. In a famous Popiſh libel, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, I find it obſerved of Robert Earl of Leiceſter (4), 'That he was the ſon 'of a Duke, the brother of a King, grandſon of an 'Eſquire, and great grandchild of a Carpenter. The 'Carpenter, ſays my author, was in all likelihood the 'happieſt of his race, for he perhaps was an honeſt man 'and died in his bed.' But, though Dr. Fuller is right in his criticiſm, yet he is right upon wrong grounds; for, he did not marry the daughter and heir of the Viſcount L'Iſle before he was high in King Henry's favour, ſince that match was the pure effect of it, the Lady being the King's ward (5). His other argument is ſtill worſe; for, John, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, reign of Edward IV. and his father having, in his own and in his wife's right, a very plentiful fortune, he received a ſuitable education (c); and, diſcovering very early the great pregnancy of his parts, he was ſent, in the year 1478 (d), to the Univerſity of Oxford, being then about the age of ſixteen. When he had ſpent there ſome time in the ſtudy of antient learntng, he was removed to London, and, being intended for the profeſſion of the Law, he was placed in Gray's-Inn (e), where, when he afterwards became ſo eminent, his arms, finely depicted, amongſt thoſe of many other noble and illuſtrious perſons, were placed in one of the windows of the Hall (f). It is very certain, that he ſtudied the Law with great diligence, and came to be very ſoon conſidered as one of the moſt conſiderable perſons of the profeſſion; which induced Henry VII. a Prince who was an excellent judge of the talents of men, to take him very early into his ſervice (g). It is alſo ſaid, that, for his ſingular prudence and fidelity, he was ſworn of the King's Privy-Council, in the 23d year of his age (h); and, as Polydore Virgil affirms this, who was then here, there can be no cauſe to doubt. In 1492, we find he was one of thoſe great men in the King's army near Boulogne, who offered propoſitions to the King for the concluſion of a treaty with France, and adviſed them to comply with them (i); which he at their interceſſion did, and a peace was accordingly ſigned November 6th, 1492. This was the fineſt ſtroke in politicks of that reign; and, though the peace was very far from being well received in England, yet it anſwered the King's purpoſes completely, and was highly honourable for this nation, ſince an annual tribute was, in plain terms, ſtipulated, and actually paid during the remainder of this reign and part of the next (k) [B]. It is highly probable, that berland, was not born till eight years after the marriage, and not quite ſix years before the King's death (6); ſo that, if it proves any thing, it muſt prove directly the reverſe of what he cites it to prove. In our ſubſequent articles the reader will ſee the true reaſon, why the fooliſh ſtory of the Carpenter came to gain any credit; and that was, the endeavours of this Gentleman's ſon to deprive the chief of his family of his honour and dignity, and to attribute to himſelf, in a direct deſcent from his anceſtors, the Barony of Dudley, to which indeed they never had any title at all; and thus, from a malignant ambition in him to be deſcended wholly from Lords, his enemies took the advantage of ſuggeſting, that his grandfather was not ſo much as a gentleman, and ſo turned his own art upon himſelf, or rather upon his deſcendants.

(6) So it appears from his petition to Parliament to be reſtored in blood.

But we cannot part with this matter thus. There was another writer of much greater figure than Dr. Fuller, whom the ſtory of the Carpenter alarmed, and who, though he profeſſes that he was ſatisfied this was falſe, yet he ſaw no reaſon to believe that our Edmund Dudley was deſcended from the Barons of Dudley, though he knew that with his own hand that Gentleman, in a pedigree of his family, aſſerted himſelf ſo to be (7). But, notwithſtanding this, Sir William Dugdale thinks he might be the ſon of ſome Gentleman of the name of Dudley, but not of the Baron's family, of which he ſays there are many in ſeveral parts of England. Upon the whole, he ſuggeſts, that, though the father of Edmund Dudley was without doubt a Gentleman, ſince he married a woman of conſiderable family and fortune, yet it was not impoſſible that his grandfather might be a Carpenter, or, if not his grandfather, his great-grandfather. In anſwer to this we ſhall obſerve, firſt, that it is a very ſtrange thing Sir William Dugdale ſhould doubt, that ſo wiſe and learned a man, as Mr. Dudley is on all hands confeſſed to be, ſhould not know who his grandfather was as well as Mr. Erdeſwick, the father of this tale of the Carpenter. In the next place, Why, ſince this tale is abſolutely falſe as to his father, which is the matter of fact affirmed, muſt it be ſuppoſed true of his grandfather, or his great-grandfather, of which there is not a word ſaid any where? But, thirdly, though Sir William Dugdale aſſerted this in his Hiſtory of Warwickſhire, yet afterwards, when he came to examine things better, in order to compoſe a Hiſtory of our Nobility in general, he thought fit to abandon this notion; and, though his account of the Suttons, Barons of Dudley, is not very exact, yet he is very clear that Edmund Dudley was really the grandſon of John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, and conſequently allows that neither his grandfather nor his great-grandfather could be a Carpenter.

(7) Dugdale's Warwickſhire, Vol. I. p. 420.

But, ſince we have ſaid ſo much upon this head, we will go a little farther, and put it entirely out of doubt, both by reaſon and authority. In the firſt place let it be obſerved, that Edmund Dudley, Eſq. was admitted into the ſervice and Council of King Henry VII. in the firſt year of his reign, when that gentleman was in the twenty-third or fourth year of his age, and in the life-time of his grandfather, John, Lord Dudley, Knight of the Garter. Now, though it is ſaid that he owed this preferment to his prudence and reputation, yet is it not reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that theſe might have been overlooked, if he had not been alſo a man of quality? In the next place, when Perkin Warbeck publiſhed a proclamation, in which he reproached King Henry VII. with admitting many mean and low men into his Councils, of whom he gives a long catalogue (8), can one imagine, that, if Edmund Dudley's birth had not been truly noble, he would not have ſtood there, as well as Sir Richard Empſon, Biſhop Fox, and Sir Reginald Bray? Thirdly, How came Bale, Pitts, and all the old writers in general, to inſiſt ſo expreſſly on the nobility of his birth, without the leaſt note of doubt or ſuſpicion of the matter? Fourthly, when ſo much weight is every where laid upon the mean birth of Sir Richard Empſon, who was the ſon of a ſievemaker at Towceſter, how can it be conceived that Edmund Dudley, in the ſame condemnation, ſhould be mentioned by the ſame writers with ſo much reſpect for his birth, if it had not been, in thoſe times, as clear as any thing could be? or, what but reſpect to his family could move King Henry VIII. to reſtore his ſon, a child of eight years old, in blood, and give him his eſtate? Laſtly, in point of authority, I ſhall mention but one writer, becauſe his name is ſufficient to ſilence all diſputes: it is the famous John Leland, who, in his Itinerary, has theſe words (9). 'The Viſcount 'Duddeley, now being, is of the Suttons, that married 'the heirs general of the Duddelys. He cometh, by his 'mother ſide, of the Talbot, Lord or Viſcount Liſle.' This is ſpoken of Sir John Dudley, Viſcount Liſle, and, being ſet down in a note-book merely for his proper uſe, cannot be ſuſpected, ſince no Antiquary deſires to deceive himſelf.

(8) See the ſubſtance of this proclamation in Lord Bacon's Hiſtory.

(9) Vol. VIII. p. 29.

[B] During the remainder of this reign, and part of the next.] It was a maxim with Henry VII. to have as little to do with the Continent as poſſible; but, when he was obliged to have to do with it, he carried things as high as he could. In the beginning of his reign, he had temporized with the French King, to prevent having a foreign war and domeſtic broils to deal with at the ſame time. But, finding the French grew upon him, he reſolved to make war in ſuch a manner as ſhould procure him peace for the future (10). He laid before the Parliament, therefore, the ground of his quarrel, in which he was certainly right. For this induced them to eſpouſe the propoſal of a war very warmly; but, to avoid oppreſſing the meaner ſort of people in raiſing money for the ſupport of it, they granted the King a benevolence by law, which was collected by way of requeſt, but of the better ſort only, and brought in a vaſt ſum of money (11). The King on that Mr. Dudley was one of the King's principal inſtruments in this intrigue, ſince, two years afterwards, we find he obtained the wardſhip and marriage of Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Grey, Viſcount L'Iſle, ſiſter and coheireſs of John Viſcount L'Iſle, her brother (l). In 1499, he was one of thoſe who ſigned the ratification of the peace beforementioned, by authority of Parliament (m). This plainly ſhews, that he was a perſon in great credit with his country, as well as in high favour with his Prince, whom he ſerved in promoting the filling of his coffers, under colour of the Law, though with very little reſpect to the principles of equity and juſtice, as an able and excellent author informs us (n) [C]. But, in what capacity he did this, is not at all in our power to aſſert, We are aſſured by Stowe, that, in 1497, he was Under-Sheriff of London, and continued ſo for ſix years (o); which might, indeed, put it in his power to pack Juries, and to have a hand in other enormities with which he was charged; but, that the ſame perſon ſhould, at the ſame time, be Under-Sheriff of London, one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Lawyers on his part, raiſed an army of twenty-five thouſand foot and one thouſand ſix hundred horſe, and, attended by the flower of his Nobility, paſſed the ſeas after Michaelmas, 1492. And, as if he intended no time ſhould be loſt, he afterwards actually opened the ſiege of Boulogne, though propoſitions had been made for amicably compoſing all diſputes; upon which a negotiation was begun, and, while the ſiege went on, a peace was concluded by the commiſſioners, to continue for both Kings lives; 'in which, ſays Lord Bacon (12), 'there was no article of importance, being, in effect, rather a bargain than a treaty. For, all things remained 'as they were, ſave, that there ſhould be paid to the 'King ſeven hundred and forty-five thouſand ducats, 'in preſent, for his charges in that journey, and five and 'twenty thouſand crowns, yearly, for his charges ſuſtained in the aids of the Britains. For which annual 'ſum, though he had Maximilian bound before for 'thoſe charges, yet he counted the alteration of the 'hand as much as the principal debt. And, beſides, 'it was left ſomewhat indefinitely, when it ſhould determine or expire, which made the Engliſh eſteem it 'as a tribute carried under fair terms. And the truth 'is, it was paid both to the King and to his ſon 'King Henry VIII. longer than it could continue 'upon any computation of charges. There was alſo 'aſſigned by the French King, unto all the King's 'principal Counſellors, great penſions, beſides rich 'gifts for the preſent. Which, whether the King 'did permit to ſave his own purſe from rewards, or to 'communicate the envy of a buſineſs that was diſpleaſing to his people, was diverſly interpreted. For, 'certainly, the King had no great fancy to own this 'peace. And therefore, a little before it was concluded, he had, underhand, procured ſome of his 'beſt captains and men of war to adviſe him to a 'peace under their hands, in an earneſt manner, in the 'nature of a ſupplication. But the truth is, this peace 'was welcome to both Kings. To Charles; for that 'it aſſured unto him the poſſeſſion of Britain, and freed 'the enterprize of Naples. To Henry; for that it 'filled his coffers; and that he foreſaw, at that time, 'a ſtorm of inward troubles coming upon him, which 'preſently after brake forth. But it gave no leſs diſcontent to the nobility and principal perſons of the 'army, who had many of them ſold or engaged their 'eſtates upon the hopes of the war. They ſtuck not 'to ſay, that the King cared not to plume his nobility 'and people to feather himſelf. And ſome made 'themſelves merry with, that the King had ſaid in 'Parliament, that, after the war was once begun, he 'doubted not but to make it pay itſelf; ſaying, he 'had kept promiſe.' The curious reader may find a very fair and full account of this matter in the French Hiſtorians, which will convince him, that they differed very little in their judgment of the matter from us; that is, they thought the honour of the nation highly concerned, and blamed Lewis XII. who ſucceeded in 1498, for renewing this treaty, and undertaking to continue the payment of thoſe ſums annually, which had been ſtipulated by his father (13). This, they ſay, he might very well do for the ſake of peace; but then he ſhould have done it as an act of his own, and not as heir and ſucceſſor to his father, and ſo bound to comply with, and diſcharge his engagements (14).

[C] As an able and excellent author informs us.] In all our general hiſtories, this matter is handled in the groſs, ſo that it is very difficult to conceive wherein the crimes of Empſon and Dudley conſiſted; but Lord Bacon, who underſtood the matter well, relates every circumſtance freely and fully, in the following manner (15). 'As Kings do more eaſily find inſtruments 'for their will and humour than for their ſervice and 'honour, he had gotten for his purpoſe, or beyond 'his purpoſe, two inſtruments, Empſon and Dudley, 'bold men and careleſs of fame, and that took toll of 'their maſter's griſt. Dudley was of a good family, 'eloquent, and one that could put hateful buſineſs into 'good language. But Empſon, that was the ſon of a 'Sieve-maker, triumphed always upon the deed done, 'putting off all other reſpects whatſoever. Theſe two 'perſons being Lawyers in ſcience, and Privy-Counſellors in authority, turned law and juſtice into wormwood and rapine. For, firſt, their manner was to 'cauſe divers ſubjects to be indicted of ſundry crimes, 'and ſo far forth to proceed in form of law; but, 'when the bills were found, then preſently to commit 'them: and, nevertheleſs, not to produce them in any 'reaſonable time to their anſwer, but to ſuffer them to 'languiſh long in priſon, and, by ſundry artificial devices and terrors, to extort from them great fines and 'ranſoms, which they termed compoſitions and mitigations. Neither did they, towards the end, obſerve 'ſo much as the half face of juſtice in proceeding by 'indictment, but ſent forth their precepts to attach 'men, and convent them before themſelves and ſome 'others, at their private houſes, in a Court of Commiſſion, and there uſed to ſhuffle up a ſummary proceeding by examination, without trial of jury, aſſuming 'to themſelves there to deal both in pleas of the 'Crown and controverſies civil. Then did they alſo 'uſe to enthrall and charge the ſubjects lands with 'tenures in capite, by finding falſe offices, and thereby 'to work upon them for wardſhips, liveries, premier 'ſeiſins, and alienations, being the fruits of thoſe tenures, refuſing, upon divers pretexts and delays, to 'admit men to traverſe thoſe falſe offices according to 'the law. Nay, the King's wards, after they had accompliſhed their full age, could not be ſuffered to 'have livery of their lands, without paying exceſſive 'fines, far exceeding all reaſonable rates. They did 'alſo vex men with informations of intruſion, upon 'ſcarce colourable titles. When men were outlaw'd 'in perſonal actions, they would not permit them to 'purchaſe their charters of pardon, except they paid 'great and intolerable ſums, ſtanding upon the ſtrict 'point of law; which, upon outlawries, giveth forfeiture of goods: nay, contrary to all law and colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the 'half of men's lands and rents, during the ſpace of 'full two years, for a pain, in caſe of outlawry. They 'would alſo ruffle with jurors, and enforce them to find 'as they would direct; and, if they did not, convent 'them, impriſon them, and fine them.' It appears, from Polydore Virgil, that, at firſt, theſe proceedings were carried on with much temper and addreſs; that is to ſay, the penalties levied were not very ſevere, and thoſe who paid them were commonly perſons in pretty good circumſtances, which prevented any great clamour: but by degrees, when the legality of theſe proceedings ſeemed to be thoroughly eſtabliſhed, they were extended farther, and then it was, that they created ſuch a general diſſatisfaction as induced the King to promiſe reſtitution, and to part with his Miniſters, Sir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley.

at the Bar, and a Privy-Counſellor, is not to be conceived (p). The ingenious Dr. Fuller gives us a more plauſible account; for, he makes him a puiſne Judge (q); but it happens unluckily, that, had he been ſo, it muſt have appeared, which it does not. Beſides, as a Judge, he could not have meddled with the King's revenue: as a Baron of the Exchequer he might; but neither was he that. Polydore Virgil, who was well acquainted with thoſe times, tells us, what both he and Sir Richard Empſom were, but he tells it us in Latin; they were, ſays he, Fiſcales Judices (r); the misfortune is, that we do not know how to put this into Engliſh. It might, perhaps, be no improbable gueſs, that they were Attorney and Solicitor General; for which, however, no direct authority can be alleged. In the Parliament, held in 1504, Edmund Dudley, Eſq. was Speaker of the Houſe of Commons (s), and, about the ſame time, was, by the King's writ, diſcharged from the ſtate and degree of a Serjeant at Law (t), as Sir William Dugdale tells us. Another writer calls it degraded, which, however it may ſound, was, in reality, an act of favour (u) [D]. In the Parliament in which this Gentleman was Speaker, there were ſeveral acts paſſed, much for the public benefit; but which, at the ſame time, very plainly diſcovered, that they were framed and digeſted by Lawyers; and this, perhaps, was one reaſon why they were found very practicable in the execution, and, like many other laws made in this reign, have been ſince admired for going clearly and directly to the ends that they were meant to accompliſh (w) [E]. In conſideration, as it may be preſumed, [D] Which, however it may ſound, was in reality an act of favour.] That learned Herald and Antiquary, mentioned in the text, gives us a large account of this matter (16). 'In the nineteenth of Henry VII. ſays 'he, he was Speaker of the Parliament, and ſhould 'the ſame year have been made a Serjeant at Law, 'but, for what reaſon I will not take upon me to aſ'ſign, he deſired that he might be diſcharged from 'aſſuming that degree; whereupon the King directed 'his precept to William, Biſhop of London, then Lord 'Keeper of the Great Seal, commanding his forbear'ance of making out any writ to him for that pur'poſe.' This ſufficiently ſhews Dr. Fuller's miſtake in affirming our Dudley to have been a Puiſne Judge, for, if ſo, he muſt have been a Serjeant. We have a large account of the antient manner of making Serjeants at Law, from an author of great dignity (17), who informs us, that the Chief Juſtices of the Common-Pleas, with the advice of the other Judges of that Court, were wont to ſet down the names of a certain number of the diſcreeteſt perſons who had moſt profited in the Laws, and were thought to be of beſt diſpoſition, which being preſented to the Lord Chancellor of England in writing, he, by the King's writ, charged every of the perſons elect to be before the King, at a day by him aſſigned, to take upon him the ſtate and degree of a Serjeant at Law, under a great penalty which in thoſe writs was ſpecified. But there were many reaſons why perſons thus named choſe to avoid taking upon them that dignity, though it may be doubted whether this was not the firſt inſtance of a perſon's being diſcharged by the interpoſition of the royal authority: but it was ſoon followed; for, we find in the ſecond year of Henry VIII. that the King granted to Richard Brooke (18) an exemption from being called to the degree of a Serjeant againſt his good will, or, if he was called, to refuſe it. Sometimes alſo they were diſcharged from that degree in order to their enjoying ſome office that was inconſiſtent therewith, which was the caſe of Thomas Fleming, Serjeant at Law, who was diſcharged by writ directed to himſelf from Queen Elizabeth, November 5, in the thirty-ſeventh year of her reign, in order to his being made Solicitor-General (19). Now, from what Sir William Dugdale ſays, it looks as if there was ſome particular reaſon for Mr. Dudley's deſiring his diſcharge, and it is not impoſſible that it might be for obtaining the office of Solicitor-General. It is very true that Sir William Dugdale mentions but two Solicitors in the whole reign of Henry VII. viz. Andrew Dimmock, who obtained that office in the firſt of Henry VII. and John Ernley, who came into it in the twenty-ſecond of the ſame reign (29). But that there were other perſons in that office, within that ſpace of time, may be hence concluded, that Andrew Dimmock was raiſed to the degree of a Baron of the Exchequer in the eleventh year of that King, and one cannot ſuppoſe, that in ſo buſy a reign there ſhould be no Solicitor for eleven years together. Something of the ſame kind might be ſaid as to the poſt of Attorney-General, in which we find Sir James Hobart during that whole reign.

[E] That they were meant to accompliſh] We have this matter admirably ſet forth by the wiſe and judicious Hiſtorian of this reign (21). 'In this Parliament, ſays he, there were not made any ſtatutes 'memorable touching public government. But thoſe 'that were had ſtill the ſtamp of the King's wiſdom 'and policy. There was a ſtatute made for the diſ'annulling of all patents of leaſe, or grant, to ſuch as 'came not upon lawful ſummons to ſerve the King in 'his wars againſt the enemies or rebels, or that ſhould 'depart without the King's licence, with an exception 'of ſeveral perſons of the long robe. Providing, ne'verthleſs, that they ſhould have the King's wages 'from their houſe till their return home again. There 'hath been the like made before for officers, and by 'this ſtatute it was extended to lands. But a man may 'eaſily ſee, by many ſtatutes made in the King's time, 'that the King thought it ſafeſt to aſſiſt martial law by 'law of Parliament. Another ſtatute was made, pro'hibiting the bringing in of manufactures of ſilk 'wrought by itſelf, or mixed with any other thread. 'But it was not of ſtuffs of whole piece (for that the 'realm had of them no manufacture in uſe at that time) 'but of knit ſilk, or texture of ſilk; as ribbons, laces, 'cauls, points, and girdles, which the people of En'gland could then well ſkill to make. This law 'pointed at a true principle, that, where foreign ma'terials are but ſuperfluities, foreign manufactures 'ſhould be prohibited. For, that will either baniſh 'the ſuperfluity, or gain the manufacture. There was 'a law alſo of reſumption of patents of gaols, and the 'reannexing of them to the ſheriffwicks, privileged 'officers being no leſs an interruption of juſtice than 'privileged places. There was a law likewiſe to re'ſtrain the bye-laws, or ordinances, of corporations, 'which many times were againſt the prerogative of the 'King, the common law of the realm, and the liberty 'of the ſubject, being fraternities in evil. It was 'therefore provided, that they ſhould not be put in 'execution without the allowance of the Chancellor, 'Treaſurer, and the two Chief-Juſtices, or three of 'them, or of the two Juſtices of Circuit where the cor'poration was. Another law was in effect to bring in 'the ſilver of the realm to the mint, in making all 'clipped, miniſhed, or impaired, coins of ſilver not to 'be current in payments, without giving any remedy 'of weight, but with an exception only of reaſonable 'wearing, which was as nothing in reſpect of the un'certainty; and ſo upon the matter to ſet the mint on 'work, and to give way to new coins of ſilver which 'ſhould be then minted. There likewiſe was a ſtrong 'ſtatute againſt vagabonds, wherein two things may be 'noted, the one, the diſlike the Parliament had of 'gaoling them, as that which was chargeable, peſte'rous, and of no open example. The other, that in 'the ſtatutes of this King's time (for this of the nine'teenth year is not the only ſtatute of that kind) there 'are ever coupled the puniſhment of vagabonds and the 'forbidding of dice and cards, and unlawful games, 'unto ſervants and mean people, and the putting down sumed, of the great services rendered by him in this high station we find, that, two years afterwards, he obtained a grant of the Stewardship of the rape of Hastings, in the county of Sussex (x). This was one of the last favours that he received from his Master, who, at the close of his life, is said to have been very much troubled at the oppressions and extortions of which his Ministers, particularly Empsom and Dudley, had been guilty; insomuch that he expressed a willingness to make restitution to such as had been injured, and directed the same by his will (y). Polydore Vergil (z), and some other courtly writers, hence take occasion to free that Monarch, in a great measure, from blame, discharging, as is commonly done, all the errors and evil practices in his government upon the shoulders of Empson and Dudley (a), who, it is very certain, lost their heads for them. But, that they did not drive the King, or even deceive him, into such measures, the judicious Lord Bacon (b) has very plainly proved, from instances that are worth the reader's notice [F]. The King died at Richmond on the 21st of April, 1509 (c); and he was scarcely laid in his grave before Mr. Dudley was sent to the Tower, the clamour of the people being so great, that this step was thought absolutely necessary to quiet them (d); tho' Stowe seems to think, that both he and Sir Richard Empson were decoyed into the Tower, or they had not been so easily taken (e). At the same time, numbers of their subordinate instruments were seized, imprisoned, tried, and punished (f). On the 16th of July, the same year, Edmund Dudley, Esq. was arraigned, and found guilty of High-Treason, before Commissioners assembled in Guild-Hall (g) [G]. The King taking a progress afterwards

'and suppressing of ale-houses, as strings of one root 'together, and as if the one were improfitable without 'the other. As for riot and retainers, there scarce 'passed any Parliament in this time without a law 'against them, the King ever having an eye to might 'and multitude. There was granted also, that Parlia'ment, a subsidy, both from the temporality and the 'clergy. And yet nevertheless, ere the year expired, 'there went out commissions for a general benevolence, 'though there were no wars nor fears. The same year 'the city gave five thousand marks for confirmation 'of their liberties; a thing fitter for the beginnings 'of Kings reigns than the latter ends. Neither was 'it a small matter that the mint gained upon the late 'statute, by the recoinage of groats and half-groats.

[F] That are worth the reader's notice.] The turn, given by some writers to these oppressions and exactions, is this, that the King intended one thing, and his Ministers did another. He found many of his subjects either too rich, or too proud, to stoop to the laws, which conceiving to be the effects of those domestic commotions with which the realm had been often troubled, he judged that the best physick for this estate-malady was the calling great and opulent offenders to justice: but, Sir Richard Empson and Mr. Dudley extended this plan so as to take in all ranks of people, and at the same time stretched the laws, and heightened the severities of them beyond the intention of the legislators; with all which, when the King was thoroughly informed, he was highly offended (22). But that there was little or no truth in this; that the King was himself as severe and as rapacious as his ministers could be; and that there is very small reason to suppose he was at all ignorant of any of their proceedings will appear from the following instances; one of which, the noble author had from good authority, and the other he relates from his own knowledge; so that, if we aim at discovering truth in this business, we may easily discern it (23).

'There remaineth to this day, says Lord Bacon, a 'report, that the King was on a time entertained by 'the Earl of Oxford, his principal servant, both for 'war and peace, nobly and sumptuously, at his castle 'at Hemingham; and, at the King's going away, the 'Earl's servants stood in their livery-coats, with cog'nizances, ranged on both sides, and made the King a 'lane. The King called the Earl to him, and said to 'him, My Lord, I have heard much of your hospi'tality, but I see it is greater than the speech: these 'handsome gentlemen and yeomen, which I see on both 'sides of me, are sure your menial servants. The Earl 'smiled, and said, it may please your Grace, that 'were not for mine ease; they are most of them my 'retainers that are come to do me service at such a 'time as this, and chiefly to see your Grace. The 'King started a little, and said, by my faith, my 'Lord, I thank you for my good chear, but I may 'not endure to have my laws broken in my sight, my 'Attorney must speak with you. And, it is part of 'the report, that the Earl compounded for no less 'than fifteen-thousand marks. And, to shew farther the 'King's extreme diligence, I do remember to have 'seen a book of accompt of Empson's, that had the 'King's hand almost to every leaf, by way of signing, 'and was in some places postilled in the margin with 'the King's hand; likewise, where was this remem'brance.

'Item, Receiv'd of such a one, five marks for a par'don to be procured, and, if the pardon do not 'pass, the money to be repaid, except the party be 'some otherways satisfied.

And over against this memorandum, of the King's own hand,

'otherwise satisfied.

It was by such small sums as these, as our excellent Historian well observes, that King Henry collected that immense mass of treasure of which he died possessed; and how immense that wealth was, in comparison of those, or indeed of these times, that learned and painful Antiquary, Sir Robert Cotton, has told us, from a book of receipts and payments kept between the King and Mr. Edmund Dudley, viz. four millions and a half in coin and bullion, exclusively of rich furniture, wrought plate, and jewels. It appears likewise from the same book, that the extraordinary, or casual revenue arising from the sale of offices, composition of penalties, and dispensing with the laws, was advanced to one hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year (24).

[G] Before Commissioners assembled in Guild-Hall.] It appears, from the account given by Stowe, that Sir Richard Empson and Mr. Dudley were sent for to attend the King in the Tower of London at such a time, very probably, as his Privy-Counsellors were sworn; and, having thus put themselves in the power of those who had no good will to them, they were committed to prison, contrary, as he insinuates, to their expectations (25). Grafton tells us, that, in the last year of King Henry VIIth's reign, they were, by special Commission, appointed to enquire of the offenders against penal laws, which they diligently prosecuted; but, says he, the malice of the people was so increased against them, for their endeavours and service in the said Commission, the new King, to pacify the populace, was obliged to proceed against them (26). Accordingly, Edmund Dudley, Esq. was brought, on the day mentioned in the text, before Edward, Duke of Buckingham; Henry, Earl of Northumberland; Thomas, Earl of Surrey; George, Earl of Shrewsbury; Thomas, Earl of Derby; Thomas, Prior of St. John's of Hierusalem, in England; Charles Somerset, of Herbert, Knight; Stephen Jennings, Mayor of the City of London; John Fineux, Knight; Robert Rede, Knight; William Hodie, Knight; Robert Brudnele, Humphry afterwards into the country, found himſelf ſo much incommoded by the general outcry of his people, that he cauſed Sir Richard Empſon to be carried down into Northamptonſhire, where, in the month of October following, he was alſo tried and convicted, and then remanded back to the Tower (b). In the Parliament which began January 21ſt, 1510, of which Sir Thomas Ingleby was Speaker, Sir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, Eſq. were attainted of High-Treaſon (i). The King, however, was unwilling to execute them; and Stowe (k) informs us, that a rumour prevailed, as if Queen Catharine had interpoſed, and procured Mr. Dudley's pardon. To give ſome employment to his thoughts during his tedious impriſonment, and, perhaps, with a view of extricating himſelf happily out of all his misfortunes, he compoſed a very extraordinary piece (l), which he addreſſed to King Henry VIII. but, as it never came to his hand, ſo it could not contribute to ſave the head from which it ſprang [H]. The clamours of the people continually increaſing, and being rather exaggerated than ſoftened by ſeeing numbers of mean fellows, whom theſe great men had employed as informers and witneſſes, convicted and puniſhed while they were ſpared, the King was, at laſt, obliged to iſſue his writ for their execution, in obedience to which the Sheriffs of London, Auguſt 18th, 1510 (m), brought Sir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, Eſq. out of the Tower to a ſcaffold upon the Hill, where they both loſt their heads. The ſame night their bodies were interred; that of Empſon in White-Friers, and that of Dudley in the Black-Friers Church (n). Such was the end of our great Lawyer and Stateſman, in the forty-eighth year of his age. We are aſſured, that he inherited ſome eſtate from his father, and a better from his mother, to (27). He was then indicted, together, as it ſeems, with Sir Richard Empſon, for high-treaſon; in proof of which, it was alleged, that, during the ſickneſs of the late King, in the month of March preceding, they ſummoned certain of their friends to be in arms at an hour's warning, and, upon the death of the ſaid King, to haſten to London; out of which, and other circumſtances, it was collected by the jury, that their intention was to ſeize on the perſon of the new King, and ſo to aſſume the ſole government, or, if they could not attain this, to deſtroy him. It was a very ſtrange inference, that, becauſe a man, who had the misfortune to labour under the public hatred, deſired the aſſiſtance of his friends in order to come ſafe to London, therefore this implied a deſign to impriſon and deſtroy the King; but, as ſtrange as it was, the jury, it ſeems, thought it credible. However, Sir Richard Empſom was ſent down into the country, and there tried for as ſtrange a felony as this was a treaſon (28). To ratify all this, they were attainted in Parliament, notwithſtanding an excellent ſpeech made by Sir Richard Empſon, which was not, as is generally ſuppoſed, written for him by the Lord Herbert (29); for, the ſubſtance of it was long before printed in one of our chronicles (30). The whole of theſe proceedings, which were in the firſt and ſecond years of the reign of Henry VIII. were recited at large in the petition exhibited in the name of John Dudley, the ſon of Edmund, by his guardian Edward Guildford, Eſq in the third year of the ſame reign, upon which he obtained a ſpecial Act of Parliament, for the repeal of this attainder; which ſufficiently ſhews, that it was founded rather in clamour than in juſtice, and that the Parliament were as willing to remove that precedent as to make it.

As to the original book, as it miſſed the King's hands, ſo it ſeems the family were alſo deprived of it; but, many years afterwards, it was met with by that faithful hiſtorian and curious collector of whatever regarded our antiquities, honeſt John Stowe; who, believing the ſight of it would be welcome to the grandſon of this great man, then Earl of Warwick, ſet himſelf to make a very fair tranſcript of it; which, when he had performed, he carried to that noble perſon, by whom it was very graciouſly accepted, John Stowe receiving, in return, as much thanks and as many good words as he could wiſh (32). The original, that induſtrious man kept to his death; long after which, with the greateſt part of his hiſtorical collection, it came into the poſſeſſion of Sir Symonds D'Ewes, who purchaſed them at a conſiderable price, about the time that he began to collect his noble library of manuſcripts, afterwards purchaſed by the late worthy Earl of Oxford, in which it is highly probable, this original work is to be found, though ſeveral copies of it have been and are ſtill to be met with in other Libraries, beſides that before ſpecified in the margin, which probably was tranſcribed from the Earl of Warwick's.

It may be conjectured, that if this piece had been preſented, as its author intended, to King Henry VIII. it might have delivered him from his misfortunes; but as Camden ſays on another occaſion, ſome ill ſtar ſeems to have waited upon all ſuch undertakings. King Henry VIII. being very deſirous of having ſuch a book as our author Dudley had compoſed for his uſe, aſſigned this employment to another of his father's Counſellors, Dr. Thomas Ruthall, Biſhop of Durham (33), a man famous for his abilities, and who executed it with all the ſkill and accuracy imaginable. It happened however a little unluckily for him, that, prompted by the ſame deſire which warmed the breaſt of his maſter, he had drawn up a book of the ſame kind, with reſpect to his Biſhoprick of Durham, and cauſed both, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times, to be very neatly bound in parchment, preciſely in the ſame manner. When, therefore, Cardinal Wolſey came from the King, to enquire for this ſyſtem of government for his uſe, the Biſhop directed his Secretary to reach the new parchment book, who, by miſtake, reached him that of the Biſhoprick of Durham. The Cardinal, taking the liberty to read the book firſt, then carried it to his maſter with this compliment; I bring your Grace a mine, out of which, when your occaſions require it, you may take a large maſs of treaſure. It was not long before this miſtake reached the Biſhop's ears, which affected him ſo ſtrongly, that, falling into a fever, he died, and Wolſey ſucceeded him. Another treatiſe of the like nature was penned for the ſpecial uſe of King Edward VI. by William Thomas, Eſq. Clerk of the Council in his reign (34), who afterwards had the misfortune to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, for high-treaſon, in that of Queen Mary.

whom he was found heir at her death, in the thirty-ſixth year of his age. He was a gainer by both his marriages, and a great gainer by the laſt; to which if we add the profits of his profeſſion, what he received from his Maſter's bounty, and what might be diverted into his own coffers, in its paſſage to the royal treaſury, we have no great reaſon to ſcruple what Stowe relates as a fact, that, at the time of his fall, he had an eſtate of eight hundred pounds a year, and above twenty thouſand pounds in money, excluſively of plate, jewels, and rich furniture (o). As to his character, it ſufficiently appears from what has been ſaid, as well of his abilities as actions; and, in reference to his family, becauſe there are many diſputes about it, and we go ſomewhat a different road from that in which thoſe travelled who went before us, we ſhall ſpeak of it at large in the notes [I]. The reader may obſerve, in this and the ſubſequent articles, that we are careful in giving him matters of fact, without adopting the ſentiments of any of our Hiſtorians, farther than as we find them ſupported by evidence. Several of them aſcribe all the exactions and proſecutions under colour of penal laws, which began in this reign almoſt as ſoon as the Civil Wars ceaſed, to Sir Richard Empſon and Mr. Dudley; but there is no proof at all to ſupport this, more eſpecially with reſpect to the latter, who ſeems to have entered into the management of ſuch affairs but a very few years before the King's death. The Noble Hiſtorian, who has ſo impartially written the hiſtory of Henry VII. ſpeaks clearly to this point; of which, if we conſider his profeſſion, he muſt be allowed a much better judge than any who have taken upon them to treat of the ſame ſubject. The King's cloſe and griping diſpoſition, he plainly admits, was the cauſe of all theſe rigorous proceedings; but he obſerves, that Cardinal Morton, Sir Reginald Bray, and ſome other Miniſters in the beginning of his reign, took much pains to bridle his avaricious diſpoſition; which, however, was not ſo underſtood by the people, who, meaſuring the merits of Miniſters by thoſe events which fell under their adminiſtration, attributed to them thoſe miſchiefs which, but for their interpoſition, had been far greater than they were. The wiſe Lord Bacon tells us, that, upon their demiſe, and the coming of Sir Richard Empſon and Edmund Dudley, Eſq. into the direction of theſe matters, the King made no account of them at all, farther than as they obeyed his orders, and carried all things as far as they would go, which Polydore Vergil, and other writers, ſay they did; and Lord Bacon alſo ſays much the ſame: and, if this be the truth, then they were ſtrictly and properly the King's inſtruments; but it may be with ſome diſtinction in their practices: for, if Dudley had been as guilty as Empſon, he might have been convicted for ſuch offences as he was; whereas the matter objected to him was treaſon. As to the other great men of this line, they are treated much in the ſame way, and writers give what colour they think fit to their actions; which make their characters uniform indeed, but in a way that will not ſatisfy impartial readers, who know that all actions may be ſet in different lights, and will therefore expect to be told, why they are ſet in one light rather than another. This, whenever it is in our power, we ſhew; and, when not, we content ourſelves with the bare matters of fact, knowing that even the greateſt men are inconſiſtent, and that there is no ſuch thing as gueſſing, with any degree of certainty, at their ſecret intentions. Laſtly, it is to be obſerved, that, when we ſpeak of rewards, honours, or offices, conferred for the wiſdom, fidelity, and great ſervices, of thoſe who receive them, we ſpeak commonly in

(o) Stowe's Annals, p. 487.

[I] We ſhall ſpeak of it at large in the notes.] Sir William Dugdale takes no notice at all of this gentleman's having two wives, and, indeed, I do not find any writer that mentions his having had iſſue by the firſt, except the manuſcript Baronage, which has been ſo often cited. Thence we learn that he married, firſt, Anne, Daughter of Sir Andrews Windſor, afterwards Lord Windſor, then the widow of Sir Roger Corbet, of Morton, in the County of Salop, by whom he had a daughter Elizabeth, who married William Lord Stourton (35). His ſecond wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Edward, Lord L'Iſle, and ſiſter and coheireſs to John Viſcount L'Iſle, by whom he had three ſons, John Dudley, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, of whom in the next article, Sir Andrews Dudley, Knight of the Garter, and Jerom Dudley, Eſq. concerning whom we know very little, excepting that he lived long in the family of his brother the Duke of Northumberland, and that he was provided for by the will of the Ducheſs. As to the Lady Elizabeth Grey, about five years after the deceaſe of her huſband Edmund Dudley, ſhe married Arthur Plantagenet, ſon to Edward IV. by Lady Elizabeth Lucy, who, in her right, upon the reſignation of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, who had married that lady's neice, was created Viſcount L'Iſle. By this noble perſon ſhe had three daughters; Bridget, married to Sir William Carden, Knight; Frances, who eſpouſed John Baſſet, Eſq. firſt, and afterwards Thomas Monk of Potheridge, in the County of Devon, Eſq. from whom deſcended George, created by King Charles II. Duke of Albemarle; and, laſtly, Elizabeth, the wife of Sir Francis Jobſon, Knight (36). C.

 [Notwithſtanding Polydore Vergil's aſſertion, we cannot help entertaining ſome doubt whether Edmund Dudley was ſworn of the King's Privy Council ſo early as in the twenty-third year of his age. This is an honour that has not uſually been conferred at any time upon ſo young a perſon, and much leſs at the period referred to, when the courſe of promotion was for the moſt part very ſlow. If the fact be true, Henry the Seventh muſt have diſcerned talents in Edmund Dudley uncommonly adapted to the purpoſes of arbitrary power. But it is more likely that Polydore Vergil ſhould be miſtaken; eſpecially when it is conſidered that the event muſt have happened in the firſt year of the King's Reign, when he could ſcarcely have had time to become acquainted with Dudley's eminent abilities.

Edmund Dudley's being one of thoſe who ſigned the ratification of the peace with France is ſaid plainly to ſhew, that he was a perſon in great credit with his country, as well as in high favour with his prince. But the fact does not warrant ſuch a concluſion. There are a thouſand inſtances to prove that a King may employ in a political tranſaction a Miniſter, who is far from being held in eſtimation by the people.

However abſurd might be ſome of the accuſations and ſome of the proceedings with regard to Edmund Dudley, it could never be juſtly aſſerted, as is done at the end of note G, that the attainder of him was founded rather in clamour than in juſtice. He was undoubtedly in the words of the grant, and mean thereby no more than to declare the cauſes expreſſed by the Royal Donor, without pretending to maintain that theſe were never miſtaken.

undoubtedly a profligate and infamous tool of royal oppreſſion, and as ſuch he deſerved the utmoſt ſeverity of the law. Dr. Campbell is much too favourable to his reputation. The doctor, inſtead of ſoftening Dudley's crimes, ſhould have more explicitly condemned them. The kind of apology, which the Biographer makes at the concluſion of the article, is more curious than ſatisfactory. "It is," ſays he, "to be obſerved, that, when we ſpeak of rewards, "honours, or offices, conferred for the wiſdom, fidelity, and great ſervices, of thoſe who receive them, "we ſpeak commonly in the words of the grant, and "mean thereby no more than to declare the cauſes "expreſſed by the royal donor, without pretending to "maintain that theſe were never miſtaken." But, if the language of grants and patents is to be admitted without reſtriction and heſitation, what will become of the truth of hiſtory?] K.

DUDLEY (JOHN), ſon of the former, Baron of Malpas, Viſcount L'Iſle, Earl of Warwick, and Duke of Northumberland; reputed, by many of our Hiſtorians, the moſt powerful ſubject that ever flouriſhed in this kingdom. He was born ſome time in the year 1502, when his father was in the very zenith of his power, and ſtood in equal credit with the King and his ſubjects, as appears by his being choſen, the year after, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons (a). At the time his father was put to death, this John, his eldeſt ſon, was about eight years old; and, it being well enough known that the ſeverity exerciſed in that act was rather to ſatisfy the people than juſtice, John Dudley, by Edmund Guilford, Eſq. of the body to the King, his Guardian, petitioned the Parliament that the attainder might be reverſed of Edmund Dudley, his late father, and himſelf reſtored in blood; which was accordingly obtained, and a ſpecial act paſſed for that purpoſe in 1511 (b). There is no reaſon to doubt, that all due care was taken of his education, by a mother equally diſtinguiſhed by her virtues and her quality, and by a guardian, who is celebrated for being one of the fineſt gentlemen in a court then eſteemed the politeſt in Europe (c). But, as to any particulars, hiſtorians are ſilent. When his mother, with the King's conſent, married Arthur Plantagenet, who, in her right, was created Viſcount L'Iſle (d), which was about the year 1523, we find that he was brought to court, and, being a young gentleman of a fine perſon, and highly accompliſhed, he attended the King's favourite, Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, in his expedition into France (e); where his gallant behaviour not only entitled him to the ſpecial notice of his noble General, but procured him alſo the honour of knighthood (f). It may be reaſonably preſumed, that, upon his return, he met with a kind reception at Court, having many relations in great favour: but it ſeems he truſted chiefly to his own abilities, and very wiſely attached himſelf to the King's firſt Miniſter, Cardinal Wolſey (g), whom he accompanied in his embaſſy to France, in the nineteenth year of that reign (h); and, making a proper uſe of the advantage which this afforded, entered, not long after, into the King's ſervice, as appears from a patent (i) granted him for the office of Maſter of the Armory of the Tower, with the allowance of a groom. His hopes at Court did not hinder him from attending to his concerns in the country, where he was very careful to improve his intereſt amongſt the gentry; and, in 1536, was Sheriff of Staffordſhire, where he lived hoſpitably, and had the good-will of his neighbours in a much greater degree than when he was exalted to a far ſuperior ſtation (k). About two years after this he entered himſelf of the ſociety of Gray's-Inn (l): but that he ever ſtudied the laws there, as his father did, ſeems to be very doubtful; though ſome authority might be brought to prove it (m). The Court was ſtill his home, and Wolſey his patron ſo long as he had power. He was alſo in great confidence with the next Prime Miniſter, Thomas Lord Cromwell; ſo that, upon the coming over of Lady Anne of Cleves, whom that ſtateſman had engaged the King to marry, when that Lord was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Eſſex and Great Chamberlain of England, he was made Maſter of the Horſe to the intended Queen (n). On the firſt of May 1539, he was the firſt of the challengers in the triumphant tournament held at Weſtminſter, in which he appeared with great magnificence (o) [A]. The fall of [A] In which he appeared with great magnificence.] We are told that this great man, who did not riſe overhaſtily at the beginning, took a great deal of pains to qualify himſelf for the King's ſervice; in order to which he made a tour to Italy, and remained ſome time at Rome: as with the like deſign he viſited France, by which means he became a very complete courtier, and capable of employments of very different kinds (1). In this, which was to make way for his future honours, he, to pleaſe the King, accepted an office in the houſehold of a Queen who was not likely to enjoy that honour long, it being well enough known in the Court, that the King had not married her from affection but from policy (2). This tournament, in which he made the principal figure, had been proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spain, for all comers to try their proweſs againſt the Engliſh challengers, who were Sir John Dudley, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Thomas Poynings, Sir George Carew, Knights; Anthony Kingſton, and Richard Cromwell, Eſquires. They came into the liſts upon May-day, preceded by a band of Knights and Gentlemen, all dreſſed in white velvet: the furniture of their horſes was of the ſame, but the challengers themſelves were very richly dreſſed. The firſt day there were forty-ſix defendants, amongſt whom were the Earl of Surrey, Lord William Howard, Lord Clinton, and Lord Cromwell, ſon to the Prime-Miniſter, who was a little before created Earl of Eſſex. Sir John Dudley, by ſome miſchance of his horſe, had the misfortune to be overthrown by one Mr. Breme; but, however, he mounted again and performed very gallantly. After this was over, the challengers rode in ſtate to Durham-houſe, where they entertained the King, Queen, and Court. On the ſecond of May, Anthony Kingſton and Richard Cromwell were made Knights; on the third, of the Earl of Eſſex, which happened ſoon after, did not in the leaſt affect the favour or the fortune of Sir John Dudley, who had a very great dexterity in maintaining himſelf in the good graces of powerful miniſters, without embarking too far in their deſigns (p), preſerving always a proper regard for the ſentiments of his ſovereign, which kept him in full credit at Court in the midſt of many changes, as well of men as of meaſures. It was owing to this wiſe conduct of his, as well as to his ſplendid manner of living and great liberality, not only to the extent but beyond the limits of his eſtate, that he never wanted friends to ſolicit in his behalf, and to excite, in his royal maſter, a juſt attention to his ſervices (q). This very clearly appeared ſoon after the death of his father-in-law, when the King, by letters patent, bearing date the twelfth of March 1542, raiſed him to the dignity of Viſcount L'Iſle (r), with very ſingular marks of his eſteem and conſideration [B]. At the next feſtival of St. George, he was alſo elected Knight of the Garter (s). This was ſoon after followed by a much higher inſtance, both of kindneſs and truſt; indeed, ſuch an inſtance as had ſcarcely any example in former times, and has not been conſidered as a precedent fit to follow in thoſe that have ſucceeded ſince; for, the King, conſidering his prudence, his courage, and his activity, as well as the occaſion he had, and was like to have, for a man of ſuch talents in that office, conſtituted him Lord High-Admiral of England for life (t). The next year he commanded a fleet of two hundred ſail, with which he proceeded to the Scotch coaſts, where he performed all the ſervice that was expected from him, and, having landed his forces, marched through the ſouthern provinces of Scotland by land, and moſt effectually reſtored the tranquillity of the marches (u) [C]. He next embarked for France, and, on the twenty-eighth of July, 1543, appeared before Boulogne, then beſieged by King Henry VIII. in perſon, and, by his great diligence and courage, facilitated very much the taking of the place, of which the King left him the charge, with the title of his Lieutenant (w). In this important employment he did more than his maſter had reaſon to expect, and as much as the nation or himſelf could deſire [D].

hird, the challengers fought on horſeback with ſwords againſt twenty-nine defendants; Sir John Dudley and the Earl of Surrey running firſt with equal advantage. On the fifth of May they fought on foot at the barriers againſt thirty defendants. In the courſe of theſe military diverſions, the challengers, at a vaſt expence, entertained both Houſes of Parliament, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and their wives, and all the perſons of diſtinction then in town, as a reward for which, the King gave to each of them a houſe and a hundred marks a year for ever, out of the revenues of the Knights of Rhodes, which had been given to his Majeſty by the Parliament then ſitting (3).

[B] Of his eſteem and conſideration.] We have before obſerved, that, upon the marriage of Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Viſcount L'Iſle, and widow of Edmund Dudley, Eſq. to Sir Arthur Plantagenet, he was raiſed to that dignity, which was limited to his heirs male by that lady, in prejudice of her children by the firſt marriage: but he dying in the Tower on the third of March 1542 (4), it was repreſented to the King that this honour naturally deſcended to Sir John Dudley, to which therefore he was advanced by patent (5), in conſideration (as the preamble ſets forth) not only of the acceptable and laudable ſervices of his beloved and faithful ſubject, Sir John Dudley, Knight, variouſly done, but alſo his vigilance, foreſight, faithfulneſs, valour, and illuſtrious deſcent: to hold the ſaid title to him and the heirs male of his body, and to enjoy ſeat and place in Parliament among the Viſcounts of this realm of England, and in all other the King's dominions, with a grant of an annuity of twenty marks, payable half yearly out of the revenues of the counties of Warwick and Leiceſter, by the Sheriffs of the ſaid counties.

[C] The tranquillity of the marches.] We find the Lord Viſcount L'Iſle, from the time of his being promoted to the great office of Lord High-Admiral, commonly mentioned, by that title, in all our hiſtories. It is plain enough, that he had ſerved with reputation at ſea, before he obtained that honour, ſince we are told, by a perſon who attended him in all his expeditions, that he boarded and took the Admiral of Sluys, fighting her ſhip to ſhip (6). In this expedition to Scotland, he had a fleet of two hundred ſail, on board of which, at Newcaſtle, he embarked an army of ten thouſand men: on the fourth of May, 1544, he landed the troops about four miles from Leith, whence they marched to Edinburgh, the Lord-Admiral commanding the van-guard, and the Earl of Hertford the main battle (7): the former had the credit of routing the Scots, and of forcing the principal gate of Edinburgh, into which, he was the firſt man that entered (8): the fleet alſo did infinite miſchief, ruining the ſea-coaſts, and taking all the ſhips which the Scots had in thoſe parts, particularly the Salamander, a very fine ſhip of war, preſented by the French King to his ſon-in-law King James, at the time of his marriage: and the Unicorn, built by order of the King of Scots. The fleet quitted Leith on the 15th of May, after ſpoiling the port, deſtroying the pier, burning the town, ruining the towns and villages on each ſide the river, as high as Stirling, and ſinking every veſſel, great and ſmall, that they did not carry away. The land army, in its return, proceeded with the ſame rigour, and in our hiſtories there is a long liſt of places, by the ruin of which their rout was diſtinguiſhed (9). This was, in execution of the King's orders: afterwards, it ſeems his hiſtorian thought of it in another light, when he ſaid, we did on that occaſion too much for lovers, and for conquerors, too little (10).

[D] As the nation or himſelf could deſire.] The ſiege of Boulogne, was formed on the 19th of July by the Duke of Suffolk. The King came to the camp in perſon on the 26th; and the Lord Admiral arrived there on the 28th of the ſame month, where he encamped the neareſt the town of any of the King's forces. In this ſiege, he was preſent in moſt of the attacks, and had there the misfortune to loſe his eldeſt ſon. The place was ſurrendered on the 14th. of Sept. and, on the 18th, the King made his public entry into it, and, ſoon after, delivered the keys of the place to the Lord-Admiral, with the title of Governor; and, upon his embarking for England on the 30th of the ſame month, declared him his Lieutenant-General (11). The Dauphin being not far off, with an army of upwards of 50,000 men, he firſt formed a deſign of retaking the place by ſiege; and afterwards, on the 9th of October, attempted it by ſurpriſe, in which, through the vigilance care, and courage of the Lord-Admiral and his garriſon, the French were repulſed, with the loſs of 800 men of their beſt troops; and this, all our writers allow (12) to have been one of the gallanteſt actions performed in that war, none of the breaches being repaired, and the place in a manner open. On the 1ſt of February following, the Lord-Admiral, ſallying out of Boulogne with a ſmall body of horſe and foot, attacked a much ſuperior corps of French forces, under the command of Monſ. de Beiz, forced them to retire precipitately, and made themſelves maſters of twelve pieces of cannon (13).

On the twenty-ſeventh of March, 1646, the King declared him, by patent, Lieutenant-General, and commander of all his forces at ſea (x), for the more effectual carrying on of the war againſt France; and this at a time when the French, by the help of money, and alliances with the maritime powers of Europe, had drawn together a very great naval force, and threatened to make the Engliſh feel the weight of it, not only at ſea, but by covering an invaſion, which they had long meditated; all which vaſt deſigns were fruſtrated by the courage and conduct of the Lord Viſcount L'Iſle, with a force much inferior to theirs (y). After this the Lord High-Admiral returned their viſit, landed five thouſand men upon their coaſts, burnt the town of Treport, and ſome other villages; and the French army advancing offered them battle, which they declined; and he thereupon reimbarked his troops, having, in this expedition, loſt only a ſingle man, and done infinite miſchief to the enemy (z) [E]. The ſame year he was, together with Dr. Cuthbert Tonſtall, Biſhop of Durham, and Dr. Nicolas Wotton, Dean of Canterbury and York, appointed a Commiſſioner to take the oath of Francis the French King, for obſerving the treaty of peace ſigned June 7th, 1546 (a); which he performed with great ſolemnity. On the ſixteenth of October following, he was, together with many other perſons of rank, named in a commiſſion for ſettling accompts of the army. This was one of the laſt ſervices he performed in the reign of that great Prince, to whom he owed all his honours and fortune, receiving from him, towards the cloſe of his reign, very large grants of church-lands, which delivered him from the inconveniences that muſt otherwiſe have enſued from his unbounded generoſity; which grants, however, created him many enemies (b) [F]. The King's health daily declining, his Majeſty made the beſt proviſion he could for the ſafety and quiet of his ſon's reign; in order to which he cauſed his laſt will and teſtament to be framed, with much deliberation, by the ableſt and wiſeſt of his counſellors, which he ſealed and ſubſcribed December 30th, 1546 (c); and therein, as the laſt mark of his affection and truſt, he named Sir John Dudley, Lord Viſcount L'Iſle, one of his ſixteen executors, and gave him alſo a legacy of five hundred pounds, which was the higheſt that he beſtowed upon any of them (d). By this will they were conſtituted Privy Counſellors, and had the government put into their hands, which gave them a legal authority, ſince this will was founded upon act of Parliament (e). On the laſt day of the month of January ſucceeding, King Henry VIII. died, and his ſon Edward VI. ſucceeded him, to the general joy and ſatisfaction of the nation (f). It was not long before great alterations were made in the diſpoſitions by the late King's will; which alterations were, in truth, the ſource of all the miſchiefs that followed. The Earl of Hertford, who was the King's uncle, and, by that near relation, in very great credit about his perſon, thought that ſufficient regard had not been ſhewn to him, by the bare nomination to a ſeat in the Council, among ſo many, where, at firſt, he did not perceive that he was like to have any precedency. He therefore preſſed to be declared Protector, that the ſtate might have ſome viſible head; to which, very probably, from their own views, the major part of the Council yielded, much againſt the will of the Lord Chancellor Wriotheſly, who ſhewed, that this was departing entirely from the will of Henry VIII. which was the legal rule they had (g). The Protector ſoon after took from him the ſeals, and thought of nothing ſo much as how to eſtabliſh his own power. It is indeed reported, by many writers, that he was excited to theſe ſteps by a wiſer man than himſelf, by [E] And done infinite miſchief to the enemy.] The French King, at an immenſe expence, hired, from ſeveral of the Italian powers, what in thoſe days was accounted a very large fleet. It conſiſted of upwards of two hundred ſail of all ſorts, beſides galleys; which, however, met with an accident when it firſt put to ſea, one of their beſt ſhips, of the burthen of eight hundred ton, taking fire (14). Between Alderney and Guernſey, their galleys attacked the Lord Admiral, who, had but a ſmall ſquadron with him, bending all their endeavours to take his own ſhip; which, however, he defended ſo well againſt eighteen of thoſe veſſels at once, that they were at length glad to retire (15). The whole French fleet appearing before St. Helen's, and making a ſhow of attempting ſomething upon the coaſt, the Admiral advanced, with his ſmall fleet of ſixty ſail; but after exchanging ſome ſhot, the French retired. The Engliſh fleet being then reinforced, and taking ſome troops on-board, offered them battle again, forced them to retire to their own coaſts, where they were ſpectators of thoſe miſchiefs done by the Engliſh (16), which are briefly mentioned in the text. All theſe tranſactions happened between the beginning of June, and the end of Auguſt, 1545.

[F] Which grants, however, created him many enemies.] The Abbey of Hales-Owen, in Shropſhire, dedicated to the Bleſſed Virgin and St. John the Evangeliſt; which, at the diſſolution, had lands of the annual value of three hundred thirty-ſeven pounds, fifteen-ſhillings and ſix-pence, according to Speed, was granted to Sir John Dudley by King Henry VIII. in the thirtieth year of his reign (17): the hoſpital of Burton Lazars, in Leiceſterſhire, which was the largeſt foundation of that kind in England, being valued, both according to Dugdale and Speed, at the annual rent of two-hundred ſixty-five pounds, ten ſhillings, was granted to the Lord L'Iſle, by the ſame monarch, in the thirty-ſixth year of his reign (18): the manor of Choſel, near Ringſtead, in the County of Norfolk, was about the ſame time granted to him, as being annexed to the hoſpital beforementioned: by the ſame grant he acquired the hoſpital of St. Giles's (19), without the Bar of the Old Temple, London. The ſame King, in the thirty-ſeventh year of his reign, granted to John Dudley, Lord Viſcount L'Iſle, and Lord High-Admiral of England, as well in conſideration of his ſervice as for the ſum of one thouſand pounds ſterling, the ſite, circuit, and precinct of the hoſpital, or priory of St. John of Jeruſalem (20), only the lead, bells, timber, ſtone, glaſs, and iron, and other things of the church, were ſpecially reſerved to the King's Majeſty. I have likewiſe ſeen accounts of ſome other ſmall grants, with which I will not trouble the reader.

whom they mean the Lord Viſcount L'Iſle (h); but of this, as there is no evidence, ſo in truth there is not much probability. Amongſt the firſt of the Protector's projects, one was, to get his brother, Sir Thomas Seymour, made High-Admiral, in whoſe favour the Lord Viſcount L'Iſle reſigned, not willingly (i) to be ſure, but upon the beſt terms he could make. Accordingly, February 17, 1547, the very ſame day that the new Lord Admiral's patent paſſed, he was created Earl of Warwick, and made Great Chamberlain of England; neither was it long before he had great grants from the crown, particularly Warwick Caſtle and Manor (k). This has occaſioned ſeveral writers to repreſent the promotions made, and titles conferred about this time, as proceeding from his intrigues; whereas, in truth, he had a title by deſcent to the Earldom of Warwick. King Henry VIII. intended to have created him Earl of Coventry (l); and the new King's coronation made it natural to do ſomething extraordinary to grace it. The Duke of Somerſet, Lord Protector, finding himſelf under a neceſſity of marching an army into Scotland, reſolved to command it in perſon, and took the Earl of Warwick with him, in quality of his Lieutenant-General (m). In this expedition he added to that reputation which he had already acquired, as even his enemies themſelves confeſs, being the chief author of that victory which was then obtained, and would alſo have puſhed the war to a glorious concluſion, if he had been intruſted with the ſole command. As it was, his conduct was univerſally commended, and all the blame fell elſewhere (n) [G]. He was next employed by the Duke of Somerſet, Lord Protector, in [G] And all the blame fell elſewhere.] Sir John Hayward, who took upon him to write the hiſtory of this reign, was no friend at all to the noble perſon who is the ſubject of this article, and yet he allows him all the honour of this expedition. We will firſt give the reader a ſhort character of the Earl of Warwick as he has drawn it, and afterwards ſome other paſſages, which will fully juſtify what we have advanced in the text (21). 'The Earl of Warwick,' ſays he, 'was a man of antient nobility, comely in ſtature 'and countenance, but of little gravity or abſtinence 'in pleaſures, yea ſometimes almoſt diſſolute, which 'was not much regarded, if, in a time when vices be'gan to grow into faſhion, a great man was not over 'ſevere. He was of a great ſpirit and highly aſpiring, 'not forbearing to make any miſchief the means of 'attaining his ambitious ends. Hereto his good wit 'and pleaſant ſpeeches were altogether ſerviceable, 'having the art alſo by empty promiſes and threats to 'draw others to his purpoſe. In matters of arms he 'was both ſkilful and induſtrious, and, as well in fore'ſight as reſolution, preſent and great. To ſay truth, 'for enterprizes by arms he was the minion of that 'time, ſo as few things he attempted but he atchieved 'with honour, which made him more proud and am'bitious when he had done. He generally increaſed 'both in eſtimation with the King, and authority 'among the nobility, doubtful, whether by fatal de'ſtiny to the ſtate, or whether by his virtues, or at leaſt 'by his appearances of virtues.' After this character, the ſame author proceeds to give us the following relation (22): 'As the Engliſh directed their way to'wards the place where they underſtood the Scots aſ'ſembled, they came to a river called Lynne, croſſed 'with a bridge of ſtone. The horſemen and carriages 'paſſed through the water, the footmen over the 'bridge, which, becauſe it was narrow, the army 'was long in ſetting over. The avaunt-guard marched 'forth, and the battail followed; but, as the rear was 'paſſing over, a thick miſt did ariſe. The Earl of 'Warwick, having before eſpied certain plumps of 'Scottiſh horſemen in ranging the field, returned to'wards the rear, to prevent ſuch danger as the thick'neſs of the miſt, the nearneſs of the enemy, and the 'diſarray occaſioned by the narrowneſs of the bridge, 'might caſt upon them. The Scots conjecturing, as 'it was, that ſome perſonage of honour ſtayed to have 'a view of the rear, called to the Engliſh to know if 'any Nobleman were near, for that one whom they 'named, well known to be of honourable condition, 'would preſent himſelf to the General, in caſe he 'might ſafely be conducted. Certain young ſoldiers, 'not uſed to ſuch trains, made raſh and ſudden an'ſwer, That the Earl of Warwick was near, under 'whoſe protection he might be aſſured. Hereupon 'they paſſed the water, placed two hundred of their 'prickers behind a hillock, and, with forty more, 'caſt about to find the Earl. Now the Earl eſpying 'ſix or ſeven of them ſcattered near the army, and 'taking them to be of the Engliſh, ſent one to com'mand them to their array, and to that end himſelf 'rode an eaſy pace towards them, followed only with 'ten or twelve on horſeback. He, that had been ſent 'before, was ſo heedleſs either to obſerve or advertiſe 'what they were, that the Earl did not diſcover them 'to be enemies until he was in the midſt among them. 'Certainly a Commander ſhould not careleſsly caſt 'himſelf into danger: but when, either upon neceſ'ſity or miſadventure he falleth into it, it much ad'vanceth both his reputation and enterprize if brave'ly he behave himſelf. Now, the Earl, eſpying where 'he was, gave ſo rude a charge upon a Captain of the 'Scots, named Dandy Care, that he forced him to 'turn, and chaced him above twelve ſcore at the lance's 'point. Herewith the reſidue retired deceitfully to'wards the place of their ambuſh, from whence iſſued 'about ſixty more. Then the Earl gathered his ſmall 'company about him, and, with good countenance, 'maintained the fight. But the enemy in the end, 'whether perceiving ſome ſuccours advancing from 'the army where the alarm was then taken, or whe'ther intending to draw the Engliſh further into their 'ambuſh, turned away an eaſy pace. The Earl for'bad his men from following, fearing a greater am'buſh behind the hill, as in truth there was. At his 'return he was received with great applauſe by the 'Engliſh ſoldiers, for that he did ſo well acquit him'ſelf in the danger, whereunto, by error and not 'by raſhneſs, he had been carried. One of his men 'was ſlain; another hurt in the buttock; a third, 'named Vane, ſo grievouſly hewn, that many thou'ſands have died of leſs than half his hurts, whereof, 'notwithſtanding, he was cured afterwards. Of the 'Scots three were taken priſoners, and preſented to 'the General by the Earl.' When a challenge was brought, in the name of the Earl of Huntley, to the Lord Protector, the Earl of Warwick told the trumpeter, that he would undertake that Lord, and give give him a thouſand crowns reward upon his bringing news that his offer was accepted (23). In the battle of Muſſleborough, fought Sept. 10, which was one of the greateſt defeats the Scots ever received, the victory was the pure effects of the courage and conduct of the Earl of Warwick. The Lord Grey began the battle, contrary to his orders, and, being ſoundly beaten, had like to have thrown all into confuſion; but the Earl of Warwick ſtood firm, though very much expoſed, and, giving his orders with great preſence of mind, recovered all, and drove the Scots out of the field. What little was done afterwards was by his command, and the execution of it truſted to his brother, Sir Andrews Dudley (24). But the Protector had his reaſons for returning as ſoon as poſſible to London; and Biſhop Burnet ſays, that the Earl of Warwick was not diſpleaſed with that, becauſe he ſaw it would leſſen the Duke's reputation; which is a conjecture only, and ought in conjunction with many other honourable perſons, to compromiſe matters with the French, who, after the death of King Henry, were very deſirous of getting Boulogne again into their hands (o), which it was of great conſequence to the Protector to prevent, and yet to avoid, if poſſible, engaging in a war; both which ends were effected for the preſent; to which the induſtry and authority of the Earl of Warwick did not a little contribute (p). It was this activity of his in buſineſs, which was generally attended with ſucceſs, that chiefly recommended him to the Protector Somerſet, who certainly had much ſlowneſs and timidity in his nature, which made him admire men of quick parts and ſolid abilities, whoſe advice he uſed from time to time, but more eſpecially liſtened to the counſels of Warwick, Sir William Paget, who was Secretary, and Sir William Cecil, who afterwards enjoyed the ſame place (q). Happy had it been for him, if he had conſtantly followed their opinions. But it ſo fell out, that, without regarding the feebleneſs of the government, he perſiſted in a war with Scotland, which was very indifferently managed, aſſumed the direction of affairs at home entirely to himſelf, undertook too many great enterprizes at once, which unluckily croſſed one another, and, by degrees, brought all into confuſion (r), His own brother, the Lord Admiral, entered into ſtrange practices againſt him, which occaſioned great diſturbance in the Court. But there is no ſign that the Earl of Warwick had any correſpondence with him, but, on the contrary, diſcountenanced his proceedings, and, in appearance at leaſt, ſupported the cauſe of the Duke of Somerſet, who, after temporizing a long time, cauſed the Lord Admiral, in the end, to be attainted by Parliament, and executed (s). In the midſt of theſe troubles, the common people in moſt parts of the kingdom, as is uſual when any ſtate is diſtracted by factions, began to grow mutinous and diſobedient, and, at laſt, broke out into inſurrections (t). The Protector Somerſet permitted theſe to grow to a great head, either from an unwillingneſs to ſhed the blood of his countrymen, for he was certainly a man of a mild and merciful diſpoſition, or that he might gain time to bring in foreign troops, which he might have afterwards at his own diſpoſal. In Devonſhire they grew ſo ſtrong, that they beſieged the city of Exeter, and, before they could be reduced by the Lord Ruſſell, a new rebellion broke out in Norfolk, under the command of one Robert Ket, a tanner, who was very ſoon at the head of ten thouſand men (u). The ſwiftneſs of their progreſs excited a commotion in Yorkſhire; and, in both places, the rebels went upon levelling principles, thought of nothing but pulling down the nobility, and changing the conſtitution at their fancy. This was an evil not to be trifled with; and therefore an army of ſix thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe, which was to have been employed againſt the Scots, received orders to march towards the rebels, under the command of John Earl of Warwick, whoſe known military abilities rendered him fitteſt for this ſervice. He preſerved Norwich with ſome difficulty, and afterwards fought with the rebels, who, both in drawing up their men, and in the courſe of the action, behaved much better than could have been expected from ſuch raw ſoldiers (w). The Earl, however, defeated them, and killed about a thouſand men; other writers ſay many more. This greatly diſcouraged, but did not diſſipate, them: on the contrary, they collected all their ſcattered parties, and offered him battle a ſecond time. The Earl marched directly towards them, but, when he was on the very point of engaging, he ſent them a meſſage, "That he was ſorry to ſee ſo "much courage expreſſed in ſo bad a cauſe; but that, notwithſtanding what was paſſed, "they might depend upon the King's pardon on delivering up of their leaders;" to which they anſwered, "That he was a nobleman of ſo much worth and generoſity, that, "if they might have the aſſurance from his own mouth, they were willing to ſub-"mit (x)." The Earl accordingly went amongſt them, upon which they threw down their arms, delivered up Robert Ket and his brother William, with the reſt of their chiefs, who were hanged; upon hearing which the Yorkſhire rebels diſperſed, and ſo all was quiet again (y). This rebellion being ſuppreſſed in the ſummer, the Lords of the King's Council, amongſt whom was the Earl of Warwick, began in the autumn to confer amongſt themſelves, as to the cauſes of that diſtreſſed and diſcontented ſtate into which the nation was reduced. The Protector, upon this, ſent Secretary Petre to know the meaning of their meetings, whom they kept with them; and, October 8th, 1549, they went into the city, where, having acquainted the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, that they had no other views than for the ſafety of the King's perſon, the redreſs of grievances, and the reſtoring the peace of the kingdom, the city thank-ought to be conſidered as ſuch, and not at all eſteemed a fact, ſince there is no evidence to ſupport it (25). At that time the Protector had ſo good an opinion of the Earl of Warwick, that he left him behind in the North to treat with the Scots, which proved indeed a thing of no conſequence, as the Scots never intended to treat, but made that propoſal to the Duke of Somerſet only to gain time; as the Duke accepted it becauſe it afforded him a fair pretence for returning into England (26). It has little or no relation to the Earl of Warwick's character, whether this war was wiſely or imprudently entered into; ſince it is univerſally acknowledged, that he diſcharged the truſt repoſed in him with great capacity, hazarded his perſon freely, and, by a right application of his military ſkill, gained a glorious victory, which procured him, at that time, what he certainly deſerved, a very great and high reputation.

fully concurred with them; upon which the Protector, who had removed the King from Hampton-Court to Windsor, submitted himself, and was sent prisoner to the Tower on the 28th of the same month (z). The Earl of Warwick was again made Lord High-Admiral, by the King's letters patent, with very extensive powers (a). At this time, it is said, the Papists had some hopes that he would favour their religion; but, whether as a Politician he gave them any grounds for these hopes, whether they took them up without grounds, or whether, as others had done, he altered his system when he came into power, certain it is that he adhered steadily to the reformation, and, shortly after, procured the removal of some who differed in opinion from him in that and many other respects (b) [H]. He stood, at this time, so high in the King's favour, and had settled so firm a friendship with the rest of the Lords of the Council, that nothing was done but by his advice or consent; to which, therefore, we must attribute the release of the Duke of Somerset out of the Tower, and restoring him to some share of power and favour at Court. The King was much pleased with this, and, being desirous that the friendship of these two great men should not be barely in appearance, a marriage was proposed between the eldest son of the Earl of Warwick and the Lady Anne Seymour, daughter to the Duke of Somerset; which, at length, was brought to bear, and, on the third of June, 1550, was solemnized in the King's presence, who expressed great satisfaction thereat (c). The King's favour to him still continued, or rather increased, so that upon his surrendering the office of Lord High-Chamberlain of England, which was bestowed upon the Marquis of Northampton, the King was pleased to make him Lord Steward of his Household, by Letters Patents (d), not only expressive of his Majesty's affection and esteem, but containing also some other matters that deserve the reader's notice [I]. In the month of April, 1551, he was constituted Earl-Marshal

[H] In that and many other respects.] If we consider the removal of the Lord Protector Somerset from the government, as it is stated by Stowe and other plain writers, it will appear that the far greatest part of the King's Council concurred in that measure, and offered very plausible reasons for their so doing (27). Sir John Hayward is very clear, that the whole was a contrivance of the Earl of Warwick's, that the rest were but his tools, and that the articles objected against the Protector were invented to make him odious (28). It is very true, that when the Council met to take this bold step of pulling down the King's uncle, it was at Ely-house, where the Earl of Warwick then resided; yet it no where appears that he was at the head of this business; nor indeed could he be, when the Lord Chancellor Rich, and the Lord St. John, who was President of the Council, were at all the consultations. The articles against the Protector are extant in our histories: there is nothing in them of black and heinous crimes, but of presumption, overbearing, and high indiscretions; many of the facts in them were notoriously known, and the Duke of Somerset confessed them in his submission (29). When the Lords went to the King to justify their complaints, the Earl of Warwick went not with them, which Sir John Hayward says was a piece of craft; it might be so, and it might also be the effects of tenderness and modesty. He was appointed by the Council one of the Lords to attend upon the King's person, which was a great honour, but then he shared it with five others (30). Sir John Hayward speaks much of his secret conferences with the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, and affirms, that, not being able to work these great Peers to serve his purposes, he got them both excluded from the Council. Bishop Burnet is of quite another opinion: he suggests, that the Papists were in hopes of making some great advantage by this notable change in the government, because they were sure of the other two Earls, and had a favourable opinion of Warwick (31). But it seems he was a very great politician: he saw that the King was a firm Protestant, and perhaps he made it a rule with him to be of the religion of the Crown; so that it is very likely his conferences with Arundel and Southampton might be upon this subject, Whether it was best to stop the reformation of religion, or to promote it? and there is nothing more certain than that in this they differed, that the two Earls were for the old Popish road: but the Earl of Warwick was for marching in the King's high-way; and therefore it is no wonder that he procured their exclusion from Councils, in which he was determined to lead, and knew very well they were not inclined to follow (32). In all this he acted like a great Statesman, though perhaps not upon virtuous or religious principles. Whatever censures he may deserve for this must light upon him in common with many others; for, few Statesmen are very remarkable for a steady adherence to any thing but their own interest; and, if his happened at this time to concur with the true interest of his country, he was so much the less to blame.

[I] That deserve the reader's notice.] These letters patent bear date, February 20, 1550, in the fourth of Edward VI (33), wherein the King recites, 'That 'whereas Henry VIII. late King of England, granted 'to his most beloved cousin and chancellor, Charles, 'late Duke of Suffolk, deceased, the office of Lord 'Steward of the Household, by the name of Great 'Master of the Household, or the Great Master of the 'King's Household: and whereas, by Act of Parliament, in May 22, Hen. VIII. it was enacted, that, 'during the time the late Duke of Suffolk, and his 'successors in the said office, should enjoy the said 'post of Lord Steward, they should be called Lord 'Steward of the King's Household, as by the said 'Act appears. That, attributing much to the loyalty, wisdom, and virtue, of his beloved cousin and 'counsellor, John, Earl of Warwick, &c. and having always experienced his constancy in the Christian 'Religion, his valour in war, sedition, and riots; 'his friendly and faithful inclination towards him, 'and desiring his abode and residence in his palace, 'and attendance on his royal person: By advice of his 'Privy-Council, he grants to the said Earl of War'wick the office of Lord or Great Master of his 'Household for life, with all fees, wages, &c. as the 'said Duke of Suffolk, Earl of Wiltshire, or any 'Steward of the King's Household, held, or enjoyed: 'and commands, that the said Earl of Warwick have 'his Letters Patent, without fine or fee, great or 'small, to his use to be paid.' At this time he was looked upon as so warm a Protestant, that the most zealous divines had recourse to his favour and protection; amongst the rest, Dr. Hooper, appointed about that time Bishop of Gloucester, who scrupled much the wearing the episcopal habit, and for whom the Earl, out of respect to the tenderness of his conscience, actually interposed; but afterwards, when the Earl became better acquainted with the state of the question, and was made sensible of the consequences that might follow from indulging such a singularity in sentiments, he withdrew his protection, and Dr. Hooper was forced to submit (34). On the other hand, though it is certain, that Dr. Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, wrote him a letter of compliment after the fall of the Protector, yet he never shewed him any countenance, nor did he give the least opposition to his being deprived of the rich Bishoprick of Winchester, Marſhal of England (e): but whereas a certain Hiſtorian ſays, that he was joined in an embaſſy with William Marquis of Northampton to the French King, about the ſame time (f), it is clearly a miſtake; ſince it appears, from unexceptionable authority, that it was his ſon, the Lord Viſcount L'Iſle. On the 15th of Auguſt the ſame year, Sir Robert Dudley, one of the Earl's younger ſons, was ſworn one of the ſix ordinary Gentlemen of the Chamber (g). A ſhort time afterwards the Earl of Warwick was made Lord-Warden of the Northern Marches (h); and, on the 11th of October the ſame year, he was advanced to the dignity of Duke of Northumberland (i), at the ſame time that the Marquis of Dorſet was created Duke of Suffolk. In a few days after theſe promotions, the conſpiracy of the Duke of Somerſet, as it was called, broke out, being betrayed by Sir Thomas Palmer. The Duke, his Ducheſs, and ſeveral other perſons, were ſent priſoners to the Tower; and the King, being perſuaded that he had really formed a deſign to murder the Duke of Northumberland, reſolved to leave him to the law (k). Accordingly, on the 1ſt of December, he was brought to his trial in Weſtminſter-Hall, where the Duke of Northumberland, which was very indecent, ſat as one of his Judges (l). He was acquitted of the treaſon, but found guilty of the felony, upon a ſtatute made in the third year of that reign, received ſentence of death, and, on the 22d of January following, was executed upon Tower-hill; which many conſidered as an effect of the potent Duke of Northumberland's reſentment (m) [K]. About this time, or rather a little before, he was elected Chancellor of Cambridge cheſter, when he knew that Archbiſhop Cranmer, conſidered it as a thing neceſſary to the peace of the Church (35). [K] Of the potent Duke of Northumberland's reſentment.] This buſineſs of the Duke of Somerſet's death is very warily related in our old chronicles, more eſpecially thoſe written neareſt the time; yet, in one of theſe (36), we have the following account. "Sir Edward Seymour, Duke of Somerſet, was again apprehended and caſt into the Tower of London, by means of Sir John Dudley, lately made Duke of Northumberland, at this time of great authority in the realm. It was laid to the Duke of Somerſet's charge, that he purpoſed, and went about, the death of the Duke of Northumberland, being one of the Privy-Council, and therefore, by ſtatute, was guilty both of treaſon and felony. Of this he was after arraigned at Weſtminſter, and by his peers acquitted of treaſon, but condemned of felony. At this time many of the people rejoiced, being perſuaded, that the King's uncle ſhould never be put to death for felony, and thereby, thought he ſhould have eſcaped: but he was had again to the Tower, and there kept until he was brought out to his death." Sir John Hayward, according to his uſual cuſtom, charges it roundly upon the Duke of Northumberland, as if he conſpired againſt the Duke of Somerſet, and not that Duke againſt him: he relates the matter thus (37). "The Duke of Northumberland, being now inferior unto none of the nobility in title of honour, and ſuperior to all in authority and power, could not reſtrain his haughty hopes from aſpiring to an abſolute command. But, before he would directly level at his mark, the Duke of Somerſet was thought fit to be taken away, whoſe credit was ſo great with the common people, that, although it ſuffered not to bear out any bad attempt of his own, yet was it of force to croſs the evil purpoſes of others. And now, to begin the third act of this tragedy, ſpeeches were caſt, that he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed King in divers countries; which albeit they were known to be falſe, inſomuch as the Miller's ſervant at Battle-bridge, in Southwark, loſt both his ears upon a pillory for ſo reporting; yet, the very naming of him to be King, either as deſired by himſelf, or by others eſteemed worthy, brought with it a diſtaſteful reliſh, apt to apprehend ſuſpicion to be true. After this, he was charged to have perſuaded divers of the nobility to chuſe him Protector at the next Parliament. The Duke being queſtioned, neither held ſilence as he might, nor conſtantly denied it, but entangled himſelf in his doublful tale. One Whaley, a buſy-headed man, and deſirous to be ſet on work, gave firſt light to this appeachment, but

"the Earl of Rutland did ſtoutly avouch it. Herewith, Sir Thomas Palmer, a man neither loving the Duke of Somerſet, nor beloved of him, was brought by the Duke of Northumberland to the King, being in his garden. Here he declared, that, upon St. George's day laſt, the Duke of Somerſet, being upon a journey towards the North, in caſe Sir William Herbert, Maſter of the Horſe, had not aſſured him, that he ſhould receive no harm, would have raiſed the people; and that he had ſent the Lord Grey before, to know who would be his friends: alſo, that the Duke of Northumberland, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Pembroke, and other Lords, ſhould be invited to a banquet, and, if they came with a bare company, to be ſet upon by the way; if ſtrongly, their heads ſhould have been cut off at the place of their feaſting. He declared further, that Sir Ralph Vane had two thouſand men in readineſs; that Sir Thomas Arundel had aſſured the Tower; that Seymour and Hammond would wait upon him, and that all the horſe of the Gendarmerie ſhould be ſlain. To this Mr. Secretary Cecil added, that the Duke had ſent for him, and ſaid, that he ſuſpected ſome ill meaning againſt him, whereto Mr. Secretary anſwered, that, if he were not in fault, he might truſt to his innocency, if he were, he had nothing to ſay but to lament him. The Duke being advertiſed of theſe informations againſt him by ſome, who had ſome regard to honeſty, did forthwith defy the Secretary by his letters. Then he ſent for Sir Thomas Palmer, to underſtand what he had reported of him, who denied all that he had ſaid; but, by this hot and harmonious ſtriving, he did but draw the knots more faſt." We have this account afterwards repeated, and a little diverſified, in ſpeaking of the Duke's trial, ſentence, and execution. Biſhop Burnet ſpeaks with much more tenderneſs of this unfortunate nobleman; and, though he bears pretty hard every where upon the Duke of Northumberland, yet he does not venture to charge that Duke with forging any of the circumſtances of this conſpiracy (38). To ſay the truth, the friends of Somerſet, in the very ſame breath that they charge Northumberland with bringing him by art to the block, let fall things that ſeemed to ſpeak quite the contrary: for inſtance, a certain author (39) delivers himſelf thus. "The Duke of Somerſet is trained by his enemies to ſuch fears and jealouſies as tranſport him, beyond his own good-nature, to an attempt one morning upon the Earl of Warwick, now Duke of Northumberland, a-bed, where being received with much kindneſs, his heart relented, and he came off re infecta. At his coming out, one of his company aſked him if he had done the deed? He anſwered, no. Then, ſaid he, you are yourſelf undone. And, indeed, it ſo fell out; for, when all other accuſations failed, this only ſtuck by him, and could

Cambridge (n), in the room of that unfortunate Peer of whom we have been ſpeaking; but at what time he became High-Steward, which Dr. Heylyn aſſures us he was (o), and that theſe two offices had never been in one perſon before or ſince, is very uncertain. This great Politician had now raiſed himſelf as high as it was poſſible, in point of dignity and of power. The aſcendancy he had gained over the young King was ſo great, that he directed him entirely at his pleaſure; and he had, with ſuch dexterity, wrought moſt of the great Nobility into his intereſts, and had ſo humbled and depreſſed all who ſhewed any diſlike to him, that he ſeemed to have all things to hope, and little to fear (p). We ought, therefore, to attribute to this ſituation, and that vain pride which naturally triumphs in the breaſts of ambitious men, his mean and barbarous uſage of the head of his family, and his near relation, John, Baron of Dudley, whoſe eſtate, being entangled by uſurers, he, by purchaſing aſſignments of mortgages, drew by degrees entirely into his own hands, ſo as at laſt to compaſs what he for many years deſired, the poſſeſſion of the antient caſtle of Dudley; which he not only thoroughly repaired, but added alſo a moſt noble ſtructure, worthy of his wealth and greatneſs, which was called the new building, adorning all parts of the caſtle with the arms of the noble families, from which, by his mother's ſide, he was deſcended, that, in ſucceeding times, it might not be taken for an acquiſition, but the patrimony of his family (q). This was certainly going far enough, or rather much too far; yet he ventured ſtill farther, and, having deſpoiled his poor couſin of his caſtle and eſtates, thruſt the titles of Dudley and Somerie amongſt his other baronies, leaving his unhappy kinſman a new and ſtrange title in their ſtead; for, living, as well as he could, amongſt the great families in Staffordſhire and Warwickſhire, who pitied his misfortunes, he went there currently by the name of Lord Quondam, till, by a ſudden revolution, he became maſter of Dudley-caſtle again, and his ſon obtained, out of the forfeiture of this potent Duke, an ample fortune, free from all incumbrances, with a clear title (r). But to return to our Hiſtory. Many writers there are who inſinuate, that, from the time the Duke of Northumberland and his family came to have the perſon of the King, as well as the direction of the Government, in their hands, the health of that young Prince began to decline. But theſe, perhaps, are no other than calumnies, ſince the decay of the King's health may, with great probability, be attributed to his having the meaſles and ſmall-pox in a ſhort time one after the other, which could not but harraſs extremely a conſtitution naturally tender; and theſe were diſeaſes which artifice or intrigue could never procure, though they might have afforded a better colour to bad deſigns, if ſuch had been really entertained, than a lingering conſumption which followed them (s). It does not indeed appear, that the Duke of Northumberland had any cauſe to ſuſpect the loſs of his power while that King lived, nor did he ſeem to fear it: but, when he diſcerned his Majeſty's health to decline apace, it was very natural for him to conſider how he might render himſelf and his family ſafe. This appears plainly, from the hurry with which the marriage was concluded between the Lady Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, and his fourth ſon, Lord Guildford Dudley, which was celebrated in the month of May, 1553, that is, not

'could not be denied, and ſo he was found guilty by 'a ſtatute of his own procurement, viz. 'That if any 'ſhould attempt to kill a Privy-Counſellor, although 'the fact were not done, yet it ſhould be felony, and 'to be puniſhed with death.' This fact of Somerſet's going with an intention to murder Northumberland in his chamber, is related more at large by a foreign author of the higheſt credit, who is known to have had his materials from the moſt knowing perſons in this kingdom, who might perhaps be more free in their communications than they would have been in penning a hiſtory, for which they muſt have been accountable themſelves if it had been publiſhed. The reader will be probably pleaſed to ſee what he ſays (40). 'Northumberland having drawn the chief power into 'his own hands, he had nothing elſe to do but to 'remove Somerſet himſelf out of the way, towards 'whom he ſhewed ſuch a contempt as drove the 'other upon the thoughts of killing Dudley, for the 'vindication of his own authority. Somerſet therefore 'went to his houſe, under pretence of a viſit, covered 'with a coat of mail under his cloaths, and carrying 'with him a party of men, whom he left in the next 'chamber; but, when he was introduced in the 'civileſt manner to Dudley, who was naked, and ly-'ing upon his bed, the good-natured man repenting, 'he would not execute his deſign, and departed with-'out ſtriking a ſtroke.' It is the obſervation of the very learned and judicious Mr. Camden (41), that 'the 'Duke of Somerſet loſt his life for a very ſmall crime, 'and that upon a nice point, ſubtilly deviſed and ma-'naged by his enemies.' Now if Doctor Fuller may be admitted to explain this ſhort text, he will bring it home to the noble perſon whoſe article we are writing. Speaking of Somerſet's accuſation (42), he ſays, 'Here I muſt ſet John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, as a 'tranſcendent, in a form by himſelf, being a compe-'tent lawyer, ſon to a Judge, known ſoldier, and able 'ſtateſman, and acting againſt the Protector, in all 'theſe his capacities. Indeed, he was the very ſoul 'of the accuſation, being all in all, and all in every 'part thereof.' It may be preſumed, that the King was as well informed in theſe points as any writer whatever; and it appears as well from his Journal, which he kept very exactly and very ſecretly (43), as from a private letter of his to Mr. Barnaby Fitzpatrick (44), that he did not judge his uncle altogether ſo innocent, or, that he was convicted without evidence. But, after all can be ſaid, the reſentment of the Duke of Northumberland was certainly ſeen in his execution if not in his condemnation; ſince the King might have been eaſily prevailed on to ſpare his uncle if he had been applied to, or rather muſt have been drawn with difficulty to conſent to the death of him he had ſo long conſidered as a parent. Here then lay the cruelty of Northumberland, which was generally remembered when his fall came, and loudly charged upon him by the people (45); and yet it may be urged, if not in juſtification, yet in excuſe, that he was not bound to regard his own life leſs than Somerſet did his, who, for his ſecurity, procured that act of Parliament on which he died, nor could it be well expected that he ſhould have more pity, or commiſeration, for his rival, in thoſe unhappy circumſtances, than Somerſet, when Protector, had for his own brother.

above two months before the King died (t). We may, however, ſuppoſe that he had, for ſome time, been contriving in his mind that plan, for the diſpoſal of the Kingdom, which he carried afterwards into execution [L]. In the Parliament, held a little before the King's death, the Duke of Northumberland procured a conſiderable ſupply to be granted, and, in the preamble of that act, a direct cenſure of the Duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration; and, having wiſely anſwered his purpoſes by this ſingle meaſure, diſſolved that Parliament immediately (u). He then applied himſelf to the King, and ſhewed him the neceſſity of ſetting the Lady Mary aſide, from the danger the Proteſtant religion would be in if ſhe ſhould ſucceed him; in which, from the piety of that young Prince, he met with no great difficulty. Biſhop Burnet ſays, he did not well underſtand how the King was prevailed upon to paſs by his ſiſter Elizabeth, who had been always much in his favour (w). Perhaps he might be told, that it was impoſſible to aſſign any reaſons for diſinheriting one ſiſter that might not alſo be applied for the other; ſo that there was a neceſſity of depriving both or neither. Yet, when this was done, there was another difficulty in the way. The Ducheſs of Suffolk was the next heir, and ſhe might have ſons; and, therefore, to bar theſe in favour of Lady Jane Dudley ſeemed to be unnatural as well as illegal. The Ducheſs herſelf contributed, as far as in her lay, to remove this obſtacle, by devolving her right upon her daughter, even if ſhe had male iſſue; which ſatisfied the King, who was but in the ſixteenth year of his age, and might not therefore perceive the fallacy of reſigning not only her own claim, but that of thoſe who might deſcend from her, which ſhe could not poſſibly have power to do (x). The King's conſent being obtained, the next point was to procure a proper inſtrument to be drawn by the Judges; in doing which, the Duke of Northumberland made uſe of threats as well as promiſes; and, when done at laſt, it was in ſuch a manner as plainly ſhewed it to be illegal in their own opinions (y) [M]. [L] Which he carried afterwards into execution.] We are told by Sir John Hayward, that, after the creation of the Marquis of Dorſet, and the Earl of Warwick, Dukes of Suffolk, and Northumberland, and other promotions and alterations made at court (46), there followed ſomewhat of ſtill greater conſequence, which he introduces thus: 'And which was the accompliſhment of miſchief, Sir Robert Dudley, one 'of the Duke of Northumberland's ſons, a true heir 'both of his hate againſt perſons of the Nobility and of 'his cunning to diſſemble the ſame, was ſworn one of 'the ſix ordinary gentlemen. He was afrerwards, for 'luſt and cruelty, a monſter of the Court, as apt to 'hate, ſo a moſt ſure executioner of his hate; yet, 'rather by practice than open dealing, as wanting 'rather courage than wit. After his entertainment 'into a place of ſo near ſervice, the King enjoyed his 'health not long.' After laying this foundation, he takes it for granted in ſeveral paſſages in the ſubſequent part of his work, that the King was poiſoned by the procurement of the Duke of Northumberland; yet the reverend Mr. Strype cenſures him for writing ſo poſitively without authorities; and not without reaſon. His very introduction is ill-grounded; for, as the King tells us himſelf, Sir Robert Dudley was ſworn one of his gentlemen in ordinary, Auguſt 15th, 1551 (47), and the promotions, of which Sir John Hayward makes this a conſequence, were in the October following. It was in the month of April, 1552, that the King had the meaſles and the ſmall-pox, and his health did not begin to decline till ſome time afterwards; ſo that there is great impropriety in ſaying, that, after his coming into a place ſo near him, the King enjoyed his health not long. All the reſt of our hiſtorians ſpeak very doubtfully of the King's death, chiefly from a great indiſcretion, which was the putting him into the hands of a woman after the Phyſicians began to doubt whether he could be ſaved by their ſkill; from which time it is certain that he did grow worſe, and ſo the Phyſicians were called in again (48). Yet there are many who will hardly take this for a teſtimony of his being poiſoned, though Sir John Hayward ſays, ſhe was a ſchool-miſtreſs well inſtructed for the purpoſe (49), but will rather conceive, that the Duke of Northumberland conſented to this, in hopes of ſaving the King's life; which, if he was a ſound politician, he muſt have conſidered as of greater conſequence to him than to any other man in the kingdom. But, be this as it will, there is no ſort of proof, that the Duke took ſuch early care as he might have done for his family, if he had any foreſight of the King's death: but his doing things as he did, in a hurry, ſeems to ſhew quite the contrary; and, indeed, there is a letter of his to Sir William Cecil, which looked as if he had deceived himſelf much in this particular, and entertained hopes of the King's recovery, after they were loſt by others. Yet it cannot be conceived, that, while the whole nation was alarmed by the King's ſickneſs, the Duke ſhould be wholly unconcerned as to the event, which is the reaſon of its being ſaid in the text, that he might have digeſted in his mind that ſcheme of the ſucceſſion ſome time before he mentioned it to the King; and, that looking upon it as a dangerous undertaking, and his laſt ſhift, he delayed it till the neceſſity became preſſing.

[M] As plainly ſhewed it to be illegal in their own opinions.] The full narrative of this whole important tranſaction, and of the Duke of Northumberland's behaviour therein, is thus briefly and clearly delivered by Biſhop Burnet (50). 'On the 11th of June,' ſays he, 'Montague, that was Chief Juſtice of the Common-'Pleas, and Baker and Bromley, two Judges, with 'the King's Attorney and Solicitor, were commanded 'to come to Council. There they found the King with 'ſome Privy-Counſellors about him. The King told 'them, he did now apprehend the danger the king-'dom might be in, if, upon his death, his ſiſter Mary 'ſhould ſucceed, who might marry a ſtranger, and ſo 'change the laws and the religion of the realm; ſo he 'ordered ſome articles to be read to them, of the way 'in which he would have the crown to deſcend. They 'objected, that the Act of Succeſſion, being an act of 'Parliament, could not be taken away by any ſuch de-'vice: yet the King required them to take the ar-'ticles, and draw a book according to them: they 'aſked a little time to conſider of it. So, having 'examined the ſtatute of the firſt year of this reign, con-'cerning treaſons, they found that it was treaſon, not 'only after the King's death, but even in his life, 'to change the ſucceſſion. Secretary Petre, in the 'mean while, preſſed them to make haſte: when they 'came again to the Council, they declared they could 'not do any thing; for, it was treaſon, and all the 'Lords ſhould be guilty of treaſon, if they went on in 'it. Upon which the Duke of Northumberland, 'who was not then in the Council-Chamber, being 'advertiſed of this, came in great fury, calling Mon-'tague a traytor, and threatened all the Judges, ſo that 'they thought he would have beaten them. But the 'Judges ſtood to their opinion. They were again ſent 'for, and came with Goſnald added to them, on the '15th of June. The King was preſent, and he ſome-'what ſharply aſked them, why they had not prepared 'the book as he had ordered them? They anſwered, 'That whatever they did would be of no force with-'out a Parliament. The King ſaid, he intended to 'have this time, indeed, the Duke, either from the hurry of his paſſions, the fear he had of what might happen from delays, or the haughtineſs ariſing from a ſeries of good fortune which had ſo long continued, began to loſe much of his former gentleneſs and affability, as he ſhewed himſelf amazingly rapacious in the grants which he obtained from a King, whoſe age, excluſively of his ſickneſs, made it indecent at leaſt, if not illegal, to accept ſuch mighty bounties, the worth of which he could never be preſumed to know, from his giving them thus laviſhly away. The Duke was no leſs careful in drawing to himſelf as much power, and diffuſing his intereſt as widely as poſſible; ſo that, whatever happened, he might not want a retreat, or find his ſchemes in danger of being broken, through an oppoſition by the diſcontented Nobility; in which ſchemes, notwithſtanding their difficulty, he ſucceeded to his wiſh, his eſtate being enlarged, and his offices multiplied, beyond any thing that had in former times been beſtowed upon any ſubject (z) [N]. The Letters Patent for diſpoſing of the Crown were ſigned by King Edward on the 21ſt of June (a), and on the 6th of July that Monarch expired, expreſſing, to the laſt, great ſatisfaction in the proviſion he had made for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant Religion and the happineſs of his people (b). It is ſaid, that the Duke of Northumberland was very deſirous of concealing the King's death for ſome time; but, this being found impoſſible, he carried his daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane, from Durham-Houſe to the Tower for the greater ſecurity, and on the 10th of July proclaimed her Queen (c). The Council alſo wrote to Lady Mary requiring her ſubmiſſion; but they were very ſoon informed that ſhe was retired into Norfolk, where many of the Nobility, and multitudes of people, reſorted to her (d). It was then reſolved to ſend forces againſt her under the command of the Duke of Suffolk; but Queen Jane, as ſhe was then ſtyled, would by no means part with her father; and the Council earneſtly preſſed the Duke of Northumberland to go in perſon, to which he was little inclined, as doubting their fidelity. He ſignified as much in the ſpeech he made at

'have one ſhortly. Then Montague propoſed, that 'it might be delayed till the Parliament met. But 'the King ſaid, he would have it firſt done, and then 'ratified in Parliament, and, therefore, he required 'them, on their allegiance, to go about it; and ſome 'Counſellors told them, that if they refuſed to obey, 'that they were traytors. This put them in a great conſternation; and old Montague thinking it could not 'be treaſon, whatever they did in this matter while the 'King lived, and, at worſt, that a pardon under the 'Great-Seal would ſecure him, conſented to ſet about 'it, if he might have a commiſſion, requiring him to 'do it, and a pardon under the Great-Seal when it 'was done. Both theſe being granted him, he was 'ſatisfied. The other Judges being aſked, if they 'would concur, did all agree, being overcome with 'fear, except Goſnald, who ſtill refuſed to do it. 'But he alſo being ſorely threatened, both by the 'Duke of Northumberland and the Earl of Shrewſbury, conſented to it the next day. So they put the 'entail of the crown, in form of law, and brought it 'to the Lord Chancellor, to put the ſeal to it. They 'were all required to ſet their hands to it; but, both 'Goſnald and Hales refuſed. Yet the former was 'wrought on to do it, but the latter, though a moſt 'ſteady and zealous man for the Reformation, would 'upon no conſideration yield to it: after that, the 'Lord Chancellor, for his ſecurity, deſired that all the 'Counſellors might ſet their hands to it, which was 'done, on the 21ſt of June, by thirty-three of them, 'it is like, including the Judges in the number. But 'Cranmer, as he came ſeldom to Council after the 'Duke of Somerſet's fall, ſo he was that day abſent 'on deſign. Cecil, in a relation which he made one 'write of this tranſaction for clearing himſelf, afterwards ſays, that, when he had heard Goſnald and 'Hales declare how much it was againſt law, he re'ſuſed to ſet his hand to it as a Counſellor, and 'only ſigned it as a witneſs to the King's ſubſcription. 'But Cranmer ſtill refuſed to do it, after they had all 'ſigned it, and ſaid he would never conſent to the diſinheriting of the daughters of his late maſter. Many 'conſultations were had to perſwade him to it. But 'he could not be prevailed on, till the King himſelf 'ſet on him, who uſed many arguments from the 'danger religion would otherwiſe be in, together with 'other perſwaſions; ſo that, by his reaſons, or rather 'importunities, at laſt he brought him to it."

[N] Been beſtowed upon any ſubject.] If all the inſtances that might be alledged of this, were carefully collected, they would ſwell this note very much beyond its proper bounds; and therefore, it ſhall ſuffice to alledge here, the teſtimony of the induſtrious Strype, who, though in other places he has diſtinctly conſidered them, thus ſums up the matter at once, ſpeaking of the Duke's ſtate and condition, in the year 1553 (51). 'Dudley, the great Duke of Northumberland, now 'bore all the ſway at Court, and, in effect, did what he 'liſted. This year, beſides the County Palatine of 'Durham, the honour and power of which was like 'to fall to him; the King gave him Bernard's Caſtle 'there, with very great additions of lands and lordſhips 'in that county, and in Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, and York, or any otherwhere in the Biſhoprick 'of Durham, for life. He had alſo granted to him, 'the manors of Feckenham, Bromeſgrove, King's 'Norton in Worceſterſhire, with many other lands. 'The year before, he was made Chief Steward of 'the Eaſt-riding of York, and of all the King's 'lordſhips in Holderneſs and Cottingham in the ſaid 'county. The year before that, he was conſtituted 'General Warden, or Keeper, of the Marches of 'England, towards Scotland, namely, of the Eaſt, 'Weſt, and middle, Marches; which were ſcarcely 'before put into one man's hand (except the Marquis 'of Dorſet immediately before him) and he to be appointed his deputy-warden. And his patent was 'ordered to be drawn up in the moſt large and 'comprehenſive manner, endowing him with as much 'authority, power, pre eminence, commodity, and 'liberty, as any before him had enjoyed, from Richard the ſecond's time to Henry the eighth, as 'the warrant ran. Beſides theſe things, in the North, 'he obtained, of the King, great and ſpreading de'means in Somerſetſhire, Warwick, and Worceſterſhire, and many other counties. So that, by this 'time, the Duke had prodigiouſly enriched himſelf, 'and made himſelf formidably great, by lands and 'lordſhips, honours and offices, caſtles and places 'of truſt, heaped upon him by the King, by whom 'it was not ſafe to deny him any thing he aſked. 'He had ſtrengthened his intereſt, alſo, by raiſing 'himſelf friends upon the King's coſt, as more eſpecially the Lord Clinton, and Sir John Gates, 'and his brother, Sir Andrew Dudley, Maſter of 'the Wardrobe, and taken into the order of the 'Garter; and his own ſons, John, raiſed to the 'degree of Earl of Warwick, and maſter of the 'King's horſe (52); Sir Robert Dudley made a 'Lord (53), and the King's Carver, and Guildford 'Dudley, whom the Duke was now marrying to one 'of the royal blood, viz. the Lady Jane, eldeſt 'daughter of the Duke of Suffolk.'

taking his leave, and was anſwered with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that men could give. The Earl of Arundel particularly told him, he was ſorry it was not his chance to go with him, in whoſe preſence he could find in his heart to ſpend his blood even at his feet (e). On the 14th of July the Duke, accompanied by the Marquis of Northampton, the Lord Grey, and others, marched through Biſhopſgate with two thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot; but, as they rode through Shoreditch, he could not forbear ſaying to the Lord Grey, "The people preſs to ſee us, but not one ſays, God ſpeed us (f)." His activity and courage, for which he had been ſo famous, ſeemed, from this time, to have deſerted him; for, though he advanced to St. Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, yet finding his troops diminiſh, the people little affected to him, and no ſupplies coming from London, though he had written to the Lords in the moſt preſſing terms, he retired back again to Cambridge (g). In the mean time the Council thought of nothing but how to get out of the Tower, and at laſt effected it, under pretence of going to the Earl of Pembroke's houſe at Baynard's Caſtle, to give audience to the foreign Ambaſſadors. This was on the 19th of the ſame month, and the firſt thing they did, when they came there, was to ſend for the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, whom they accompanied to Cheapſide, and there Garter King at Arms proclaimed Queen Mary. The Earl of Arundel, and Lord Paget, went the ſame night poſt to pay their duty to her (h). The Duke of Northumberland had advice of this on the 20th; and, about five in the afternoon the ſame day, cauſed her to be proclaimed at Cambridge, throwing up his cap and crying, "God ſave Queen Mary!" with how much joy and ſincerity may be eaſily imagined (i). About an hour afterwards came letters from the Council to the Duke of Northumberland, by one of the Heralds, requiring him to diſband his forces, upon receiving which the Duke gave leave to every man to depart, and ſoon after he was arreſted in King's-college by Slegge, Serjeant at Arms; but other letters coming from the Council, that all men ſhould go each his way, the Duke ſaid to thoſe that kept him, "Ye do me wrong to withdraw my liberty, ſee ye not the Council's letters, without exception, that all men ſhould go whither they would? Whereupon they, who guarded him and the other Noblemen, ſet them at liberty, and ſo they continued for that night; and the Earl of Warwick, the Duke of Northumberland's ſon, was ready in the morning to have rode away; at which time the Earl of Arundel came from the Queen to the Duke into his chamber, who, when he ſaw him, ſaid, "For the love of God conſider, I have done nothing but by the conſent of you and all the whole Council." "My Lord," replied the Earl of Arundel, "I am ſent hither by the Queen's Majeſty, and in her name I arreſt you." "I obey it," ſaid the Duke, "I beſeech you, my Lord of Arundel, uſe mercy towards me, knowing the caſe as it is." "My Lord," anſwered the Earl, "you ſhould have ſought for mercy ſooner. I muſt do according to my commandment:" and thereupon committed the charge of him, and of others, to the guard, and gentlemen that ſtood by (k). The 25th of July, the Duke, with the reſt, were brought to the Tower of London, under the conduct of Henry Earl of Arundel, with a body of light horſemen (l). On Friday, the 18th of Auguſt, he was arraigned, a great ſcaffold being ſet up in Weſtminſter-Hall, with John, Earl of Warwick, his ſon and heir, and William Parr, Marquis of Northampton, before Thomas Duke of Norfolk, High-Steward of England on that occaſion. As to his behaviour at his trial, which was equally modeſt and decent, ſome particulars of it will be mentioned in the notes (m) [O]. After his condemnation he was carried back to the Tower, where he remained a cloſe priſoner. Monday, the twenty-firſt of

[O] Will be mentioned in the notes.] The indictment having been read, containing a charge againſt him of high-treaſon, the Duke of Northumberland, with great reverence towards the Judges, proteſted his faith and allegiance to the Queen, whom he confeſſed grievouſly to have offended, and ſaid he meant not to ſpeak any thing in defence of his acts, but requeſted to underſtand the opinion of the court in two points (54):

(54) Stowe's Annals, p. 614.

Firſt, Whether a man doing any act by the authority of the Prince's Council, and by warrant of the Great Seal of England, and doing nothing without the ſame, might be charged with treaſon for any thing he might do by warrant thereof.

Secondly, Whether any ſuch perſons as were equally culpable in that crime, and thoſe by whoſe letters and commandments he was directed in all his doings, might be his judges, or paſs upon his trial as his Peers?

To which it was anſwered: 'That the Great Seal 'which he had for his warrant, was not the Seal of 'the lawful Queen of the realm, nor paſſed by autho-'rity, but the Seal of an uſurper, and therefore could 'be no warrant to him. And that if any were as 'deeply to be touched in the caſe as himſelf, yet ſo 'long as no attainder was of record againſt them, they 'were perſons able in law to paſs on any trial, and not 'to be challenged but at the Prince's pleaſure.' After which anſwer the Duke uſed few words, but confeſſed the indictment; by whoſe example the other priſoners arraigned with him did the like, and thereupon had judgment. The Duke, on receiving his ſentence, ſaid: 'I beſeech you, my Lords, all to be humble ſuitors to 'the Queen's Majeſty, and to grant me four requeſts: 'Firſt, That I may have that death which Noblemen 'have had in times paſt, and not the other. Secondly, 'That her Majeſty will be gracious to my children, 'which may hereafter do good ſervice, conſidering 'that they went by my commandment, who am their 'father, and not of their own free wills. Thirdly, 'That I may have appointed to me ſome learned men 'for the inſtruction and quiet of my conſcience. And 'fourthly, That ſhe will ſend two of the Council to 'commune with me, to whom I will declare ſuch 'matters as ſhall be expedient for her and the com-'monwealth. And thus I beſeech you all to pray for 'me.'

August, was the day fixed for his execution, when a vaſt concourſe of people aſſembled upon Tower-Hill, all the uſual preparations being made, and the executioner ready; but, after waiting ſome hours, the people were ordered to depart. This delay was to afford time for his making an open ſhow of the change of his religion; ſince that very day, in the preſence of the Mayor and Aldermen, as well as ſome of the Privy-Council, he heard maſs in the Tower (n). The next day he was actually brought out to ſuffer death, on the ſame ſcaffold, on Tower-Hill, where he made a very long ſpeech to the people; of which there remains nothing but what relates to his religion, which he not only profeſſed to be then that of the Church of Rome, but that it had been always ſo, taking upon himſelf the odious character of a hypocrite in the ſight of God, as well as a diſſembler with men (o). John Fox affirms, that he had a promiſe of pardon even if his head were upon the block, if he would recant and hear maſs (p); and ſome have believed that he entertained ſuch a hope to the laſt, from a paſſage in his ſpeech [P]. However that may be, it is allowed that he behaved with becoming courage and compoſure, putting off his damaſk gown when he had done ſpeaking, and then kneeling down, ſaying, to them that were about him, "I beſeech you all to bear me witneſs that I die in the true Catholick faith;" and then ſaid the Pſalms of Miſerere, and De Profundis, his Pater Noſter, and ſix of the firſt verſes of the Pſalm, "In te Domine ſperavi," ending with this verſe, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my ſpirit." And, when he had thus ended his prayers, the Executioner aſked him forgiveneſs, to whom he ſaid, "I forgive thee with all my heart, do thy part without fear." And, bowing towards the block, he ſaid, "I have deſerved a thouſand deaths;" then laid his head on the block, and was beheaded; whoſe body, with the head, was buried in the Tower by the body of Edward Duke of Somerſet; ſo that there lie between the high altar, in St. Peter's church, two Dukes between two Queens, viz. Queen Anne, and Queen Catharine, all four beheaded (q). Such was the end of this potent Nobleman, who, with the title of a Duke, exerciſed, for ſome time, a power little inferior to that of a King, in the fifty-firſt, or at moſt in the fifty-ſecond, year of his age, as differently repreſented by our Hiſtorians [Q], but of whom it

[P] From a paſſage in his ſpeech.] Several authors agree in affirming that he made a long ſpeech at the time of his death, and we have reaſon to regret that only a part of it is preſerved, which is what follows: (55) 'Good people, all you that be here preſent to ſee 'me die, though my death be odious and horrible to 'the fleſh, yet I pray you judge the beſt in God's 'works, for he doth all for the beſt. And as for me 'I am a wretched ſinner, and have deſerved to die, 'and moſt juſtly am condemned to die by Law. And 'yet this act whereof I die was not altogether of me, 'but I was procured and induced thereunto by others; 'I was I ſay induced thereunto by others. Howbeit, 'God forbid that I ſhould name any man unto you, 'I will name no man unto you, and therefore I be-'ſeech you look not for it. I, for my part, forgive 'all men, and pray God alſo to forgive them, and if 'I have offended any of you here, I pray you and all 'the world to forgive me, and moſt chiefly I deſire 'forgiveneſs of the Queen's Highneſs, whom I have 'moſt grieveouſly offended. And I pray you all to 'witneſs for me, that I depart in perfect love and 'charity with all the world, and that you will aſſiſt me 'with your prayers at the hour of death.——— 'And here I do proteſt unto you, good people, moſt 'earneſtly, even from the bottom of my heart, that 'this which I have ſpoken is of myſelf, not being re-'quired nor moved thereunto by any man, nor by any 'flattery or hope of life; and I take witneſs of my Lord 'of Worceſter (*) here, mine old friend and ghoſtly 'father, that he found me in this mind and opinion 'when he came to me; but I have declared this only 'upon mine own mind and affection, and for the zeal 'and love that I bear to my natural country. I could, 'good people, rehearſe much more even by expe-'rience, that I have of this evil that hath happened 'to this realm by theſe occaſions; but you know I 'have another thing to do, whereunto I muſt prepare 'me, for the time draweth away. And now I be-'ſeech the Queen's Highneſs to forgive me mine of-'fences againſt her Majeſty, whereof I have a ſingular 'hope, foraſmuch as ſhe has already extended her 'goodneſs and clemency ſo far upon me, that whereas 'ſhe might forthwith, without judgment, or any far-'ther trial, have put me to moſt vile and cruel death, 'by hanging, drawing, and quartering, foraſmuch as 'I was in the field in arms againſt her Majeſty; her 'Highneſs nevertheleſs, of her moſt merciful goodneſs, 'ſuffered me to be brought to my judgment, and to 'have my trial by law, where I was moſt juſtly con-'demned. And her Highneſs hath now alſo ex-'tended her mercy and clemency upon me, for the 'manner and kind of my death. And therefore my 'hope is, that her Grace, of her goodneſs, will remit 'all the reſt of her indignation and diſpleaſure towards 'me, which I beſeech you all moſt heartily to pray 'for, and that it may pleaſe God long to preſerve her 'Majeſty, to reign over you in much honour and feli-'city.' I muſt confeſs it does not appear to me, that this ſpeech of the Duke implies any perſuaſion of pardon, but quite the contrary. He recapitulates thoſe inſtances of juſtice and kindneſs, which he would have the people believe, he, in his own opinion, had received from the Queen, and thence infers, that her Majeſty would retain no reſentment againſt him after he was dead, and conſequently would not proceed againſt his family, of which many were obnoxious to her juſtice, and all of them to her ſuſpicions. If, therefore, any promiſes were made to him, it is more likely that they ſhould relate to his children, and his brother, in favour of whom he might poſſibly reſolve to die as he lived, like a Courtier, as he evidently did.

[Q] As differently repreſented by our Hiſtorians.] We have the following character of this great man, drawn by the hand of a famous Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian (56). 'Such was the end of this great perſon, 'the firſt Earl of Warwick, and the laſt Duke of Nor-'thumberland of this name and family. By birth he 'was the eldeſt ſon of Sir Edmund Sutton, alias Dud-'ley, who, together with Sir Richard Empſon, were 'the chief inſtruments and promoters under Henry VII. 'for putting the penal laws in execution, to the great 'grievance and oppreſſion of all ſorts of ſubjects. For 'which, and other offences of a higher nature, they 'were both ſacrificed to the fury of the common peo-'ple, by King Henry VIII. which poſſibly might 'make him carry a vindictive mind towards that 'King's children, and prompt him to the diſinheriting 'of all his progeny. Firſt trained up (as his father had 'alſo been before him) in the ſtudy of the Common 'Laws, which made him cunning enough to pick 'holes it may be truly said, that, though even his enemies could not deny he had many great, and some good, qualities, yet the best friends to his memory must confess, they were much overbalanced by his vices. His relict, Jane, Duchess of Northumberland, was a Lady of great piety and virtue, of whom therefore we shall give a short account in a note [R]. His brother, Sir Andrews Dudley, Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, fell under the same condemnation with himself; but, through the clemency of Queen Mary, his life was spared; some particulars of which the reader will find at the bottom of the page [S]. This great Duke had also a numerous issue, viz. eight

'holes in any man's estate, to find ways by which to 'bring their lives in danger. But finding that the long 'sword was of more estimation than the long robe in 'the time of that King, he put himself forward on all 'actions wherein honour was to be acquired; in which 'he gave such testimony of his judgment and valour, 'that he gained much on the affections of his Prince, 'by whom he was created Viscount L'Isle, on the '15th of March, anno 1541, installed Knight of the 'Garter in 1543, and made Lord Admiral of England. 'Employed in many actions against the Scots, he came 'off always with success and victory, and having said 'this, we have said all that was accounted either good 'or commendable in the whole course of his life. 'Being advanced unto the title of Earl of Warwick by 'King Edward VI. he thought himself in a capacity 'of making Queens, as well as Richard Nevil (one of 'his predecessors in that title) had been for setting up 'and deposing Kings; and they both perished under the 'ambition of those proud attempts; punished as Ne-'vil also was, in having no issue male remaining to 'preserve his name. For, though he had six sons, all 'of them living to be men, and all of them to be mar-'ried men, yet they went all childless to the grave, I 'mean, as to the having of lawful issue, as if the curse 'of Jeconijah had been laid upon them. With him 'died also the proud title of Duke of Northumberland, 'never aspired to by the Piercies, though men of emi-'nent nobility.' The reader may compare this with the following sketch of his character by Bishop Burnet than whom no man could be better acquainted with the History of those times (75). 'Thus died the am-'bitious Duke of Northumberland. He had been, in 'the former parts of his life, a great Captain, and had 'the reputation of a very wise man: he was generally 'successful, and they that are so are always esteemed 'wise. He was an extraordinary man in a lower size, 'but had forgot himself much when he was raised 'higher, in which his mind seemed more exalted than 'his fortunes. But as he was transported by his rage 'and revenge out of measure, so he was as servile and 'mean in his submissions. Fox, it seems, was in-'formed, that he had hopes given him of his life, if 'he should declare himself of the Popish religion, even 'though his head were laid on the block; but, which 'way soever he made that declaration, either to get 'his life by it, or that he had really been always what 'he now professed, it argues that he regarded religion 'very little, either in his life, or at his death. But, 'whether he did any thing to hasten the King's death, 'I do not find it was at all enquired after. Only those 'who consider how much guilt disorders all people, 'and that they have a black cloud over their minds, 'which appears either in the violence of rage or the 'abjectness of fear, did find so great a change in his de-'portment in these last passages of his life, from what 'was in the former parts of it, that they could not but 'think there was some extraordinary thing within him, 'from whence it flowed.' We may well suppose, that some shining qualities were very conspicuous in this unfortunate Duke, since the greatest enemy his family ever had, at the close of his most virulent invective against his son, the Earl of Leicester, has these words, which falling from him are very remarkable (58). 'In his father, no doubt, there were to be seen many 'excellent good parts, if they had been joined with 'faith, honesty, moderation, and loyalty. For, all the 'world knows that he was very wise, valiant, magna-'nimous, liberal, and assured friendly where he once 'promised, of all which virtues my Lord his son hath 'neither show nor shadow.' That he was a good 'master, and that he had a servant in whom the memory of past favours out-lived the Duke, as well as his fortunes, will appear from the following passage, recorded in an old History of our Peerage (59), and except the last sentence transcribed by Sir William Dugdale (60). 'John Cock, Lancaster Herald, some time 'servant to this Duke, begged of Queen Mary to bury 'the head of his old master in the Tower of London, 'which was granted him with the whole body, and 'performed accordingly. In remembrance whereof, 'the said Lancaster did ever after bear, for his crest, 'a bear's head, silver; crowned, gold.' It may not be amiss to add here, that it was also in gratitude for this good office he was made Lancaster Herald in 1585, when Robert, Earl of Leicester, son to this Duke, went Governor of the Low-Countries, whom he attended (61).

(61) Weever's Funeral Monuments, in his Cat. of Heralds.

[R] A short account in a note.] The name of this lady, was Jane Guilford daughter and heir of Sir Edward Guildford, Marshal of Calais, Lord-Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Master of the Ordnance under King Henry VIII. by Eleanor, sister and heiress of Thomas West, Lord la Warre. It seems this was a marriage of affection, their fathers having been intimate friends, and themselves brought up together while children. The Duke married her when he was scarcely of age, so that they had lived together thirty years at the time he lost his life, when her estate was truly deplorable, being, in the strict sense of the words, turned out of doors, all her furniture seized, left without fortune, without friends, and without necessaries, her husband and her son executed, her other sons living but by permission; so that, considering her age, her quality, and the manner in which she had spent her days, the Duke being as absolute in his own house, by affection as in the state by power, she could not but be very miserable. By degrees however things grew better, more especially after the marriage of Queen Mary to King Philip, the Spanish lords and ladies of his court; employing all their interest in her favour, as appears from her will, written with her own hand, in which she expresses a very grateful sense of their kindnesses. But no reason has been assigned hitherto for their behaviour towards her, though there was a very good one; for her uncle Henry Guilford had served long in Spain, was knighted by King Ferdinand, and, for his gallant behaviour in war, had the arms of the kingdom of Granada granted him, as an augmentation of his paternal coat. She deceased at her house at Chelsea, in the forty-sixth year of her age, on the 22d of January, 1554-5, and was buried with great funeral solemnity in the church there on the 1st of February following, and had a noble monument erected there, with a suitable inscription to perpetuate her memory (62).

(62) These particulars are taken from the Memoirs prefixed to the Sidney State-papers.

[S] At the bottom of the page.] It does not appear, at what time this gentleman received the honour of Knighthood; but we find, that, by the title of Sir Andrews Dudley, Knight, he had the manor of Whitney granted him by King Edward VI. in the year 1551 (63). A like grant of the manor of Minster Lovel, and the hundred of Chadlington, passed in the month of February, 1552. In the month of October, the same year, upon his being recalled from the castle of Guisnes, of which he was captain, he was appointed one of the four gentlemen in ordinary of his Majesty's Privy-Chamber (64): he was also keeper of the palace of Westminster, and, as the warrants to him plainly shew, Master of the Wardrobe (65); but the last and greatest favour he received in that reign, was his being elected, April 23d, in the sixth year of Edward VI. one of the Knights Companions of the most Noble Order of the Garter (66). He joined, as it was natural for him to do, with the Duke his brother, and for that offence, on the 19th of August 1553, received judgment to die as eight ſons and five daughters, of whom ſome went before him to the grave, others ſurvived, and lived to ſee a great change in their fortunes: we ſhall likewiſe give a ſuccinct account of them, for the reader's ſatisfaction [T]. It may not be amiſs to remember here, that Sir John Sutton, Baron of Dudley, was taken into the new Queen's favour, though he did not live to enjoy it long, dying in leſs than a month after the great Duke his couſin, and, by the Queen's ſpecial command, was, on the 21ſt of September 1553, buried with great pomp and ceremony at Weſtminſter, the Heralds attending at his funeral, when his ſtyle and titles were publicly proclaimed (r). His ſon, Edward Sutton Lord Dudley, received ſtill higher marks of her Royal beneficence, ſince, by her letters patent, ſhe reſtored to him and the heirs of his body all the manors of Horburne and Smethwick, with the advowſon of the church of Horburne in the county of Stafford; as alſo the whole priory of Dudley, and the tithes of Norfield and Sedgeley, with divers meſſuages and lands, parcel of the poſſeſſions belonging to the ſame priory, then in the poſſeſſion of the Crown by the attainder of John, Duke of Northumberland (s). This Lord taking to wife Catharine, the daughter of Sir John Bridges, Lord Chandos of Sudeley, one of the Ladies in ordinary attending on the Queen, ſhe granted to him, and to the heirs of their two bodies, the lordſhips of Sedgeley, Himley, and Swinford, with the parks of Etinſhall, Sedgeley, and Himley; the hays, foreſts, and chaces, of Aſhwood and Chaſpell, with all the land called Willingſworth, and divers other lands and tenements in the county of Stafford (t). Her Majeſty alſo granted him, though the date does not appear, the whole caſtle of Dudley, the park called the Conigree, the old park of Dudley, with divers other lands lying in Dudley, Rowley, and Sedgeley, in the county of Stafford; all which came to the crown by the forfeiture of the ſaid John, Duke of Northumberland (u). The Queen alſo made this Lord Governor of the caſtle of Hampnies in Picardy, for the term of his natural life (w). By his Lady before-mentioned, he had only one daughter, Anne, married to Thomas Wylmer, Eſq. Counſellor at Law (x). As to his other marriages and iſſue, the reader has ſeen them already in another place (y). We ſhall therefore add nothing farther here, than that this noble Peer dying as a traitor, notwithſtanding which he was reprieved, and afterwards pardoned, and diſcharged out of the Tower, Octob. 18, 1554, living the remainder of his life privately, at his houſe in Tothill-ſtreet, where he deceaſed in 1559: but it does not appear that any notice was taken of him by Queen Elizabeth, ſo that, at the time of his demiſe, his fortune was but ſmall (67).

[T] For the reader's ſatisfaction.] We are here to ſpeak of the Duke of Northumberland's poſterity, and firſt of the ſons, which were eight.

I. Henry, who was killed at the ſiege of Boulogne, at the age of nineteen, married to Wynefred, daughter to the Lord Rich; upon whoſe death there is an elegy extant, by Leland (68).

II. Thomas, who died when he was two years old.

III. John, who had the title of Earl of Warwick in his father's life-time. At the coronation of Edward VI. he was made one of the Knights of the Bath: in the fifth year of that monarch's reign, he accompanied the Marquis of Northampton, who carried the Order of the Garter to the French King (69). In the ſixth of Edward VI. he was made Maſter of the Horſe, with a fee of one hundred pounds per annum (70). He had the wardſhip granted him of Sir Edward Seymour, Knight, ſon to the Protector (71). But whereas it is ſaid, by certain writers, that, when his father cauſed the Lord Paget to be deprived of the Garter (72), it was to make room for his ſon the Earl of Warwick, that is not likely to be true, becauſe this young nobleman never had it at all. He was condemned with his father, but reprieved, and releaſed out of the Tower with his uncle, and, going to his brother's houſe at Penſhurſt in Kent, died there in two days time; ſo that it is probable he was dying when he was diſcharged (73). He was, as a certain writer informs us, a nobleman of great hope, and one of the mirrors of his age for religion, learning, and military affairs (74). He deceaſed, October the 21ſt, 1554, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, leaving no iſſue by his Counteſs, the daughter of the Duke of Somerſet, who, after his death, married Sir Edward Umpton, Knight (75).

IV. and V. Ambroſe and Robert, of whom hereafter.

VI. Guilford, who, as we have ſhewn in the text, married Jane, daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, in the month of May, 1553, and, on the 12th of February following, loſt his life, together with his unfortunate lady, upon the ſcaffold (76).

VII. Henry, who married Margaret, the ſole daughter and heireſs of Thomas, Lord Audley, High-Chancellor of England, and was killed at the ſiege of St. Quintin's, in 1557. His widow married Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, and from her deſcended the Howards, Earls of Suffolk (77).

VIII. Charles, who at his death was but four years old.

The daughters were five, viz.

1. Mary, who married Sir Henry Sidney, Knight of the Garter, Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Lord Preſident of Wales, from whom deſcended the Earls of Leiceſter of that name (78).

2. Margaret, who died when ſhe was ten years old.

3. Catharine, who became the wife of Henry Haſtings, Earl of Huntingdon, and Lord Preſident of the North, by whom ſhe had no iſſue. She ſurvived him long, deceaſed in the month of Auguſt, 1620, and was interred by her mother in Chelſea church (79).

4. Temperance, who died at a year old (80).

5. Another Catharine, who died at ſeven years of age (81).

 [The beginning of this article continues that undue partiality which our predeceſſor had before ſhewn to the memory of Edmund Dudley. As we have already made a remark upon it, we ſhall not here add any thing farther upon the ſubject; though the weakneſs of the reaſoning, ariſing from Dudley's having been choſen Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, might juſtly be expoſed.

Something of the ſame partiality may be traced in Dr. Campbell's elaborate and well-written account of the Life and Actions of the famous Warrior and Stateſman now before us. The dexterity for which he is applauded, and the conduct which is ſaid to be wiſe, were in fact nothing but unprincipled accommodations, for the purpoſes of intereſt and ambition, to all the changes and circumſtances of the times. In order to exalt the Duke of Northumberland, the Duke of Somerſet appears to be unjuſtly depreciated. Indeed, an unreaſonable palliation of Northumberland's tranſactions runs through ſeveral of the Notes, and is particularly apparent in Note [K]. However, in certain reſpects, the iniquity of the Duke, his rapacity, and particularly his barbarous uſage of his relation, John, Baron of Dudley, are properly related. We agree agree with our predeceſſor in opinion, that there is no proof of Northumberland's having poiſoned King Edward the Sixth. What ſtrikes us in reading the Hiſtory of theſe times is the general want of principle that was found in public men. They ſeem to have revolted to the ruling party without heſitation and without ſhame. When the Duke of Northumberland marched out in ſupport of the cauſe of Queen Jane, he received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of fidelity from the Council; and the Earl of Arundel in particular told him, that he was ſorry that it was not his chance to go with him, in whoſe preſence he could find in his heart to ſpend his blood even at his feet. And yet, within a few days, this ſame Earl of Arundel appears to have arreſted the Duke with the moſt perfect indifference and compoſure of mind. Thoſe who are the moſt ready to extol the virtues of our anceſtors, and to ſet them far above the level of the preſent times, are not always the beſt judges of the ſubject.]

K.

DUDLEY (Lady JANE), ſee GREY (Lady JANE), or, as Heylyn ſtyles her, QUEEN JANE.

DUDLEY (AMBROSE), ſon of John Duke of Northumberland beforementioned, afterwards Baron L'Iſle, and Earl of Warwick, through the favour of Queen Elizabeth. He was born, as I conjecture, either in 1530 or 1531, and was carefully educated in his father's family, and, ſhewing an early propenſity to arms, he attended his father, then Earl of Warwick, when he went into Norfolk againſt the rebels in the year 1549 (a), and there it was, in all probability, that he deſerved the honour of knighthood, which was conferred upon him November the 17th, with the Duke of Lunenburgh, Sir John Perrot, Sir Nicholas Pelham, and Sir Thomas Ruſſel (b). We find him very high in King Edward's favour in 1552, when he aſſiſted at ſeveral tournaments, made, as ſome writers inſinuate, to amuſe the young King, while his uncle the Duke of Somerſet was under ſentence of death (c). He was then ſtyled Lord Ambroſe Dudley, and received by that title ſome marks of benevolence from the King his maſter (d). He continued all that reign, as the reader may conceive, in much credit at Court, and, being in arms at the ſame time with the Duke of Northumberland on the behalf of Lady Jane, he was attainted, received ſentence of death, and remained a cloſe priſoner till October 18, 1554 (e), when he was diſcharged out of the Tower, and pardoned for life (f). Upon the demiſe of his mother, the Ducheſs of Northumberland, in the ſucceeding year, he became poſſeſſed of the Lordſhip of Hale Owen, charged with ſome annuities to his younger brothers by the Will of that Lady (g). In 1557, in company with both his brothers, he attended the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Viſcount Montacute, the Lord Wilton, and the Earl of Lincoln, who, in the month of May, with a body of eight thouſand men, paſſed over into the Low-Countries, and joined the Spaniſh army that lay then before St. Quintin's (h). He had his ſhare in the famous victory that was gained over the French who came to the relief of the place, and was likewiſe preſent during the remaining part of the ſiege, which was reſumed after the battle (i). Having had the misfortune to loſe there his youngeſt brother, who was a perſon of great hopes, and a ſingular favourite with King Edward VI. (k), this matter was ſo repreſented to Queen Mary, that ſhe conſented to reſtore the whole family in blood, and accordingly an act paſſed this year for that purpoſe, by which Sir Ambroſe Dudley, Knight, was entirely freed from the inconveniences derived upon him by the attainder of John, Duke of Northumberland, his father (l) [A]. [A] By the attainder of John, Duke of Northumberland, his father.] It is highly probable, that this reſtitution in blood was obtained by the power of King Philip, on account of the good ſervices that had been performed by all the brothers at St. Quintin's, where the youngeſt, Henry, in the laſt aſſault given to the place, was killed by a ſhot, as he was ſtooping to draw his ſtocking over his knee, that it might not incommode him in ſcaling (1). This act of Parliament recites (2), that by reaſon of the attainders of John, Duke of Northumberland, the ſaid Ambroſe Dudley, and Robert Dudley, Knights, now remain out of all name and reputation, to their great diſcomfort, grief, and daily ſorrow. And, for as much as the ſaid Ambroſe and Robert be and always, ever ſince the ſaid attainders have been, and always hereafter intend to be, her Highneſs's true and faithful ſubjects: It may therefore pleaſe her Highneſs, &c. at their moſt humble petitions, for the true and faithful ſervice which they had done, and intended to do during their lives; and having already given good proof and trial of their fidelity, &c. it was therefore enacted, with the aſſent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and of the Commons in Parliament aſſembled, That the ſaid Ambroſe Dudley, and Robert Dudley, Knights, the Lady Mary Sidney, and Lady Catherine Haſtings, and every of them, and their heirs, and the heirs of every of them, from henceforth, may, and ſhall, by authority of this act, be reſtored and enabled in blood and name, and made heir and heirs, as well to the ſaid Sir John Dudley, Knight, late Duke of Northumberland, their ſaid father, as alſo to any other their aunceſtor or aunceſtors, lyneal or collateral, in ſuch manner and form, as if the ſaid late Duke their father, or they, or any of them, had never byn attainted, and as yf no ſuch attainder or attainders were, or had byn had: the corruption of bloud between the ſaid late Duke their father, and your ſaid ſubjects, or any of them, or the corruption of bloud between your ſaid ſubjects, and any other their aunceſtor, or aunceſtors, or any act of Parliament, or judgment at Common-Law, concerning the attainder of the ſaid late Duke their father, or of the ſaid Sir Ambroſe Dudley, or of the ſaid Sir Robert Dudley, or any of them, or any other thing, whereby the bloud of the ſaid late Duke their father, or of the ſaid Sir Ambroſe Dudley, or of the ſaid Sir Robert Dudley, or any of them, is, ſhould, or might be, corrupted, &c. And it was alſo enacted, that the ſaid Ambroſe Dudley, and Robert Dudley, the Lady Mary Sidney, and the Lady Catherine Haſtings, and every

the acceſſion of Queen Elizabeth, he became immediately one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons at her Court, and was called, as in the days of her brother, Lord Ambroſe Dudley (m). In the firſt year of her reign, he obtained a grant of the manor of Kibworth Beauchamp in the county of Leiceſter, to be held by the ſervice of Pantler to the Kings and Queens of this realm at their coronation (n), which ſeemed to be a happy omen of the reſtitution of his family, ſince that office had been, by his father, and other his anceſtors Earls of Warwick, enjoyed. In the firſt promotion, however, he had no higher preferment given him, and was alſo paſſed by in the firſt creation of Peers (o). In the ſecond year of her reign, the Queen beſtowed on him a much ſtronger mark of her kindneſs, by advancing him to the great office of Maſter of the Ordnance (p), and to ſhew her confidence in him the greater, he was ſo conſtituted for life. On Chriſtmas-day, in the fourth year of her reign, he had the antient honour of his family, though with ſome change in the title, conferred upon him, being created, by Patent, Baron of Kingſton L'Iſle, in the county of Berks, in conſideration of his illuſtrious blood, fidelity, valour, prudence, and other great merits, as the preamble of that patent recites (q); and the very next day was advanced to the honour of Earl of Warwick, with very ſingular circumſtances of the Queen's eſteem [B]. It was about this time judged neceſſary to ſend over a body of troops to Normandy, upon a promiſe made by the Proteſtants to Queen Elizabeth, that they ſhould have a very important port put into their hands; which being conſidered as a matter of the higheſt importance, the Council recommended to her the Earl of Warwick, as the propereſt perſon to be entruſted with the command. Accordingly, in the Autumn of 1562, he was honoured with a commiſſion to be the Queen's Lieutenant in Normandy, where the important town of Havre de Grace, called by our writers New Haven, was delivered to him, and he was with great ſolemnity ſworn into his office (r). He behaved himſelf, in the courſe of that expedition, with the greateſt courage and conduct, executed the Queen's orders with the utmoſt punctuality, and when he found himſelf ſhut up in the place, defended it with all the firmneſs and prudence imaginable; neither would he deliver it up, though warmly preſſed by a great army, and attacked within by famine and peſtilence, till he received the Queen's expreſs commands, and then obtained an honourable capitulation (s) [C]. While he commanded in France, the Queen cauſed him to be elected Knight every of them, and their heirs, &c. ſhall be enabled to demand, aſk, have, hold, and enjoy, all ſuch lands, tenements, and hereditaments, &c. which at any time hereafter ſhall deſcend, come, remain, or revert from any their aunceſtor or aunceſtors, as if the ſaid Duke their father, or any of them had never byn attainted, and as though no ſuch attainder of their ſaid late father, or of them, or any of them, had ever been had or made.

[B] With very ſingular circumſtances of the Queen's eſteem.] It is no unreaſonable conjecture, that the Queen had the raiſing of this noble perſon and his brother much at heart, from the very beginning of her reign; at which, though ſome hiſtorians affect much amazement, and have recourſe to the influence of the ſtars, to account for what they could not comprehend (3), there ſeems, however, to be no great difficulty in the caſe. In her youth, the princeſs Elizabeth had converſed very intimately with Ambroſe and Robert Dudley, ſaw them high in her brother King Edward's favour, and probably had made uſe of their intereſt in thoſe times of proſperity. They had been alſo, abating the great diſtance in their rank, companions in adverſity under Queen Mary; nor is it at all improbable, that they might render the Princeſs Elizabeth very acceptable ſervice, during the latter part of that reign, when both the brothers had recovered ſome degree of favour. But, notwithſtanding all this, the Queen proceeded ſlowly, and with much deliberation. The preamble to his patent for the Earldom of Warwick ſets forth (4): That the Queen conſidering that the way to increaſe herr oyal dignity is by advancing men to titles of honour, eminent for their abilities and valour, and, of ſuch, the more ſhe prefers, the brighter her crown ſhines: And Sir Ambroſe Dudley, Knight, Baron L'Iſle, being lawfully deſcended from the illuſtrious and ancient race of the Earls of Warwick, as alſo he is at the preſent eldeſt ſon of John, late Duke of Northumberland, and Earl of Warwick: She therefore being willing to reſtore the family, has created him Earl of Warwick, by girding him with a ſword, and placing a cap of honour and circle on his head; to hold to him, and the heirs male of his body, with remainder to Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, Maſter of the Horſe to her Majeſty, otherwiſe called Sir Robert Dudley, Knt. brother of the ſaid Sir Ambroſe Dudley, Knight, Baron L'Iſle, and now Earl of Warwick, and to the heirs male of the body of the ſaid Sir Robert, with a grant of twenty pounds annually, out of the fee-farm rent of the city of Coventry, payable by the ſheriff and citizens of the ſaid city.

[C] And then obtained an honourable capitulation.] About this time, the firſt civil wars on the account of religion broke out in France, King Charles IX. being then in his minority. The Guiſes, who were at the head of the Papiſts, had the King, and the Queen his mother, in their hands, which induced the Prince of Condé, and the other chiefs of the Proteſtants, to deſire the protection of Queen Elizabeth, which ſhe accordingly granted. The Earl of Warwick embarked at Portſmouth, October the 17th, 1562, but was obliged by ill weather to put into Dover, whence he ſailed again, and was again forced back, ſo that he did not arrive at Newhaven till the 29th of the ſame month. He found the place in the hands of Sir Adrian Poynings, who had taken poſſeſſion of it on the 2d of September. While the civil war continued, the Engliſh Lord Lieutenant, gave all the aſſiſtance poſſible to the Proteſtants, but they, having made up their quarrel with the Court, declared againſt the Engliſh; upon which, the Lord Lieutenant obliged all the French to quit the town (5). It was not long before the place was inveſted by a numerous army, under the command of the Conſtable Montmorency, the Proteſtants being as active againſt the Engliſh as any, that they might recover the favour of the Court. The place was quickly deprived of freſh water, partly through the dryneſs of the ſeaſon, and partly by the pains taken by the French to cut off the aqueducts, which obliged the ſoldiers to boil their victuals in ſalt water. This produced an epidemic diſtemper, by which numbers periſhed. Notwithſtanding all this, the Lord-Lieutenant continued to make an obſtinate defence, and frequently repulſed the French in their aſſaults, as is very largely related by our own hiſtorians, and is alſo clearly admitted by theirs (6). The Queen, having intelligence of the ſtate that things were in, expreſſed with tears her commiſeration for her ſubjects, and that ſhe

Knight of the Garter, and the enſigns of the Order were ſent over to him thither (t). Upon his return, he was received with great kindneſs by his Sovereign, who continued to him her accuſtomed favour, and gave him, upon many occaſions, extraordinary marks of her confidence. In 1566, he was created Doctor of Laws by the Univerſity of Oxford (u), and, in 1568, he was added, with ſome other Noblemen, to the Lords of her Majeſty's Privy-Council, as a Commiſſioner in the great cauſe of the Queen of Scots, upon her retiring into England; and took the oath of ſecrecy impoſed upon that occaſion (w). In 1569, he, together with the Lord Clinton, was appointed jointly and ſeverally the Queen's Lieutenants in the North, upon that dangerous rebellion which broke out under the Earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, which, by his care and vigilance, was happily ſuppreſſed. In 1570, the Queen was pleaſed to grant him the office of Chief-Butler of England (x). In the beginning of the ſucceeding year, when the unfortunate Thomas Duke of Norfolk was brought to his trial before George Earl of Shrewſbury as Lord High-Steward of England, he was one of the Peers appointed, by the Queen's Commiſſion, to ſit upon the trial (y). In the ſame year he was ſworn one of the Members of her Majeſty's Moſt Honourable Privy-Council (z). We find him in all the great and public ſervices during this active and buſy reign, but never in any of the intrigues with which it was blemiſhed; for he was a man of great ſweetneſs of temper, and of unexceptionable character, ſo that he was beloved by all parties, and hated by none (a). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf particularly as the zealous patron of the trade and manufactures of his country, which induced him to promote a deſign, formed by ſome Merchants of London, for opening the trade to Barbary; which, however, was not attended with ſo much good fortune as they expected; upon which that noble Lord, in 1585, procured a licence from the Queen, for the ſole tranſporting of cloths into thoſe parts for two years, that Thomas Starkey, Gerrard Gore, and other Merchants of London, who were embarked in the firſt unfortunate adventure, might repair the loſſes they had ſuſtained (b). In 1586, he was one of the Peers that aſſiſted at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and to whom, as a perſon for whom ſhe had a particular regard, that unfortunate Princeſs addreſſed herſelf when the Aſſembly broke up (c). In the laſt years of his life he endured great pain and miſery, from the wound received in his leg when he defended Newhaven againſt the French, and this, at laſt brought him ſo low, that, ſubmitting to the opinion of Phyſicians and Surgeons, he conſented to an amputation, which was accordingly performed, but without ſucceſs, ſo that he departed this life ſoon after at Bedford-Houſe, Bloomſbury, February 20th, 1589, when he was about the age of threeſcore (d). As the long decline of his health gave him timely notice of his approaching death, he made a long and very remarkable will, ſome few paſſages of which the reader will find in the notes [D]. This noble perſon was ſhe might no longer expoſe ſo many brave men at once to ſickneſs and the ſword; ſhe publicly applauded their noble courage, and at the ſame time directed the Earl of Warwick to capitulate upon honourable terms. He ſent accordingly commiſſioners to treat, and on this occaſion, going himſelf upon the rampart, without armour, to ſpeak to a French officer of diſtinction, he was baſely, and againſt the rules of war, ſhot with a poiſoned bullet in the leg, which proved not only the cauſe of his loſing that limb, but afterwards his life (7). It was not long before the articles of ſurrender were adjuſted, and were in ſubſtance theſe, viz. That the town, with all the ammunition, ſhipping, and furniture, which belonged to the French King and his ſubjects, ſhould be ſurrendered: That the large tower ſhould forthwith be delivered up to Montmorency: That the priſoners taken on both ſides ſhould be exchanged without ranſom; and that the Engliſh ſhould have free liberty to depart in ſix days, if the wind ſerved, with all things that belonged to the Queen and them. The hoſtages delivered were, Sir Oliver Manners, the Earl of Rutland's brother; the captains, Leighton, Pelham, and Horſey. The laſt that ſtayed, ſays Camden, was Colonel Edward Randolph, who, out of a piety, never enough to be commended, carried upon his ſhoulders the ſick and deceaſed ſoldiers into the ſhips. Thus was Newhaven, after it had ſtood the ſiege of a ſickneſs, more violent than the enemies fire, left at laſt to the French, after the Engliſh had been maſters of it eleven months. The ſoldiers, that were brought back to England ſick of the infection, ſcattered the bad influence thereof ſo unhappily, that it ſeized on the whole kingdom in a miſerable manner, and there were carried out of the city of London alone, which then conſiſted of an hundred and twenty-one pariſhes, twenty-one thouſand five hundred and thirty-corps (8).

DUDLEY (ROBERT), Baron of Denbigh, and Earl of Leiceſter, ſon of John, Duke of Northumberland, and brother to Ambroſe, Earl of Warwick, before-mentioned. We have no certainty at all as to the time of his birth, or diſtinct account of the manner of his education, excepting that he had a competent knowledge of the Latin tongue, and was thoroughly verſed in the Italian (a). He received the honour of knighthood when he was but a youth, and came very early into the ſervice and favour of King Edward (b). It was one of his father's maxims to marry his children while they were young, as the ſureſt means of fixing their fortunes, bringing them into a ſettled courſe of life, and giving him an opportunity of procuring for them valuable grants or places of honour and profit. Accordingly, June the 4th, 1550, being the day after the marriage of his brother the Lord L'Iſle to the Duke of Somerſet's daughter, Sir Robert Dudley eſpouſed Amy, daughter of Sir John Robſart (c), at Sheen in Surrey, the King honouring their nuptials with his preſence [A]. He was, not long

(c) See this explained in the note.

[A] The King honouring their nuptials with his preſence.] There is not any article in this collection, encumbered with more difficulties than this of Queen Elizabeth's diſtinguiſhed favourite, the third in deſcent of the ſame family, to the third in deſcent of the ſame royal houſe. Edmund Dudley, Eſq; was the chief Miniſter of Henry VII. John, Viſcount L'Iſle, honoured, living and dying, with the favour of King Henry VIII.; and, by the title of Northumberland, ruling all things under Edward VI.; and this Robert, Earl of Leiceſter, from the very entrance of Queen Elizabeth's reign, taking in the ſpace of nearly thirty years, in as high credit and power as a ſubject could be. But notwithſtanding all this, and that hardly any nobleman's name occurs more frequently in our Hiſtories, yet there are many particulars relating to his life, which are very obſcure, chiefly from the different views which thoſe perſons had, by whom they were recorded, and theſe we ſhall principally endeavour to clear up, as far as the narrow bounds which the nature of ſuch a collection preſcribes will allow.

As to this marriage, King Edward enters it thus in his journal (1). 'June 4, 1550, Sir Robert Dudley, 'third ſon to the Earl of Warwick, married Sir John 'Robſart's daughter, after which marriage, there were 'certain gentlemen that did ſtrive who ſhould firſt 'take away a gooſe's head, which was hanged alive 'on two croſs poſts.' Authors differ as to the name of this lady. Brooke, in his firſt edition (2), calls her Amy, in which he agrees with ſome ancient authorities that I have ſeen; but in the ſecond edition, following the general courſe of other authors, he ſtyles her Anne (3), and indeed, in old writings it is very difficult to diſtinguiſh between Amie and Anne. She was a very conſiderable heireſs, and deſcended of a noble family in Norfolk, one of her anceſtors by the father's ſide having been a peer of the realm in the reign of Henry V. and two of them Knights of the Garter in the reign of that prince and of his ſon (4). So that, as we obſerved in the text, this match, at the time it was made, agreed perfectly with his father's maxim, and afforded Sir Robert Dudley a very good eſtabliſhment for a younger brother, which he improved, by procuring grants to his father-in-law and himſelf.

after, made Maſter of the King's Buckhounds for life (d); and, on the 15th of Auguſt, 1551, he was ſworn one of the Six Gentlemen of the King's Chamber in Ordinary, together with Mr. Barnaby Fitzpatrick (e). In the month of October he was, amongſt many other perſons of diſtinction, appointed to wait upon the Queen-Dowager of Scotland, and appears to have had a ſhare in moſt of the King's diverſions, who gave him, upon all occaſions, very pregnant marks of his ſingular affection (f). In the firſt year of Queen Mary he fell into the ſame misfortunes with the reſt of his family, was brought priſoner from the Queen's camp to London, ſent to the Tower, indicted of high-treaſon, and, upon his pleading guilty (g), received ſentence of death, but was pardoned for life, and ſet at liberty October 18th, 1554 (h). He was reſtored in blood at the ſame time, and by the ſame Act of Parliament, with his brother (i), but had the advantage of him in one reſpect, being raiſed to the important poſt of Maſter of the Ordnance by Queen Mary (k), which has been thought to give ſome credit to the earlieſt piece of ſecret hiſtory that is to be met with in reſpect to this great man, if we except what regards King Edward's death (l); though, perhaps, both are without foundation [B]. On the acceſſion of Queen Elizabeth it very ſoon appeared, that the change of Sovereigns had created no alteration but in the degree of his favour. He was immediately entertained at Court as one of the new Queen's principal favourites, promoted to the office of Maſter of the Horſe, with the fee of one hundred marks per annum (m), and named firſt in the commiſſion for compounding with ſuch as might be called to receive the honour of knighthood at the Queen's coronation, by the name of Lord Robert Dudley (n). On the 4th of June 1559, he was inſtalled Knight of the Moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and ſworn of the Council (o). Theſe great preferments excited ſome degree of envy, the rather, becauſe this noble perſon, in compliance with his Sovereign's humour, and perhaps with his own, lived at a very high rate, and, in point of magnificence, ſurpaſſed moſt of the Nobility, though he had not as yet any other title than what he derived from curteſy. In 1562, he obtained from the Queen the Caſtle and Manor of Kenilworth, together with Aſtel-Grove in Warwickſhire, the Lordſhips, Manors, and Caſtles, of Denbigh and Chirk, of very large value (p). The ſame year he became High-Steward of the Univerſity of Cambridge, and obtained prodigious grants from the Crown, and from others, in virtue of that influence which he was known to have at Court [C]. All things gave way, at this time, to his ambition, influence, [B] Though perhaps both are without foundation.] We are told, in that famous book which is aſcribed to Parſons the Jeſuit, that at the very cloſe of King Edward's reign, the Duke of Northumberland wrote flattering letters to the Lady Mary, promiſing to aſſiſt in eſtabliſhing her ſucceſſion (5), which ſeems not a little incredible. It is not however at all unlikely, that his younger ſons, Ambroſe and Robert, might expreſs an affection for her cauſe, and a great unwillingneſs to act againſt her, which turned afterwards highly to their advantage. But in this, as in the ſucceeding reign, the younger brother ſhewed himſelf the more expert courtier of the two, attaching himſelf wholly to King Philip after his marriage; ſo that we find him made choice of to carry meſſages between the King and Queen, riding poſt (6) upon ſuch occaſions, and neglecting nothing that might ingratiate him with either of theſe princes. This aſſiduity recommended him to the poſt he obtained under the Queen, and in all probability he had a great ſhare in King Philip's favour, not only then, but long after, which, at the firſt acceſſion of Queen Elizabeth, he employed for her ſervice, and was for ſome years looked upon as a perſon well-affected to his Catholic Majeſty, and rather a friend than an enemy to the Popiſh intereſt; yet without running any hazards in their defence, and purely by obſerving great civility towards them, which he afterwards excuſed out of gratitude for favours formerly received. But when the Papiſts felt the ſeverity of the laws, and ſaw this noble perſon ſet himſelf at the head of the Puritans, they made no ſcruple of affirming loudly, that he was once theirs; that, if Queen Mary had lived, he would have neglected nothing to ingratiate himſelf with her; and that, following his father's example, he was ready to embrace, or at leaſt to profeſs, any creed that might promote his own progreſs at Court, and leſſen the greatneſs of thoſe who refuſed to depend upon him.

[C] Which he was known to have at Court.] The intelligent reader will obſerve, that, notwithſtanding the revenues of the Crown were far inferior in thoſe days to what they are now, yet ſuch as had the favour of the Prince knew how to turn it to greater advantage than can be done at this day; as, for inſtance, the Earl of Leiceſter having obtained a licence for tranſporting cloths ſold it immediately, to ſome of the Merchant-Adventurers, for the ſum of ſix thouſand two hundred ſixty-ſix pounds thirteen ſhillings and four pence (7). He made ſuch a diſplay of his power over the Queen his miſtreſs's mind, that even her beſt friends and oldeſt ſervants were glad to court his favour, as appears by a letter in a very humble ſtyle from Sir William Cecil, afterwards Lord Burleigh, with a preſent (8). By the reputation of this high influence, he obtained whatever he ſought, almoſt from all hands. As for example, he had a patent for the ſtewardſhip of the Biſhoprick of Ely, confirmed by the Dean and Chapter of that place, alſo the office of Chamberlain of the County Palatine of Cheſter. And theſe following were after conferred on him: the ſtewardſhip of the foreſt of Snoden; the ſtewardſhip of Reading; the ſtewardſhip of Abingdon; the ſtewardſhip of Harrow on the Hill, from Roger, Lord North. The ſtewardſhip of Texbury, Cleve, Swell, and Longney, with the fees of eleven pounds per annum, and the Bailiwick, with the fees of ſixty-ſix ſhillings and eight pence. The ſtewardſhip of Clun. A patent of maſter of the game and liberties belonging to the Biſhoprick of Coventry and Lichfield, with licence to muſter his tenants, &c. with a fee of ten pounds per annum. A patent from the Archbiſhop of York, of the high ſtewardſhip of his poſſeſſions, and Maſter of his Game, with a fee of ten pounds. The ſtewardſhip of the Church of Norwich, with a fee of ten pounds. A grant of a rent-charge of ſix pounds per annum, from the Biſhop of Wincheſter, for the term of his life, out of the manor of Taunton, and other lands in Somerſetſhire, confirmed by the Dean and Chapter. The ſtewardſhip of the lands of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and a rent-charge of ten pounds per annum, granted by the Dean and Chapter of Chriſt Church of Canterbury. And a patent in reverſion of the ſtewardſhip of the lands of the Biſhop of London, with a fee of ten pounds per annum, granted by Edwin, Biſhop of London, and a confirmation of the ſame from the Dean and Chapter. The ſtewardſhip of the honour of Tickhall, with the accuſtomed fee; the ſtewardſhip of the city of Briſtol, with the fee of four pounds; alſo the ſtewardſhip of the Biſhop-fluence, or policy; ſo that whatever he deſired for himſelf, or his friends, were obtained as ſoon as demanded. He had a grant of Windſor-Park, in terms as ample as he could deſire or the Queen could give (q). In his attendance on the Queen, when ſhe viſited the Univerſity of Cambridge, the higheſt reverence was paid him He was lodged in Trinity-College, conſulted in all things, requeſts made to the Queen through him, and, Auguſt 10th, 1564, he, on his knees, entreated the Queen to ſpeak to the Univerſity in Latin, which ſhe accordingly did (r). At Court, however, Thomas, Earl of Suſſex ſhewed himſelf averſe to his counſels, and ſtrongly promoted the overture of a marriage between the Queen and the Archduke Charles of Auſtria, as much more worthy of ſuch a Princeſs than any ſubject of her own, let his qualities be what they would. This was reſented by Lord Robert, who inſinuated, that foreign alliances were always fatal, that her ſiſter Mary never knew an eaſy minute after her marriage with King Philip, and that her Majeſty ought to conſider ſhe was herſelf deſcended of ſuch a marriage as, by thoſe lofty notions, was decried; ſo that ſhe ſhould not contemn an alliance with the Nobility of England, but ſhe muſt, at the ſame time, reflect on her father's choice and her mother's family (s). Theſe diſputes created a kind of civil war in the very palace, both lords openly avowing their diſtaſte to each other, and keeping their ſervants armed about their perſons, and, whenever they went abroad, as if things were to be decided by the ſword. But the Queen, taking up the matter, reconciled them, or rather prevented an open rupture (t). But this was done without any diminution of Lord Robert Dudley's aſcendency, who continued daily to ſolicit and obtain new grants and offices for himſelf, and his dependants, which, by degrees, grew ſo numerous, and made ſo great a figure, that he was ſtyled the "Heart of the Court" by the common people. It was thought neceſſary to give ſome colour to theſe extraordinary marks of royal indulgence; and therefore the Queen thought proper to propoſe him as a ſuitor to the Queen of Scots, promiſing that Princeſs all the advantages that ſhe could expect or deſire, either for herſelf or her ſubjects, in caſe ſhe conſented to the match (u). The ſincerity of this was ſuſpected at that time, when the deepeſt Politicians believed, that, if the Queen of Scotland had complied, it would have ſerved only to countenance the preferring him to his Sovereign's bed. But the French faction at the Court of Queen Mary repreſented to her, that ſuch a ſtep would be highly diſhonourable to a Queen-Dowager of France, and a Queen of Scotland in her own right; which induced her to reject the propoſal (w) in a manner that, ſome have thought, proved as fatal to her as to another Lady, who was ſuppoſed to be ſacrificed to his ambition of marrying a Queen (x) [D]. Whatever truth there might be in theſe ſuggeſtions,

[D] To his ambition of marrying a Queen.] The death of this lady happened Sept. 8, 1560, at a very unlucky juncture for the Earl's reputation, becauſe the world at that time conceived it might be much for his conveniency to be without a wife, this iſland then holding two Queens, young and without huſbands. The manner too of this poor lady's death, which Mr. Camden ſays, was by a fall from a high place (10), was another untoward circumſtance, which, added to the number of this favourite's enemies, filled the world with the rumour of a lamentable tragedy. The reader will perhaps expect to be gratified with ſome account of this, and it ſo falls out, that the induſtrious John Aubrey, Eſq; ſpeaking of Cumnor, in Berkſhire, where this happened, inſerts the following relation, which is very circumſtantial, and carries in it ſtrong pretences to abſolute certainty. At all events it is very curious, and much clearer than any thing elſe that is to be met with on this ſubject (11). 'Robert Dudley, Earl of 'Leiceſter, a very goodly perſonage, being a great 'favourite to Queen Elizabeth, it was thought, and 'commonly reported, that had he been a bachelor or 'widower, the Queen would have made him her huſ'band. To this end, to free himſelf of all obſtacles, 'he with fair flattering intreaties, deſires his wife to 'repoſe herſelf here, at his ſervant Anthony Forſter's 'houſe, who then lived in the manor-houſe of this 'place; and alſo preſcribed to Sir Richard Varney (a 'prompter to this deſign) at his coming hither, that 'he ſhould firſt attempt to poiſon her, and if that did 'not take effect, then by any other way whatſoever 'to diſpatch her. This was proved by the report of 'Dr. Walter Bayley, ſome time Fellow of New-Col'lege, then living in Oxford, and Profeſſor of Phyſick 'in that Univerſity; who becauſe he would not con'ſent to take away her life by poiſon, the Earl endea'voured to diſplace him. This man reported for cer'tain, that there was a practice in Cumnor, among 'the conſpirators, to have poiſoned this innocent lady 'a little before ſhe was killed, which was attempted 'after this manner. They ſeeing her ſad and heavy, 'as one that well knew by her other handling, that 'her death was not far off, began to perſuade her, that 'her preſent diſeaſe was melancholy and other hu'mours, and would needs counſel her to take ſome 'potion; which ſhe abſolutely refuſing to do, as ſuſ'pecting the worſt, they ſent a meſſenger for Dr. 'Bayley, and intreated him to perſuade her to take 'ſome little potion by his direction, and they would 'fetch the ſame at Oxford, meaning to have added 'ſomething of their own for her comfort, as the Doc'tor upon juſt cauſe and conſideration did ſuſpect, ſee'ing their great importunity, and the ſmall need the 'lady had of phyſick, and therefore he peremptorily 'denied their requeſt, miſdoubting, as he afterwards 'reported, leſt, had they poiſoned her under the name 'of his potion, he might after have been hanged for 'a colour of their ſin; and the Doctor remained ſtill 'well aſſured, that this way taking no effect, ſhe 'would not long eſcape their violence, which after'wards happened thus. Sir Richard Varney, who, 'by the Earl's order, remained that day of her death 'alone with her, with one man only; and Forſter, 'who had that day forcibly ſent away all her ſervants 'from her to Abingdon fair, about three miles diſtant 'from this place; they firſt ſtifling her, or elſe ſtran'gling her, afterwards flung her down a pair of ſtairs 'and broke her neck, uſing much violence upon her; 'but, however, though it was reported, that ſhe by 'chance fell down ſtairs, but ſtill, without hurting 'her hood that was upon her head; yet the inhabi'tants, geſtions, very certain it is, that, on the 28th of September, 1564, the Queen created him Baron of Denbigh (y), and the next day Earl of Leiceſter, with all the ceremony imaginable, which, in the preamble of the patent, is ſaid to be in conſideration of his noble blood, great loyalty, eminent valour, diſtinguiſhed prudence, and other numerous virtues; as alſo on account of his being lawfully deſcended from the illuſtrious and antient Earls of Warwick (z). He received, before the cloſe of the year, a very conſiderable addition to his new honours, by being elected Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford (a). His great influence in the Court of England was not only known at home but abroad, which induced the French King, Charles IX. to ſend him, as well as the Duke of Norfolk, the Order of St. Michael, then the moſt honourable in France; and both theſe great Peers were inſtalled, with the greateſt ſolemnity poſſible, January 24th, 1565 (b), and a very particular relation of the whole ceremony has been carefully preſerved to poſterity (c). If we may truſt the reports of Camden, and other Hiſtorians, he was the principal mover in the affair of the Duke of Norfolk's ſuit to the Queen of Scots, which proved ſo fatal to them both (d). The Duke wanted not friends to diſſuade him from that dangerous enterprize, or to ſhew him how much hazard he might run, by exciting the hate of the Queen, through his diſcovering ſo much affection for the other; but Leiceſter infuſed bolder counſels, and made him believe, that Queen Elizabeth ſhould not have power to hinder or reſent his marriage if ſhe would (e). But he was fatally deceived, and, as the Lord Burleigh long before hinted to him, the purſuit of that match coſt him his head; the Earl of Leiceſter being one of thoſe Peers that ſat in judgment upon him in 1572, and condemned him to death (f). About this time it is ſuppoſed, and ſome writers pretend that it has been legally proved, that the Earl married Douglas, Baroneſs-Dowager of Sheffield (g); which, however, was carried with ſuch privacy, that it did not come to the Queen's ears, though a great deal of ſecret hiſtory was publiſhed, even in thoſe days, concerning the adventures of this unfortunate Lady [E]. One might be tempted to ſuppoſe, notwithſtanding the confidence with which

'tants will tell you there, that ſhe was conveyed from 'her uſual chamber where ſhe lay to another, where 'the bed's head of the chamber ſtood cloſe to a privy 'poſtern door, where they in the night came and 'ſtifled her in bed, bruiſed her head very much, broke 'her neck, and at length flung her down ſtairs, thereby 'believing the world would have thought it a miſ'chance, and ſo have blinded their villany. But be'hold the mercy and juſtice of God in diſcovering this 'lady's murther; for, one of the two perſons, that was 'a coadjutor in this murder, was afterwards taken 'for felony in the Marches of Wales, and offering to 'publiſh the manner of the aforeſaid murder, was 'privately made away in the priſon, by the Earl's 'appointment; and Sir Richard Varney, the other, 'dying about the ſame time in London, cried miſe'rably, and ſaid to a perſon of note, not long before 'his death, that all the devils in hell did tear him in 'pieces. Forſter, likewiſe, after this fact, being a 'man formerly addicted to hoſpitality, company, 'mirth, and muſick, was afterwards obſerved to for'ſake all this with much melancholy and penſiveneſs; 'ſome ſay with madneſs, pined and drooped away. 'The wife alſo of Bald Butler, kinſman to the Earl, 'gave out the whole fact a little before her death. 'Neither are the following paſſages to be forgotten, 'that, as ſoon as ſhe was murdered, they made great 'haſte to bury her before the Coroner had given in 'his inqueſt; which the Earl himſelf condemned, as 'not done adviſedly, and her father, Sir John Robert'ſett, hearing, came with all ſpeed hither, cauſed her 'corpſe to be taken up, the Coroner to ſit upon her, 'and further enquiry to be made concerning this bu'ſineſs to the full; but it was generally thought, that 'the Earl ſtopped his mouth; and to make plain to 'the world, the great love he bare to her while alive, 'and what a grief the loſs of ſo virtuous a lady was to 'his tender heart, cauſed her body to be re-buried in 'St. Mary's church, in Oxford, with great pomp and 'ſolemnity. It is alſo remarkable, that Dr. Babing'ton, the Earl's chaplain, preaching the funeral ſer'mon, tript once or twice in his ſpeech, by recom'mending to their memories that virtuous lady ſo 'pitifully ſlain.' There are ſome things in this account not very conſiſtent, which, in ſo dark an affair, is not at all ſtrange: but, with reſpect to the leaſt intelligible paſſage of all, which is her father's being ſo ſilent about a matter which opened the mouths of all the world beſides, a very probable account may be given, which is this: the inquiſition taken after the death of this Lady, was to determine who were her heirs; for, her father was long before dead, and this was a reaſon that inquiſition produced no other effect, than preſerving the family-eſtate, which was very conſiderable, to John Walpole, Eſq; anceſtor to the preſent Earl of Orford. It may not be amiſs to obſerve, that the Lord Robert Robſart came over from the Low Countries with King Edward III. and that he left behind him three ſons, John, Lewis, and Theodorick; or, as we wrote it in thoſe days, Tyrrey. Lewis, the ſecond brother, became Lord Bourchier by his marriage, and was a Knight of the Order of the Garter, but, dying in the life-time of his elder brother, he became his heir (12). This Sir John Robſart was alſo a Knight of the Garter, and, dying in 1450, left his eſtate to Sir John Robſart, his ſon, who had iſſue, Sir Theodorick or Sir Tyrrey Robſart, who married the daughter and heireſs of Sir Thomas Syderſton, in the County of Norfolk, by whom he had iſſue, Sir John Robſart, and a daughter Lucy, who married Edward Walpole, Eſq. of Houghton (13). Sir John Robſart left behind him an only daughter, Amy, who was the wife of Lord Robert Dudley, and by the inquiſition before-mentioned, John Walpole, Eſq. in right of his mother Lucy Robſart, aunt to this unfortunate Lady, was found to be her next heir, and came into poſſeſſion of her lands (14).

[E] Concerning the adventures of this unfortunate Lady.] It may ſeem a little ſtrange, to inſert, in the notes of a ſtateſman's life, the memoirs of ſeveral ladies, and of many of his intrigues; but the misfortune is, that we have no remedy. The learned Camden, and the judicious Sir William Dugdale, have been forced to take the ſame method, which, as it is a proof of the neceſſity, ſo it amounts to a vindication of the practice. This Lady Douglas Howard was the grand-daughter of Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, the daughter of William Howard, the firſt Baron of Effingham, and Knight of the Garter, and the widow of John, Lord Sheffield, of Butterwick, who died ſuddenly of an extreme rheum in his head, which the malicious people of thoſe times called a Leiceſter cold (15). It is beyond all doubt, that the Earl of Leiceſter had by her a ſon, Sir Robert Dudley, of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, and to whom, by the name of his baſe ſon, he left the bulk of his fortune, as alſo a daughter. It likewiſe appeared by depoſitions taken long after in the Star-Chamber, upon the oath of Lady Douglas Sheffield which theſe ſtories are told, that they muſt be exaggerated at leaſt, if not falſe, ſince the Earl, at this juncture, obtained an Act of Parliament to enable him to erect an Hoſpital at Warwick; which he afterwards did, and plentifully endowed it, that it might bear his name, and preſerve his memory as a moſt religious perſon, the character which of all others he moſt affected, to ſucceeding times (b) [F]. Yet very great doubts have been moved upon this ſubject, ſome affirming, that, in the former part of his life, he inclined to favour the Papiſts, but, at the perſuaſion of his friend Lord North, altered his conduct, and became the patron of the Puritans (i). In the thirteenth of Queen Elizabeth, he procured, from the Earl of Arundel, an aſſignment of the Wardenſhip of Sheffield herſelf, and of ſeveral other perſons, that ſhe having been firſt contracted in Cannon-Row (16), within the liberties of Weſtminſter, about two years before, was ſolemnly wedded to him at Eſher, in the County of Surrey, by a lawful Miniſter, according to the form of matrimony by law eſtabliſhed in the Church of England, in the preſence of Sir Edward Horſey, Knight, who gave her in marriage, as alſo of Robert Sheffield, Eſq. Dr. Julio, Henry Frodſham, and five other perſons, whoſe names are there ſpecified, and that the ring, wherewith they were ſo married, was ſet with five pointed diamonds and a table diamond, which had been given to him by the then Earl of Pembroke's grandfather, upon condition, that he ſhould not beſtow it upon any but whom he did make his wife. Likewiſe, that the Duke of Norfolk was the principal mover of that marriage; but that this Earl, pretending a fear of the Queen's indignation, in caſe it ſhould come to her knowledge, made her to vow not to reveal it till he gave leave, whereupon all her ſervants were commanded ſecrecy therein. And it was alſo farther depoſed, that, within two days after the birth of this Sir Robert Dudley, which happened at Sheen, where he was chriſtened by a Miniſter ſent from Sir Henry Lea, having to his godfathers, the Earl of Warwick his uncle, and the ſame Sir Henry, and to his godmother, the Lady Dacres of the South, by their deputies; the ſaid Lady Douglas, received a letter from this Earl, which one Mrs. Eriſa (then Lady Parker) read, wherein his Lordſhip did thank God for the birth of this his ſon, who might be their comfort and ſtaff of their old age, as are the words of the letter, and ſubſcribed, your loving huſband, Robert Leiceſter. Likewiſe, that the ſaid Lady Douglas was after this ſerved in her chamber as a Counteſs, until he commanded the contrary, for fear the marriage ſhould be diſcloſed. Some of the wits in the Court of Queen Elizabeth, after the Earl's public marriage with the Counteſs Dowager of Eſſex, ſtyled theſe two Ladies, Leiceſter's two Teſtaments, calling Lady Douglas the old, and Lady Lettice the new (17). In order to ſtifle this affair, however, as much as poſſible, the Earl made ſeveral propoſitions to Lady Douglas Sheffield, to deſiſt from her pretenſions, particularly, as ſhe herſelf depoſed, in the cloſe arbour in the Queen's gardens at Greenwich, where, in the preſence of Sir John Hubbard and George Digby, he offered her ſeven hundred pounds a year, adding at the ſame time threats, that, if ſhe would not comply, he would never come near her, nor ſhould ſhe receive from him one penny of money. Being able to do nothing, either by fair means or foul, he went ſomewhat farther, ſo that the poor Lady, to ſhelter herſelf from his reſentment, was conſtrained to marry Sir Edward Stafford, a perſon of high birth, great honour, and the Queen's Embaſſador in France (18), which being, as ſhe herſelf confeſſed, an act which did the greateſt wrong poſſible to her own pretenſions, and to thoſe of her ſon, ſhe upon her oath declared, that her motive thereto was this, that, having had ſome ill potions given her, which occaſioned the loſs of her hair and nails, ſhe knew no other way to preſerve her life (19). Such is the hiſtory of the Lady Douglas, whom ſome reckon the ſecond wife of this potent Earl.

And if the ſaid Earl, or his ‘ heir or heirs, did not from time to time, within three ‘ months next after the ſaid twelve brethren, or any of ‘ them ſhould die, reſign, be deprived, or otherwiſe ‘ lawfully removed from the ſaid Hoſpital; then ſuch ‘ perſon and perſons, as from time to time, upon the ‘ default of the ſaid Earl, and his heirs, in form afore- ‘ ſaid, ſhould be appointed, and preferred to be a ‘ brother, or brethren, by the Biſhop of Worceſter ‘ for the time being, and the recorders of Coventry ‘ and Warwick for the time being, or any two of ‘ them, under hands and ſeals, ſhould be a brother ‘ and brethren of the ſaid Hoſpital for ever. New Foreſt, which had been granted to his anceſtors in the ſixth of Edward III (k). He is reported to have had much of his father's temper, which appeared in nothing more than the pains he took to adorn his Caſtle of Kenilworth, and to render it, as his father had done Dudley-Caſtle, one of the faireſt, as well as one of the ſtrongeſt, places in England, which, if Sir William Dugdale was well informed, was a project that coſt him about ſixty thouſand pounds (l). There, in the month of July, 1575, he entertained the Queen his Miſtreſs for ten days, with the greateſt elegance as well as magnificence, at a boundleſs expence (m). Of this, none of the leaſt remarkable tranſactions of his life, ſome farther account is given at the bottom of the page [G]. In 1576 happened the death of Walter, Earl of Eſſex, which, as we have elſewhere ſhewn, drew upon this noble Peer many ſuſpicions, more eſpecially after his marriage with the Counteſs of Eſſex was declared (n); as to which the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee, in the notes, ſome particulars that were reſerved for this place [H]. In 1578, the Duke of Anjou preſſing the match that had been propoſed between him and Queen Elizabeth, and ſending over Monſieur Simier, a very gallant Gentleman, attended by a large train of French Nobility, the Earl of Leiceſter was doubtful whether the marriage might not take effect. The Earl, as it is ſaid by our Hiſtorians, had, ſome time before, ſounded the Queen's diſpoſition in chooſing him for a huſband, and not receiving a favourable anſwer (o), he abandoned all thoughts thereof, and privately married the Counteſs of Eſſex, as before related. This marriage Simier diſcovered to the Queen, apprehending his Lordſhip to be the greateſt bar of the Duke's pretenſions; and Camden relates, that ſhe was ſo enraged thereat, that ſhe commanded him not to ſtir from the Caſtle of Greenwich, deſigning to have committed him to the Tower, but was diſſuaded from it by the Earl of Suſſex (p). This he reſented ſo far as it was thought he had ſome intention to cauſe him to be murthered; and, one day, Simier waiting on her Majeſty in her barge, not far from Greenwich, a gun was diſcharged from a neighbouring boat, and one of the Queen's bargemen wounded through both his arms. This was ſuggeſted to be intended to diſpatch Simier; but, on enquiry, it appeared to have been wholly accidental, [G] At the bottom of the page.] There was a large relation of the Queen's entertainment at this palace, written by George Gaſcoign, Eſq; out of which Sir William Dugdale tells us (23), that the Queen was ſurprized at her entrance with the ſight of a floating iſland on the large pool there, bright blazing with torches, on which were clad in ſilks the Lady of the Lake, and two nymphs waiting on her, who made a ſpeech to the Queen, in metre, of the antiquity and owners of that caſtle, which was cloſed with cornets and other muſick. Within the baſe court, was a noble bridge ſet up of twenty feet wide, and ſeventy feet long, over which the Queen paſſed; on each ſide whereof, on poſts erected, were preſents on them to her by the Gods, viz. a cage of wild fowl, by Sylvanus; divers ſorts of fruits, by Pomona; of corn, by Ceres; of wine, by Bacchus; of ſea-fiſh, by Neptune; of all habiliments of war, by Mars; and of muſical inſtruments, by Phœbus. Alſo, during the ſeveral days of her ſtay, various rare-ſhows and ſports were exerciſed, viz. in the chace, a ſavage man with ſatyrs, bear-baitings, fire-works, Italian tumblers, a country bride-ale, with tunning at the Quinting, and morrice-dancing; and, that nothing might be wanting which thoſe parts could afford, the Coventry men came and acted the ancient play, long ſince uſed in that City, called Hock's Tueſday, ſetting forth the deſtruction of the Danes in King Ethelred's time, which pleaſed the Queen ſo much, that ſhe gave them a brace of bucks, and five marks in money, to bear the charges of a feaſt. Likewiſe on the pool there was a Triton riding on a Mermaid eighteen feet long, as alſo Arion on a Dolphin, with rare muſick. The coſts and expences of theſe entertainments may be gueſſed at by the quantity of beer then drunk, which amounted to three hundred and twenty hogſheads of the ordinary ſort; and, for the greater honour thereof, Sir Thomas Cecil, ſon and heir to the Lord Burghley, Lord Treaſurer; Sir Henry Cobham, brother to the Lord Cobham; Sir Thomas Stanhope, and Sir Thomas Treſham, were then knighted, and, the next enſuing year, the Earl obtained a grant of the Queen for a weekly market at Kenelworth, on the Wedneſday, with a fair yearly on Midſummer-day (24). There is alſo, in Strype (25), a long and very circumſtantial narrative of all that paſſed at this royal viſit, by one who was preſent; and it is very well worth the reading, as it ſhews the temper of the Queen, and manners of thoſe times.

[H] Some particulars that were reſerved for this place.] In that famous book of Parſons the Jeſuit, or whoever elſe was the author of this favourite's ſecret hiſtory, beſides the account quoted in another place, there is a ſhort detail of this iniquitous tranſaction, which follows a hint of Lord Sheffield's being taken off in the ſame manner, and for the ſame reaſon that is, becauſe this great man had a mind to his wife. This relation runs thus (26). 'The like good chance 'had he in the death of my Lord of Eſſex, as I have 'ſaid before, and that at a time moſt fortunate for his 'purpoſe; for, when he was coming home from Ire-'land with intent to revenge himſelf upon my Lord 'of Leiceſter, for begetting his wife with child in his 'abſence (the child was a daughter, and brought up 'by the Lady Shandois, W. Knolles's wife), my Lord 'of Leiceſter hearing thereof, wanted not a friend or 'two to accompany the Deputy, as, among others, a 'couple of the Earl's own ſervants; Crompton, if I 'miſs not his name, yeoman of his bottles; and 'Lloyd, his Secretary, entertained afterwards by my 'Lord of Leiceſter, and ſo he died in the way of an 'extreme flux, cauſed by an Italian recipe, as all his 'friends are well aſſured; the maker whereof was a 'Surgeon, as is believed, that then was newly come 'to my Lord from Italy, a cunning man, and ſure in 'operation.' The judicious Mr. Camden, in treating expreſſly upon this ſubject, leaves it doubtful and open; but, glancing occaſionally at it elſewhere, he ſhews plainly his own belief, that this imputation was not falſe. Sir Robert Naunton goes farther, and having, in all probability, the very book we have firſt cited in his eye, proceeds thus (27). 'I am not bound to 'give credit to all vulgar relations, or to the libels of 'the times, which are commonly forced and falſified, 'ſuitable to the moods and humours of men in paſſion 'and diſcontent; but that which leads me to think 'him no good man, is, amongſt others of known 'truth, that of my Lord of Eſſex's death in Ireland, 'and the marriage of his Lady, yet living, which I 'forbear to preſs, in regard, that he is long ſince 'dead, and others living whom it may concern.'

cidental, and the man, who had been apprehended, was ſet at liberty (q) [I]. The Duke of Anjou ſending an embaſſy, compoſed of ſome perſons of the firſt diſtinction in France, into England, in 1581, they were received by the Queen with all poſſible marks of diſtinction, and the Earl of Leiceſter was one of the Noblemen appointed to confer with them, and that engaged for their diverſion, in juſtings, barriers, and turney; but the people in general ſhewing great diſcontent at the propoſed marriage, it induced the Queen to iſſue her proclamation, under a ſevere penalty, that none of her ſubjects ſhould either ſtrike, or draw weapon, within four miles of London, or the Court (r). And the Duke thinking his preſence might contribute to his point more than the oratory of his Embaſſadors, who ſignified to him the Queen's declining the marriage, he came in perſon to prefer his ſuit; but having remained in England the ſpace of three months, and finding his application to be ineffectual, he ſet out on the ſixth of February for Sandwich (s); the Earl of Leiceſter, with a train of one hundred Gentlemen, and three hundred others of inferior ſort, attending him to Antwerp, as did alſo the Lord Hunſdon, and the Lord Charles Howard, who had each of them one hundred and fifty followers (t). The Confederates of the Low Countries, believing it might pleaſe the Queen, had ſent over their agents to the Duke in England, to deſire he would be their protector againſt the Spaniards, and the Queen promiſing him aid, he accepted of their offer, and, on his arrival at Antwerp, was, with the Earl of Leiceſter, who accompanied him, entertained with great ſtate and ſolemnity; and, having ſeen him inveſted in the government of the ſaid Provinces, the Earl, on the 19th of February, together with the Engliſh Nobility and their trains, returned to England (u). In 1584, he prevailed on the chief of the Nobility and Gentry in the kingdom to ſubſcribe an aſſociation, by which they bound themſelves to purſue unto death, whoſoever ſhould attempt any thing againſt Queen Elizabeth; and this, by ſome authors, is ſaid to be in hatred to the Queen of Scots, and that, a plot being formed to ſet her at liberty, he was for making her privately away (w). His averſion againſt that unhappy Princeſs is ſuppoſed to have riſen from a private view of conveying the Crown into the family of the Dudleys, as a certain author informs us (x), by advancing the Earl of Huntingdon to the Throne, who had a claim to the Crown as being deſcended, in a direct line, from George, Duke of Clarence (y), who had married the ſiſter of the Earl (z), and was ever after cloſely attached to his intereſts [K]. [I] Was ſet at liberty.] It may not be amiſs, for a reaſon which will be hereafter given, to exhibit two accounts that are yet extant of this great Peer's malice to this French gentleman, which aroſe, as the writer of his ſecret hiſtory ſays, from his having had the boldneſs to tell the Queen of the Earl's marriage, with the widow of Eſſex, which though celebrated at Wanſtead, in the preſence of the Earl of Warwick, the Lord North, Sir Francis Knolles, and others, at Mr. Stoner's houſe, by one Dr. Culpeper, a clergyman; yet the Queen heard nothing of it in ſeveral days. This it was that provoked Leiceſter firſt to attempt taking him off by poiſon (28). 'And when that failed, (ſays this author), he appointed, that Robin Tider, 'his man, as after, upon his ale-bench he confeſſed, 'ſhould have ſlain him at the Black-Friars at Greenwich, as he went forth at the garden-gate; but miſſing alſo that purpoſe, for that he found the gentleman better provided and guarded than he expected, 'he dealt with certain Fluſhiners, and other pirates, 'to ſink him at ſea, with the Engliſh gentlemen his 'favourers, that accompanied him at his return into 'France. And though they miſſed of this practice alſo '(as not daring to ſet upon him, for fear of ſome of 'her Majeſty's ſhips, who, to break off this deſignment, 'attended by ſpecial commandment, to waft him over 'in ſafety), yet the aforeſaid Engliſh gentlemen were 'holden four hours in chace at their coming back, as 'Maſter Rowley well knoweth, being then preſent; 'and two of the chaſers, named Clark and Harris, 'confeſſed afterwards the whole deſignment.' Mr. Camden (29), much to the ſame purpoſe, 'That in the 'mean while, Simier continued amorouſly to ſolicit 'Queen Elizabeth in Anjou's behalf. And, although 'ſhe excuſed herſelf a long time, yet he brought her 'to that paſs, that Leiceſter, who from his heart was 'againſt the marriage, and others, ſpread rumours 'abroad, that, by love-potions and unlawful arts, he 'had inſinuated into the Queen's affection, and induced 'her to the love of Anjou. M. Simier, on the other 'ſide, left no means uneſſayed to remove Leiceſter out 'of his place and favour with the Queen, revealing to 'her his marriage with Eſſex's widow. The Queen 'thereupon grew into ſuch a paſſion, that ſhe com-'manded Leiceſter not to ſtir out of the Caſtle of 'Greenwich, and intended to have committed him to 'the Tower of London, which his enemies much de-'ſired. But Suſſex, though his greateſt adverſary, 'and one that earneſtly endeavoured to promote the 'marriage, diſſuaded her, as out of a ſolid judgment, 'and the innate generoſity of his noble mind, he was 'of opinion, that no man ought to be troubled for 'his lawful marriage, which hath ever been had in 'honour and eſteem. Yet glad he was, that, by this 'marriage, he was now put beſide all hopes of marrying with the Queen. Nevertheleſs, Leiceſter was 'ſo incenſed thereat, that he bent himſelf to revenge 'the wrong he had received. And there wanted not 'ſome, who accuſed him, as if he had ſuborned one 'Teudor, of the Queen's guard, a bravo, to take away 'Simier's life. This is certain, the Queen com-'manded by publick proclamation, that no man ſhould 'offer any affront to Simier, his attendants, or ſervants, either by word or deed. About this time it 'happened, that while the Queen, for her pleaſure, 'was rowed in her barge upon the Thames, near 'Greenwich, attended by Simier, the Earl of Lincoln, and Hatton, her Vice-Chamberlain, a young 'man diſcharged a piece out of a boat, and ſhot one 'of the bargemen, in the Queen's barge, through both 'his arms, who was preſently apprehended and led to 'the gallows, for a terror to him; but he ſolemnly 'proteſting, that he did it unwittingly, and thought 'no harm, was ſoon diſcharged. Neither would the 'Queen believe what ſome buzzed in her ears, that he 'was purpoſely ſet on to miſchief either her or Simier 'So far was ſhe from giving way to any ſuſpicion 'againſt her ſubjects, that ſhe was wont to ſay, ſhe 'could believe nothing of her people, which parents 'would not believe of their children.' The reader will plainly diſcern, that, whatever we may think of ſuch things now, they were looked upon, even by wiſe men, as very credible at the time in which they are ſaid to have happened.

[K] And was ever after cloſely attached to his intereſts.] In this note, it is intended to diſcuſs the ſeveral the very height of power and influence, ſo he ſtood expoſed, as might be naturally expected, to the ſhafts of envy; and as, excepting his father, who had the rule in a minority, there never was any ſubject in England greater than himſelf, ſo the attempt made upon his character ſurpaſſes any thing that is to be met with in antient or modern ſtory (a). This piece which is commonly called LEICESTER'S COMMONWEALTH, was publiſhed at leaſt, if not written, beyond the ſeas, but imported hither in great quantities; and, from the book's having leaves edged with green, and the ſuppoſed author's name, it was ſtyled "Father Parſons's Green Coat (b)." The drift of this book was to repreſent to the people, that the Engliſh Conſtitution was ſubverted, and a new form imperceptibly introduced, to which no name could be ſo properly given as that of a Leiceſterian Commonwealth; and, in order to render this notion plauſible, the Earl of Leiceſter was not only repreſented as an Atheiſt in point of Religion, a ſecret traitor to the Queen, an oppreſſor of her people, an inveterate enemy to the Nobility, a complete monſter with regard to ambition, cruelty, and luſt; but it was alſo ſuggeſted that, purſuing his father's plan, he had thrown all offices of truſt and profit into the hands of veral ſuſpicions that were entertained of Leiceſter's views upon the Crown, ſome of which are thought to have been as early as the cloſe of King Edward's reign, and that the great Duke of Northumberland meant not to deprive or to depreſs the two Princeſſes farther than to bring them to certain matches which he had propoſed, and which, having once brought to bear, he would have put down his daughter-in-law, Queen Jane, with the ſame facility that he ſet her up (30). This ſcheme is ſo fine-ſpun, that one can hardly believe there is ſo much in it as a thread of truth; and yet his proclaiming Queen Mary at Cambridge, his deſiring to confer with the Queen's Counſellors, his compliance with the old religion at his death, the ſudden reſtitution of his family in the next reign, and the early favour of his ſon Robert in this, in which none of his wives had any ſhare, are circumſtances not eaſily accounted for; indeed ſo far from it, that Mr. Camden has more than once recourſe to the ſtars (31). The firſt ſcheme in this reign, was with reſpect to the Queen of Scots, whoſe title Leiceſter openly abetted, and, in conjunction with the Earl of Murray, drove on the marriage between that Queen and the Duke of Norfolk, which he is afterwards ſaid to have betrayed to Queen Elizabeth for his own ſecurity: that is to ſay, himſelf ſaid it by way of excuſe; for, that he firſt promoted, then revealed, and at length proſecuted it as a crime, are undeniable facts (32). His enemies gave this turn to the whole, that, by theſe practices, he meant to remove the Duke of Norfolk, the moſt powerful and popular nobleman in England, out of his own way, and Mary's title out of the way of the Queen. This being effectually done, there followed an Act of Parliament, in 1571, of a very ſtrange nature, of which, as it is almoſt the only thing the Hiſtorian ſpeaks of, as from his own knowledge, Camden (33) ſhall give an account to the reader. 'The iniquity 'of theſe times, and the love which the Parliament of 'England (now met at Weſtminſter) bare to their Prince 'and country, was the occaſion of a law for preventing the practices of ſeditious perſons; whereby, according to the tenor of former laws, it was provided, 'that, if any man ſhould attempt the death, or perſonal hurt, of the Queen, or raiſe war, or excite 'others to war, againſt her; or if any one ſhould give 'out, that ſhe is not the lawful Queen of this realm; 'but that any other can claim a juſter title thereto, or 'ſhould pronounce her to be an Heretick, Schiſmatick, 'or Infidel, or ſhould uſurp the right and title of the 'kingdom during her life, or ſhould affirm, that any 'other has a right to the Crown, or that the laws and 'ſtatutes cannot limit and determine the right of the 'Crown and the ſucceſſion thereof, every ſuch perſon 'ſhould be guilty of high-treaſon. That if any one, 'during the Queen's life, ſhould, by any book, written or printed, expreſſly maintain, that any perſon 'is, or ought to be the Queen's heir and ſucceſſor, except the natural iſſue of her body, or ſhould publiſh, 'print, or diſperſe any books or writings to that 'effect, he, and his abettors, ſhould for the firſt offence be impriſoned for a whole year, and forfeit the 'one-half of his goods. If any ſhould offend a ſecond 'time, he ſhould incur the penalty of a Præmunire, 'that is, loſs of all his goods, and perpetual impriſonment. Some looked upon this as too ſevere, who 'thought it would tend to the eſtabliſhing the quiet 'of the nation, if an heir apparent were declared. 'But it is incredible, what jeſts thoſe, that lewdly catch 'at words, made upon that clauſe, except the natural 'iſſue of her body, ſince the Lawyers term thoſe children natural, which are begotten out of wedlock, 'whom nature alone, without the intention of honeſt matrimony, hath begotten, and thoſe they call 'lawful according to the tenor of the Common-Law 'of England, who are in lawful matrimony begotten 'of ſuch a one's body. So that I myſelf, being then a 'young man, have often heard people ſay, that this word 'was inſerted in the act by Leiceſter, with a deſign, 'that one time or other he might impoſe ſome baſtard 'ſon of his upon the Engliſh for the Queen's natural 'iſſue.' We have the ſame thing confirmed to us by various authors: but, whatever view there might be from this act, it was held, that the Earl of Leiceſter entertained a good opinion of his brother Huntington's pretenſions, which produced a very cloſe correſpondence between thoſe two Lords, who had not been always upon ſuch friendly terms (34). The nature of this title was very plauſible, and could not but ſound pleaſing enough in the ears of the people, more eſpecially ſuch as were inclined to Puritaniſm, of whom that Peer was a declared protector. In reſpect to his pretenſions, they were very clear and ſhort. Henry Haſtings, Earl of Huntingdon, who had married Lady Katharine Dudley, daughter to John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, was the ſon of Francis, Earl of Huntingdon, by Katharine his wife, one of the daughters and heirs of Henry Pole, Lord Montacute, who was ſon and heir to Sir Richard Pole, Knight of the Garter, by Margaret Plantagenet, Counteſs of Saliſbury, who was the daughter and heireſs of George, Duke of Clarence, brother to King Edward IV (35). It is ſaid, that this title was commonly diſcourſed of by ſuch as favoured it, or would be thought to favour it, becauſe the power of the Earl of Leiceſter was ſuch, that nobody durſt complain of their diſcourſes; and, on the other hand, few or none thought it their buſineſs to queſtion it, for fear of being drawn within the ſtatute abovementioned, made on purpoſe to tie people's tongues upon that ſubject: in which, upon the whole, it proved of ſervice to the true heir. Some however there were, who inſinuated, that the Earl of Leiceſter meant to ſet up his brother-in-law, as his father, the Duke of Northumberland, had done his daughter-in-law; that is, till ſuch time as he could make a better title in his own family, by the marriage of his ſon to the Lady Arabella (36): and it is highly probable, that theſe crooked ſchemes of his, after the death of Mary Queen of Scots, induced the Cecils to reconcile themſelves to her ſon; and thus there was a complete turn made by Queen Elizabeth's Miniſters, ſince, in the beginning of her reign, Leiceſter was the avowed Champion of the Queen of Scots' title, and was very near ruining Lord Keeper Bacon and Secretary Cecil (37), for being ſecret favourers of the houſe of Suffolk.

his creatures and dependants; ſo that the Court, the Fortreſſes, the Navy, the Kingdom of Ireland, the Northern and Welſh Marſhes, the Iſle of Wight, and, in ſhort, every thing, was in his power, and the Queen had ſcarcely any thing left her but a titular ſovereignty (c). It is no wonder that a libel like this ſhould make a very great noiſe, or that the Queen and her Miniſters ſhould take the alarm as they did; but it is really ſomewhat ſurprizing, that her Majeſty thought the propereſt method, for removing the impreſſion this bitter performance was ſure to make upon the vulgar, ſhould be iſſuing letters from the Privy-Council, in which all the facts contained therein were declared to be abſolutely falſe, not only to their knowledge who ſigned them, but alſo of the Queen herſelf (d); which however ſhe did, as appears from ſome of thoſe letters yet extant (e) [L]. His nephew, the learned and ingenious Sir Philip Sidney, undertook to refute this invective, and actually compoſed an anſwer, which is ſtill preſerved, but, either from the multiplicity of his affairs, or from other reaſons with which we are not acquainted, was never finiſhed, or at leaſt never publiſhed (f). Yet, notwithſtanding all the pains that were then and afterwards taken to ſuppreſs and diſcredit it, this ſecret hiſtory gained a moſt unaccountable currency; nor was the myſtery of the writing, printing, and publiſhing, any more than the name of its real author, ever certainly diſcovered, which, with other concurrent circumſtances, has induced a ſuſpicion, that not only the Popiſh exiles abroad, but ſome abler heads, who were jealous of Leiceſter's power and influence at home (g), had a great hand therein, or, at leaſt, furniſhed the materials [M]. As, of the 'other ſide, both her Highneſs, of her certain know-'ledge, and we, to do his Lordſhip but right, of our 'ſynceare conſciences muſt needs affirm theſe ſtrange 'and abominable crimes to be raiſed of a wicked and 'venomous malice againſt the ſaid Earl, of whoſe good 'ſervice, ſincerity of religion, and all other faithful 'dealings towards her Majeſty and the realm, we 'have had long and true experience. Which things 'conſidered, and withal knowing it to be an uſual 'trade of traiterous minds, when they would render 'the Prince's government odious, to detract and bring 'out of credit the principal perſons about them, her 'Highneſs, taking the abuſe to be offered to her own 'ſelf, hath commanded us to notify the ſame unto you, 'to the end, that, knowing her good pleaſure, you 'may proceed therein as in a matter highly touching 'her own eſtate and honour. And therefore we wiſh 'and require you, to have regard thereof accordingly, 'that the former negligence and remiſſneſs ſhewed in 'the execution of her Majeſty's commandment may 'be amended by the diligence and ſeverity that ſhall 'be hereafter uſed. Which amendment and careful-'neſs, in this cauſe chiefly, her Majeſty aſſuredly 'looketh for, and will call for account at all your 'hands.

'And ſo we bid you heartily farewel. From the 'Court at Greenwich, this 26th day of June, 1585.

[M] Or at leaſt furniſhed the materials.] We are at a loſs for the original title of this book; for, it has gone by many. It is very probable, however, that it was at firſt called "A Dialogue between a Scholar, a "Gentleman, and a Lawyer (39):" but in the body of the book the author plainly declaring, that the old Engliſh Monarchy was now changed into a Leiceſtrian Commonweath, the book was again printed with the title of "Leiceſter's Commonwealth, &c. (40)." Both theſe editions were printed beyond the ſeas, without any name of author or printer, or ſo much as the place of the impreſſion, or the year; yet that it was in 1584 is plain enough from the fact mentioned in it (41). Dr. Thomas James (42), who was a very learned and knowing man, aſcribed it to Robert Parſons the Jeſuit. Anthony Wood ſays (43), that it was commonly ſuppoſed to be written by him, and adds, in a parentheſis, that he had moſt of his materials for the compoſition thereof from Sir William Cecil Lord Burleigh. Upon what foundation this report ſtands it is not eaſy to ſay; but this is certain, that Parſons himſelf denied that he was the author of it, neither is it reckoned amongſt his works either by Pits or Rybadeneira. Yet whoever conſiders and compares the conference about the ſucceſſion which Parſons publiſhed under the name of Doleman, will not eaſily approved in Parliament, and a law paſſed to carry it into execution (b); which, with many other penal ſtatutes, affrighted many of the Nobility; ſo that Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, and ſon to the unfortunate Duke of Norfolk, endeavoured to retire out of the kingdom, which brought him into great troubles. The Earl of Northumberland, being ſent priſoner to the Tower, deſtroyed himſelf with his own hands, and the Lord Paget ſought ſhelter beyond the ſeas; all of whom pretended to charge their misfortunes on the ſeverities with which they were proſecuted at home (i). At this time the affairs of the Proteſtant Low-Countries were in a perplexed ſituation, and the States thought that nothing could contribute ſo much to their recovery as prevailing upon Queen Elizabeth to ſend over ſome perſon of great diſtinction, whom they might ſet at the head of their concerns, civil and military (k); which propoſition, Camden ſays, ſo much flattered the ambition of this potent Earl, that he willingly conſented to paſs the ſeas upon this occaſion, being well aſſured of having ample powers granted him, and ſome ſort of authority over the Lord High-Admiral of England (l), which, as it was without example, could not but be highly grateful to one of his high temper, who loved command, more eſpecially over ſuch as might, in other reſpects, eſteem themſelves his equals. Accordingly, October 22d, in the ſame year, he was conſtituted Captain-General of all ſuch forces as ſerved, or thereafter ſhould ſerve, in the Low Countries, for the relief of the inhabitants there, and was empowered to levy in England, or the dominion of Wales, five hundred able and ſufficient men, of his tenants and ſervants, to attend his perſon beyond the ſeas; and, in his paſſage thither, and returning thence, them, and every of them, to employ in his ſervice, as he ſhall think convenient; which retainers and followers, under his hand and ſeal ſignifying the ſame, were, during the time ſo employed in his ſervice, to have the Queen's protection for their bodies, lands, and goods; any law, ſtatute, or reſtraint, to the contrary thereof, in any wiſe, notwithſtanding: With a mandate to all Juſtices of Peace, Mayors, Sheriffs, &c. and all other officers, to be obedient thereto (m). Before his departure, the Queen admoniſhed him to have a ſpecial regard to her honour, and to attempt nothing which ſhould be inconſiſtent with the employment to which he was advanced; and particularly ſhe required him to ſearch into the method of the States raiſing and falling the value of money, that ſo the ſoldiers might not receive their pay at one rate, and give it out at another; and very affectionately recommended to his care the young Noblemen of the country, and more eſpecially the ſons of the late Prince of Orange (n). On the eighth of December, 1585, he embarked, having with him fifty ſail of ſhips; and thoſe that accompanied, or ſoon after followed him, were the Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Eſſex, the Lord Audley, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Sheffield, the Lord North, and the Lord Borroughs, Sir William Ruſſel, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Robert Sidney, Sir Henry Stanley, Sir Gervaſe Clifton (o), Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir William Pelham, Lord Marſhal of the Field, Sir Arthur Baſſet, Sir Walter Walter, with many other perſons of diſtinction (p). On the 10th he arrived at Fluſhing, with his whole train, his perſon being guarded by fifty archers, bearing bows and arrows, fifty halberds, and fifty muſqueteers, who were magnificently entertained by Sir Philip Sidney, Governor of the town for her Majeſty, by Grave Maurice, ſecond ſon to the late Prince of Orange, and by the Queen's Embaſſador and the States: and all ſorts of people expreſſed the greateſt joy on his arrival (q). This was carried to a very extraordinary height on both ſides; great feaſts being given, and nothing to be ſeen during the remaining part of that month but mirth and diverſions.

eaſily believe that he was not the author of this book alſo, though perhaps he might not call it Leiceſter's Commonwealth, and therefore might think himſelf at liberty to deny his writing a book under that title. As to Lord Burleigh's furniſhing the materials, when we conſider the paper ſigned by him, which the reader has ſeen in the foregoing note, it muſt appear very improbable. It may not however be amiſs to obſerve, that it is on all hands agreed, that our famous Hiſtorian, Mr. Camden, had his materials for the firſt part of the Annals of Queen Elizabeth, from that noble perſon, and many are of opinion that he actually wrote them. Now, upon examination it will be found, that a great many of the facts in Leiceſter's Commonwealth are likewiſe related, though in a ſofter and leſs peremptory ſtyle, in thoſe Annals, of which we have given in this work ſeveral inſtances; whence it may he concluded, that whoever was the author of this book was well ſupplied with intelligence, and that, notwithſtanding the declaration of the Privy Counſellors, it was not univerſally believed to be a heap of falſhoods, though undoubtedly there are abundance of falſhoods in it, and many things repreſented as indubitable facts, that are no more than exaggerated ſuggeſtions. No pains were ſpared in circulating it abroad as well as at home; for, in the year after its original publication, it was tranſlated into French under the title of "La Vie Abominable, Ruſe, Trahiſons, Meurtres, Impoſtures, Empoiſonements, Paillardiſes, Athéiſmes, & autres tres Iniques Converſations, duquel la uſe & uſe Journellement, le my Lord de Leceſtre Machiaveliſto, contre l'Honneur de Dieu, la Majeſté de la Reyne d'Angleterre ſa Princeſſe, &c." not mentioning where printed, but in 8*vo.* 1585. It has been ſeveral times reprinted in Engliſh, particularly in 1600 in 8*vo.* in 1631 in the ſame ſize, the running-title in this edition being a letter of State of a Scholar of Cambridge; in 1641 in 4*to.* and in 12*mo*, with the addition of Leiceſter's Ghoſt; and again reprinted in 1706, in 8*vo*, under the title of "Secret Memoirs of Robert Dudley Earl of Leiceſter," with a preface by Dr. Drake, who pretended it was printed from an old manuſcript. The deſign of reprinting it in 1641 was to give an ill impreſſion of the government of Charles I, and the like was ſuppoſed to be the deſign of Dr. Drake in his publication. To ſay the truth, it may be conſidered as a ſtanding libel upon all over-grown miniſters and governments by faction.

On the fifteenth of January following, all the points of ceremonial were ſettled for the eſtabliſhment of ſuch an adminiſtration as might be for the common benefit, and prevent all diſputes. Accordingly, on the 26th of the ſame month, the Earl was ſworn to the States, and the States to the Queen, and to obey the Earl as her Lieutenant (r). On the ſixth of February following, they publiſhed their placard concerning his authority, which was very ample. His Excellency then entered upon the diſcharge of his office, and ſome exploits were performed againſt the Spaniards, which highly raiſed the reputation of the Engliſh troops, and the characters of the officers who commanded them (s). On the 23d of April, 1586, being at Utrecht, his Lordſhip kept the feaſt of St. George with prodigious magnificence, in which, as one of our Hiſtorians ſays, he appeared moſt Prince-like, inveſted in his robes of the Order, guarded by the principal Burghers in the town, and his own guard of fifty halberdiers, in ſcarlet cloaks, edged with purple and white velvet (t). It ſeems the Queen was not at all pleaſed with theſe proceedings of the States, or of her Lieutenant, and therefore ſent over her Vice-Chamberlain (u), with letters written in ſo ſharp a ſtyle as made both the States and the Earl very uneaſy [N]. Upon explanations from the one, and very deep ſubmiſſions from the other, the Queen was pacified, and his Excellency left to proſecute the duties of his charge (w). His expedition for the relief of Grave, a place of great importance, beſieged by the Prince of Parma, was, at firſt, attended with great appearance of ſucceſs; but, after he had taken the forts that impeded his paſſage to the place, the Dutch Governor very unexpectedly ſurrendered, at the perſuaſion, as was reported, of his miſtreſs; for which, notwithſtanding he obtained an honourable capitulation, his Excellency cauſed him, and two officers of note, to be put to an ignominious death (x). The Engliſh forces continued to render great ſervice, the Lord Lieutenant himſelf driving the Spaniards out of the whole iſland of Betawe (y). The Lord Willoughby, at Bergen-op-Zoom, beat a convoy going to Antwerp, which was a thing of great conſequence; and Count Maurice, aſſiſted by Sir Philip Sidney, took Axel by ſurprize (z). His Excellency had to deal with one of the beſt officers which that age, or indeed any other, had produced, the Prince of Parma, who is ſaid to have projected the taking of Utrecht when the Lord Lieutenant was there in perſon, and, with that view, intended to have ſent in a conſiderable number of men, in various diſguiſes; but it ſeems his plot was diſcovered, and diſappointed (a). The Prince of Parma then inveſted Reinberch, in which there was a garriſon of twelve hundred Engliſh troops, under the command of Colonel Morgan. His Excellency thought himſelf obliged to diſengage that place, and [N] As made both the States and the Earl very uneaſy]. In order to apprehend this matter clearly, it will be neceſſary to ſee, firſt the power granted by the States which, over and above the powers granted him by the Queen's commiſſion and their own, were expreſſed to be in their placard of the 6th of February, 1586 (44). 'The higheſt and ſupreme commandment 'and abſolute authority above, and in all matters of 'warfare both by ſea and land, to execute and adminiſtrate the ſame to the reſiſtance of the enemy, even as 'his Excellency ſhould think moſt commodious to the 'preſervation of thoſe countries, and ſo further, to do 'all ſuch things as appertain to the office of a general 'Captain. And furthermore, we commit the adminiſtration and uſe of policy and juſtice over the aforeſaid United Provinces and aſſociated cities, and members of the ſame, into his hands, to execute and 'adminiſtrate the ſame, with ſuch power and authority as have had in times paſt, all the other Governors of theſe Low-Countries before him, and eſpecially, as have been exerciſed, and lawfully adminiſtered in the time of Charles the Fifth, &c. We 'therefore command all Governors of Provinces and 'Cities, all Admirals, Vice-Admirals, all Officers 'and Soldiers by ſea and land; and furthermore, all 'other Counſellors, Officers, Treaſurers, Receivers, 'Bailiffs, Burgomaſters, Magiſtrates, &c. of what 'quality or condition ſoever, to honour, reſpect, and 'obey him, as they ought to do, &c.' In the Queen's letter, among other expreſſions, were theſe. 'How 'contemptuouſly you have carried yourſelf towards us, 'you ſhall underſtand by this meſſenger, whom we 'ſend to you for that purpoſe. We little thought, 'that one, whom we had raiſed out of the duſt, and 'proſecuted, with ſuch ſingular favour above all 'others, would, with ſo great contempt, have 'ſlighted and broken our commands, in a matter of 'ſo great conſequence, and ſo highly concerning us 'and our honour. Whereof, though you have but 'ſmall regard, contrary to what you ought by your 'allegiance, yet think not that we are ſo careleſs of 'repairing it, that we can bury ſo great an injury in 'ſilence and oblivion. We therefore command you, 'that, all excuſe ſet apart, you do forthwith, upon 'your allegiance which you owe unto us, whatſoever 'Heneage our Vice-Chamberlain ſhall make known 'to you in our name, upon pain of further peril.' She alſo wrote to the States-General. 'That to her 'diſgrace, and without her knowledge, they had conferred the abſolute government of the confederate 'Provinces upon Leiceſter her ſubject, though ſhe had 'abſolutely refuſed it herſelf, &c. ſhe therefore adviſed them to turn Leiceſter out of that abſolute authority, whoſe commiſſion ſhe had limited, not that 'ſhe thought their cauſe unworthy to be favoured, but 'to provide for and ſecure her own honour, which ſhe 'eſteemed more dear to her than life itſelf.' Bentivoglio (45), intimates at though this ſtep muſt have been before ſecretly made known to the Queen, or the Earl of Leiceſter would not have accepted the Government, without her private conſent. And Strada (46) more openly charges her Majeſty with an ambitious view of ſeeking to add the Low-Countries to her dominions, by permitting Leiceſter to take upon him the ſovereignty. But this is improbable. The Provinces had been twice offered her by a ſolemn embaſſy from the States; her Parliament had ſolicited the acceptance, and promiſed her ſupplies to ſupport it; and the univerſal inclination to ſubmit to her, in conjunction with the forces ſhe had ready to ſend over, muſt have rendered all oppoſition impracticable. It has been obſerved, that Strada was an Italian Jeſuit in the pay of Spain, and conſequently the Engliſh could expect no fair repreſentation from him, who hated them as hereticks and as enemies. Yet, he ſays, the Earl of Leiceſter was ſuch an abſolute maſter of his own temper, that he could as he pleaſed adapt it to any man's humours or deſigns. Agreeably to this, Mezeray calls him a ſubtle, dexterous courtier; and what other hiſtorians cite argues him to be a man of great abilities, though the general hatred and envy of many people ſuppreſſed his real virtues, or imputed them to artifice and deſign.

yet was unwilling to hazard a battle, and therefore beſieged Zutphen, which had the deſired effect; for, the Duke of Parma marched immediately to engage the allied army. Accordingly, on the 22d of September, the vanguards came to action, in which the Engliſh diſtinguiſhed themſelves, though with ſome loſs; and there it was that the famous Sir Philip Sidney received a mortal wound (b). The Spaniards, however, had been certainly beaten, if the Duke of Parma, with his whole army, had not advanced to their aſſiſtance. The ſiege of Zutphen was notwithſtanding continued, and ſome very brave actions were performed before it; but, however, they were not able to reduce the place (c) [O]. Upon his Excellency's return to the Hague he found the States uneaſy and diſcontented: they received him coldly, and, as their own writers ſay, with expoſtulations and complaints. He endeavoured to ſatisfy them, and, for that purpoſe, entered into a long detail of what had been effected, and of the cauſes why more was not effected, which, however, did not anſwer his purpoſe. He then attempted to diſſolve the Aſſembly; but failing in that too, he declared in anger his reſolution of returning to England (d). However, being afterwards brought into a better temper, he gave them to underſtand, that, though he ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution of returning home, it ſhould be ſo far from being prejudicial to them, that he would make it turn to their advantage (e). Whatever exterior marks of ſatisfaction this might produce, it is very certain that the States retained their diſpleaſure, which proceeded from the ſuſpicions, that, notwithſtanding the oath of fidelity he had taken, he practiſed upon the minds of the people, and laboured to poſſeſs them with an opinion, that he was better affected to the Proteſtant religion and the publick good than themſelves (f), the conſequences of which they clearly foreſaw, and very much feared [P]. His ſubſequent behaviour did not leſſen their apprehenſions;

[O] They were not able to reduce the place.] While the Earl of Leiceſter continued the ſiege, viz. on the 4th of October, the great fort demanded a parley; which being granted, Count Hollock, or, as we now write, Hohenloe, ſtepped out to confer with them (47); but in the midſt of the conference, as the Count was ſpeaking, he was ſhot through the mouth, and the ball took off the jewel at his ear. To revenge this treachery, the Engliſh repeated their attacks, and the ſame day made an aſſault on the leſſer fort ſword in hand. Captain Edward Stanley, was the firſt who mounted the breach, and perhaps truer courage was never ſhewn (48). He was oppoſed by the Captain of the fort, who ſtanding alone in the breach, aimed his pike at his breaſt as he was entering. On which, with great preſence of mind, laying hold of the pike, he ſtrove with all his force to pluck him from his poſt, if he refuſed to let go his hold. But, finding his ſtrength inſufficient to effect his purpoſe, he ſuffered himſelf to be raiſed up by his competitor on the rampart, and, his ſoldiers following, ſo terrified the garriſon with his unexpected preſence, that, deſerting the defence, as many as were able made their eſcape by a back gate, and fled to Zutphen, leaving their Captain priſoner. The Earl of Leiceſter knighted Stanley for his courage, preſented him with forty pounds ſterling, and ſettled a penſion on him for life. He likewiſe knighted Captain Reade, who alſo ſhewed great bravery on that occaſion: and the enemy, much terrified, abandoned the great fort the next night. But the Earl judged it not convenient for his army to continue any longer before Zutphen, till the rigour of the ſeaſon ſhould be abated, it being ſufficiently blocked up by the garriſons which lay in the towns round about it. Many perſons of eminent rank amongſt the Engliſh nation having highly diſtinguiſhed themſelves, the Earl of Leiceſter (49), in reward of their merit and for his own honour, conferred, in his camp, the dignity of a Knight Banneret on the Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Audley, and the Lord North; and knighted Sir Henry Goodyere, Captain of the Guard, Sir Henry Norris, Sir John Borroughs, Sir John Winkfield, Sir Roger Williams, Sir Robert Sidney, Sir Philip Butler, Sir Henry North, Sir Thomas Denis, Sir William Knolles, Sir George Farmer, Sir George Digby, Sir ——— Steward, and Sir ——— Beauford. On the 15th of October, his Excellency, after ſecuring of Deventer, came to Arnheim to viſit his nephew Sir Philip Sidney, whom he found paſt all hopes of recovery, dying two days after to his infinite regret, and was bewailed by him with great ſorrow, ſhutting himſelf up for a whole day, as Stowe relates, who is very circumſtantial in whatever regards this noble perſon.

[P] And very much feared.] But, notwithſtanding theſe outward profeſſions of regard, they were jealous of him (50), and privately proceeded to ſtraiten his authority; and, in other letters to the Queen, would have inſerted a clauſe to limit his command on his return to them, had not the Lord Buckhurſt interpoſed, and laid before them the miſchief it would have produced from his Lordſhip's power with her Majeſty. Theſe proceedings were not agreeable to the majority of the people, who were firm in the intereſt of the Earl of Leiceſter, and threatened to be revenged of the States, if the Queen ſhould take any offence at their alterations (51). In Frieſland, the Clergy offered her Majeſty the ſovereignty of the Low-Countries without any reſtriction, having held two Synods on the occaſion. The Synod at Sneek preſented a petition to the Lord Buckhurſt, in which they invited her Majeſty to come to the aſſiſtance of Chriſt, who threw himſelf and his children into her arms, and implored her protection (52): and ſeveral other towns proteſted they would depend only on her Majeſty. Alſo the preachers at Amſterdam openly inveighed againſt the magiſtrates from their pulpits, and libels were ſet up againſt the States. But, as the people ſeemed determined to take up arms, the Lord Buckhurſt ſignified to them from her Majeſty, That it was her inclination to ſend back the Earl of Leiceſter, to compoſe their differences, by re-aſſuming the Government. And this expectation of his Lordſhip's preſence gave a check to their violence, and put a farther ſtop to the proceedings of the States, who had begun to introduce a new ſcheme of government. Prince Maurice was brought to profeſs all good-will and amity to his Lordſhip, and Count Hollock promiſed to receive him with all honour and friendſhip: alſo the States General, and Council of State, both publickly and privately aſſured the Lord Buckhurſt of all duty and fidelity to him. But, before the Queen was prevailed on to give conſent to his Lordſhip's return, ſhe required Lord Buckhurſt, by letter, to let the States know, ſhe expected they ſhould ſend an army into the field, on his arrival, of ten or twelve thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, and give aſſurances, that one hundred thouſand pounds, ariſing from the extraordinary contributions, ſhould be delivered, at ſuch reaſonable times as might ſerve to defray the charges of the ſaid army, into the hands of ſome perſon of the country, who ſhould be nominated by the Earl of Leiceſter to be treaſurer of the army, and to be iſſued out by his Lordſhip's direction, with the privity of the Council of State. But this not being agreeable, the Lord Buckhurſt acquainted the Queen with their ſentiments; and that on their non-compliance he had declared to them, he had no commiſſion to promiſe his Lordſhip's return. On this, they apprehenſions; for, when the day came for his departure, he, by a public act, gave up the care of the Provinces into the hands of the Council of State, but privately, by an act of reſtriction of the ſame date, he reſerved to himſelf an authority over all Governors of provinces, cities, and forts; and, not contented with that, deprived the Council of State, and thoſe who had the chief direction in the Provinces, of their accuſtomed juriſdiction (g). He experienced in his paſſage all the difficulties of the ſeaſon and the country, being obliged to embark and land ſeveral times, and to make uſe of, part of the way, a waggon. He arrived at the Court at Richmond on the 23d of November (b), where, notwithſtanding all that was paſt, he was well received by the Queen. Her Majeſty was at that juncture more uneaſy than ever about the Queen of Scots, apprehending herſelf to be in great danger from the practices ſet on foot for obtaining the liberty of that Princeſs, whom ſhe had now taken a reſolution to remove, and was therefore glad of the Earl of Leiceſter's preſence, in whom ſhe had ever a great confidence (i). When the matter came to be debated in Council, which was before his return, he was conſulted by letter; and it is ſaid that the Earl gave it as his opinion, that it would be the ſafeſt and beſt expedient to make uſe of poiſon, which was vigorouſly oppoſed by Secretary Walſingham, to whom, though a Court Divine was ſent to ſettle his conſcience as to the lawfulneſs of this method, he remained fixed in his ſentiment, that it ought to be done by form of law (k). Accordingly, a commiſſion was drawn, grounded upon the late Act of Parliament, in which all the Members of the Privy-Council were appointed to be her Judges, and, amongſt others, the Earl of Leiceſter; but, being abroad, he neither aſſiſted at the trial, nor at the judgment given in the Star-Chamber, neither was he preſent in Parliament: yet ſufficient care was taken to make all the world ſenſible that he approved theſe meaſures, by printing the applications to the Queen from both Houſes, in a letter directed to him; and, in this very form, together with that letter, they are ſtill to be found in one of our old Chronicles (l). It is no wonder, therefore, that, laying aſide all thoughts of what had diſtaſted her in his miſconduct in the Low-Countries, the Queen was wonderfully pleaſed to have him near her again upon ſuch an occaſion, more eſpecially as the ſame point upon which he had been conſulted before, came again upon the carpet; for the trial had done little for the Queen's ſatisfaction if the execution did not follow; and how that might be done with leaſt diſcredit to Queen Elizabeth, remained a point difficult to decide. The Earl of Leiceſter kept to his firſt notion, and propoſed making her away privately. Another ſcheme was offered, as little honourable though more extravagant, which was, to ſend her back to Scotland, and have her put to death upon the frontiers of both countries. The majority of the Council approved neither, but inclined rather to proſecute the legal method in the end as well as at the beginning (m). The Queen ſeems to have concurred with the Earl of Leiceſter, as appears from the letters written to Sir Amias Pawlet and Sir Drew Drury; which not taking effect, the other way was at laſt reſolved on, and Daviſon, by a very artful piece of management, bore all the blame (n). About this time he was conſtituted Lord Chief-Juſtice in Eyre of all the foreſts ſouth of Trent (o), and, as appears from ſeveral letters in the Cabala, was highly favoured by Queen Elizabeth [Q]. During his abſence from the Low-Countries the Spaniards had bribed York and Stanley, two Engliſhmen whom the Earl had appointed, the firſt Governor of a Fort near Zutphen, and the other of they reſolved to provide for their own ſecurity, and accordingly eſtabliſhed new ſuperintendants on their frontiers, which was oppoſed by Lord Buckhurſt, as contrary to the twenty-fourth article of their contract, by which the nomination of them was reſerved to her Majeſty's Lieutenant: yet his oppoſition produced no effect. However, as their perils increaſed continually on them, there ſeemed no other means left to prevent their entire ruin, but the ſettlement of a preſent government, attended with a proportionable ſupply of men and money. The Lord Buckhurſt, out of a true ſenſe of thoſe difficulties which the States laboured under, and the uncertainty of his Lordſhip's return, drew up a new ſcheme for the eſtabliſhing ſuch a government in the United Provinces; which very highly offended the Earl of Leiceſter, and ſeems to be the principal motive of the averſion and hatred he ever after expreſſed towards him (53).

[Q] Was highly favoured by Queen Elizabeth.] It might have been expected, that, after the indignation expreſſed againſt him by his Sovereign, for exceeding his authority in the Low Countries, he could have little hopes of obtaining new marks of favour, conſidering more eſpecially how many places of honour and profit he held already. Yet the Earl was ſo complete a Courtier, that he knew how to turn this diſagreeable accident in a little time to his ſervice. His conduct, in the affair of the Queen of Scots, was very acceptable to the temper of Queen Elizabeth. His intelligence from Spain, which he never wanted, and was never truſted either to the eye or ear of a Secretary of State, gratified her Majeſty highly, who knew by experience that it deſerved entire credit. But what proved of the higheſt ſervice of all was his opening her Majeſty's eyes in relation to the double-dealing of the Duke of Parma, who, while engaged in a treaty with England, was taking all the neceſſary meaſures to invade it. By theſe ſteps he regained the Queen's confidence entirely, and then it was ſuggeſted, that, as he had been ſo unfortunate as to incur her diſpleaſure, of which he had received very public marks, as well by letters as by the meſſage with which Vice-Chamberlain Heneage had been entruſted, it was neceſſary, for the ſatisfaction of the world in general, aud of the States of Holland in particular, that this ſhould be cancelled by ſome extraordinary act of grace, by which it might be known, both at home and abroad, that he was cleared from all imputations, and ſtood on as good terms with the Queen his Miſtreſs as ever. This affords us a pregnant inſtance of his art and addreſs; and many other like inſtances might be given, ſufficient to ſhew, that, whenever he met with cloudy weather at Court, he could never be brought to believe that it was fair again, unleſs he felt the warmth as well as ſplendor of ſunſhine: and thus every return to favour coſt her Majeſty a fine for her anger, and brought him an ample reward for the humility of his ſubmiſſions (54).

(54) Leiceſter's Commonwealth

Deventer, to deliver thoſe places into their hands, which by the treachery of York, ſo wrought on Stanley that he complied, and the loſs thereof gave occaſion to loud exclamations and complaints againſt the Earl of Leiceſter (q). Whereupon the States-General, immediately aſſembling, agreed to inveſt Prince Maurice (r) with the full power and authority of Stadtholder and Captain-General of Holland, Zealand, and Friezeland, and to give him command over all the militia within the ſaid Provinces. And, purſuant to this determination, they obliged all their officers to receive a new commiſſion from him, and to take a new oath to the States, and diſcharged all recuſants whatſoever from the ſervice. Queen Elizabeth was diſpleaſed with theſe alterations in their government, and reſented the diminution of the Earl of Leiceſter's authority as an injury offered to herſelf, and thereupon immediately directed the Lord Buckhurſt, her kinſman, to enquire into, and complain of, the innovations introduced in the abſence of the Earl, and to ſettle all differences between them; and the States, in return, aſſured her Majeſty, that their late proceedings were but proviſional, and enforced through fear of a general revolt on the loſs of Deventer; but that, at his Lordſhip's arrival, they would readily acknowledge both him and his authority in as ample a manner as it had been granted to him at the firſt (s). Alſo, in their letter to the Queen, March 1, they repreſented to her, that they were infinitely ſorry her Majeſty ſhould entertain any ſiniſter conceit of their actions and proceedings, which they attributed to the practice of their enemies, and concluded with deſiring the Earl might return to his government, which they alleged was highly neceſſary to their ſafety [R]. The Queen yielded to this, but with ſome difficulty, ſo that his Lordſhip did not go back to his charge, as was deſired and expected, in the beginning of the ſpring, which his friends in Holland gave out afforded great advantage to the enemy. The Duke of Parma began the campaign with the ſiege of Sluys, the moſt conſiderable town in Flanders, excepting Oſtend, that remained in poſſeſſion of the States. He firſt attacked the fort of Blanchenberg, commodious for the conveying ſuccours to the beſieged by land, which made little reſiſtance, as his coming thither was unexpected, and no proviſion made to oppoſe him (t). His next ſtep was to raiſe a fort in the iſland of Caſante to cut off all relief by ſea. But, before he could execute his deſign, Sir Roger Willams, with five companies from Bruges, entered the town, and ſupplied it with proviſions and ammunition to hold a conſiderable time againſt him. Whilſt this town was beſieged, the Earl of Leiceſter, on the 18th of June, was made Lord Steward of the Queen's Houſehold (u), and, ſetting ſail from England on the 25th of the ſame month, landed in Zealand about the latter end of it. He brought with him a conſiderable ſupply both of horſe and foot. Prince Maurice and the Deputies of the States attended on him at Flushing to congratulate his return, and left Count Hollock to watch the motions of the enemy. When they had conferred on raiſing the ſiege, it was determined to attempt it by ſea; to which end they ſhipped five thouſand foot and ſix hundred horſe, with all neceſſary proviſions for the relief of the town, and, on the fleet's appearing in the channel, the Earl of Leiceſter made ſignals to the beſieged that he was come to their aſſiſtance (w). But, on examination, finding the channel blocked up and the paſſage ſecured, he ſaw it would be in vain to proceed that way. For three days he continued in ſuſpenſe what ſtep to take, and then weighing anchor he bent his courſe towards Oſtend, with a reſolution to ſuccour the beſieged by land. The [R] Was highly neceſſary to their ſafety.] While the negotiations mentioned in the text were carrying on between the Queen's Miniſter and the States, the creatures of the Lord Lieutenant in the Low-Countries were far enough from being inactive. On the contrary, they were ſo buſy, and took ſuch exceptions to every thing that was done by the States in the Earl's abſence, that at laſt they intimidated them to ſuch a degree as to be almoſt afraid of acting at all, and even to wiſh ſincerely for the return of the Lord Lieutenant, that ſome degree of weight might be reſtored to the government. In theſe practices the Earl's moſt indefatigable agents were the clergy; and how very able he was to manage a ſet of men, who, of all others, delight themſelves moſt in managing the minds of the multitude, will appear from the following letter, which certainly is a maſter-piece in its kind, though both in the matter and the ſtyle it differs not much from many of this noble perſon's epiſtles (55).

'GENTLEMEN,

'THAT I did not return ſuch an anſwer to ſeveral of your letters as you deſired and expected was not for want of good-will towards ſerving the cauſe of God, and defending the poor people, but it was becauſe I had not yet received her Majeſty's reſolutions about what was farther neceſſary to be done for the ſervice of your country. But the Queen having given me full directions with regard to the forces ſhe will ſend to your aſſiſtance, and having laid her command upon me to return, I, therefore, poſtponing all private views and conſiderations, and abandoning all thoſe advantages which God has beſtowed on me in this kingdom, intend to haſten over, and ſatisfy the deſires of a people who have ſo often called for me, to which the zeal and good inclinations of ſome have more induced me than the demerits of others, that ſuffer themſelves to be made tools for keeping me back by ſlanders and detractions, which I ſhall nevertheleſs enter into my book of oblivion, that no harm may befal thoſe who ſeek to do me ſuch diſſervices. And I hope I ſhall never give the people any cauſe to diminiſh their good-will and affection for me. In the mean time I intreat you to go on in your duty, and to admoniſh and excite thoſe under your care to peace and unity, to the end that they may more and more deſerve all the benefits they receive. For the reſt I refer myſelf to my arrival, and ſo I recommend you, Gentlemen, to the protection of the Almighty.

Your good friend,

R. LEICESTER.'

Earl of Leiceſter had no ſooner landed his forces, but he prepared to attack the fort of Blanchenberg, and, joining the whole garriſon of Oſtend to his army, marched directly againſt it. The loſs was of no leſs conſequence to the Duke of Parma than the gaining it would have been advantageous to the Earl; and therefore the Duke, leaving the ſiege every where well provided, led the remainder of his army to the defence of the fort againſt his Lordſhip (x). The Engliſh were ready to begin their batteries when the Duke of Parma came up; but on ſight of the army they deferred their hoſtilities, and after ſome conſultation retired to Oſtend, whence they returned with the ſame fleet where they had before been at anchor, not far from Sluys, and the Duke of Parma again preſented himſelf to their view, whereby they found themſelves under a neceſſity to retire once again, and never more attempted to raiſe the ſiege. The loſs of Sluys renewed the miſunderſtanding between the Earl of Leiceſter and the States, whilſt the blame of the action was thrown by each party on the miſmanagement of the other. The Earl complained of the State's negligence, in not making ſufficient preparations, and not reſtraining the firſt attempts of the Spaniards againſt the town. And the States, in return, virulently inveighed againſt his Lordſhip, and imputed the whole misfortune to his ill conduct, and the delay of the Engliſh forces. This diſſatisfaction increaſing, they refuſed to eſtabliſh him in that abſolute authority which had been conferred on him at his firſt arrival. This diminution of his power was ſo highly reſented by him, that he openly expreſſed his diſpleaſure againſt the States, and the Dutch writers charge him with having entered into indirect practices to regain it, by forming parties in his progreſs through the country, and converſing chiefly with the Miniſters and private perſons (y), ſo that they, and the common people, were ſo tranſported with his appearances of piety, and his zeal for their intereſts, as to approve of ſuch as he did, and loudly exclaimed againſt the proceedings of the States [S]. The Queen, however, being well apprized by her Miniſters at home of the ſituation of affairs in the Low-Countries, thought proper to recall him by an inſtrument dated November 9, 1587, and at the ſame time appointed Peregrine Bertie, Lord Willoughby, Captain-General of her forces (z). Camden relates, that the Earl of Leiceſter, on his return, finding an accuſation was preparing againſt him by the Lord Buckhurſt, and ſome others of his enemies, for his miſconduct in the management of affairs in the Low-Countries, and that he was ſummoned to appear before the Council, privately implored the Queen's protection, and earneſtly beſought her, 'Not to receive him with diſgrace upon his return, whom, at his firſt departure, ſhe had ſent out with honour; nor bring down alive to the grave, whom her former goodneſs had raiſed from the duſt (a);' and that the Queen was ſo pacified with his expreſſions of humility and ſorrow, as to paſs by the diſpleaſure ſhe had con-

[S] And loudly exclaimed againſt the proceedings of the States.] At his ſecond departure from the Low-Countries, the Earl of Leiceſter left the free adminiſtration of public affairs to the States, without making uſe of any ſuch precaution as he had taken when he was there before; notwithſtanding which, we are poſitively told, and therefore it muſt reſt upon the hiſtorian's (56) credit who ſays it, that he had it in his head to uſurp the government, and to ſend the Prince of Orange and Penſionary Barnevelt priſoners into England; ſo that he reckons it amongſt the many wonderful eſcapes of the inhabitants of theſe provinces, from the open tyranny of Philip II. and from the fox-like ſubtleties of William, Prince of Orange, that they were not ſubdued by the all-graſping ambition of our potent Earl of Leiceſter. It is, indeed, certain, that before he quitted that government, the Earl diſtributed, amongſt his particular friends, ſome gold medals, of which there are yet to be found in the cabinets of the curious; on the face (57), the Earl's effigies in buſt, armed, with this inſcription, ROBERTUS DUDLEUS. COM. LEYC. BELG. GUBER. i. e. Robert Earl of Leiceſter, Governor of the Low-Countries; on the reverſe a ſhepherd's dog looking back upon the flock, from which he is going; and, in the exergue, under the dog's legs, INVITUS DESERO, i. e. unwillingly I abandon; about the circle, NON GREGEM, SED INGRATOS, i. e. not the flock, but the ungrateful. Theſe inſinuations had ſuch an effect upon the minds of the people, that the whole nation was in confuſion, ſome Dutch garriſons affecting to adhere to the Engliſh: and, on the other hand, Sir William Ruſſell taking ſuch ſteps as gave no ſmall jealouſy to the State, which was augmented (58) by the coming of the Lord High-Admiral of England upon their coaſts juſt at that juncture. Theſe jealous ſuſpicions, at laſt, roſe ſo high, that the Dutch, well affected to their own government, according to the genius of that people, to which the Earl of Leiceſter conformed in his medals, ſtruck others, upon which were the old alluſion of the two pots ſwimming at ſea, with this inſcription, ſi collidimur, frangimur; i. e. if we claſh, we are undone. The Lord Admiral did all he could to ſettle the minds of the States and of their ſubjects; which, however, was not effected till the Queen ſent her orders to the Lord Willoughby, to reduce, by force, if that ſhould be neceſſary, ſuch places as refuſed to yield obedience to the States, which convinced them, that they had at leaſt done her Majeſty wrong, whatever foundation there might be for queſtioning the upright meaning of the Earl of Leiceſter, who in this command, ſays the hiſtorian, was the firſt Engliſhman that bore the ſwelling title of Excellency: and, therefore, many at home were very well pleaſed to ſee him forced to lay it down with ſo little honour (59). The nature of the ſubject, a juſt regard for truth, and a ſincere deſire the reader ſhould want no lights that are in our power to give, oblige us to obſerve, that the Earl of Leiceſter's medal is far from being any concluſive evidence of his bad intentions, ſince the words, fairly conſtrued, mean no more than that he left with reluctance thoſe whom he had conſidered in the light of a flock committed to his charge; and this, notwithſtanding ſome of them had repaid with ingratitude all the care he had taken. We muſt alſo remark, that thoſe who diſliked the Earl in England concurred with his enemies in Holland to give a ſanction to all their jealouſies and ſurmiſes, which, whatever effects they might have in thoſe times, cannot paſs for unſuſpected teſtimonies in theſe. The Earl of Leiceſter had his faults, and thoſe very great faults too; but other miniſters might not be without them, or even without a propenſity of magnifying thoſe of the Earl of Leiceſter, in order to prejudice him with their ſovereign, in whoſe confidence, while he had ſo large a ſhare, it was impoſſible that he ſhould eſcape envy, or that ſuch as envied him ſhould (contrary to the nature of that paſſion) always ſpeak truth.

ceived againſt him, and to admit him into her former grace and affection. The day when it was expected he ſhould have given in his anſwer, he took his place at the Council-table; and, when the Secretary had begun to read his accuſation, he roſe up and interrupted him, complaining of being injured, and declaring that his public commiſſion was limited by private inſtructions: and, making his appeal to the Queen, he evaded the accuſation, and came off in triumph; and, by his power with her Majeſty, he ſo far prevailed, that a cenſure was paſſed upon the Lord Buckhurſt, who was confined thereupon to his houſe for ſeveral months. It is very certain, that, how much ſoever this noble perſon's employment in the Low-Countries might gratify his ambition, or perhaps his vanity, it was very far from turning in any other manner to his advantage; ſince, at his laſt going over, he took up very large ſums of money at high intereſt upon his barony of Denbigh (b), which, after his return, he found it impoſſible to diſcharge; upon which the Merchants who had lent the money, moſt of whom had borrowed it upon their own private credit in order to ſupply him at that juncture, finding themſelves very much diſtreſſed by this diſappointment, applied for redreſs to the Lord Treaſurer as well as to the Lord Chancellor; but it does not appear that any thing was or could be done for their relief. Whether it was in regard to this affair, or ſome other relating to the tranſactions in the Low-Countries, certain it is, that the Earl had frequent differences with the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, which at length roſe ſo high, that the Earl told his Lordſhip plainly at Council, "that he found his Lordſhip very "much inclined to croſs him upon all occaſions, and more eſpecially before the Queen; "and that he liked it ſo ill, that he could and would find ways to anger him as well;" adding ſome other ſpeeches, which the Lord Treaſurer took as a charge againſt him for acting to the Queen's prejudice; upon which, the very ſame night, he reſolved to expoſtulate the matter freely with the Earl by letter, which he ſent him the next day, and received an anſwer in the evening (c). This, as it ſerves to ſhew the temper of this noble Peer much better than any of the accounts we have of him extant, and as the reader may poſſibly think it a better vindication than any that have been offered of his proceedings, we have placed it at the bottom of the page [T]. It has before been obſerved, that the Duke of Parma, who was a great Politician as well as a great Cap-

As for the letter written by the Lord Treaſurer, upon this laſt quarrel, that gentleman does not give us ſo much as a line of it, though he has preſerved the Earl of Leiceſter's anſwer entire, and a very extraordinary paper it is (61).

'My Lord,

'I Know not from whence my hap hath it, but it 'hath fallen our ſundry times, both contrary to my 'expectations, and much leſs by any deſert of mine, 'that I have found your Lordſhip more ready to 'thwart and croſs my endeavours than any other 'man's, eſpecially in the preſence of her Majeſty, 'and for ſuch cauſe as I have been the more earneſt 'in, when, by your Lordſhip's own allowance and 'opinion, it had been ſo reſolved on by our confe-'rence before, as fit and meet advices to be given her 'Majeſty for the beſt furtherances of her own ſer-'vices. And theſe cauſes have lately been moſt in 'queſtion; in which I myſelf, by her appointment, 'have been furtheſt employed, viz. about aſſiſtance of 'the Low-Countries. And, therefore, did, both at 'your Lordſhip's hands and other my Lords, hope 'to be aſſiſted and comforted, ſo far as my opinion 'ſhould tend to the ſervice of her Majeſty, and to 'matters being before, by your Lordſhip and others, 'debated and agreed upon. Wherefore, finding it 'to fall out otherwiſe, and to draw difference in ar-'gument, where there was good aſſent before: what 'was it? but to leave me, in her Majeſty's opinion, 'to be a man either affectionate or opinionative in 'mine own conceits; and, withal, to ſee her Majeſty's 'ſervice hindred, and to take lack through ſuch need-'leſs and unprofitable controverſies among Counſel-'lors? Albeit I know and grant among Counſellors 'there may and muſt riſe, by way of argument, di-'viſions in opinion, which is both lawful and very 'convenient, and oft doth without any cauſes of 'miſlike at all. And God forbid there ſhould be. 'But, my Lord, in theſe cauſes, we have been two 'or three times before her Majeſty; we had debated 'the matter before. And the courſe I took was no 'other than your Lordſhip did beſt like and moſt ad-'viſe. And to fall into contrary opinions before her 'Majeſty cauſed me both to take it ill, and to ſhew 'it plainly to you as I did. And for the words which 'I added withal, which your Lordſhip doth ſet down 'in your letter, that I did charge you with ſome mat-'ters towards her Majeſty; aſſuredly, my Lord, I 'uſed no ſuch words. But finding myſelf grieved 'with ſuch croſs handling, as both at this and at 'other times I have done, I told your Lordſhip, I 'ſaw your Lordſhip very ready to croſs me now-a-'days before her Majeſty. That I like it ſo ill, that 'I would and could find way to anger you as well. 'And that I had not dealt in this ſort either with you 'or any of your's, but much otherwiſe. And ſo, my 'Lord, I have done to my poor power, and with as 'much deſire to have you my aſſured friend, as any 'friend you have found in England. Which, finding 'theſe occaſions more than once falling to my lot, I can 'hardly diſſemble or bear the unkind dealing of them, 'but rather to deal as I am dealt withal, when all 'kindneſs is not only ſo little regarded but hardly re-'quited. In which conceit, my Lord, I pray you 'think I can be as others are to me. And to that 'end was my ſpeech and my meaning, and that I 'ſaid was to your Lordſhip's ſelf, and before none 'other, but moved, as your Lordſhip ſaid, in paſſion. 'And, as I have been loth to have the occaſion that 'ſhould drive me to take ſuch hard or unkind courſes 'as I ſee ſome do, and myſelf very deeply felt. Thus 'much, my Lord, I have thought good to ſet down, 'which receiving your Lordſhip's letter, even as I 'came from the Court, had no time till late this night 'to anſwer. Wherein I will not hide the conceit I 'had upon the cauſes I have ſhewed, finding myſelf 'indeed heartily moved and grieved, but plainly and 'flatly to deliver my mind, rather than to diſſemble 'as many can. Leaving to your Lordſhip to conſider 'of my doings, how you have found them, if I be 'well uſed. And ſo in very haſte, leaving the reſt till 'I ſpeak with yourſelf, I commit you to the Lord. 'From my houſe, this Monday night.

'Your Lordſhip's very friend, if you ſo regard me,

tain,

tain, ſet on foot a negotiation with the Engliſh Court, as if it had been in his power to have concluded an abſolute peace; upon which, the Earl of Derby, and ſome other perſons of credit and diſtinction, and, amongſt the reſt, Sir James Crofts, Comptroller of the Queen's Houſehold, were ſent over, with the title of Commiſſioners, to negotiate with them, in the month of April, 1588 (d). A great deal of time was ſpent to very little purpoſe; and, notwithſtanding the Duke of Parma was earneſtly ſolicited, he could never be prevailed on to produce the commiſſion by which his Catholic Majeſty impowered him to treat and conclude, becauſe, in reality, he had no ſuch commiſſion to produce. Sir James Crofts, who was a plain man, and heartily deſirous that a peace between England and Spain ſhould take effect, made a journey to Bruſſels, without having any authority ſo to do, in order to confer with the Duke (e); in which, though the reſt of the Commiſſioners allowed that he was too forward, yet they cleared him from any ill intention as well as from doing any thing that was amiſs; yet, upon their being recalled in the month of Auguſt following, Sir James Crofts was accuſed, by the Earl of Leiceſter, for his unadviſed journey to Bruſſels, and, by an order of the Privy-Coudcil, committed to priſon (f). The whole nation was by this time alarmed, with the apprehenſion of the Spaniſh Armada, and, amongſt other precautions that were taken, an army was aſſembled at Tilbury, conſiſting of between ſixteen and ſeventeen thouſand men, of which the Earl of Leiceſter was made Lieutenant-General, and the Earl of Eſſex commanded the horſe (g). Queen Elizabeth, that ſhe might encourage her ſubjects by her preſence, went to review that army in perſon; and, upon that occaſion, made a ſhort and memorable ſpeech, which, as it contains a character of this nobleman, given by his Sovereign to her people, it is requiſite to inſert (h). 'I myſelf,' ſaid ſhe, 'will be your General, Judge, and Rewarder 'of every one of your virtues in the field. I know already, for your forwardneſs, you 'have deſerved rewards and crowns; and we do aſſure you, on the word of a Prince, 'they ſhall be duly paid you. In the mean time, my Lieutenant-General ſhall be in 'my ſtead than whom never Prince commanded a more noble or worthy ſubject, 'not doubting, but, by your obedience to my General, by your concord in the camp, 'and your valour in the field, we ſhall ſhortly have a famous victory over thoſe ene-'mies of my God, of my kingdom, and of my people.' At this time, there is nothing plainer than that he ſtood as well with Queen Elizabeth as ever; and it is highly probable, that the Earl of Leiceſter, than whom no man underſtood a court better, was perſuaded of this himſelf; otherwiſe he would never have ſought an employment ſtill greater than any he had, which was that of the Queen's Lieutenant in England and Ireland; nor would he have obtained it as he did, if the Queen's favour had not been as ſtrong towards him as ever; but a ſtop was put to the paſſing the letters-patent, prepared for this purpoſe, by the Lord-Chancellor Hatton and the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh, who are ſaid to have ſhewed the Queen, in time, what hazards ſhe might run, by intruſting ſo large, or rather ſo exorbitant, a power in the hands of a ſingle perſon (i). It is not at all improbable, that the danger of the Spaniſh Invaſion being by this time over made the Queen think ſo extenſive a command unneceſſary, which inclined her to liſten to the ſuggeſtions of thoſe two great Stateſmen upon this ſubject. Whether the Earl of Leiceſter conceived any diſlike at this, and thought of retiring from Court, as ſome have ſuggeſted, or whether, as it was uſual with him, he was deſirous of enjoying the pleaſures of privacy in the country at that ſeaſon; certain it is, that he ſet out about the end of Auguſt for his Caſtle of Kenelworth (k); but, making ſome ſtay at his houſe at Cornbury in Oxfordſhire, he there breathed his laſt, September the 4th, 1588, when he was about the age of fifty-ſix (l). At the time of his demiſe, he was of the Queen's Privy-Council, Lord-Steward of the Houſehold, Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, High-Steward of that of Cambridge, Chief Juſtice in Eyre in the Counties beyond Trent, the Queen's Lieutenant and Captain-General of the Forces in Holland, Governor and Captain-General of the United Provinces, and General of the forces raiſed in England againſt the Spaniards; Knight of the French King's Order of St. Michael, and of the moſt noble Order of the Garter (m). Some writers add, Earl-Marſhal of England (n), but without authority; for, certainly, he never enjoyed that office (o). As to the manner of his death, there are very different opinions, and all countenanced by ſome authority. We are told by Camden, that he died of a fever (p). Sir Robert Naunton (q), who was well acquainted with the tranſactions of thoſe times, informs us, that, though he ended not his days by ſo violent a death, or by the fatal ſentence of judicature as his father and grandfather, yet (as is ſuggeſted) by that poiſon which he had prepared for others, wherein they report him a rare artiſt [U]. (63) Leiceſter's Commonwealth.

At Court an opinion prevailed, that he did not leave the world by a natural diſeaſe, but by ſome practices of a diabolical nature; concerning which, ſeveral examinations were taken before the Privy-Council (r), with which, perhaps, it may not be amiſs to make the reader acquainted [W]. That he died under a cloud, which time and emulation, the companions of great ones, brought upon him, as a certain writer ſuggeſts (s), one would think a little improbable; ſince Camden aſſures us, that the Queen expreſſed a very deep concern for his death: but then, the force of this aſſertion is leſſened by his adding, that ſhe ſuffered his goods to be ſold by public auction, for the diſcharge of a debt due to the Crown, in purſuance of a maxim, from which ſhe rarely departed, of remitting to none the claims upon them from her Treaſury (t). Whatever the diſpoſition of his Sovereign might be to him, he left the ſtrongeſt teſtimonies of duty and fidelity towards her, that words could poſſibly expreſs, in his laſt will, penned by his own hand, during his laſt reſidence in Holland; which is a piece ſo ſingular, that it cannot but afford pleaſure to ſee a part of it in the notes (u) [X]. In that inſtrument, which is the Lord Sheffield and the Earl of Eſſex, who are thought to have been removed for the ſake of their wives, there are ſome others that have been publicly ſaid to travel the ſame road, by the ſame conveyance, though for other reaſons. As, for inſtance, the Cardinal Chaſtillion, who died at Canterbury in 1570 as he was going out of England, and who is ſaid to have offended this great Earl, by informing the Queen of the arts which he uſed to diſguſt ſuch foreign Princes as ſought her Majeſty in marriage. That this Prelate was highly careſſed by the Queen is beyond all doubt, and that he was poiſoned is likewiſe certain; but by whoſe contrivance is by no means clear (64). The caſe of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton may be accounted, of all others, that which bears the hardeſt upon the Earl in point of circumſtances. He is ſaid to have been poiſoned in a ſallad at Leiceſter-Houſe, being taken ill at table, and dying before he could be removed. The latter part of this ſtory is acknowledged by the Earl of Leiceſter himſelf, in a letter to Secretary Walſingham; and, as to the former, it depends upon a family tradition, that Sir Nicholas accuſed the Earl upon his death-bed. However it was, the report generally prevailed, and Camden does not ſpeak of it as a thing entirely groundleſs (65). The ſame ſtory is told of his great competitor the Earl of Suſſex, but with no great ſhow of probability or truth, much leſs of certainty, though ſaid to have been taken from his own mouth. He was, indeed, the Earl's enemy to the very laſt; for on his death-bed he is reported to have given this caution to his friends (66): 'I am 'paſſing into another world, and muſt now leave you 'to your fortunes, and to the Queen's grace and 'goodneſs; but beware of the gypſey (Leiceſter), for 'he will be too hard for you all; you know not the 'beaſt ſo well as I do.' All theſe tales would be abſolutely incredible, if the propoſal for taking off the Queen of Scots, by a doſe, was not poſitively vouched by Camden, and the Lady Sheffield's loſs of her hair and nails teſtified by herſelf upon oath. Hence it was a ſaying in thoſe days, That folks often fell without ſeeing the hand that puſhed them, and that many died who knew not their own diſeaſe.

[W] To make the reader acquainted.] We have obſerved in the text, that, upon the return of Sir James Crofts, Comptroller of the Houſhold, who was one of the Commiſſioners in the Low-Countries, he was committed for acting imprudently in the diſcharge of his truſt. After the Earl of Leiceſter's death, among other reports that flew abroad, one was, that the ſon of this gentleman had been inſtrumental in his Lordſhip's ſudden end (67). Upon this Mr. Edward Crofts, and ſeveral other perſons, were brought before the Privy-Council, when the following facts came out, as they are tranſcribed from the original minutes. Being examined concerning the Earl of Leiceſter's death, he (Edward Crofts) ſaith, that after his father, Sir James Crofts, was committed, this examinate came home to his own houſe at Charing-Croſs; and, lamenting, ſaid unto Smith and Pille's wife, that he and all his were undone except he had help. And Smith ſaid, he would do what he could; and willed this examinate to give him the names of all the Council, which he did. And Smith promiſed to tell him who were his father's enemies; and did after tell him that the Earl of Leiceſter was his great enemy. Within two or three days after, Smith, walking up and down with this examinate, made a flirt with his thumb, and bad him be of good comfort; for, the bear is tied to the ſtake, or muzzled; whether he doth not remember; and in what manner or ſort the Earl was dealt withal he doth not know. That Smith told him, that his father ſhould not remain in priſon a full month. And that this examinate ſhould be the man that ſhould obtain the warrant for his delivery, and ſo he did. All the perſons abovementioned were examined as well as Mr. Crofts, who confirmed every tittle of what he had ſaid, particularly Smith himſelf; but what puniſhment they ſuffered, or whether they ſuffered at all, is not mentioned. We learn alſo from the ſame author, that the Earl of Leiceſter was in good health on the 27th of Auguſt, when he wrote a letter to the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, in behalf of a friend of his, excuſed his going out of town without taking leave of him, and declared his intention to return ſpeedily, which is a plain proof that he did not retire from any diſcontent.

[X] In the notes.] There is no need of any introduction to this piece, after what is ſaid of it in the text. It begins thus (68): 'This is the laſt Will and 'Teſtament of me Robert Earl of Leiceſter, her Ma'jeſty's Lieutenant-General of all her forces in the 'Low-Countries, and Governor and Captain-General 'of all the United Provinces, written, with his own 'hand, the firſt of Auguſt, in Middleborough, 1578. 'Firſt, I take it to be the part of every true Chriſtian 'to make a true teſtimony of his faith at all times, 'and eſpecially in ſuch a caſe and ſuch a time as this 'is. And therefore I do mean here faithfully to make 'a ſhort declaration, to teſtify in what faith I do live 'and depart from this world, through the grace of 'my Lord and Saviour, to continue me in the ſame 'till the ſeparation of this life and body. And ſo I 'do acknowledge my creation and being to be had 'and continued by the Providence of our Almighty 'God, the creator of all things, both in heaven and 'earth; and do confeſs, that, above all deeds that his 'Divine Majeſty hath done for mankind, is the gift 'of his bleſſed ſon Chriſt Jeſus, to be the Redeemer 'and Saviour of his people that be faithful; by whoſe 'only merits and paſſion, I verily believe, and am 'moſt aſſured of, the forgiveneſs of all my ſins, be 'they never ſo great or infinite, and that he only is 'the ſufficient ſacrifice that hath appeaſed the wrath 'of his father, and that bleſſed Lamb which innocently 'ſuffered all torments, to bear the bitter burden due 'to us miſerable wretches, for his moſt tender com'paſſion over all that have grace to believe on him. 'All which his Grace's goodneſs and mercy I moſt 'faithfully take hold on, being ſo promiſed by him'ſelf, who is the only truth itſelf, that I am the child 'of ſalvation, and to be the inheritor of his everlaſt'ing kingdom, and to meet with him at the joyful 'day of reſurrection with all the faithful children and 'ſaints of God. In this faith I now live, and in this 'faith I truſt to change this life, with continual prayer 'to the Throne of Grace, to grant me, during this 'pilgrimage of mine, a true, humble, and penitent 'heart, for the due recognition of all my offences, 'and the willing amendment of the ſame, and to fly 'inſtantly is written with amazing art, in as much as the language thereof is ſcarcely to be diſtinguiſhed from that of nature, he takes great care of his family, and ſhews wonderful condeſcenſions towards his wife; though, after all, the bulk of his fortune is ſecured to his ſon Robert, whom he ſtyles conſtantly his baſe ſon, with what meaning muſt be left to conjecture. As he died before his brother Ambroſe, Earl of Warwick, and that noble peer was univerſally beloved, he had intereſt enough to carry his brother's teſtament, or at leaſt the moſt eſſential parts thereof, into execution, which otherwiſe would have been attended, if we may gueſs from what happened in the next reign, with inſuperable difficulties (w). The corpſe of the Earl of Leiceſter was removed from Cornbury Park to Warwick, where it was interred in our Lady's Chapel, adjoining to the Choir of the Collegiate Church, and a very noble monument is erected to his memory, with the effigies in armour lying on his back, with the Earl's Coronet on his head, and the effigy of his Counteſs lying by him, with an inſcription in capitals, the ſubſtance of which the reader has already ſeen, as it contains little more than a recapitulation of his employments (x). The character beſtowed upon him by Camden (y) is to this effect. He was looked upon as a finiſhed courtier in every reſpect; elegant in his dreſs, liberal in his way of living, bountiful to ſoldiers and men of letters; very adroit in chuſing his time, and carrying his point; complaiſant in his temper, but inſidious towards rivals; amorous in the former part of his life, and in the latter uxorious to a ſtrange degree. As for the reſt, as he preferred an envied height of power to ſolid virtue, he furniſhed matter for a multitude of malicious detractors to deſcant upon, who, even in the zenith of his glory, failed not to proſecute him with their libels, which were mixed with abundance of untruths. To ſum up all, what was ſaid of him in public had the air of praiſe and panegyrick; but in private, and where people durſt be free, he was repreſented in quite a different light. This, without doubt, conſidering its brevity, is an admirable deſcription, and by far ſuperior to the diffuſe accounts that are to be met with in other writers; but, as it is perfectly adapted to the hiſtorian's ſubject, it may be poſſibly thought too ſuccinct to cloſe a particular article compoſed of ſuch a variety of matter; and therefore we will endeavour, with the utmoſt impartiality, to ſubjoin a more copious repreſentation of this great Stateſman

'inſtantly to the ſure anchor-hold, my Lord and Saviour Chriſt Jeſus, to whom, with the Father and the Holy Spirit, be all honour, glory, and dominion, for ever, Amen. Thus, being in perfect health and memory, and having ſet down my faith as a true Chriſtian, and being uncertain of the hour of death, I think it my part to ſettle my worldly matters in as good eſtate as I can, eſpecially being haſtily and ſuddenly ſent over, and likewiſe having very little leiſure ſince my arrival to get any time for my private buſineſs. But, firſt, my will is to commit this wretched body of mine, when it ſhall pleaſe God to ſeparate it from the ſoul, to the order of my dear friends, that ſhall be living, as my executors, and my overſeers of this my laſt Will and Teſtament, and they to take ſuch order for the burial of my body as they ſhall think meet, always requiring that it may be done with as little pomp or vain expences of the world as may be, being perſuaded that there is no more vain expence than that is; a convenient tomb or monument I wiſh there ſhould be. And, for the place where my body ſhould lie, it is hard to appoint, and I know not how convenient it is to deſire it, but I have always wiſhed, as my dear wife doth know, and ſome of my friends, that it might be at Warwick, where ſundry of my anceſtors do lie, either ſo, or elſe where the Queen's Majeſty ſhall command; for, as it was, when it had life, a moſt faithful, true, loving ſervant unto her; ſo living, and ſo dead, let the body be at her gracious determination, if it ſhall ſo pleaſe her. Touching my bequeſts, they cannot be great, by reaſon my ability and power is little; for, I have not diſſembled with the world my eſtate, but have lived always above any living I had, (for which I am heartily ſorry,) leſt that, through my many debts from time to time, ſome men have taken loſs by me. My deſire therefore is, and I do charge my executors to have due conſideration, that, if any perſon ſhall juſtly, after my deceaſe, make ſuch complaint, that they ſhall be ſatisfied as far as it ſhall be found in any equity it is due unto them, with advantage to them. Beſides, I do here appoint my moſt dear well-beloved wife, the Counteſs of Leiceſter, to be my ſole executrix of this my laſt Will and Teſtament, and do require her, for all love between us, that ſhe will not only be content to take it upon her, but alſo to ſee it faithfully and carefully performed. And, albeit there may many imperfections be found with the making of this Will, for that I am no lawyer, nor have any counſel with me to place things in ſuch form as ſome are able, yet as my true meaning is, I truſt, to expreſs, that accordingly it may be interpreted, for I mean to make it as plain as I can. And, firſt of all, before and above all perſons it is my duty to remember my moſt dear and moſt gracious Sovereign, whoſe creature under God I have been, and who hath been a moſt bountiful and princely miſtreſs unto me, as well in advancing me to many honours as in maintaining me many ways by her goodneſs and liberality. And as my beſt recompence to her moſt excellent Majeſty can be, from ſo mean a man, chiefly in prayer to God, ſo, whilſt there was any breath in this body, I never failed it even as for mine own ſoul. And, as it was my greateſt joy in my life-time to ſerve her to her contentation, ſo it is not unwelcome to me, being the will of God, to die and end this life for her ſervice. And yet, albeit I am not able to make any piece of recompence of her great goodneſs, yet will I preſume to preſent unto her a token of an humble and faithful heart, as the leaſt that ever I can ſend her, and with this prayer withal, that it may pleaſe the Almighty God, not only to make her the oldeſt Prince that ever he gave over England, but to make her the godlieſt, the virtuouſeſt, and the worthieſt in his ſight, that ever he gave over any nation. That ſhe may indeed be a bleſſed mother and nurſe to this people and Church of England, which the Almighty God grant for his Chriſt's ſake. The token I do bequeath unto her Majeſty is the jewel with three great emeralds, with a fair large table-diamond in the midſt, without a foil, and ſet about with many diamonds without foil, and a rope of fair white pearl, to the number of ſix hundred, to hang the ſaid jewel at, which pearl and jewel was once propoſed for her Majeſty, againſt a coming to Wanſtead, but it muſt now thus be diſpoſed, which I do pray you, my dear wife, ſee performed, and delivered to ſome of thoſe whom I ſhall hereafter nominate and appoint to be my overſeers for her Majeſty.'

and fortunate favourite in public and in private life. He is ſaid to have inherited the parts, as his brother the Earl of Warwick was the heir of his father's virtues (z). His ambition was great, but his abilities were greater. His dexterity as a courtier appeared as ſoon as he entered the Court; for, he obtained, under King Edward, more than any of his brethren in point of places and donations (a), and this addreſs continued through all his different ſituations. He complimented Queen Mary upon her acceſſion (b), though he went a priſoner out of her preſence; and, notwithſtanding he met, as might be expected, with a bad reception, yet he perſevered till he obtained not only a pardon but a place. He ſecured, however, ſo good an intereſt with her ſucceſſor, that he was declared a favourite as ſoon as ſhe was declared a Queen, and maintained the firſt place in her confidence as long as he lived. As he was deſirous of the graces of his Sovereign, ſo he ſtudied that the world ſhould take notice of his ſucceſs, which appeared early in the magnificence, beyond example, with which he diſcharged the office of Conſtable, or Prince of the Revels, in the Temple (c); and in this he perſiſted through his whole life, introducing creatures of his own, to elbow out any of whom the Queen took notice without his participation, and thereby kept himſelf always ſupreme (d). But, though he loved the ſtation of a favourite, he affected alſo that of a Miniſter (e). He would be firſt in all things, and he was ſo; in the Court, in the Camp, and in the Cabinet, at the ſame time; he changed his parties often, but never his views. He affected, in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's time, a great reſpect for the Spaniſh and Popiſh intereſt; adviſing her to give good words to King Philip, that ſhe might have leiſure to ſettle the affairs of Religion, and of her kingdom, upon a ſolid foundation; and thus he made his court at home, and preſerved his intereſt and intelligence abroad, which he uſed to the laſt, and is ſaid to have bequeathed it as a legacy to his ſon-in-law, Eſſex (f). The Papiſts and the Puritans ſeparating from the Church about the ſame time, he went over to the latter, the former having chiefs of their own, not to be removed but by proſecutions, which therefore was the way that he took (g). He profeſſed a kindneſs for Mary Queen of Scots, but it was to pleaſe Queen Elizabeth; and when he propoſed the Aſſociation afterwards, which proved the ruin of that Princeſs, it was ſtill to pleaſe, as well as to preſerve Elizabeth (h). His religious zeal was intirely governed by, or at leaſt had a conſtant connection with, his temporal intereſts, which induced him ſometimes to take meaſures that were not at all agreeable to thoſe Prelates that were at the head of the Church, who could never be brought to conſider him as a friend to themſelves or a well-wiſher to it (i) [Y]. As great a Politician as he was, he never choſe a back game, though

[Y] Or a well-wiſher to it.] In this note, it is propoſed to give ſome account of the diſputes this potent Earl had with his Clergy, which have been tranſmitted to poſterity, with circumſtances not much to his honour. He exerciſed his office of Chancellor of Oxford with a very high hand; and, by preferring his dependants, ſecured himſelf a great intereſt there, attended, as might be expected, with much clamour (69). He differed with Archbiſhop Grindal; and, though he was much in the confidence of the Queen, brought him at firſt into diſcredit with her, and then into diſgrace: nay, to ſuch a degree was this perſecution carried, that the poor prelate deſired to lay down his archiepiſcopal dignity, and actually cauſed the inſtrument of his reſignation to be drawn; but his enemies, believing he was near his end, did not preſs the perfecting of it, and ſo he died, with his mitre on his head, of a broken heart (70). He kept his houſe long, and was reported to be blind. A certain author, no great friend to Biſhops, and whoſe teſtimony is the more credible when he ſpeaks kindly of them, ſhall give the hiſtory of this Archbiſhop's fall, and of the ſhare the Earl had in it. His words are theſe (71). 'There was an Italian Doctor (one Julio Bargarucci) that having a 'known wife alive, yet bearing himſelf on the countenance of ſome great Lord, did marry another gentlewoman. This good Archbiſhop, not winking at 'ſo public a ſcandal, convened him for that, and 'proceeded by eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt him. Letters were preſently written from this great Lord to 'the Archbiſhop to ſtop the proceeding, to tolerate, 'to diſpenſe, or to mitigate, the cenſure, but the 'Biſhop remained ſtill unmoved and unmovable. 'When no ſubjects in treaty could be found to prevail, 'they intreat the Sovereign to write in the Doctor's behalf; but this John Baptiſt, not only perſiſted in 'his non licet habere eam, but, alſo, in a reverend 'faſhion, required an account of her Majeſty's faith, 'in that ſhe would ſeem to write in a matter, that, if 'ſhe were truly informed, was expreſſly againſt the 'word of God. The Queen, in a gracious diſpoſition, was purpoſed to have yielded an account in 'writing; but the great Lord not only diſſuaded her 'from that, as too great an indignity, but incenſed 'her exceedingly againſt him; whereupon he was 'privately commanded to keep his houſe, where, be'cauſe he was ſometimes troubled with ſore eyes, his 'friends gave out he was blind. In which, if he 'reſembled Tireſias the Soothſayer, he might alſo 'have been like him in another reſpect, by foretelling the fate of his perſecutor. For, that Lord, that 'ſo perſecuted this prelate about his phyſician's two 'wives, dying twenty years ſince, left two wives be'hind him, that can hardly be yet agreed which was 'his lawful wife.' A certain Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian acquaints us, that Dr. Julio's divorce was not the ſingle fault of this Archbiſhop: it ſeems he would not part with Lambeth-Houſe (72), to which the Earl had a mind. But the moſt remarkable circumſtance in this buſineſs is, that the Archbiſhop's want of vigilance in ſuppreſſing Puritans was the cauſe aſſigned for oppreſſing him, by that very nobleman who was known to be their principal protector, and to whom conſequently this could not give any real offence (73). Dr. Whitgift, ſucceeding in the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, ſucceeded alſo in a ſhort time to the diſlike of the Earl of Leiceſter, who having provided for Mr. Cartwright, the father and chief of the Puritans, not only by making him Maſter of his Hoſpital at Warwick, but alſo by granting him an annuity of fifty pounds a year out of his own eſtate, recommended him alſo to the Archbiſhop, with whom he had had many controverſies (74). Mr. Cartwright, on his ſide, behaved very reſpectfully, and his Grace not civilly only, but kindly; for which the Earl thanked him, as if the favour had been done to himſelf, by letter, intimating at the ſame time, what good things might be expected in caſe Mr. Cartwright was again allowed to preach; but the Archbiſhop would not be drawn into that, and gave his Lordſhip his reaſons in a long epiſtle (75). The though nobody knew better how to play it when no other road to ſucceſs was left (k). It was this deſire of ſeeming as well as being powerful, that made him induſtrious to prevent any from being called to Council, before he knew what road they would take and what length they would run. He ſought and loved men of abilities, but took care to keep them at a diſtance from Court, and in ſtations where he might be uſeful to them and they to him. Thus he ſent Sir Henry Sidney, his brother-in-law, over to Ireland; placed the Earl of Pembroke in Wales; Lord Hunſdon at Berwick; and the Earl of Huntingdon at York, with the title of Preſident of the North (l). In a word, he reduced the management of domeſtic affairs into a regular ſyſtem, ſo that there was no part of the kingdom in which he had not an influence; and, in the counties round his caſtle of Kenelworth, almoſt every thing was dependent upon him, either through hope or fear (m) [Z]. The Earl was then ſilent upon this ſubject, but ſoon after addreſſed himſelf to the Archbiſhop upon another, which was to demand his opinion as to the lawfulneſs of aſſiſting the Dutch, on the ſcore of religion, againſt their Sovereign the King of Spain, which he knew could not fail of bringing him into great difficulties. The Archbiſhop in his anſwer, declined giving any ſuch opinion; for which conduct of his, he advanced many reaſons; but theſe would not ſatisfy, and he was at laſt obliged to pen a reſolution of what was ſtyled the Queen's caſe of conſcience in that matter; which he did ſo wiſely, that no exceptions could be taken (76). The Archbiſhop, and the Lord-Treaſurer Burleigh, being viſitors of St. John's College in Cambridge, the Earl of Leiceſter interpoſed, by his letters, to ſtay their proceedings, which occaſioned much trouble (77). In the mean time Mr. Cartwright broke out again, and the conduct of the Puritans gave the Queen ſo much trouble, that the Earl of Leiceſter, to preſerve the Queen's favour, thought fit to leave them. Dr. Heylin gives us this account of the matter (78). 'It is worth obſerving, that the Puritans 'were then moſt buſy, as well in ſetting up their diſ-'cipline as in publiſhing their railing and ſeditious 'pamphlets, when the Spaniards were hovering on 'the ſeas with their terrible navy. At what time they 'conceived, and that not improbably, that the Queen 'and Council would be otherwiſe buſied than to take 'notice of their practices or ſuppreſs their doings, 'or, rather, that they durſt not call them into queſ-'tion for their words and actions for fear of alienating 'the affections of ſo great a party as they had raiſed 'to themſelves; the ſerious apprehenſions of which 'miſchievous Counſels prevailed ſo far on Leiceſter 'and Walſingham, that they did abſolutely renounce 'any further interceſſion for them, profeſſing that they 'had been horribly abuſed with their hypocriſy, which 'poſſibly might happen better for themſelves than it 'did for the Church, the Earl of Leiceſter going to 'his own place before the end of this year, and Wal-'ſingham being gathered to his fathers within two 'years after.'

[Z] Either through hope or fear.] In the foregoing note, we have ſhewn what a ſtroke he had in the Church, and how little able the firſt ſubject of the Queen was to bear up againſt his diſpleaſure, though conceived upon none of the juſteſt motives. As to his power paramount in the ſtate, we may form ſome idea of that, from the obſervance that was ſhewn to him when he viſited Buxton Wells, by the Earl of Shrewſbury, one of the ancienteſt peers in the kingdom, and the ſenſe which Queen Elizabeth expreſſed of that Earl's behaviour in the following letter (79), written in her own hand, which contains, perhaps, as high a teſtimony of favour, as ever was expreſſed by a Sovereign to her ſubject.

(79) Strype's Annals, Vol. II. p. 501.

'ELIZABETH,

'OUR very good couſin: being given to under-'ſtand from our couſin of Leiceſter, how ho-'nourably he was, not only lately, received by you 'our couſin, and the Counteſs, at Chatſworth, and 'his dier, by you both diſcharged at Buxton's, but 'alſo preſented with a very rare preſent; we ſhould 'do him great wrong, holding him in that place of 'favour we do, in caſe we ſhould not let you under-'ſtand, in how thankful ſort we accept the ſame at 'both your hands, not as done unto him, but unto 'our ownſelf: reputing him as another ourſelf. And, 'therefore, you may aſſure yourſelf, that we, taking 'upon us the debt, not as his, but our own, will 'take care, accordingly, to diſcharge in ſuch honour-'able ſort as, ſo well deſerving creditors as ye are, 'ſhall never have cauſe to think ye have met with an 'unthankful debtor, &c.'

It was but an ill return that he made to this nobleman, if it be true, as ſome have ſuggeſted, that he countenanced the ſtories told to his prejudice out of female jealouſy by his Counteſs, and thereby brought him into ſuſpicion with the Queen his miſtreſs (80), who had confided in him formerly, as much as in any man of his quality, the Earl of Leiceſter himſelf excepted, and had been ever faithfully ſerved.

(80) Leiceſter's Commonwealth.

On what account this exorbitant indulgence was ſhewn to the Lord Leiceſter, by the Queen, is not for us to decide, which, even in thoſe days, was but indifferently underſtood. However, that her Majeſty was ſuppoſed to have had thoughts of marrying him, not libels and ſecret hiſtories, but even the graveſt and moſt authentic writers, affirm; and therefore we may attribute to this the ſingular condeſcenſions of the Queen on one ſide, and the lofty behaviour of the Earl on the other. Oſborne (81), who lived near her time, and was a paſſionate admirer of this Princeſs, makes no matter of doubt of it; and, having mentioned ſome of the reaſons ſaid to be uſed to give a colour to this marriage, he proceeds thus. 'Nor 'could Leiceſter render his bed vacant to a more 'thriving end, as he is rumoured to have done, than 'to make room for the greateſt and moſt fortunate 'Princeſs the ſun ever looked upon without bluſhing, 'in relation to oppreſſion or blood: this may be al-'lowed upon the ſcore of probability, that his Lord-'ſhip would hardly have been ſo rampant and uncivil, 'without ſome extraordinary invitation, as to draw a 'blow, in her preſence, from another Privy-Counſellor, 'more zealous poſſibly than diſcreet; to whom, when 'the Queen ſaid, 'He had forfeited his hand,' his 'reply was, 'He hoped ſhe would ſuſpend that judg-'ment till the traitor had loſt his head, who did bet-'ter deſerve it:' but this accident, bordering ſo near 'the confines of her honour, did admit no further 'debate, it being no other than ſhe, in a leſs 'ſprightly humour, might have given him herſelf, 'none being more flexible to all kind of jollities than 'the minds of Princes, when unbent from public 'affairs.'

(81) Traditional Memoirs on the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, § 19.

In all public commiſſions, the Earl of Leiceſter's name was ſure to be inſerted, and in moſt of them he took care to act; for, he was an excellent patron, and ſeldom failed any one that was attached to him. He miſſed no opportunity of gratifying himſelf and his followers, and frequently obtained grants of great value, ſuch as of timber, waſte lands, encroachments upon foreſts, and licences for importing and exporting certain goods, all of which he ſold for large ſums of money (82). He valued himſelf not a little upon the court paid him by the nobility; and ſuch as held themſelves of too high rank to make ſuch kind of ſubmiſſions, he frequently found means to reach, when they leaſt expected it. Such were his deeds at Court, in quality of Queen's favourite and chief miniſter, which he thought title ſufficient to command obedience from men of all ranks, as appears from his behaviour to the Lord Chief Juſtice Anderſon, as we have ſhewn in prized at his great weight in Parliament, where he had always a ſtrong party in the Houſe of Commons at his devotion; and, in the Houſe of Peers, he directed things at his will, having ſometimes ſix, eight, or even ten proxies in his own hands (n), there being at that time no order to reſtrain ſo exorbitant a privilege. If in any thing he overſhot himſelf, it was in accepting the command in the Low-Countries, to which thoſe who were leaſt inclined to him, were moſt ready in giving their approbation (o), and in his abſence, brought Sir Chriſtopher Hatton into high credit, with which he was much offended (p). It is certain his dignity did not anſwer his expectation, but ſerved rather to hurt his fortune, and to impair his power, both which however he would have recovered if he had lived; for he perfectly underſtood the Queen's temper, and had a great aſcendency over it. In his private life he affected a wonderful regularity, was very circumſpect in his ſpeeches, and wrote as well as any man of his time (q). It was a ſaying of his, that a great man ought to know every thing, and be able to do every thing by himſelf, or by his inſtruments; which he made good in his practice. But with reſpect to men of ordinary rank, whom he employed and admitted to great familiarities, their favour was ſeldom of any long date; but he found ways and means to diſpoſe of them, either in diſtant employments, or otherwiſe, ſo that when he thought proper to diſpenſe with their ſervices, they might be able to do him no hurt (r). He carried his pretences to piety very high, though to gratify his paſſions, he fell into vices that could not be concealed; and though no man talked more of moderation and juſtice, yet he was guilty of ſome acts of oppreſſion that were both violent and mean [AA]. in another place (83). For all this, his Lordſhip was not always a courtier: he could ſometimes act the patriot too, and that with equal life and ſpirit, as when he declared in Parliament, that a huſband ſhould be impoſed upon the Queen, or that ſhe ſhould be obliged to nominate a ſucceſſor for the ſecurity of the State (84). But it has been doubted whether he was in earneſt in that bold declaration, or whether he made it with a view to diſcover what other great peers were of this ſentiment, and then to lead them, under colour of zeal for their country, into practices which might render them obnoxious to the reſentment of the crown (85).

[AA] That were both violent and mean.] We are informed by Camden (86), that when the Lord Paget retired beyond the ſeas, he complained that he was forced to take this ſtep for his own preſervation, becauſe, through the arts of Leiceſter and Walſingham, he found the Queen's favour entirely eſtranged from him, which might poſſibly paſs for a calumny, if ſoon after, upon his being attainted in Parliament, the Earl of Leiceſter had not procured a grant to himſelf of Paget, afterwards ſtyled Eſſex-Houſe. We are told by Sir Robert Atkyns (87), that this Earl cauſed ſome of his agents to apply themſelves to the Lord Berkeley, for a ſight of his family evidences, that the Earl might be the better able to ſhew his allegiance to that noble houſe, ſome of which they took away, and then a title being ſet up by the Earl of Leiceſter, to part of Lord Berkeley's lands, he loſt them for want of thoſe evidences to ſupport his right. We have mentioned in another part of this work, the caſe of Mr. Arden, of Park-Hall in Warwickſhire (88), who was brought to an untimely end, for deſpiſing that low method of making court to this great man, to which ſome of his neighbours condeſcended, which was, by wearing his livery. Sir William Dugdale acquaints us with the injury done to one Mr. Robinſon of Warwickſhire, who by ſome ſtrange methods loſt his eſtate, which was afterwards found in this great Earl's poſſeſſion (89). But, in another place we are informed, that this Robinſon was the ſon of a gentleman killed in the Queen's ſervice at Newhaven, under the Earl of Warwick, that he was bred up in Leiceſter's ſervice, in which he ſpent a great deal of money, and thereby entangled his eſtate; that upon this, ſuits grew between him and the uſurers, who, at the bottom, were but this Lord's inſtruments, and in an attempt of theirs to get poſſeſſion, a man was killed by Robinſon, or ſome of his party in their own defence, for which he was impriſoned, tried, and convicted, but loſt only his eſtate (90); which, with other lands, was afterwards conveyed to the Queen in exchange, and ſo all farther diſputes prevented. But the Earl's power and influence, great as they were, met now and then with a check, and particularly in the caſe of

(91) Life and Actions of Sir John Packington, MS.

 [The Thomas, Earl of Suſſex, who is mentioned in an early part of the article as having ſhewn himſelf averſe to Leiceſter's counſels, and as having ſtrongly promoted the overture of a marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Arch-duke, Charles of Auſtria, has not, till lately, been ſo well known as he deſerves. But we have now the ſatisfaction of being able to give an account of him from Mr. Lodge's valuable Illuſtrations of Britiſh Hiſtory. This nobleman was the eldeſt ſon of Henry Ratcliffe, the ſecond Earl of Suſſex, by Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Thomas Howard, ſecond Duke of Norfolk. "His firſt "public ſervice was in an honourable embaſſy to the "Emperor Charles the Fifth, to treat of the projected "marriage of Queen Mary to Philip, which he afterwards ratified with the latter in Spain. Upon his "return he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, "and Chief Juſtice of the Foreſts, north of Trent. "The Order of the Garter, and the office of Captain "of the Penſioners, were likewiſe conferred on him "in that reign, a little before the concluſion of which "he ſucceeded to his father's honours. Elizabeth "continued him for a while in the poſt of Lord Deputy, and recalled him to aſſume that of the Preſident of the North, a ſituation rendered infinately "difficult by the delicacy of her affairs with Scotland, "and the rebellious ſpirit of the border counties. "The latter, however, was ſubdued by his prudence "and bravery in 1569; and the aſſiduity and acuteneſs with which he ſtudied the former, will appear "from his own pen. The unfortunate affair of the "Duke of Norfolk, to whom he was moſt firmly attached, fell out in the courſe of that year, and "would have ended happily and honourably if the "Duke had followed his advice. That nobleman's "laſt requeſt was, that his beſt george, chain, and "garter, might be given to my Lord of Suſſex. He "was the prime negotiator in thoſe two famous treaties of marriage with the Arch-duke Charles, and "the Duke of Alençon, Elizabeth's real intentions in "which have been ſo frequently the ſubject of hiſtorical diſquiſition. In 1572, he retired from the "ſeverer labours of the public ſervice, in which he "had waſted his health, to the honourable office of is wonderful, that, with these great inequalities in his behaviour, he should be able to maintain himself, and under such a reign, in the possession of absolute power, for such a number

" Lord Chamberlain, and the duties of a Cabinet " Minister; and died, at his house in Bermondsey, " June 9, 1583, leaving little to his heirs but the " bright example of a character truly noble. The " Earl of Sussex was twice married: first, to Eliz- " abeth, daughter of Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of " Southampton, by whom he had two sons, Henry " and Thomas, who died young: secondly, to Fran- " ces, daughter of Sir William Sydney, afterwards " the celebrated foundress of Sydney-Sussex College " in Cambridge; by whom, having no children, " he was succeeded by Henry, his next bro- " ther (92)."

(92) Lodge's Illustrations of British History, Biography, and Manners, vol. I. p. 367, 368. Note.

The character, which Mr. Lodge has drawn of the Earl of Sussex, is as follows: " This great man's con- " duct united all the splendid qualities of those emi- " nent persons who jointly rendered Elizabeth's court " an object of admiration to Europe, and was per- " fectly free from their faults. Wise and loyal as " Burghley, without his blind attachment to the " Monarch; vigilant as Walsingham, but disdaining " his low cunning; magnificent as Leicester, but in- " capable of hypocrisy; and brave as Raleigh, with " the piety of a primitive Christian; he seemed above " the common objects of human ambition, and wanted, " if the expression may be allowed, those dark shades " of character which make men the heroes of history. " Hence it is, probably, that our writers have be- " stowed so little attention on this admirable person, " who is but slightly mentioned in most historical " collections, unless with regard to his disputes with " Leicester, whom he hated almost to a fault." Mr. Lodge justly esteems himself peculiarly fortunate in having been the instrument of disclosing the Earl of Sussex's letters to the public. They form a very valu- able part of the " Historical Illustrations," and, a small number excepted, are the only ones to be met with in print. Mr. Lodge trusts that they will acquit him of extravagance in the view he has given of the Earl's character (93).

(93) Ibid.

In this opinion we entirely concur. The Earl of Sussex's letters display both his integrity and ability in a very striking light, and they are written in a clear and manly style. Four of those letters are particularly curious; being two to the Queen, on the treaty of marriage with the Arch-duke of Austria; one to Sir William Cecil, on the state of parties in Scotland; and one to her Majesty concerning the Duke of Alençon. The letter on the affairs of Scotland is considered by Mr. Lodge as an inestimable curiosity (94). Farther light will be thrown on the Earl of Sussex's character, by transcribing the manly language in which he com- plains that his services were neglected, and declares his purpose of retiring to private life. It is in a let- ter to Sir William Cecil. " I was firste a Lieuten'te; " I was after little better than a Marshal; I had then " nothing left to me but to direct hanging matters, " (in the meane tyme all was disposed that was w^th^in " my comission,) and nowe I ame offered to be " made a Shreif's Bayly to deliver over possessions. " Blame me not, good Mr. Secretarie, though my " pen utter somewhat of that swell in my stomake, " for I see I ame kepte but for a brome, and when I " have done my office to be throwen out of the dore. " I ame the first nobel man hathe been thus used. " Trewe service deserveth honor and credite, and not " reproche and open defaming; but, seeing the one " is ever delivered to me in the stede of the other, I " must leave to serve, or lose my honor; w^ch^, being " continewed so long in my howse, I wolde be lothe " shoolde take blemishe w^th^ me. These matters I " knowe procede not from lacke of good and honor- " able meaning in the Q' ma^te^ towards me, nor from " lacke of dewte' and trewthe in me towards her, " which grevethe me the more; and, therefore, seing " I shall be still a camelyon, and yelde no other shewe " then as it shall please others to give the couller, I " will content my self to live a private lyfe. God " send her Ma^te^ others that meane as well as I have " done; and so I comitt you to th' Almightie (95)."

(94) Illustrations of British History, vol. II. p. 1—6.

(95) Ibid. p. 35. The letter was written in 1569.

From the next letter it appears that the Queen had too much wisdom to part with so faithful a counsellor and servant. The Earl of Sussex had a high regard and esteem for Lord Burghley. In one of his letters, dated June 28, 1580, he expresses himself, to that great statesman, in the following terms: " The trewe " fere of God w^ch^ yo^r^ actyons have alwayes shewed " to be in yo^r^ harte, the grete and deepe care w^ch^ you " have always had for the honor and salfty of the Q'. " Ma^t's^ moste worthy p'son; the co'tinuall troubell " w^ch^ you have of long tyme taken for the benefytyng " of the com'on-welthe; and the upryght course w^ch^ " ye have alwaye's taken, respectyng the mattr and " not the p'son, in all causes; (w^ch^ be the necessary " trusts of him that ferethe God trewly, s'rveth his " Soverayne faythfully, and lovethe his countrey " derely) have tyed me to yo^r^ L. in that knotte w^ch^ " no worldly fraylty can break; and, therfor, I wyll " never forbere to runne any fortune that may s'rve " you, and further you^r^ godly actyons. And so, my " good L. forberyng to entrobell you w^th^ words, I " end; and wysh unto you as to my self, and better, " yf I may (96)."

Our predecessor, in note D, has laid too much stress upon Aubrey's Narrative, which he considers as carrying in it strong pretences to absolute certainty. But the fact is, that Aubrey's story is manifestly copied from " Leicester's Commonwealth." This will ap- pear by the many correspondent passages. Aubrey has managed the matter so clumsily, as to retain words which betray the plagiarism; such as " fetch the same at Oxford." Nothing in the narrative seems to be Aubrey's own, excepting the sentence that begins, " yet the inhabitants will tell you, &c.;" which has much the air of a circumstantiated idle tale. Stories of a similar nature, with regard to other events, may be met with in every county in Britain (97).

(97) From the remarks of a valuable correspondent.

In whatever manner the death of Lord Robert Dud- ley's Lady took place, it is certain, that, on his be- coming a widower, his ambition raised him to the hopes of marrying the Queen; and that there was a general opinion, both at home and abroad, of her Majesty's inclination to the match. Indeed, it was not disclaimed by Elizabeth herself. The truth of these facts is rendered apparent from a very curious letter, written, on the 30th of November, 1560, by Mr. Jones to Sir Nicholas Throkmorton, Ambassador in Frrnce, and published by Lord Hardwicke, in his State Papers (98).

(98) Miscellaneous State Papers, vol. I. p. 163—169.

Concerning the Duke of Norfolk's suit to the Queen of Scots, there is a letter, in cypher, for the most part, from Throgmorton to the Secretary Maitland, dated July the 20th, 1569, which originally belonged to Archbishop Spotswood, and was lately in the pos- session of Sir Alexander Dick, Baronet. A copy of this letter, which is not a little curious, has been transmitted to us, in a series of observations on Lei- cester's article, by the correspondent whom we have so often had occasion to mention with gratitude and esteem. But, upon reflection, we think that the communication will more proprerly appear when we come to the Duke of Norfolk's life.

We do not entirely agree with our ingenious pre- decessor in his assertion, that the Earl of Leicester's entertainment of the Queen, for ten days, was con- ducted with the greatest elegance as well as magnifi- cence. Magnificence there was in it in a high degree; but of elegance, it was assuredly defective in various respects. The savage man with his satyrs, the bear- baitings, the Italian tumblers, the country bride-ale, the morrice-dancing, and the Coventry men's Hock's Tuesday's play, can scarcely be called elegant diver- sions. In the whole, there was ingenuity and splen- dour, mixed with a remainder of barbarous manners. The mythological and allegorical taste of the times, in the entertainments given to Elizabeth, is well dis- played by Mr. Warton, in his history of English Poetry. " Every thing was tinctured with ancient " history and mythology.—When the Queen paraded " through a country town, almost every pageant was a " pantheon. When she paid a visit at the house of " any of her nobility, at entering the hall she was " saluted number of years as he did, and that too in ſpite both of open and ſecret oppoſition; which fully juſtifies an obſervation that has been made upon his conduct, viz. "That his

"ſaluted by the penates, and conducted to her Privy-Chamber by Mercury. Even the paſtry-cooks were expert mythologiſts. At dinner, ſelect transformations of Ovid's Metamorphoſes were exhibited in confectionary: and the ſplendid iceing of an immenſe hiſtoric plumb-cake, was emboſſed with a delicious baſſo relievo of the deſtruction of Troy. In the afternoon, when ſhe condeſcended to walk in the garden, the lake was covered with tritons and nereids: the pages of the family were converted into wood-nymphs, who peeped from every bower: and the footmen gamboled over the lawns in the figure of ſatyrs.—The next morning, after ſleeping in a room hung with tapeſtry of the voyage of Eneas, when her Majeſty hunted in the park, ſhe was met by Diana, who, pronouncing our royal prude to be the brighteſt paragon of unſpotted chaſtity, invited her to groves, free from the intruſions of Acteon.—When ſhe rode through the ſtreets of the city of Norwich, Cupid, at the command of the Mayor and Aldermen, advancing from a groupe of gods who had left Olympus to grace the proceſſion, gave her a golden arrow, the moſt effective weapon of his well-furniſhed quiver, which, under the influence of ſuch irreſiſtible charms, was ſure to wound the moſt obdurate heart. "A gift," ſays honeſt Hollinſhed, "which her Majeſty, now verging to her fiftieth year, received very thankfullie." In one of the fulſome interludes at Court, "where ſhe was preſent, the ſinging-boys of her chapel preſented the ſtory of the three rival goddeſſes on Mount Ida, to which her Majeſty was ingeniouſly added as a fourth: and Paris was arraigned in form for adjudging the golden apple to "Venus, which was due to the Queen alone (99)."

(99) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, vol. III. p. 492—494.

Wicked as Leiceſter was, the inſinuations againſt him in note H, appear to be groundleſs. In our additions to the article of Walter, Earl of Eſſex, we have ſhewn that the death of that nobleman is fully accounted for without having recourſe to the ſuſpicion of poiſon. We have ſhewn, likewiſe, that the marriage of Leiceſter with the Counteſs of Eſſex did not take place in the haſty and indecent manner which is often repreſented. In fact, they were not married until two years (one day excepted) after Eſſex's deceaſe. In the concluding remark of note I, as well as in other parts of the article, Dr. Campbell ſeems to have departed from his uſual biographical character, and to have been as ready to believe things to the prejudice of the Earl of Leiceſter, as he was in the preceding lives, to palliate the conduct of the Dudleys.

The ſuppoſed title of the Earl of Huntingdon to the crown, whoſe deſcent, from the Duke of Clarence, is deſcribed in note K, was much talked of in Elizabeth's reign. It appears, ſo early as 1563, that he was rendered uneaſy on this account, and received marks of diſpleaſure from the Queen, whoſe extreme jealouſy, about her ſucceſſion, is well known. In Lord Hardwicke's State Papers, there is a curious letter relative to this ſubject, written by the Earl of Huntingdon to the Earl of Leiceſter. As it throws ſome light on Elizabeth's diſpoſition, we ſhall tranſcribe it.

"My honourable good Lord,

"I am ſorry that my preſent diſeaſe is ſuch as "there are left me but theſe two remedies, either to "ſwallow up thoſe bitter pills, lately received, or to "make you a partner of my griefs, thereby ſome-"thing to eaſe a wounded heart. At my wife's laſt "being at Court, to do her duty as became her, it "pleaſed her Majeſty to give her a privy nippe, eſ-"pecially concerning myſelf, whereby I perceive ſhe "has ſome jealous conceit of me, and, as I can ima-"gine, of late digeſted. How far I have been al-"ways from conceiting any greatneſs of myſelf, nay, "how ready I have been always to ſhun applauſes, "both by my continual low ſail, and my carriage, I "do aſſure myſelf, is beſt known to your Lordſhip, "and the reſt of my neareſt friends; if not, mine "own conſcience ſhall beſt clear me from any ſuch "folly. Alas, what could I hope to effect, in the "greateſt hopes I might imagine to have in the ob-"taining the leaſt likelihood of that height? Will a "whole Commonwealth deprive themſelves of ſo "many bleſſings preſently enjoyed, for a future hope, "uncertain, in favour of one inferior to many others, "both in degree, and any princely quality? With regard to Anthony Wood's aſſertion, in note L, that the author of "Leiceſter's Commonwealth" had moſt of his materials for the compoſition of it from Sir William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, we cannot help conſidering it as totally groundleſs. He was too wiſe and circumſpect a man to engage in ſuch a hazardous buſineſs. Indeed, it is utterly incredible that he ſhould connect himſelf, in the leaſt degree, with Parſons the jeſuit, or any writer of that kind; or that he ſhould furniſh materials for a libel, which he muſt know would be moſt odious to his Sovereign; that Sovereign to whom he was ſo firmly and loyally attached.

The Earl of Leiceſter's conduct in the Low Countries is ſufficiently detailed in the text, and in our general hiſtories. If any of our readers wiſh to ſee a recent and well-written account of it, they may have recourſe to Watſon's Hiſtory of Philip the Second, King of Spain. It may be obſerved, by the way, that Leiceſter appears to have had more than one project with relation to the States of Holland. The Maſter of Gray, in a letter to Mr. Archibald Douglas, dated November the 10th, 1586, writes thus: "My Lord "Leiceſter has ſent, at divers times, an offer of the "propriety of the Low Countries to the King's Ma-"jeſty (of Scotland);" and, now of late, and craves an "anſwer (103)." Sir Robert Naunton obſerves, concerning Leiceſter's exploits in Holland, that his device might have been without prejudice to the great Cæſar, Veni, Vidi, Redivi (104). Indeed, his character as a warrior does not appear to have been of the firſt order. In this reſpect he was greatly inferior to his father.

It is juſtly remarked, that the latter, in note R, is a maſter-piece in its kind. Several of the ſtateſmen of Queen Elizabeth's reign, excelled in the propriety, freedom, and ſtrength of their ſtyle. We have before had occaſion to obſerve, that this was the caſe with regard to Walter and Robert Devereux, Earls of Eſſex; and Leiceſter may be added to the number. Indeed public men may ſometimes be more likely to excel in a vigorous

" his depth was not fathomable in thoſe days, or his policy to be reached in theſe (s)." In a word, the family of Dudley, in three deſcents, furniſhed men of ſuch capacities, as our hiſtories ſcarcely record the like. The grandfather, the father, and the ſon, were all great men; but the laſt the greateſt and moſt fortunate of the three, if any man can be ſo reputed, whom flattery itſelf would be aſhamed to ſtyle good. This Earl had by his laſt Counteſs, Lettice, daughter of Sir Francis Knolles, Knight of the Garter, and widow of Walter Devereux, Earl of Eſſex, an only ſon Robert, Baron of Denbigh, a vigorous and elegant manner of compoſition than mere ſcholars. The latter, being confined to their cloſets, are in danger of contracting a formality and ſtiffneſs of ſtyle: and this was particularly the ſtate of things, when the learned by profeſſion did not ſo generally mix with the world as is cuſtomary at preſent. But thoſe who are engaged in the grand ſcenes of buſineſs, who have their talents called into exerciſe by frequent and ſtriking emergencies, and who follow the dictates of their immediate feelings, provided they have had a tolerable education, acquire an eaſe, and a variety of expreſſion, which the others cannot readily attain (105).

(105) Introduction to the New Annual Regiſter for 1791, p. xx.

Without the leaſt intention of vindicating or palliating the character of the Earl of Leiceſter, we cannot but heſitate in admitting the full truth of ſome of the circumſtances related in note U. Charges of ſo atrocious a nature ought to be founded on ſtronger evidences than hearſays and ſurmizes. At the ſame time, it muſt be acknowledged, that there was ſomething very ſuſpicious and hateful in the Earl's general conduct, when it was ſo readily credited, by the age in which he lived, that he did not ſcruple to have recourſe to poiſon on various occaſions.

When we conſider the univerſal teſtimony of hiſtorians to the badneſs of Leiceſter's character, it is impoſſible to peruſe the religious expreſſions, and ſolemn profeſſions, of his laſt will, without ſome degree of aſtoniſhment. Either he was more ſincere in certain reſpects than is commonly imagined, or elſe he was one of the moſt abominable hypocrites that ever exiſted. If the language he uſed was ſolely the language of art, it is juſtly obſerved in the text, that it is ſcarcely to be diſtinguiſhed from that of nature. The probable ſolution of the difficulty is, that he united piety (falſe in its nature, but real in its feelings,) with practical wickedneſs: nor have the examples of ſuch an union been very frequent in the hiſtory of mankind.

Since the firſt edition of the Biographia, many of the Earl of Leiceſter's letters, which had hitherto exiſted only in manuſcript, have appeared in different publications. There are five in Murdin's State Papers, one of which, dated June the 20th, 1572, was written to Lord Lincoln, then Ambaſſador in France, directing him to make diligent enquiry into the diſpoſition of the Duke of Alençon, but eſpecially to ſend an account of his perſon. The other four were addreſſed in the ſame year, to Lord Burleigh, and principally relate to Sir Henry Piercy and the State of Scotland (106).

(106) Murdin's State Papers, p. 19. p. 228—233.

In the Earl of Hardwicke's State Papers, one department (No. XVIII) conſiſts of letters to and from Lord Leiceſter, in the Low Countries. This correſpondence throws peculiar light on the extreme offence which Queen Elizabeth took at Leiceſter's accepting, without her conſent, the office of Governor and Captain General of thoſe countries; and diſplays the great pains that were taken by the chief ſtateſmen of the time, to reconcile her Majeſty to the conduct of her favourite. It is remarkable, that Lord Burleigh, who is uſually repreſented as the political rival of Leiceſter, exerted himſelf with particular zeal on this occaſion. His own words will beſt explain his behaviour. " I, in the preſence of Mr. Secretary, uſed " ſome boldneſs with her Majeſty, and proteſted to " her as a counſellor, I could not forbear to let her " know, that this courſe that ſhe held againſt your " Lordſhip, was like to endanger her, in honour, " ſurety, and profit; and that, if ſhe continued the " ſame, I prayed her Majeſty that I might be diſ- " charged of the place I held, and both afore God and " men, be free from the ſhame and peril that I ſaw " could not be avoided. I uſed, boldly, ſuch bold " language in this matter, as I found her doubtful " whether to charge me with preſumption, which " partly ſhe did, or with ſome aſtoniſhment of my " round ſpeech, which, truly, was no other than my " conſcience did move me, even in amaritudine " animæ." Lord Hardwicke remarks, that this reſolute friendly behaviour of the old Treaſurer towards his rival, Leiceſter, during the Queen's diſpleaſure, does him great honour, and that it is ſtrange that Camden paſſes it over in ſilence. " But, indeed," adds his Lordſhip, " that hiſtorian's omiſſions are un- " pardonable, conſidering the lights he had." Concerning Leiceſter, Lord Hardwicke obſerves, that his character is ſtrongly marked in his letters upon the ſubject before us. They ſhew him to have been paſſionate and vindictive, but, at the ſame time, to have poſſeſſed more conſiderable talents for buſineſs than are allowed him by Camden and other hiſtorians. One of his letters to Daviſon is extremely petulant, and ſtrongly diſplays the haughty temper of the man. Nor did Daviſon deſerve this treatment; for he evidently appears to have acted with great zeal in explaining and vindicating to the Queen, Leiceſter's motives for accepting the dignity of Governor General of the Low Countries. Among others of his letters in Lord Hardwicke's collection, are three which relate to a private treaty with Spain (107)

Mr. Lodge has recently publiſhed, in his " Illuſ- " trations of Britiſh Hiſtory," an additional number of the Earl of Leiceſter's original letters. As to enter into a particular detail of them would extend our article to an undue length, it may be ſufficient to refer to them in general, and to obſerve, that they contribute to a farther elucidation of the Earl's diſpoſition and abilities.

Mr. Lodge's character of the Earl of Leiceſter is as follows: " He was diſtinguiſhed by the elegance of " his manners, and the profuſeneſs of his expences; " and affected a great degree of piety, and a ſtrict " purity of conduct. To theſe plauſible appear- " ances, though unpoſſeſſed of either wiſdom or vir- " tue, he owed the maintenance of his power to the " laſt, againſt a ſtrong party at Court, and even " againſt the Queen herſelf, who would gladly have " pulled him down when thoſe motives, which, doubt- " leſs, produced her firſt favours to him, had loſt " their force. The moſt material circumſtances of " his political hiſtory, never appeared to public view; " for he was the darkeſt character of his time, and " delighted in deriving the ſucceſs of his ſchemes " from the operation of remote cauſes, and the agency " of obſcure inſtruments. It is highly probable that " the Queen of Scots, and the Duke of Norfolk, " were ſacrificed to this crooked ſort of policy; a con- " jecture which tends to wipe out ſomewhat, though, " alas! but little of the bloody ſtain, which thoſe " enormities have left on Elizabeth's memory (108)."

(108) Ibid. vol. I. p. 303, Note.

Notwithſtanding the elaborate and valuable article of our ingenious predeceſſor, and the farther information that may be derived concerning Leiceſter from ſubſequent writers, there ſtill hangs a cloud on ſome parts of his conduct, which is probably now for ever incapable of being removed. This is particularly the caſe with regard to the murders aſcribed to him, which rather reſt upon the grounds of ſtrong and reaſonable ſuſpicion, than the baſis of direct and poſitive evidence. Perhaps, likewiſe, too indiſcriminate a credit has been given to the tract, entituled, " Leiceſter's " Commonwealth." On the whole, however, he muſt ſtand upon record as having been a very wicked man; and it is a poor compenſation for this character, to be able to ſay, that, upon enquiry, his abilities appear to have been of a higher nature than has commonly been apprehended.] K.

who died in his childhood, July 15, 1584, for whom an altar-monument was erected by that of his father at Warwick, with his effigies thereon, and a very pompous inſcription to his memory (t). As for Lettice, Counteſs of Leiceſter, ſhe ſurvived nearly forty-ſix years after the deceaſe of the Earl, by whom an ample proviſion was made for her, with the higheſt teſtimony of affection, in his will, of which ſhe was appointed executrix; and that ſhe loſt no time in proving it appears by the date, September 6, 1588, when her Lord had not been two days dead (u). Her Ladyſhip was, likewiſe, very expeditious in a third marriage with Sir Chriſtopher Blount, a gentleman who had great dependance upon her ſon, the Earl of Eſſex, and whoſe tender friendſhip for him afterwards coſt him his life (w). It does not appear, that, during the remaining part of Queen Elizabeth's reign, the Counteſs-Dowager of Eſſex had any great intereſt, though her ſon ſucceeded her huſband in the Queen's favour. On the contrary, we are told, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty the Earl of Eſſex prevailed upon the Queen to admit the Counteſs his mother to her royal preſence, and this too after repeated diſappointments; neither could he afterwards prevail in the ſame ſuit, though he urged it with much warmth (x). We need not wonder, therefore, that her ſolicitations could avail him little in his laſt misfortunes, though it is very certain that ſhe did for him all that was in her power. But in the reign of King James ſhe had great credit at Court, at leaſt for ſome time, as will be ſeen elſewhere. The laſt years of her life were ſpent in retirement in the country, where ſhe lived hoſpitably and charitably till her deceaſe, which happened December the 25th, 1634 (y). She was buried with great funeral pomp, in the ſame tomb with her ſecond huſband, in the church at Warwick; and on the right hand of his monument there is a large copy of verſes, in two columns, on a tablet, to her honour, ſubſcribed Gervaſe Clifton (z).

DUDLEY (Sir ROBERT), as he was here called, and, as he was ſtyled abroad, Earl of Warwick, and Duke of Northumberland. He was ſon of Robert Earl of Leiceſter, by the Lady Douglas Sheffield, and was born at Sheen in Surrey in 1573, where, for reaſons that we have ſeen in the former article, he was very carefully concealed, as well to prevent the Queen's knowledge of the Earl's engagements with his mother, as to hide it from the Counteſs of Eſſex, to whom he was then contracted, if not married (a). At the time of his birth, however, and ſome time after, he was conſidered as the Earl of Leiceſter's lawful ſon, by Ambroſe Earl of Warwick, and others of his neareſt relations; particularly by Sir Thomas Butler and his ſon, who, as the Earl affirms in his will, intended to leave his ſon Robert their eſtate. When he was about five years of age, his father, the Earl of Leiceſter, married Lettice, Counteſs-Dowager of Eſſex, openly, and thereupon his ſon Robert was no longer treated as his lawful child, but as his natural iſſue by the Lady Douglas Sheffield. Out of her hands the Earl was very deſirous of getting him, in order to put him under the care of Sir Edward Horſey, Knight, Governor of the Iſle of Wight (b), which ſome have imagined was with a ſiniſter view, not againſt the boy, for whom Leiceſter had ever the greateſt tenderneſs, but with a thought of bringing him upon the ſtage at ſome proper time, as his natural ſon by another Lady. At that time, however, he failed of his purpoſe; but not long after it ſeems he prevailed, and got the child into his hands. He ſent him then to ſchool at Offington in Suſſex in 1583, where he was under the care of one Owen Jones, to whom, upon a certain occaſion, the Earl expreſſed himſelf to this purpoſe (c): 'Owen, thou knoweſt that Robin, my boy, is my lawful ſon; and as I do, 'and have charged thee, to keep it ſecret, ſo I charge thee not to forget it; and there-'fore ſee thou be careful of him.' There he received the firſt rudiments of literature, and gave very extraordinary proofs of the wonderful pregnancy of his parts, which were not only equal, but even ſuperior, to thoſe of any of his family. After remaining four years in this private ſchool, he was removed, in 1587, to the Univerſity of Oxford, and there entered of Chriſt-Church, by the ſtyle of Comitis filius, i. e. an Earl's ſon, and placed under the care of Mr. Thomas Chaloner, afterwards Sir Thomas Chaloner, and tutor to Prince Henry (d). In about a year after he came to the Univerſity, and when he was about the age of fifteen, his father died, leaving him, after the deceaſe of his uncle Ambroſe, Earl of Warwick, his noble caſtle of Kenelworth, the lordſhips of Denbigh and Chirk, and the bulk of his eſtate, which, before he was of age, he in a great meaſure enjoyed, notwithſtanding the enmity borne him by the Counteſs-Dowager of Leiceſter. He was at this time looked upon, and very deſervedly, as one of the fineſt gentlemen in England; in his perſon tall, well-ſhaped, having a freſh and fine complexion, but red-haired; learned beyond his age, more eſpecially in the Mathematicks; and very expert in his exerciſes, and particularly in riding the great horſe, in which he was allowed to excel any man of his time (e). With theſe accompliſhments, and a great fortune, it is no wonder that he was every where well received, and particularly at Court, more eſpecially as he was of a frank and open diſpoſition, very generous and friendly, and, though few were ſo well verſed in books, much addicted dicted to an active life. His genius prompted him to great exploits; and, having a particular turn to Navigation and diſcoveries, he reſolved, ſoon after he was of age, to make a voyage into the South Seas at his own expence, in hopes of acquiring as great fame thereby as the famous Thomas Cavendiſh of Trimley, Eſq; his dear and intimate acquaintance, whoſe ſiſter he married. But, after a great deal of pains taken and much money ſpent, the government would not ſuffer him to proceed, looking upon it as a dangerous voyage, in which they thought it not fit to hazard the lives of the Queen's ſubjects (f). Mr. Dudley was not to be cured of his deſire of going to ſea even by this diſappointment, and therefore fitted out a ſmall ſquadron for the river Oroonoque, and the coaſts adjacent, of which he took the command in perſon. He ſailed from Southampton-road, November 6, 1594, and returned to St. Ives, in Cornwall, about the end of May, 1595, having performed all, and indeed more, than could be expected from him, conſidering his ſmall ſtrength, taking, ſinking, and otherwiſe deſtroying, nine ſail of Spaniſh ſhips, one of which was a man of war of ſix hundred tons, which he fought board and board for two days, till he had no powder left, and ſhe afterwards ſunk at ſea (g). He wrote a particular account of this voyage at the requeſt of the Reverend Mr. Hakluyt, which he afterwards publiſhed in his large and valuable Collection [A]. In the ſucceeding year he fitted out two ſhips and two pinnaces, for the South-Seas, under Captain Benjamin Wood, at his ſole expence; and, attending the Earl of Eſſex and the Lord High-Admiral of England in their glorious expedition againſt the Spaniards, he, for his gallant behaviour at the taking of Cadiz, received the honour of knighthood from the firſt of thoſe noble Peers (b). In the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Dudley, being then a widower, married Alice, daughter to Sir Thomas Leigh (i), and ſettled upon her, in jointure, great part of his eſtate; and, gaining by this marriage ſome powerful friends, he began to entertain hopes of reviving the honours of his family. He conſidered with himſelf, that it was not yet too late to make proof of the legitimacy of his birth, by which he would become clearly entitled to the honour of Lord L'Iſle and Earl of Leiceſter, as heir to his father, as alſo to the earldom of Warwick, by virtue of the limitations in his uncle's patent, as alſo to the Caſtle of Warwick, and ſeveral fair manors in that county and elſewhere, by force of the entail. Full of theſe hopes, in the year 1605, he commenced a ſuit in the Court of Audience of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the plague being then at London, obtained a Commiſſion, directed to Dr. Zachary Babington, Chancellor of the dioceſe of Lichfield, to examine witneſſes on that head, which was accordingly done (k). But no ſooner had Lettice, Counteſs of Leiceſter, notice of theſe proceedings, than ſhe procured an information to be filed, by Sir Edward Coke, the King's Attorney-General, in the Star-Chamber, againſt Sir Robert Dudley, Sir Thomas Leigh, Dr. Babington, and others, for a conſpiracy; and, upon the petition of Lord Sidney, an ordered iſſued out of that Court for bringing in all the depoſitions that had been taken by virtue of the Archbiſhop's commiſſion, ſealing them up and depoſiting them in the Council-cheſt (l). In order, however, to keep up ſome appearance of impartiality, Sir Robert Dudley was allowed to examine witneſſes, as to the proof of his le-

[A] In his valuable Collection.] It was certainly a mark of true courage, as well as of public ſpirit, that, as ſoon as he became of age, and entered into the poſſeſſion of his fortune, Mr. Dudley, inſtead of indulging himſelf in the pleaſures of a Court, ſhould undertake ſo long and hazardous a voyage, as even the laſt of the two was, which he projected. The ſhips that he fitted out, were the Bear, of two-hundred tons, in which he commanded himſelf; the Bear's Whelp, Captain Monk, and two pinnaces, the one called the Friſking, and the other the Earwig. Captain Monk returned, with his veſſel and two prizes, before the end of the year; of which Mr. Dudley having no knowledge, he waited for him near the Azores; but hearing no news, and finding many of his men ſick, he thought it better to proceed in his undertaking, as ſoon as it was in his power to do it conveniently. Accordingly, having taken two prizes, he put Captain Benjamin Wood into the one, which he called the Intent, and Captain Wentworth into the other; ſo that, having now three ſail under his command, he made the beſt of his way for the iſland of Trinidad, in the Weſt Indies. Upon his arrival there, he detached the ſhip called the Intent, and her conſort, to the Leeward Iſlands, and, with his own veſſel, laboured to make what diſcovery he could of the great empire of Guiana; the writings and example of Sir Walter Raleigh, having been no ſmall motives to this enterprize. All the account he gives us of the countries, the rivers, and the people, as alſo of the reports that prevailed amongſt them of very rich countries that lay farther within land, agree perfectly well with the relations of that learned Knight, and ſhews plainly, that he did not magnify any thing beyond the informations that he received. Mr. Dudley heard, as well as he, of ſilver and gold mines, particularly one of the latter at Wakkaru, and alſo obtained ſome ſpecimens of gold from another place. It ſeems he was in expectation of Sir Walter's coming thither, and was in great hopes of their making very conſiderable diſcoveries together, which induced him to ſtay as long as it was ſafe for him to do, and then he returned to Europe, as is related in the text, having barely as much proviſion left as would ſerve for his voyage (1). After gaining, by this expedition, experience ſufficient to qualify him for a ſea commander, he went with the Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord High-Admiral Howard, to Cadiz, in quality of Captain of the Nonpariel (2), and, in that warm ſervice, ſhewed all the courage of an adventurous young man, and all the coolneſs and conduct of an old officer, as was reported of him at his return. It is probable, that the reader will be deſirous of knowing what became of Captain Wood's enterprize in the South-Seas, whither he was ſent with a good ſhip, and a pinnace, fitted out in 1595, at the expence of ſome thouſand pounds: but the misfortune is, that no information on that ſubject can be had, no news being ever heard, either of the ſhips or men (3), which was much regretted in thoſe days, becauſe Mr. Benjamin Wood, was looked upon as a man of ſteady courage, great integrity, and of uncommon abilities as a ſeaman, which recommended him to the favour and friendſhip of this great genius.

gitimacy, in that Court; which, when he had done in as full a manner as in ſuch a caſe could be expected, a ſudden order was made for ſtaying all proceedings, and locking up the examinations, of which no copies were to be taken but by the King's licence (m). This was ſuch a blow to all the hopes of Sir Robert Dudley, and made it ſo evident that he had no favour to expect where his enemies had influence enough to preclude him from juſtice, that he reſolved to retire abroad, in hopes that time might either leſſen his misfortune, or at leaſt mitigate the ſharp ſenſe he had of it. In order to this, he applied for a licence to travel for three years, which was very readily granted him, there being many who choſe to have him out of their way; and others, who bore him good will, thought that at this juncture his withdrawing for a time might be of uſe to him. But, in the manner of his leaving the kingdom, there was ſomething that ſhewed he inherited ſome of the vices as well as moſt of the great qualities of his family (n) [B]. He had not been long abroad, before ſuch as meant him no good procured, notwithſtanding his licence, a privy-ſeal, commanding his return into England, being very ſenſible that he would not obey it. The pretence for this was, that he had aſſumed, in foreign countries, the title of Earl of Warwick, which irritated ſome at Court extremely (o). It ſeems they formed a true notion of his circumſtances and diſpoſition; for, Sir Robert, finding himſelf well received at the Court of Florence, reſolved to continue there, notwithſtanding the letter of re-call; and this gave a handle for ſeizing his whole eſtate, which was veſted in the Crown, during his natural life, by the ſtatute of fugitives. He left behind him Lady Alice Dudley, his wife, and four daughters, for whom ſufficient proviſion was made. In this ſituation things continued for ſome years, till ſome perſons about Henry Prince of Wales ſuggeſted to him, that Kenelworth Caſtle was one of the fineſt and moſt magnificent places in the inland parts of the kingdom, and very fit for his Royal Highneſs's reſidence; upon which ſome overtures were made to Sir Robert Dudley abroad, as well as to Lady Alice at home, the Prince deſiring to have it by way of purchaſe. Theſe propoſals were very readily accepted, on account, as it is ſaid, of ſome promiſes that were made of having regard to his claims when a proper opportunity offered (p). In the mean time a commiſſion iſſued for enquiring into the value of this eſtate, and the return thereto being very curious, the reader will find it in the notes [C]. The treaty beforementioned came at laſt to a concluſion, and deeds were executed, bearing date November 21, 1611, by which, in conſideration of fourteen thouſand five hundred pounds, to be paid in one year to the ſaid Sir Robert Dudley or his aſſigns, the ſaid Caſtle of Kenelworth, together with the manor and lands bearing the ſame name, the manors of Rufden, Balſhall, and Long Itchington, were ſettled upon the ſame Prince and his heirs, with condition that Sir Robert ſhould hold the Conſtableſhip of the ſaid caſtle for the term of his natural life, by patent from his Royal Highneſs. Of this purchaſe-money, which was but a very inconſiderable ſum in compariſon of the value of the eſtate, but three thouſand pounds were ever paid, and that to a Merchant, who broke ſoon after, not one penny coming to the hands of Sir Robert Dudley (q). Prince Henry likewiſe dying, his title to the caſtle and lands deſcended to his brother Charles Prince of Wales, who, in the nineteenth year of the reign of King James I, procured an Act of Parliament to enable Alice Lady Dudley, who had a jointure therein, to alienate it, notwithſtanding her coverture, in conſideration of the ſum of four thouſand pounds, to be paid her out of the Exchequer, and a yearly penſion (r); which ſaid ſum was accordingly paid, as the penſion likewiſe was, for ſome time, but grew afterwards into arrear, through the diſtreſs of that Prince's affairs after he came to the the throne (s). But, though Sir Robert Dudley lived in exile, and without receiving any conſiderable ſupplies from England, he ſtill cheriſhed ſome hope of his return; to facilitate which, and to ingratiate himſelf with King James, he drew up a ſcheme for improving the royal revenue (t), which ſcheme falling into the hands of ſome perſons of great diſtinction, and being by them made public, this was conſidered as a thing of a pernicious nature, for which they were impriſoned; but, upon a diſcovery of the true author, they were ſhortly after releaſed [D]. The caſtle and four gate-houſes, all covered with lead, whereby it is ſubject to no other decay than the glaſs, through the extremity of the weather.

[B] As well as moſt of the great qualities of his family.] When Sir Robert Dudley had once ſettled his reſolution of quitting England, he reſolved to make the place of his retreat as agreeable to him as it was poſſible, and therefore prevailed upon a young lady, at that time eſteemed one of the fineſt women in England, and of a family diſtinguiſhed for their beauty, to bear him company in the habit of his page (4). This Lady was Mrs. Elizabeth Southwell, the daughter of Sir Robert Southwell, of Woodriſing, in the county of Norfolk (5), whom, as the reader will find in the text, he afterwards eſpouſed, in virtue of a diſpenſation from the Pope; whence a certain writer, who bore him no good will, has taken occaſion to ſay, that he left England, becauſe he could not be allowed to have two wives (6); in which, there would have been more truth, if Sir Robert Dudley had married that Lady here, as it is very certain he did not. How much ſoever ſhe might be blamed in following him as ſhe did, yet her conduct afterwards was without exception, and as ſhe lived in honour and eſteem, and had all the reſpect paid her that her title of a Dutcheſs could demand, ſo it is reported, that Sir Robert never altered his affections, but, to ſhew his high regard for her memory, cauſed a noble tomb to be erected to her memory in the church of St. Pancratius in Forence (7), where her body lies interred, and where he deſired that he might be buried with her. As to his iſſue by this Lady, they will be taken notice of hereafter. It is very probable, that this marriage might prove a great bar to his return into England, and might be alſo a motive to the paſſing ſo extraordinary a law as that was, by which Lady Alice Dudley, was enabled to diſpoſe of her jointure during his life. But, before we cloſe this note, it may not be amiſs to examine what the reaſons were, which induced the Lords in the Star-Chamber to treat Sir Robert Dudley's cauſe as they did. It ſeems that Sir William Leighton, upon whoſe advice he chiefly depended, when he found what evidence might be produced to prove the marriage of Lady Douglas Sheffield with Robert Earl of Leiceſter, gave him advice, which, though wiſe and well laid in itſelf, yet gave an opportunity to Sir Robert's enemies, to caſt out ſuch inſinuations as threw an odium upon his whole proceedings. For, when the commiſſion mentioned in the text was brought down, and a Notary came afterwards to ſpeed it, Sir William reſolved to commence a ſuit in the courts at Lichfield, in the name of Sir Robert Dudley, in which one John Buſhell was raiſed up as the adverſary upon a charge, that he ſhould have called Sir Robert a baſtard three years before. Upon this, one Goffe cites him to the court, in cauſa probri & convitii, and Goffe earneſtly preſt him to appear thereto. It was never intended by this ſuit to puniſh Buſhell, but only to prove the marriage and legitimation. Buſhell appeared, and made ſuch anſwer as ſuited beſt for their purpoſe. The thirty-ſix articles were exhibited, thirty of whom tended to prove the marriage and legitimation, and ſome of the reſt the defamation. And Dr. Babington then ſitting in judgment in the court, and knowing the matter to be there proſecuted unduly, againſt a raiſed adverſary, upon colour of defamation, admitted a very unlawful proſecution of the libel, and ordered the defendant to make preſent anſwer; and then Frodſham, Saliſbury, and Jones, were again examined as witneſſes; and, after their examinations, carried back to Clarges, Goffe, and Leigh's houſes, and had diet and apparel given them by directions of Sir Robert Dudley and Sir William Leighton. For theſe offences, and undue proceedings, which tended to call in queſtion the Lord of Leiceſter, and his then Lady's marriage, and her jointure, and the eſtates of many of the King's ſubjects, they were all committed; Sir William Leighton fined three hundred pounds; Babington, one hundred marks; Goffe, forty pounds; Saliſbury and Frodſham, one hundred pounds a piece; and Jones, forty pounds. All the examinations and depoſitions, taken in the Court of Audience by the Commiſſioners and at Litchfield, were ſuppreſſed and damned. The examinations and depoſitions in the Court, that concern the marriage between the Earl of Leiceſter and the Lady Douglas Sheffield, were ordered to be ſealed up by the Clerk of the Court, and never to be ſeen or publiſhed; Jones, Saliſbury, and Frodſham, to be ever after held ſuſpected in their teſtimonies touching the marriage and legitimation of Sir Robert Dudley, and the reſt were acquitted (8). But this ſentence takes no notice of the depoſitions of Lady Douglas, Sir Robert Dudley's mother, of Lady Parker, and many other perſons who depoſed to his legitimacy; and yet this gave a colour for ſealing and locking theſe up, which was what the friends of Lettice Counteſs of Leiceſter ſought; and ſhews how dangerous a thing it was to leave matters of ſo high a nature to be determined in that Court, without the aſſiſtance of a jury, and without appeal (9). An inconvenience which, by degrees, was ſo much felt, and ſo generally underſtood, that it was by act of Parliament diſſolved, at the common prayer of the whole nation.

The rooms of great ſtate within the ſame, and ſuch as are able to receive his Majeſty, the Queen, and Prince, at one time, built with as much uniformity and conveniency as any houſes of later time, and with ſuch ſtately cellars, all carried upon pillars and architecture of free ſtone, carved and wrought, as the like are not within this kingdom, and alſo all other houſes for offices anſwerable.

There lieth about the ſame, in chaces and parks, twelve hundred pounds per annum; nine hundred pounds whereof are grounds for pleaſure, the reſt in meadow and paſture thereto adjoining, tenants and freeholders.

There joineth upon this ground a park-like ground, called the King's Wood, with fifteen coppices lying all together, containing ſeven hundred and eighty-nine acres within the ſame, which, in the Earl of Leiceſter's time, were ſtored with red deer, ſince which the deer ſtrayed, but the ground in no ſort blemiſhed, having great ſtore of timber, and other trees of much value upon the ſame.

There runneth through the ſaid grounds, by the walls of the caſtle, a fair pool, containing one hundred and eleven acres, well ſtored with fiſh and fowl, which, at pleaſure, is to be let round about the caſtle.

In timber and woods upon this ground, to the value as hath been offered, of twenty thouſand pounds, having a convenient time to remove them, which, to his Majeſty, in the ſurvey, are but valued at eleven thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-two pounds; which proportion, in a like meaſure, is held in all the reſt upon the other values to his Majeſty.

The circuit of the caſtle, manors, parks, and chaces, lying round together, contain, at leaſt, nineteen or twenty miles in a pleaſant country, the like both for ſtrength, ſtate, and pleaſure, not being within the realm of England.

Theſe lands have been ſurveyed by Commiſſioners from the King, and the Lord Privy-Seal, with directions from his Lordſhip, to find all things under the true worth; and, upon oath of jurors, as well freeholders as cuſtomary tenants, which courſe being held by them, are notwithſtanding ſurveyed and returned at thirty-eight thouſand five hundred and fifty-four pounds and fifteen ſhillings; out of which, for Sir Robert Dudley's contempt, there is to be deducted ten thouſand pounds: and, for Lady Dudley's jointure, which is without impeachment of waſte, whereby ſhe may ſell all the woods, which, by the ſurvey, amount unto eleven thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-two pounds.

His Majeſty hath herein the mean profits of the caſtle and premiſes, through Sir Robert Dudley's contempt, during his life, or his Majeſty's pardon, the reverſion in fee being in the Lord Privy-Seal.

[D] They were ſhortly after releaſed.] I have taken notice of this matter all together, though there was fourteen years difference between the framing of this propoſal of Sir Robert Dudley's, and the commitment of the noble perſons who publiſhed it. It was written about the year 1613, and ſent to King James, being in all reſpects as ſingular and as dangerous a paper as ever fell from the pen of man; for which reaſon, I ſhall not tranſcribe any part of it here, but refer the reader in the margin to the paper itſelf (10), which Wood ſuppoſes to have remained a manuſcript; and which, conſidering the miſchief it has done, one would have wiſhed might have been the caſe. His great-grandfather's book was a very unlucky precedent, and this, which I take to have been a copy of it (11), ſuited to the times, was a paper to the full as unlucky; for, though neither King James I, nor King Charles I, or their which Sir Robert Dudley choſe for his retreat, upon his leaving his native country, was Florence, where he was very kindly received by Coſmo II. Great Duke of Tuſcany, and, in proceſs of time, was made Great Chamberlain to his Serene Highneſs's conſort, the Archdutcheſs Magdalen, of Auſtria, ſiſter to the Emperor Ferdinand II, with whom he was a great favourite (u). He diſcovered in that Court thoſe great abilities for which he had been ſo much admired in England, contrived ſeveral methods of improving ſhipping, introduced new manufactures, excited the Merchants to extend their foreign commerce, and, by other ſervices of ſtill greater importance, obtained ſo high a reputation, that, at the deſire of the Archdutcheſs, the Emperor Ferdinand, before mentioned, by his letters-patent, dated at Vienna March the 9th, 1620, created him a Duke of the Holy Roman Empire (w), upon which he aſſumed his grand-father's title of Northumberland, and ten years after got himſelf enrolled, by Pope Urban VIII, amongſt the Roman nobility (x). Under the reign of the Grand Duke Ferdinand II, he became ſtill more famous, on account of that great project which he formed, of draining a vaſt moraſs between Piſa and the ſea, and raiſing Livorno, or Leghorn, which was then, though an ancient, yet a mean and pitiful, place, into a large and beautiful town, improving the haven by a mole, which rendered it both ſafe and commodious; and, having engaged his Serene Highneſs to declare it ſcala franca, or a free port, he, by his influence and correſpondences, drew many Engliſh merchants to ſettle and ſet up houſes there (y), which was a thing of great importance to our Italian trade, and, conſidered in that light, was of very great ſervice to his native country. It was not only in the Courts of Princes that Sir Robert Dudley, by a happy application of his great talents, made himſelf admired, but alſo among the learned, to whom he was a generous patron and conſtant friend, and at the ſame time held a very high place himſelf in the republick of letters, as well on account of his ſkill in philoſophy, chemiſtry, and phyſic, as his perfect acquaintance with all the branches of the Mathematicks, and the means of applying them for the ſervice and benefit of mankind; of all which he has left abundant evidence in his excellent writings (z) [E]. In gratitude to his merit, and their Miniſters, made uſe of it, or intended to make uſe of it, yet it was turned to their prejudice, and the people excited to hate ſtateſmen, as the authors of this project, who might very probably abhor it as much as they. I will give the hiſtory of it from a very able and authentic writer, the brother of that learned and worthy gentleman (12), who detected the real author of it, when it was firſt made the ſubject of public clamour. His words are theſe. 'It is not unworthy the notice, 'by what artifices they, that is the patriots in 1628, 'did really endeavour to make the King odious to his 'ſubjects, of which I ſhall only touch upon one grand 'impoſture, fobbed about by many of theſe chief ring-'leading members. And this was of a paper by them 'carefully and plentifully ſpread abroad, to diſcover 'the impertinence of Parliaments, and how, by the 'ſubjects purſes, to keep the nation in a good defence 'againſt the King's enemies. And this was ſuggeſted, 'that the King had not only ſuch a deſign on foot, 'but by him, or his means, this plot firſt took birth; 'whereas it was diſcovered by Sir David Foulis, one 'not ignorant of ſtate-affairs, being thereunto ſeveral 'times employed by King James, of bleſſed memory, 'that this paper was contrived ſeveral years before, 'viz. about 1615, by Sir Robert Dudley, then living 'at Florence, under the title of Duke of Northumber-'land. By which means it ſeems ſome men would 'not leave any ſtone unturned rather than fail of their 'intended ends; nor can I quit him from the ſame 'ignorance and malice, who long afterwards publiſhed 'it under the name of "Strafford's Plot diſcovered," '&c. endeavouring thereby to make him odious to 'the ſimple people, as if he had been the compoſer of 'it, and this only becauſe a copy of it was found in 'his ſtudy.'

(12) Foulis's Hiſt. of Plots, B. i. p. 68.

In order to render theſe facts completely clear, we muſt not omit telling the reader who the perſons were, that, Whitlocke ſays, were committed for the firſt offence (13), and againſt whom another writer aſſerts, that informations were filed by Sir Robert Heath, then Attorney-General, in the Star-Chamber (14), viz. the Earls of Bedford, Somerſet, and Clare; Sir Robert Cotton, Baronet; John Selden, and Oliver St John, Eſquires. It will be likewiſe proper to mention, that the contrivance of faſtening it upon the Earl of Strafford, was immediately after his deceaſe, as appears from the title of the treatiſe expreſſed more at large. It ran thus: 'Strafford's Plot diſcovered, and the Par-'liament vindicated, in their Juſtice executed upon 'him by the late diſcovery of certain propoſitions de-'livered to his Majeſty by the Earl of Strafford a little 'before his trial; with this inſcription, Propoſitions 'for the bridling of Parliaments, and for the increa-'ſing of his Majeſty's revenue, &c.'

[E] Abundant evidence in his excellent writings.] We have already ſpoken of the account of his voyage to the iſland of Trinidad, and the mouth of the river Oroonoque, to one of the iſlands in which it is ſaid he gave his own name. We have alſo ſpoken of the propoſitions made by him in reſpect to Parliaments, and the increaſe of the revenue, either of which might ſufficiently prove him a man of quick parts and ſolid abilities. But the work by which he is chiefly known to the learned world, and which in truth is moſt worthy of his general learning and great compaſs of knowledge, is that which follows, viz.

Del Arcano del Mare, &c. Firenze, 1630, 1646, in two volumes in folio. This work has been always ſo ſcarce, as ſeldom to have found a place even in the catalogues that have been publiſhed of rare books. It is full of ſchemes, charts, plans, and other marks of its author's mathematical learning, but is chiefly valuable on the ſcore of the projects that are contained therein, for the improvement of navigation, and the extending of commerce. If we conſider what has been ſince done, the work will appear leſs valuable. But capable judges will allow for the time in which it was written, and in that point of view it will appear truly admirable, as the author hints at many things that were in thoſe days totally unknown, and of which, notwithſtanding, he appears to have judged very right. There are alſo many things that have not as yet been executed, which might turn to the advantage of any maritime power that would be at the expence to proſecute his deſigns. In ſhort, it is a ſingular treaſury of curious and important ſchemes, which manifeſtly prove the author's high capacity for the advancement of uſeful knowledge, no man having ever had a ſtronger propenſity to reduce ſpeculations to practice than he; and the ſucceſs that attended his labours in this reſpect, ought to derive an extraordinary degree of credit, to whatever he ſuggeſts as practicable; though beyond all and for the ſupport of his dignity, the Grand Duke beſtowed upon him a penſion of two thouſand ſequins per annum; which, however, went but a little way in his expences; for he affected magnificence in all things, built a noble palace for himſelf and his family at Florence (a), and much adorned the caſtle of Carbello, three miles from that capital, which the Grand Duke gave him for a country retreat, and where he breathed his laſt in the month of September, 1649 (b), in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age; leaving behind him, by Elizabeth his Dutcheſs, to whom, by the Pope's diſpenſation, he was married, a very numerous poſterity, as the reader will ſee in the notes [F]. As for Alice Lady Dudley, his ſecond wife, whom he left in England, ſhe, by the aſſiſtance of her friends and relations, ſecured to herſelf and her daughters the remains of that great fortune, which devolved to him in conſequence of the Earl of Leiceſter's will, and other conveyances; and being herſelf a lady of great parts, as well as diſtinguiſhed piety, ſhe had a great ſhare in the favour of King Charles I.; inſomuch, that upon her humble application to him at Oxford, ſetting forth the ſituation and ſtate of her huſband abroad, and the great loſſes ſhe had ſuſtained by reſigning her jointure, upon expectancies which had been very indifferently fulfilled; that Prince was graciouſly pleaſed, by letters-patent under the great-ſeal of England, to give her the rank, ſtyle, and title of a Dutcheſs (c), during the term of her natural life; as alſo the like privileges and precedences to her daughters, as if they had been Duke's daughters, with other ſignal teſtimonies of his gracious condeſcenſion and eſteem. The preamble of this patent, as it is in itſelf a thing very extraordinary, and contains many points of hiſtory relative to this family, under the ſanction of ſo high an authority, is placed at the bottom of the page [G]. This prudent and pious Lady, Alice Dutcheſs Dudley, all doubt, ſomething of the like genius muſt be required in ſuch as attempt to make uſe of any of his projects, which are delivered in a manner not very intelligible to vulgar underſtandings.

We are told by Mr. Wood (15), that our author wrote a phyſical treatiſe, entituled "Catholicon," which was well eſteemed by the faculty; but, as he had never ſeen it, he could ſay no more of it, and the very ſame reaſon muſt excuſe us. He was the author of a very famous powder, called, "Pulvis Comitis Warwicenſis, "or, the Earl of Warwick's Powder," which ſhews that Dr. Heylin was miſtaken in affirming, that he never took that title (16), by which, however, it is certain he was known in Italy before the Emperor created him a Duke. This celebrated powder is thus made, "Take of Scammony, prepared with the "fumes of Sulphur, two ounces; of diaphoretic An-"timony, an ounce; of the Cryſtals of Tartar, half an "ounce; make them all together into a powder." It is directed to be made different ways, both by Schroder and Zwelfer, but this is much the readieſt, and what the ſhops are now accuſtomed to uſe. It was not at firſt received by the College, but is now become common in extemporaneous preſcriptions, eſpecially as a purge for children, to whom it is convenient to give becauſe of the ſmallneſs of the quantity requiſite for a doſe. It is a ſmart purge, and frequently given to children againſt worms, from five to fifteen grains; and, to grown perſons, from fifteen grains to half a dram. Dr. Marcus Cornacchinus (17) varied this medicine a little in the proportions of the ingredients, and then publiſhed a treatiſe upon it, in which he recommended it as a kind of univerſal remedy; but, notwithſtanding all his pains, the original receipt has been preferred. It may not perhaps be amiſs to add, ſince we are ſpeaking of his inventions, that he is believed to have been the firſt perſon who broke ſetting-dogs (18). One might inſiſt upon many other particulars, if the nature of this collection did not reſtrain us.

[F] In the notes.] This Duke of Northumberland, as he was ſtyled in Italy, had, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Robert Southwell, a ſon, Charles, who aſſumed the title of Earl of Warwick (19), and four daughters, all honourably married in that country, viz. the eldeſt to the Prince of Piombino, of the Houſe of Arragona Appiano; the ſecond to the Marquis of Clivola, of the houſe of Maleſpina; the third to the Duke of Caſtillion del Lago, of the houſe of La Cloregnia; and the fourth to the Earl of Carpegna, brother to the Cardinal of that name. Charles, titular Duke of Northumberland, married in France, Mary Magdalen Gouſſier, a relation of the Duke of Rohaner, by whom he had ſeveral children. The eldeſt, Robert, ſtyled Earl of Warwick, was page to the Elector of Bavaria; another ſon, was an eccleſiaſtick in France (20); one of his daughters, who was of the bed-chamber to the Dutcheſs of Savoy, married, for her ſecond huſband, the Marquis Palliotti, of Bologna, by whom ſhe had a daughter, whoſe name was Adelhida (21), married to Charles, Duke of Shrewſbury, who died not many years ago, and a ſon who died likewiſe in England, in a manner ſuitable to his crime, but unworthy of his birth (22). Theſe are, indeed, but very imperfect notices of the deſcents in this noble line; but they are the beſt that we have been able to obtain, and will ſerve to inform the reader of the ſtrange viciſſitudes that have happened to this great family, of which, for any thing that we know, there remains not any heir male, that is to ſay, deſcending from Edmund Dudley, father to the Duke of Northumberland. For, as to the ancient houſe of the Suttons, Barons of Dudley, though the eldeſt branch of it be likewiſe extinct as to heirs male, yet many of the younger branches ſtill flouriſh, by the ſurname of Dudley; for, Edmund Sutton, Lord Dudley, who was brother to John Dudley; had by his ſecond wife, the widow of Sir Thomas Harrington, a ſon Thomas, who left behind him three ſons, and as many daughters; and Richard Dudley, the eldeſt of theſe, left likewiſe a numerous poſterity (23). Sir William Dudley, of Clapton in Northamptonſhire, was, from the ſame ſtock, deriving himſelf from Sir John Sutton (24), the firſt Baron of Dudley of that name.

'Charles, by the grace of God, King of England, 'Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the 'Faith, &c. To all Archbiſhops, Dukes, Marquiſſes, 'Earls, Viſcounts, Biſhops, Barons, Knights, and all 'other our loving ſubjects, to whom theſe our letters 'ſhall come, greeting. Whereas, in or about the 'beginning of the reign of our dear father, King 'James, of famous memory, there was a ſuit com-'menced in our High-Court of Star-Chamber, againſt 'Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, and others, for preten-'ding himſelf to be lawful heir to the honours and 'lands of the Earldoms of Warwick and Leiceſter, as 'ſon and heir of the body of Robert, late Earl of Lei-

Dudley, lived after this honour was conferred upon her many years, admired for her many admirable qualities, and very juſtly revered for that ſingular zeal which ſhe expreſſed in doing good, a diſpoſition, which, by extraordinary care in their education, as well as by the force of her own excellent example, ſhe ſo infuſed into her five daughters, that, if all their works of piety and bounty were collected together, and properly ſet forth, they would make a very conſiderable volume, independently of any panegyrick they might be thought to deſerve; which is a reaſon ſufficient, that, excepting a ſingle inſtance, we ſhall not mention thoſe prodigious works of charity in this article, but content ourſelves with referring the reader to authors that will, in ſome meaſure, ſatisfy his curioſity (d). Of theſe daughters, Lady Alezia Dudley, dying a maiden, bequeathed her fortune of three thouſand pounds to be diſpoſed of to charitable uſes, at the diſcretion of her mother, who ſurvived her, which will of her's was

'ceſter, lawfully begotten upon the Lady Douglas, 'his mother, wife to the ſaid late Earl of Leiceſter, 'and all proceedings ſtayed in the Eccleſiaſtical-'Courts, in which the ſaid ſuit depended for proof 'of his legitimation. Yet, nevertheleſs, did the ſaid 'Court vouchſafe liberty, to the ſaid Sir Robert, to 'examine witneſſes in the ſaid Court of Star-Chamber, in order to the making good of his legitimacy, 'and divers witneſſes were examined there accordingly. Whereupon, by full teſtimony upon oath, 'partly made by the ſaid Lady Douglas herſelf, and 'partly by divers other perſons of quality and credit, 'who were preſent at the marriage with the ſaid late 'Earl of Leiceſter, by a lawful miniſter, according 'to the form of matrimony then by law eſtabliſhed in 'the Church of England, and the ſaid Sir Robert and 'his mother, owned by the ſaid late Earl of Leiceſter 'as his lawful wife and ſon, as by many of the ſaid 'depoſitions remaining upon record in our ſaid Court 'ſtill appear, which we have cauſed to be peruſed for 'our better ſatisfaction herein. But a ſpecial order 'being made, that the ſaid depoſitions ſhould be ſealed 'up, and no copies thereof taken, without leave, did 'cauſe him, the ſaid Sir Robert, to leave this our 'kingdom. Whereof his adverſaries taking advantage, procured a ſpecial Privy-Seal to be ſent unto 'him, commanding his return into England. Which 'he not obeying, becauſe his honour and lands were 'denied unto him, all his lands were therefore ſeized 'on to the King, our father's uſe. And not long 'afterwards Prince Henry, our dear brother deceaſed, 'made overture to the ſaid Sir Robert, by ſpecial inſtruments, to obtain his title by purchaſe of and in 'Kenilworth Caſtle, in our county of Warwick, and 'his manors, parks, and chaſes, belonging to the 'ſame; which, upon a great under-value, amounted, 'as we are credibly informed, to about fifty thouſand 'pounds, but were bought by the ſaid Prince, our 'brother, in conſideration of fourteen thouſand five 'hundred pounds; and upon his faithful engagements, and promiſe of his princely favour unto the 'ſaid Sir Robert, in the ſaid cauſe, to reſtore him 'both in honours and fortunes. And, thereupon, 'certain deeds were ſealed in the ninth year of the 'reign of our ſaid father, and fines alſo were levied, 'ſettling the inheritance thereof in the ſaid Prince 'our brother and his heirs. But the ſaid Prince our 'brother, departing this life, there was not above 'three thouſand pounds of the ſaid ſum of fourteen-'thouſand five hundred pounds ever paid, if any at 'all, to the ſaid Sir Robert's hands; and we ourſelves, 'as heir to the ſaid Prince our brother, came to the 'poſſeſſion thereof. And it appearing to the ſaid 'Council, that the ſaid Alice Lady Dudley, wife of 'the ſaid Sir Robert, had an eſtate of inheritance of 'and in the ſame, deſcendable unto her poſterity, in 'the nineteenth year of our ſaid dear father's reign, an 'Act of Parliament was paſſed, to enable the ſaid 'Lady Alice, wife to the ſaid Sir Robert, to aliene 'her eſtate, which ſhe had by the ſaid Sir Robert 'therein, from her children by the ſaid Sir Robert, as 'if ſhe had been a feme-ſole, which accordingly ſhe 'did, in the nineteenth year of our ſaid father's reign, 'in conſideration of four thouſand pounds, and further payments yearly to be made by us to her, out 'of our Exchequer, and out of the ſaid caſtle and 'lands, which have not been accordingly paid unto 'her by us for many years, to the damage of the ſaid 'Lady Alice and her children, to a very great value. 'Which Sir Robert, ſettling himſelf in Italy, within 'the territories of the Great Duke of Tuſcany, from 'whom he had extraordinary eſteem, he was ſo much 'favoured by the Emperor Ferdinand the Second, as 'that being a perſon, not only eminent for his great 'learning and blood, but for ſundry rare endowments, 'as was well known, he had, by letters-patents from 'his Imperial Majeſty, the title of Duke given unto 'him, to be uſed by himſelf and his heirs for ever, 'throughout all the dominions of the ſacred empire. 'Which letters-patents have been peruſed by our late 'Earl Marſhal and Heralds. And whereas our dear 'father, not knowing the truth of the lawful birth of 'the ſaid Sir Robert, as we pioufly believe, granted 'away the titles of the ſaid Earldoms to others, which 'we now hold not fit to call in queſtion, nor ravel 'into our deceaſed father's actions, eſpecially they 'having been ſo long enjoyed by thoſe families, to 'whom the ſaid honours were granted, which we do 'not intend to alter, and yet, as we having a very 'deep ſenſe of the great injuries done to the ſaid Sir 'Robert Dudley, and the ſaid Lady Alice Dudley, 'and their children; and that we are of opinion, that, 'in juſtice and equity, the poſſeſſions, ſo taken from 'them, do rightly belong unto them, or full ſatisfaction for the ſame. And holding ourſelves in honour and conſcience obliged to make them reparation now, as far as our preſent ability will enable 'us. And alſo taking into our conſideration, the ſaid 'great eſtate, which ſhe the ſaid Lady Alice Dudley 'had in Kenilworth, and ſold at our deſire to us, and 'at a very great under-value, and yet not performed, 'or ſatisfied, to many thouſand pounds damage. And 'we alſo caſting our princely eye upon the faithful 'ſervice done unto us by Sir Richard Leveſon, Knight 'of the Bath, who hath married the Lady Catharine, 'one of the daughters of the ſaid Duke, by his ſaid 'wife, the ſaid Alice Dudley; and alſo, the great 'ſervices which Robert Holborne, Eſq. hath done to 'us by his learned pen, and otherwiſe; which ſaid 'Robert Holborne hath married the Lady Anne, one 'other of the daughters of the ſaid Duke, by his ſaid 'wife, the Lady Alice Dudley: we have conceived 'ourſelves bound in honour and conſcience to give 'the ſaid Lady Alice, and her children, ſuch honour 'and precedencies as is or are due to them in marriage or blood. And, therefore, we do not only 'give and grant unto the ſaid Lady Alice Dudley, the 'title of Dutcheſs Dudley for her life in England, and 'other our realms and dominions, with ſuch precedencies as ſhe might have had, if ſhe had lived in 'the dominions of the ſacred Empire, as a mark of our 'favour unto her, and out of our prerogative royal, 'which we will not have drawn into diſpute; but we 'do alſo farther grant unto the ſaid Lady Katharine, 'and Lady Anne, her daughters, the places, titles, 'and precedencies of the ſaid Duke's daughters, as 'from the time of their ſaid father's creation, during 'their reſpective lives, not only in England, but in 'all other our kingdoms and dominions, as a teſtimony of our princely favour and grace unto them, 'conceiving ourſelves obliged to do much more for 'them, if it were in our power, in theſe unhappy 'times of diſtraction, &c.'

punctually fulfilled, and many feel the effects of it at this day (e). Lady Douglas Dudley died alſo a maid. Lady Katharine Dudley eſpouſed Sir Richard Leveſon, Knight of the Bath. Lady Frances Dudley was the wife of Sir Gilbert Kniveton, Knight; and Lady Anne Dudley married Robert Holborn, Eſq. afterwards Sir Robert Holborn, Knight, and Solicitor-General to King Charles I. (f). Alice Dutcheſs Duddeley, as ſhe herſelf ſpells, departed this life January 22, 1668-9, in the ninetieth year of her age, and lies buried in the church of Stoneley in Warwickſhire, where a noble monument is erected to her memory (g) [H], yet the effects of her wiſdom, piety, and charity, have eſtabliſhed one more laſting and better. Her only child that ſurvived her was Katharine Leveſon, relict of Sir Richard Leveſon, who died in the month of February, 1673, at Trentham in the county of Salop, and was buried in the pariſh-church of Lilſhull (b); of whoſe extenſive charities ſome notice muſt neceſſarily be taken at the bottom of the page [I], becauſe it will ſerve to complete the hiſtory of [H] To her memory.] This ſtately monument at Stonely, ſtanding on the north ſide of the chapel, was built by Alice, Dutcheſs Dudley, herſelf, in her life-time, with one below it for her daughter Lady Alezia, who died May 23, 1631 (26). It may not be amiſs, in this note, to give ſome account of the Dutcheſs's deſcent. Her grandfather was Sir Thomas Leigh, Knt. Lord Mayor of London at the time of Queen Elizabeth's acceſſion, who married Alice Barker, the niece of Sir Rowland Hill, a very rich merchant, who left her the greateſt part of his fortune. Their eldeſt ſon, Sir Rowland Leigh, ſettled at Longborough in Glouceſterſhire, and inherited a great fortune from his godfather (27). Thomas, the ſecond ſon, was knighted by Queen Elizabeth, and created Baronet by King James. He eſpouſed Katharine, daughter to Sir John Spencer, of Wormleighton, Knt. anceſtor to the Earls of Sunderland, and to his preſent Grace of Marlborough (28). Alice, Dutcheſs Dudley, was the third daughter of this marriage; and her nephew, Sir Thomas Leigh, for his ſteady adherence to King Charles I. in all his troubles, was created a peer of England, by the ſtyle and title of Baron Leigh, of Stonley in the county of Warwick (29), which honours are ſtill enjoyed by his deſcendant; and it may, without ſuſpicion of flattery, be ſaid, that the virtues of this noble family, their piety, probity, and charity, have conſtantly accompanied the title.

[I] At the bottom of the page.] What we have to deliver in this note may be fully, and at the ſame time ſuccinctly, ſet forth from the caſe of this Lady, with reſpect to the manor of Balſhall in Warwickſhire, which belonging formerly to the Knights Templars was aſſigned by King Henry VIII. for the dowry of Katharine his laſt Queen, and the reverſion granted by his ſon, Edward VI, to his uncle, the Lord-Protector Somerſet. Upon his attainder, the inheritance was granted by the Crown, to John, Earl of Warwick, afterwards Duke of Northumberland; and, upon his attainder, Queen Mary gave it to Edward Sutton, Lord Dudley: but, afterwards propoſing to receive the order of the Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, that Lord reconveyed this manor to the Crown, which put it in the power of Queen Elizabeth to grant it, as ſhe did, by letters-patent to Sir Robert Dudley, Earl of Leiceſter, and his heirs (30); who, by his deed, dated in the twenty-firſt year of the ſame Queen's reign, ſettled this manor and Itchington, after his deceaſe, upon Ambroſe Dudley, his brother, then Earl of Warwick, and the iſſue of his body; and, for want of ſuch iſſue, upon the Lady Mary Sidney, daughter to John, Duke of Northumberland, ſiſter to both the aforeſaid Earls, and wife to Sir Henry Sidney, then Lord Preſident of Wales, for her life; and, after her deceaſe, upon Sir Philip Sidney, her firſt ſon, and the iſſue male of his body; and, for want of ſuch, upon Sir Robert Sidney, ſecond ſon to the ſaid Lady Mary, and his iſſue male (31). From this entail, Robert Sidney, Earl of Leiceſter, made his claim, he being ſon to Sir Robert Sidney, whoſe elder brother, Sir Philip, died without iſſue, and after the death of Ambroſe Dudley, Earl of Warwick, without iſſue, he got into preſent poſſeſſion of all the great eſtate of Robert Dudley, the old Earl of Leiceſter, excepting only what his Counteſs Dowager had for her jointure, of which Balſhall and Itchington were part; and ſhe, favouring his title, granted him a leaſe of both during her life, and he held both after her deceaſe, by virtue of his pretended title, by the ſaid entail; during which he cut all the timber of Balſhall-heath and the demeſnes, to the value of many thouſand pounds. Robert Dudley, Earl of Leiceſter, revoked the deed of entail; and, by his laſt will and teſtament, dated at Middleburgh in Zealand, the firſt of Auguſt, 1587, the year before he died, he gave this eſtate to Ambroſe, Earl of Warwick, for life, and the inheritance to Sir Robert Dudley, Knight, who obtained a decree in Chancery for the whole; but, upon his retiring, the ſuit ceaſed till his death, when the Lady Katharine Leveſon, and the Lady Anne Holborn, after a long ſuit in Chancery, obtained Balſhall and Itchington, but could not get into quiet poſſeſſion thereof till a little before the reſtoration of Charles II. at which time the Lady Anne Holborn, had three parts of the eſtate, and the Lady Katharine Leveſon a fourth part: the ſaid Lady Holborn having purchaſed her ſiſter the Lady Douglas's fourth part for the ſum of one thouſand pounds; and the Lady Frances Kniveton, her other ſiſter, dying without iſſue, it was agreed ſhe ſhould have her fourth part alſo, in conſideration of the great ſums of money ſhe had expended in the law-ſuits, the Lady Katharine Leveſon having been at at no charge. Which Lady Anne Holborn, in her life-time, greatly repaired the church, which was in a very ruinous condition, and by her will endowed it with one hundred pounds per annum, for the maintenance of a preaching Miniſter for ever; but the Lord Viſcount Brouncker, having a legacy of fifteen hundred pounds, and doubting her eſtate would not hold out to pay her debts, charitable gifts, and legacies, it is ſuppoſed he perſuaded her, by a codicil annexed to her will, to reduce the ſalary from one hundred pounds to fifty pounds per annum. She gave alſo, by her will, five hundred pounds to finiſh the repairs of the church; and alſo fifty pounds per annum, to be paid out of the rents at Itchington, for the augmentation of the church there, and many other great legacies; for the payment of which, and of her debts, her three parts of Itchington were, by decree in Chancery, ſold to Serjeant Newdigate, and her three parts of Balſhall, to the Lady Katharine Leveſon, who, being thereby poſſeſſed of the whole, excepting what was given to the two churches, out of her pious care and charity, to the poor of Balſhall, did, by a codicil annexed to her will, bearing date on or about the twenty-firſt of February, 1670, give and deviſe all the manor and lordſhip of Balſhall, and all the rents and iſſues of her eſtate there, for twenty poor perſons, being widows, and poor women not married, of good lives and converſations, to be choſen out of the poor inhabitants of the pariſh of Balſhall; and, if there ſhould not be ſo many poor widows and poor women unmarried in the ſaid pariſh to be placed in the ſaid houſe, that then ſuch as ſhould be wanting, for the time only, of ſuch want, and no longer, ſhould be choſen out of the poor inhabitants of Itchington, in the county of Warwick; of Trentham, in the county of Stafford; and Lileſhull, in the county of Salop; there to remain for their reſpective lives, excepting for their miſcarriages they ſhould be removed, and to have the yearly ſum of eight pounds per annum, and alſo yearly one gown of of this illuſtrious family; a family, at leaſt as remarkable as any that have flouriſhed in this kingdom; which has produced as great men, and as good women, as any that are mentioned in our hiſtories, and of which hitherto we have had but very imperfect accounts, which, it is preſumed, will appear a ſufficient reaſon to juſtify the care that has been taken of them in this work; a care, that, though it has rendered theſe articles very extenſive, might have carried them to a far greater length, if we had not uſed all the precaution poſſible to avoid prolixity, without prejudice of that perſpicuity, the want of which would have been deſtructive to our original deſign.

of grey cloth, with the letters K. L. in blue cloth, to be ſet upon the breaſt thereof, to be worn continually by them; and if they, or any of them, ſhould refuſe to wear the ſaid gowns, with the letters aforeſaid, then to be put out, and others elected in their rooms. That, immediately after the erecting and finiſhing of the ſaid houſe, there ſhould be a Miniſter of God's word provided, who ſhould twice every day read the ſcripture, and pray, either in the church of Balſhall, or houſe, hoſpital, or alms-houſe, with the ſaid poor perſons, and inſtruct them for the good of their ſouls; for which he ſhould be allowed twenty pounds per annum; and that he ſhould alſo teach and inſtruct twenty of the pooreſt boys of the inhabitants of Balſhall pariſh, until they ſhall be fit to be apprentices, not taking any thing from their parents. According to this deviſe, an hoſpital was built, and, in the firſt of Queen Anne (32), it was enacted, that the ſaid houſe ſhould be made an hoſpital, and incorporated, and named, and called the hoſpital of the Lady Katharine Leveſon; that there ſhould be, for ever thereafter, eleven Governors, which ſhould be incorporated and made one body politic, to have perpetual ſucceſſion, and a common ſeal, to be capable of purchaſing lands, of ſuing and being ſued, of making leaſes, of chooſing officers and ſervants, and to have the power to enlarge the number of the alms-women, and the buildings, as to them ſhall ſeem meet and convenient. As alſo, that they ſhould take care conſtantly to have the ſum of one thouſand pounds out at intereſt, to anſwer and ſatisfy for any accident of fire, or otherwiſe relating to the ſaid hoſpital; and that, in all meetings relating to the good government thereof, there ſhould not be leſs than ſix Governors, and the majority of thoſe preſent to be binding. Since which Act of Parliament, their ſtock increaſing, they have enlarged the ſaid hoſpital, and placed therein twenty-ſeven old women; and, in the year 1721, made an order, that the ſame ſhould be farther enlarged; at which ſeaſon it was expected, that in due time a new pile of building might be erected, and the number of perſons enlarged to thirty-four, with an allowance of twelve pounds per annum. This pious and charitable lady has an inſcription erected to her memory in the chapel of our lady at Warwick, with which, in reſpect to the hiſtorical particulars contained therein, we will conclude this article (33). 'To the memory of Lady Katharine, 'late wife of Sir Richard Leveſon, of Trentham, in the 'county of Stafford, Knight of the Bath, one of the 'daughters and co-heirs of Sir Robert Dudley, 'Knight, which honourable Lady taking notice that 'theſe tombs of her noble anceſtors being much bleminiſhed by conſuming time, but more by the rude 'hands of impious people, were in danger of utter 'ruin, by the decay of this chapel, if not timely prevented, did in her life-time give fifty pounds for 'its ſpeedy repair: and, by her laſt will and teſtament, bearing date the 18th of December, 1673, 'bequeath forty pounds per annum, iſſuing out of her 'manor of Foxley, in the county of Northampton, 'for its perpetual ſupport, and preſervation of theſe 'monuments in their proper ſtate, the ſurpluſage to 'be for the poor brethren of her grand-father's hoſpital in this borough, appointing William Dugdale, 'of Blythe-Hall, in this county, Eſquire, who repreſented to her the neceſſity of this good work, and 'his heirs, together, with the Mayor of Warwick 'for the time being, to be her truſtees therein.'  [A particular account of the impriſonments occaſioned by Sir Robert Dudley's diſcourſe on bridling the impertinency of parliaments, and eſpecially ſo far as Sir Robert Cotton was involved in the matter, will be found in that gentleman's article. Little here is neceſſary to be added, excepting an obſervation or two of Mr. Walpole (now Earl of Orford) on the ſubject. "There is great reaſon," ſays that author, "to "preſume that this attack on parliaments was not "made without the connivance of the Court, at leaſt "was not diſagreeable to it, the Attorney-General "receiving orders, in the middle of the proſecution, "to diſmiſs the cauſe, on pretence that his Majeſty "was willing to extend his royal lenity to his ſubjects "on the birth of a Prince, of whom the Queen was "juſt delivered." A remarkable incident, "was the "Earl of Somerſet's being involved in this trial, that "haughty and fallen favourite, generally ſuppoſed to "have dragged out the remainder of his life in infamy "and obſcurity, but who here appears engaged in "ſtate-intrigues, with ſome of the greateſt Lords at "that period (34)."

(34) Royal and Noble Authors, Vol. II. p. 173, 174.

Our predeceſſor has expreſſed himſelf, in note D, with too much apprehenſion and timidity concerning Sir Robert Dudley's diſcourſe. However dangerous it might be thought when it was firſt written, or when it was afterwards brought into public view, the tranſcribing any part of it could have excited no alarm in the preſent century. Ruſhworth has done no miſchief by inſerting it in his collection; and, were any one now to give himſelf the trouble of reading it, the reſult would probably be more of contempt than indignation. The period of exhorting our Princes to rule without parliaments, and of danger from any ſuch exhortations, has long been at an end.

Sir Robert Dudley's medical preſcriptions muſt, we ſuppoſe, be ſuperſeded in modern practice. It is ſaid, indeed, in note E, that his famous powder is in common uſe as a purge for children. That this is not the caſe I cannot affirm from ſpecific knowledge; but I much doubt whether the application of the remedy has been continued to our own time.

The preamble to the patent, by which Alice, Lady Dudley was created a Dutcheſs, is curious, as it ſhews how difficult it was in that age to obtain juſtice on many occaſions. It is obſervable in this patent, that the marriage of Lady Douglas Sheffield to Robert Earl of Leiceſter is aſſerted in the ſtrongeſt terms. Whether the language of preambles to patents is abſolutely to be depended upon may be juſtly queſtioned; ſince it is not improbable that ſuch language may be accommodated to the particular gratification of the family that is ennobled. After all that has been advanced on the ſubject, we cannot help greatly doubting the legitimacy of Sir Robert Dudley's birth. If ever the Earl of Leiceſter was ſerious and ſolemn in his aſſertions, it was when he made his laſt will; and yet he there calls him his baſe ſon. Neither has the very extraordinary circumſtance of Lady Douglas's marriage with Sir Edward Stafford been ſufficiently conſidered. It is ſaid, indeed, that ſhe did it becauſe ſome ill portions had been given her, and that ſhe knew no other way to preſerve her life. But the fact does not ſtand upon evidence that is unqueſtionable; beſides which, what are we to think of a woman, who, from any apprehenſions, could thus openly marry another, ſhe herſelf being already legally married? What, alſo, are we to think of the conduct of Sir Edward Stafford, who is repreſented as having been a man of great honour as well as high birth? It is not eaſy to ſuppoſe that he would have united himſelf in marriage with Lady Douglas, unleſs he had been convinced that ſhe was a ſingle woman. If it be true, likewiſe, that ſhe afterwards gave public teſtimony of her having been married to the Earl of Leiceſter, did ſhe not thereby ſubject herſelf to the danger of a proſecution for bigamy? The Star-Chamber, it appears, conſidered the depoſitions, which had been made in the Eccleſiaſtical Court at Litchfield, as deſerving of little credit, credit, and as the result of a combination (35). We do not mention these hints as decisive upon the affair, but as difficulties which have suggested themselves to our minds. The current of our historians strongly runs another way. Mr. Walpole says that Sir Robert Dudley was probably the legitimate son of the great Earl of Leicester; and Lord Hardwicke asserts, without hesitation, that Lady Douglas was privately married to the Earl. It may be deemed, perhaps, as a presumptive evidence of the fact, that, on her marriage with Sir Edward Stafford, that gentleman was imprisoned. She was a woman of extraordinary character, and, by her accomplishments, well fitted for the French Court, where she resided with her husband. It appears that she made him, if not a very good wife, a very agreeable companion. Lord Hardwicke is of opinion, that this country, by its injustice, lost the service of an able man in Sir Robert Dudley (36).

Mr. Walpole's sentiments of Sir Robert Dudley are extremely favourable. He regards him as having been a great honour to this country, and says that the only uncommendable performance of his life was his discourse to correct the exhorbitances of parliaments. Nevertheless, concludes Mr. Walpole, "Considering "how enterprizing and dangerous a Minister he "might have made, and what variety of talents were "called forth by his misfortunes, it seems to have "been happy both for the Duke and his country, that "he was unjustly deprived of the honours to which "his birth gave him pretensions (37).

There are some passages in Mr. Lodge's "Illustrations of British History," concerning Sir Robert Dudley. In a letter from Rowland Whyte to the Earl of Shrewsbury, dated May 13, 1605, the writer says, "The great cause in the Star-Chamber between my "Lady Leicester and Sir Robert Dudley was ended "and censured upon Friday last; the matter of "marriage was not handled at all, only the practice "was proved in the proceedings. The depositions "to be suppressed and cancelled; the witnesses sus-"pected and disgraced; the bill and answer to be "sealed with the seal of that Court, and so put by "till the Court call for them." In another letter to the Earl of Shrewsbury, written by P. Sanford, on the 7th of June, we read as follows: "In the Star-Cham-"ber the Lords were lately moved to alter the order "made against Sir Robert Dudley, especially in two "points; the one, that, whereas his witnesses were "censured as suspected, how they should be set down "only as "subject to suspicion;" the other, that, "whereas the Earl of Leicester's lands were said to be "reverted to the crown, it should be only "supposed "to be reverted." These things, because they "seemed much to prejudicate the legitimation, were "far pressed; but the order was entered as it was "first set down, upon the speeches especially of the "Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Treasurer (Lord Buck-"hurst), and Chief Justice (Sir John Popham); the "Earl of North holding hardly for the contrary." Mr. Lodge has remarked, that it is strange that neither Dugdale, in the diffuse account of the Dudleys given in his History of Warwickshire, nor Collins, in his Memoirs of that Family, prefixed to the Sidney Papers, should mention Sir Robert Dudley's connection with Mrs. Elizabeth Southwell (38). Dugdale, however, has mentioned the fact in his Baronage, though with some of the cautious timidity of a peerage writer; for he only speaks of it as having been credibly reported (39)]. K.

DUGARD (WILLIAM), a very eminent schoolmaster in the XVIIth century, was the son of Henry Dugard, a Clergyman, and born at Bromsgrove in Worcestershire in the year 1606. He had his education chiefly under Mr. Henry Bright, Master of the royal school adjoining to Worcester Cathedral, and prebendary of that church, by whose good instructions he made a great progress in all kinds of classical learning. At the age of sixteen, on the 13th of September, 1622, he was admitted into Sidney-college in Cambridge, and put under the tuition of his uncle, Richard Dugard, Bachelor of Divinity (a). In the year 1626, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Master in 1630 (b). Soon after, he was appointed Master of Stamford-school, in Lincolnshire; whence, on the 27th of July, 1647, he was elected, 'with one 'mutual consent and agreement,' Master of the free-school in Colchester (c); which he very much improved, not only in the number of scholars, but also in divers useful and necessary repairs and amendments about the house (d). He resigned it the 17th of January, 1642-3 (e); and on the 10th of May, 1644, was chosen Head Master of Merchant-Tailors school in London. As he was a very diligent, exact, and excellently learned man in all grammatical learning, that school greatly flourished under his care and influence (f). But for shewing, as was thought, too great an affection to the royal cause [A], and especially for being concerned in printing Cl. Salmasius's Defence of King Charles I. [B], he was deprived of his school on the 20th of February, 1649-

[A] But for shewing, as was thought, too great an affection to the royal cause.] That he was very well affected to King Charles I. and to the royal interest, appears from a curious register he kept of his school (1), wherein the following verses of his are entered.

(1) Now extant in Sion-College Library.

On the beheading of King Charles I.

Μάρλυς ὑπερ θείων παλεμικώλεμων νόμων ὄχ' ἅριστε.
Σκηπτούχων ΚΑΡΟΛΟΣ μεν ἀλιτήλων χερσὶν ἔπεπτεν.

i. e. 'Charles, the best of Kings, is fallen by the hands 'of cruel, or wicked, men: a martyr for the laws of 'God, and those of his country,'

And on the burial of Oliver Cromwell's mother in Westminster-Abbey.

Ὃς δύο μὲν βασιλεῖς τε καὶ ὥλεσε τρεῖς βασιλείας.

i. e. 'Here lieth the mother of a cursed son, who has 'been the ruin of two Kings and of three kingdoms.'

However, it was not for these verses, as Mr. Strype at first imagined (2), that he was dismissed the school, but for being concerned in printing the book mentioned above; and also Εικὼν βασιλικὴ (*).

Being ſoon after releaſed, he opened, on the 15th of April, 1650, a private ſchool on Peter's Hill, London. But, on the 25th of September, the ſame year, he was reſtored to his former ſtation, by means of the ſame Council of State, who had cauſed him to be removed (h). There he continued with great ſucceſs and credit till about the middle of the year 1661, when he was diſmiſſed, for breaking ſome orders of the Company of Merchant-Tailors, having been publicly warned and admoniſhed of it before (i). He preſented a remonſtrance to them upon that occaſion, but to no purpoſe (k). Whereupon he opened a private ſchool in Coleman-ſtreet, July 4, 1661, and, by the 25th of March following, had gathered an hundred and ninety-three ſcholars; ſo great was his reputation, and the fame of his abilities (l). But he lived a very little while after; for he died in the year 1662. He gave, by will, ſeveral books to Sion-College Library (m). Beſides the qualifications of his mind, which made him be highly valued and eſteemed; he was alſo an excellent ſcholar, and particularly a good orator and poet (n).  [It is ſurpriſing that our predeceſſor, in ſpeaking of Dugard's publications, ſhould have omitted his principal work, which was his "Lexicon Greci Teſtamenti Alphabeticum," printed in 1660, and which is known to every theological ſcholar. This book is excellently adapted for the uſe of ſchools, and young ſtudents in divinity. It is not merely a Lexicon, by exhibiting all the words of the Greek Teſtament, as they ſtand in the text, with explanations and inflections, but anſwers, likewiſe, in a compendious form, the end of a concordance. The late learned Mr. Bowyer had taken ſome pains in correcting and enlarging this work, with a view to its republication. His improved copy is in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Nichols (4).

We cannot underſtand upon what grounds Mr. Dugard is repreſented in the text as having been a good poet. Like many other excellent claſſical ſcholars, he could occaſionally write Latin and even Greek verſes; but a capacity of this kind may ſubſiſt without any great pretenſions to the poetical character.] K.

DUGDALE (WILLIAM), a moſt induſtrious and excellent Antiquary and Hiſtorian, in the XVIIth century, was the only ſon of John Dugdale [A], of Shuſtoke, near Coles-Hill, in Warwickſhire, Gent. by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Arthur Swynfen, a younger ſon of William Swynfen of Swynfen in Staffordſhire (a). He was born at Shuſtoke the 12th of September, 1605; and had his firſt education in grammar-learning under Mr. Thomas Sibley, Curate at Nether Whitacre, near his native place, till he arrived to the age of ten years and upwards; and, afterwards, under Mr. James Cranford, in the free-ſchool at Coventry, till he was near fifteen years old. Then returning home to his father, he received farther inſtructions from him, eſpecially in Law (b) and Hiſtory; in all which he became well verſed by his own indefatigable induſtry. In the mean time, his father being aged, and grown very infirm with a dead palſy, and deſiring to ſee him matched in his life-time, he married, on the 17th of March, 1622-3, Margery, ſecond daughter of John Huntbach, of Seawall, in the pariſh of Biſhbury in Staf-

[A] Was the only ſon of John Dugdale.] This John Dugdale was the only child of James Dugdale, of Cletherow, in Lancaſhire, Gent. (which name and family had been of long continuance in thoſe parts), and had his chief education in St. John's College, Oxon: where applying himſelf to the ſtudy of Civil-Law, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts; and, continuing there the ſpace of fourteen years, was for ſome time Clerk of the Accompts for that College, and Steward of their Courts. During ſome years of his ſtay in that college, he was tutor to William Paulet, only ſon to the Lord Giles Paulet, younger ſon to William, the firſt Marquis of Winchester, of that noble family. When he left the Univerſity, reſolving to ſettle in the country, he took a liking to the woodland part of Warwickſhire, where Mr. Paulet had a fair eſtate. Selling therefore his lands in Lancaſhire, he gave him a large fine for a leaſe of the impropriate rectory of Shuſtoke, during the term of ſixty years, where finding the houſe ruinous, he new built it. Fixing himſelf there, and marrying his wife Elizabeth abovementioned, he had by her our author, William; and one daughter, named Mary, who became the wife of Richard Seawall, ſon of Henry Seawall, Alderman of Coventry (1).

fordſhire,

fordſhire, Gent. As he was then but in the eighteenth year of his age, he boarded with his wife's father till the death of his own father, which happened on the 4th of July, 1624. But, ſoon after that, he went and kept houſe at Fillongley in Warwickſhire, where he had an eſtate formerly purchaſed by his father. In 1625 he bought the manor of Blythe in Shuſtoke aforementioned; and, the year following, ſold his eſtate at Fillongley, and came to reſide at Blythe-Hall. His natural inclination leading him to the ſtudy of Antiquities and Hiſtory (c), he was generally encouraged thereto by that great Antiquary, Samuel Roper, Eſq. a Derbyſhire gentleman, and Barriſter at Law, with whom he became acquainted about the year 1615. And having alſo, after his ſettling at Blythe-Hall, read Mr. William Burton's Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire, and being made known to him (d), he was by that learned perſon introduced (e) to Sir Simon Archer of Tamworth, Knt. a great lover of Antiquities; who delivered to him collections he had made out of divers ancient writings, and brought him acquainted with Sir Simon Clarke of Brome-Court, and moſt other gentlemen in Warwickſhire. By their advice and encouragement he undertook a Deſcription of that County, of which we ſhall give an account below. In 1638 he accompanied Sir Simon Archer to London, who introduced him to the learned Sir Henry Spelman: and, during his reſidence in that place, he had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the moſt eminent Antiquaries in the nation [B]. Among the reſt, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton took a great liking to [B] He had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the moſt eminent Antiquaries in the nation.] Take a full account of this in Mr. Dugdale's own words. 'After he ſettled at Blythe-Hall, having read the 'deſcription of Leiceſter, publiſhed by Mr. William 'Burton, of Lindley, in that county, (about eight 'miles diſtant from Blythe-Hall,) he was introduced 'into his acquaintance by Mr. Fiſher Dilke, of Shuſ'toke, a kinſman of Mr. Burton, and, by the ſaid 'Mr. Burton, into the acquaintance of Sir Simon 'Archer, of Tamworth, in the county of Warwick, 'Knight; who, being much affected to Antiquities, 'and having made ſome collections out of divers an'cient writings, did freely communicate to him what 'he had ſo gathered, and brought him acquainted 'with moſt of the gentlemen of note in the county; 'who being deſirous, through his incitation, to pre'ſerve the honour of their families by ſome ſuch pub'lic work, as Mr. Burton had done by thoſe in Lei'ceſterſhire, did freely communicate unto him the 'ſight of their ancient evidences. Amongſt the which 'he found none more knowing, and forward to en'courage ſuch a work, than Sir Simon Clarke of 'Brome-Court, in the pariſh of Salford, who imparted 'to him divers things of conſequence, eſpecially the 'Leiger-book of the Priory of Kenilworth. Sir Si'mon Archer going to London with his Lady in Eaſ'ter-Term, Anno 1638, much importuned Mr. Dug'dale to accompany him in that journey; whereunto 'he aſſenting, Sir Simon being acquainted with the 'learned Sir Henry Spelman, Knight, (a perſon fa'mous for his knowledge in Antiquities,) and then 'near eighty years of age, brought Mr. Dugdale to 'him; who receiving him with great humanity, and 'finding, upon diſcourſe with him, and the ſight of 'divers collections relating to the Antiquities of War'wickſhire, (which he then ſhewed him), that he had 'made ſome good progreſs in thoſe ſtudies, told him, 'That being a perſon ſo well inclined to that learning, 'and ſo good a proficient therein, he eſteemed him 'very fit to ſerve the King in the Office of Arms; and 'that the moſt noble Thomas, Earl of Arundel, then 'Earl Marſhal of England, having, by virtue of that 'office, the nomination of all ſuch as were admitted 'into that ſociety, would think it a good ſervice to 'the public, to prefer ſuch thereunto as were thus 'naturally qualified, and found ſedulous in thoſe ſtu'dies, offering to recommend him, the ſaid Mr. 'Dugdale, to his Lordſhip for that purpoſe: which 'he did accordingly. Whereupon he was intro'duced unto that honourable perſon, firſt, by Sir 'George Greſteley of Drakelow, in the county of 'Derby, Bart. (who was then in London), and well 'known to his Lordſhip. Waiting ſome time upon 'Sir Henry Spelman, Sir Henry told him, That 'there was a Yorkſhire Gentleman, one Mr. Roger 'Dodſworth, who had taken much pains in ſearch of 'records, and other ancient memorials, relating to 'the Antiquities of that country, but eſpecially as to 'the Monaſtery-foundations in the Northern parts of 'this realm, which work he did not a little recom'mend to the pains and care of ſome induſtrious and 'diligent ſearchers into Antiquities: affirming, that, 'out of his own great affection thereto, he had in his 'younger years got together the tranſcripts of the 'foundation-charters of divers Monaſteries in Norfolk 'and Suffolk (himſelf being a Norfolk man), much 'importuning Mr. Dugdale to join with Mr. Dodſ'worth in that commendable work, which, by reaſon 'of his youth, and inclination to proſecute thoſe ſtu'dies, might in time be brought to ſome perfection. 'Unto which propoſal Mr. Dugdale readily aſſented, 'and, within a few days after, caſually meeting with 'Mr. Dodſworth, at Mr. Samuel Roper's chamber in 'Lincoln's-Inn, and communicating what they were 'in hand with, as to their farther progreſs in thoſe 'ſtudies, readily engaged themſelves to each other, to 'endeavour the gaining of what tranſcripts they could 'obtain from any leiger-books, public records, ori'ginal charters, or other manuſcrips of note, in order 'thereto; but ſtill with this reſervation, that Mr. 'Dugdale ſhould not neglect his collections, touching 'the Antiquities of Warwickſhire, wherein he had 'made conſiderable progreſs. Being thus in London, 'and deſirous to gain acquaintance with all perſons of 'note there, who ſtood affected to Antiquities, Mr. 'Roper brought him to Mr. Henry Lillye, an arms'painter in Little-Britain, who, according to that 'meaſure of learning he had gained, was not a little 'verſed in thoſe ſtudies, having been employed by 'divers perſons of honour and quality in framing their 'pedigrees out of original evidences, and other war'rantable authorities. Hereupon converſing ſome 'time with Mr. Lillye, he there accidentally met with 'one Mr. Richard Gaſcoigne, a Yorkſhire Gentleman, 'who alſo ſtood much affected to thoſe ſtudies, eſpe'cially as to matters of pedigree, wherein he had taken 'ſome pains for divers northern families; who having 'great acquaintance with Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, of 'Kirby, in the county of Northampton, afterwards 'created Lord Hatton, a perſon highly affected to 'thoſe ſtudies, and who had not ſpared for coſt in 'gaining ſundry tranſcripts from public records, 'leiger-books, ancient charters, and many choice 'MSS, brought Mr. Dugdale to that moſt worthy 'perſon, by whom he was made welcome, with all ex'preſſions of kindneſs, and readineſs to further him 'in thoſe his labours. In order thereunto, Sir Chriſ'topher made him ſoon acquainted with Sir Thomas 'Fanſhaw, his near kinſman, at that time the King's 'Remembrancer in the Exchequer (afterwards Lord 'Viſcount Fanſhaw), by means of which great office 'he had the cuſtody of divers leiger-books, and other 'manuſcripts of great antiquity; eſpecially that not'able record called the Red-book, as alſo Teſta de 'Nevill, Kirby's Queſt. Nomina Villarum, and others, 'to all which, by his favour, he had free acceſs. Nor 'was he leſs careful to obtain the like acceſs for him 'to

to him, and joined with Sir Henry Spelman in recommending him to Thomas, Earl of Arundel, then Earl Marſhal of England; who, on the 24th of September, 1638, created him a Purſuivant at Arms Extraordinary, by the name of Blanch-Lyon, having obtained the King's warrant for that purpoſe. Afterwards, he was made Rouge-Croix-Purſuivant in Ordinary, by virtue of his Majeſty's Letters-Patent, dated March 18, 1639-40, in the room of Mr. Edward Walker, removed to the office of Cheſter-Herald. By this means, having a lodging in the Heralds-Office, with a yearly ſalary of twenty pounds out of the Exchequer, and perquiſites, for his ſupport; he ſpent that, and part of the year following, in augmenting his collections out of the records in the Tower, and other places. In ſummer, 1641, through Sir Chriſtopher Hatton's encouragement, he employed himſelf, with one Mr. William Sedgwick, a ſkilful arms-painter, in taking exact draughts of all the monuments in the Abbey-Church at Weſtminſter, St. Paul's Cathedral, London, and in many other Cathedral, Collegiate, Conventual, and Parochial Churches [C], wherein any tombs or monuments were to be found; to the end that the memory of them, in caſe of that deſtruction then imminent, might be preſerved for future and better times. In 1642 he received orders, by warrant under the Royal Signet Manual, dated June 1, to repair to his Majeſty at York, according to the duty of his place; which he accordingly did, and continued there till about the middle of July, when he received the King's command to attend Spencer, Earl of Northampton, Lord Lieutenant of Warwickſhire (f), who was then endeavouring to ſecure the chief places in and near that county, and to diſperſe the forces aſſembled by the Lord Brook for the Parliament's ſervice (g). During his attendance upon that Lord, he ſummoned the caſtle of Banbury, which ſurrendered to his Majeſty; but Warwick and Coventry refuſing ſo to do, the perſons by whom they were held were proclaimed traitors by Mr. Dugdale. He attended the King at Edge-hill battle, on the 23d of October, 1642 [D], and afterwards to Oxford (where, on the firſt of November, he was created Maſter of Arts (h)), and thence to Reading and Brentford; his Majeſty intending to proceed to London. But, being forced to return back to Oxford, our author continued there (i), by his Majeſty's command, till the ſurrender of that garriſon to the Parliament, June 26, 1646. In the mean time he was, on the 16th of April, 1644, created Cheſter-Herald, in the room of Edward Walker, Eſq. advanced to the office of Norroy. In this ſame year he took a journey to Worceſter, and extracted, out of the Regiſters of the Biſhop and Dean and Chapter, the like materials for his Antiquities of Warwickſhire as he had done at Litchfield. Likewiſe, during his long reſidence at Oxford, he applied himſelf to the ſearch of ſuch Antiquities, in the Bodleian and other Libraries, as he thought might any way conduce towards the furtherance of the Monaſticon, deſigned by Mr. Roger Dodſworth and himſelf; as alſo of whatſoever might relate to matter of Hiſtory, touching the antient Nobility of this realm, of which he made good uſe in his Baronage. After the ſurrender of Oxford garriſon, upon articles, in May 1646, Mr. Dugdale having the benefit of them, repaired to London, and, for the ſum of a hundred and ſixty-eight pounds, compounded for his eſtate which had been ſequeſtered. Then he, and Mr. Dodſworth, vigorouſly proceeded to complete their collections for the Monaſticon, out of the Tower Records and Cottonian Library: in which latter, Mr. Dugdale ſorted many bundles of original letters, and choice memorials, and cauſed them to be bound in eighty volumes [E]. In May,

During his ſtay alſo at London at that time, he was, by the ſaid Mr. Samuel Roper, brought into the acquaintance of Sir Thomas Cotton, Baronet, ſon to the moſt worthy Sir Robert Cotton, founder of that incomparable library in his houſe at Weſtminſter, of moſt rare and choice manuſcrips, whereby he had alſo free acceſs thereto, and made ſuch Collections as were of ſingular uſe to him in ſeveral volumes, which have been ſince made publick. By the ſaid Mr. Roper, he was alſo introduced into the acquaintance of Mr. Scipio Squire, then one of the Vice-Chamberlains of the Exchequer, through whoſe kindneſs and favour he had acceſs to that venerable Record, called Doomſday-book, as alſo to the Fines, Plea-Rolls, and ſundry other things of Antiquity remaining in the Treaſury (2).'

(k) Author of a History of England in French, and several other curious books.

May, 1648, he waited on the Lady Hatton to Calais, who was to meet there the Lord Hatton, her husband: and, when his Lordship returned to Paris, Mr. Dugdale accompanied him thither, and stayed nearly three months in that city; where, through the favour of Mr. Francis Du Chesne, he had the perusal of the collections of his learned father Andrew du Chesne (k), out of which he copied many curious things, relating to the Priories-alien in England, which were cells to great abbeys in France, &c. He returned to England in August, having a safe conduct from Queen Henrietta-Maria. After which he and Mr. Dodsworth went on completing their collections for the Monasticon, and preparing them for the press. When they were ready, the booksellers not caring to venture upon so large and hazardous a work, Mr. Dodsworth and Mr. Dugdale hired sums of money, and printed at their own charge the first volume, which was published in the year 1655 [F], in folio, as were the second and third volumes afterwards. In the mean time, our industrious author having finished 'The Antiquities of 'Warwickshire illustrated [G],' he printed that valuable work at his own charge: and for nearly a year and a half, whilst it was printing, continued in London, in order to correct the press himself, because the ordinary correctors were not skilled in the pedigrees. During his residence in which place, he had an opportunity of collecting materials for The History of St. Paul's Cathedral in London [H], which he published in rials, and caused them to be bound in eighty volumes]. They were bundles of most valuable papers of state, which Sir Robert Cotton had obtained from several hands: containing the transactions between Cardinal Wolsey and others, with several of his letters; as also of T. Cromwell afterwards Earl of Essex, Secretary Paget, Cecil Lord Burleigh, Secretary Walsingham, and others, relating as well to foreign as domestic affairs; and likewise the letters and papers of Mary Queen of Scots, John Duke of Norfolk, and other eminent persons in those times. Mr. Dugdale having sorted them, caused them to be bound up with clasps, with the arms of Sir Thomas Cotton on each side of every book (5).

[F] The first volume, which was published in the year 1655.] Under this title: Monasticon Anglicanum; sive Pandectæ Coenobiorum Benedictinorum, Cluniacensium, Cistercensium, Carthusianorum. A primordiis ad eorum usque dissolutionem. Ex MSS ad Monasteria olim pertinentibus, Archivis Turrium Lond. Ebor. Curiarum Scaccarii, Augmentationum, Bibliothecis, Bodleiana, Arundelliana, Cottoniana, Seldeniana, Hottoniana, aliisque, digestum. Adorned with the prospects of Abbeys, Churches, &c. After the publication of this, the printing of the second volume was put off for above five years, till the greatest part of the impression of the first was sold, in order to raise money for going on with that extensive work (6). This is the reason why the second volume was not published till the year 1661; The title of it was, Monastici Anglicani Volumen alterum. De Canonicis Regularibus, Augustinianis, scilicet, Hospitalariis, Templariis, Gilbertinis, Præmonstratensibus, & Maturinis sive Trinitarianis. Cum Appendice ad Volumen primum de Coenobiis aliquot Gallicanis, Hibernicis, & Scoticis. Nec non quibusdam Anglicanis antea omissis, &c. These two volumes were collected, and totally written by Mr. Dodsworth; but Mr. Dugdale took great pains in methodizing and disposing the materials, in making several indexes to the two volumes, and in correcting them at the press: for Mr. Dodsworth died in August, 1654, before the tenth part of the first volume was printed off (7). The third volume was printed off in 1673, under this title: Monastici Anglicani volumen tertium & ultimum. Additamenta quædam in volumen primum, ac volumen secundum, jampridem edita: Nec non fundationes, sive dotationes, diversarum Ecclesiarum Cathedralium ac Collegiatarum, continens. Ex Archivis regiis, ipsis autographis, ac diversis Codic. Manuscriptis decerpta. Several curious things in this volume were communicated by Mr. Ant. Wood, and Sir Tho. Herbert, Bart. (8). These three volumes contain chiefly the Foundation-Charters of the Monasteries at their first erection, the Donation-Charters in after-times being purposely omitted; which are so numerous, that twenty such volumes would not contain them.

[G] The Antiquities of Warwickshire illustrated.] The whole title of the book is, 'The Antiquities of 'Warwickshire illustrated; from Records, Leiger-'Books, Manuscripts, Charters, Evidences, Tombes, 'and Arms: beautified with Maps, Prospects, and 'Portraictures, Lond. 1656, fol.' The Author gives us this account of it.—'As for the work itself, it is an 'Illustration of the Antiquities with which my native 'country (Warwickshire) hath been honoured; in accomplishing whereof, I have spent the chiefest of my 'time for much more than twenty years, diligently 'searching into the vast treasuries of publique Records, besides a multitude of Manuscripts, original 'Charters, and Evidences in private hands, as the 'margents where they are cited do manifest (9).'—— A second edition of this curious and useful book was published in 1730————'in two volumes, printed 'from a copy corrected by the author himself, and 'with the original copper-plates. The whole revised, 'augmented, and continued down to this present time, 'by William Thomas, D. D. some time Rector of 'Exhall, in the same county. With the addition of 'several prospects of gentlemen's seats, churches, 'tombs, and new and correct maps of the county, and 'of the several hundreds, from an actual survey made 'by Henry Beighton, F. R. S. Also complete lists of 'the Members of Parliament and Sheriffs taken from 'the original Records; and an alphabetical index and 'blazonry of the arms upon the several plates.' One fault there is the method of this book; namely, That the parishes are not distinguished from the villages by any particular mark. The titles, at the beginning of the several divisions, should therefore have been printed in different characters: as, for instance, the parishes in old English letter, or in capitals; and the villages in italic, as they are now. The name of each parish should likewise have been put at the top of the page, or pages, which contain an account of the same.—— However, this is our author's master-piece (10), and allowed to be the best methodized and most accurate account that ever was written of this nature (11).

[H] During his residence in which place, he had an opportunity of collecting materials for The History of St. Paul's Cathedral in London.] Of which he gives us himself the following account. 'Meeting casually 'there with Mr. John Reading, a Nottinghamshire 'Gentleman, who had formerly been Clerk of the Nisi 'Prius for the Midland-Circuit, and with whom, before the Rebellion, he was acquainted, he friendly 'invited Mr. Dugdale to his house at Scriveners-hall, 'with promise to shew him some old manuscript books, 'original charters, and other ancient writings. Coming thither accordingly, Mr. Reading brought forth 'five ancient manuscript books in folio, which were 'leiger-books of the lands anciently given to the Cathedral of St. Paul, in London; and freely lent them 'to him, to carry into the country until the next ensuing Michaelmas Term, intimating that he should 'have the use of many more upon his next return to 'London. But, in Michaelmas Term, when Mr. 'Dugdale came to restore those books so lent, he 'found that Mr. Reading was dead, and had constituted one Mr. Williams, a Barrister at Law of the

Addreſſing himſelf therefore 'to the ſaid Mr. Williams, and deſiring a ſight of 'the reſt, he very civilly brought him to Scriveners- 'Hall, and there ſhewing him many other old manu- 'ſcript-books, original charters, and very ancient 'writings, in bags and hampers, all relating to that 'great Cathedral, he freely lent them to him, to 'carry to his own lodging, they amounting to no leſs 'than ten porters burdens.' Having them, therefore, thus in his private cuſtody, and beſtowing pains to ſort them into order, he made extracts from them, of what he found hiſtorical in reference to that church. And, to the end, the memory of thoſe noble and ancient monuments might be preſerved (which were afterwards deſtroyed, the church being made an horſe-garriſon by the late rebellious uſurpers), did by the help and favour of ſundry worthy perſons who voluntarily offered to be at the charge of thoſe plates, in which the repreſentations of them were cut in braſs, as alſo the lively proſpects of the whole fabrick (inſide and out), accompliſh the ſame; and having ſuccinctly framed an hiſtorical narrative of the foundation, and endowment thereof, likewiſe of all the chantries, and what elſe was moſt memorable therein, publiſhed it, under this title, 'The Hiſtory of St. Paul's Cathedral "in London, from its Foundation, till theſe Times: "extracted out of original Charters, Records, Leiger- "books, and other Manuſcripts. It was printed in a very incorrect manner; but Mr. William Somner took a great deal of pains in noting all the faults in the margin of a copy belonging to him, which was depoſited in the Library of the Church of Canterbury. What great ſhare Mr. Dugdale had in this work will beſt appear hence: That, out of two hundred and ninety-four articles whereof that volume conſiſts, a hundred and ninety-one are of his collecting, being thoſe that are marked with an * in the liſt of the contents, at the beginning of the volume (12). [K] As alſo the ſecond part of that learned Knight's Gloſſary.] The firſt part was publiſhed in 1626, fol. by Sir Henry. He did not live to finiſh the ſecond part, but left much of it looſely written; with obſervations, and ſundry bills of paper, pinned thereto. Theſe Mr. Dugdale took the pains to diſpoſe into proper order, tranſcribing many of thoſe looſe papers, &c. And having reviewed the firſt part, cauſed both to be printed together in 1664, (14) under this title, Gloſſarium Archaiologicum, continens Latino barbara, peregrina, obſoleta, & novæ ſignificationis vocabula. There was another edition of it in 1687. The ſecond part, digeſted by Mr. Dugdale, began at the letter M. But Mr. Wood obſerves (15), that it 'comes far ſhort of 'the firſt.' Nay, ſome have aſſerted (16), 'that he 'or they who put out the ſecond part of Sir Henry 'Spelman's Gloſſary, did not do right to his memory.' In anſwer to which, Dr. R. Brady gives us the following account (17). 'The firſt part [of the Gloſſary], 'to the letter N, was publiſhed in the year 1626, the 'whole being then finiſhed, and offered, by Sir 'Henry Spelman, to Mr. Bill the King's Printer, for 'the value of five pounds in books only: but he re- 'fuſing to give him that ſmall rate for the copy, he 'ventured to print the firſt part of it at his own 'charge, and moſt of his books lay upon his hands 'till the latter end of the year 1637, when two book- 'ſellers, in St. Paul's Church-yard, took them off. 'The next year, Mr. Dugdale being with Sir Henry 'Spelman, and telling him that many learned men 'were very deſirous to ſee the remaining part of that 'work, Sir Henry then told him what is here related, 'and produced both parts of the Gloſſary, the firſt 'whereof was printed and interleaved with blank 'leaves, as alſo was the ſecond, which was in manu- 'ſcript, wherein he had added and altered much. 'After King Charles the IId's Reſtoration, the Earl of 'Clarendon then Lord Chancellor, and Dr. Sheldon, 'then Biſhop of London, inquired of Mr. Dugdale 'what was become of the remaining part of the Gloſ- 'ſary, or whether it was ever finiſhed. He told them 'it was finiſhed, and in the hands of Mr. Charles 'Spelman, grand-child to Sir Henry, and youngeſt 'ſon to Sir John. Whereupon they deſired Mr. Dug- 'dale to move him to print it; which he did: but, 'finding that the bookſellers would give nothing for 'the copy, and that he was not able to print it at his 'own charge, and returning this anſwer to the Lord 'Chancellor, and Biſhop of London, they contributed 'liberally themſelves, and, procuring many ſubſcrip- 'tions

[L]. which he publiſhed in 1666, fol. His next work, was, "The Baronage of England," [M], of which the firſt

'tions to that purpoſe, deſired Mr. Dugdale to receive 'the money, and deal with a Printer to perform the 'work: which he did, and cauſed it to be printed as 'he received it, all under the proper hand-writing of 'Sir Henry Spelman, without alteration or addition.' This account the Reader will be pleaſed to compare with the beginning of this Note, which is taken out of Sir William Dugdale's Life, written by himſelf. But that learned Author aſſures us, in the ſame Life (18), that the ſecond part of the Gloſſary was publiſhed, 'without any alteration from Sir Henry's Copy, as 'by ſome hath been ignorantly ſurmiſed.'

The Hiſtorical Part, which was deſigned as an Introduction to the Chronological Tables, is divided into ſeventy-eight chapters. And the book is adorned with the heads of Sir John Clench, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Randolph Crew, Sir Robert Heath, Edward Earl of Clarendon to whom the Book is dedicated, Sir Orlando Bridgman, Sir John Vaughan, and Mr. Selden. There are alſo plates of the Arms in the windows of the Temple-Hall, and other Inns of Court, &c. The firſt Edition, as is ſaid above, was in 1666; and the ſecond in 1671. having the three laſt Plates more than the firſt, but being very full of faults. There was a pretended third Edition in 1680; but it is only the ſecond, with a new Title-page; and a Continuation, in three leaves at the end, of the Chronology and Catalogues aforeſaid. Biſhop Nicolſon recommends this Book, as a proper Introduction to the Hiſtory of the Laws of this Kingdom (19).

[M] The Baronage of England.] The whole title of Tome I. is thus, "The Baronage of England, or "an Hiſtorical Account of the Lives and moſt memo-"rable Actions of our Engliſh Nobility in the Saxons "Time, to the Norman Conqueſt; and from thence "of thoſe who had their riſe before the end of King "Henry the Third's Reign. Deduced from publick "Records, antient Hiſtorians, and other Authori-"ties."——That of the ſecond is the ſame, with this difference——"Which had their riſe, after the end "of King Henry the Third's reign, and before the ele-"venth year of King Richard the Second."——And of the third——"As had their riſe, from the tenth "year of King Richard the Second, until this preſent "year 1676." Theſe two laſt Volumes are generally bound together. What induced our Author to undertake this work, he tells us in the following words. 'I muſt ingenuouſly acknowledge, that I had not any 'thoughts of attempting this work here made public, 'until (by God Almighties diſpoſal) attending the late 'King Charles the Firſt, of bleſſed memory, in his 'garriſon at Oxford, according to the duty of my 'place; and continuing in his ſervice there, from the 'beginning of November An. 1642. until the end of 'June 1646; I had both leiſure and opportunity 'of peruſing many excellent Hiſtorical Manuſcripts 'choicely preſerved in the famous Bodleian Library, 'and ſundry Colleges there; whence having gathered 'a large ſtock of fit materials in order to ſuch a work, I 'grew encouraged to proceed farther; and thereupon, 'betook myſelf to a diligent ſearch into thoſe old Re-'cords in the Tower of London, Office of the Rolls, 'Exchequer, and ſundry other public places: Next 'into that incomparable Treaſury of moſt antient and 'choice Manuſcripts, which the late worthy Sir Ro-'bert Cotton Bart. had, in his time, happily got to-'gether: and, after that, into divers other, no leſs 'eſtimable; which, with much charge, had been 'gained by the Right Honourable, the late Lord 'Hatton; and by his eſpecial favour communicated 'to me; likewiſe into that elaborate collection from 'the Pipe-Rolls, made by Mr. Roger Dodſworth, my 'late deceaſed friend, and into ſundry other, where-'unto my Quotations do refer: amongſt which, thoſe 'of Robert Glover, formerly Somerſet-Herald, (moſt 'opportunely acquired from ſeveral hands, wherein 'they lay obſcured) were not the leaſt (20).' The collecting of the materials for this work coſt the induſtrious Author a great part of thirty years labour, (21). But, notwithſtanding his great care and pains, there are many faults in it: ſo that the Gentlemen at the Heralds Office, dare not depend upon the generality of matter relating to pedigree therein (22). However, this moſt uſeful work did not deſerve the ſevere cenſure which a ſour and ill-natured pedant (23) hath paſſed upon it, in his "Three Letters, con-"taining Remarks on ſome of the numberleſs Errors "and Defects in Dugdale's Baronage (24)." For, therein he is charged, with inaccuracy (25), want of capacity, and judgment (26), much negligence and ignorance (27), maſter-piece of ſtupidity (28), with groſs and complicated blunders (29); who, as often as he has opportunities, falls into miſtakes (30), and has fagoted his collections together (31): That, a very great number of inconſiſtencies, and contradictions are plentifully ſtrewed through his whole book (32) &c. He owns indeed, that 'Dugdale is eſteemed by much 'the beſt writer, who has yet made a general trea-'tiſe on this ſubject [of the Peerage] for which he 'ſeemed aptly qualified, being very laborious and in-'duſtrious, and having been furniſhed with a vaſt 'number of excellent materials, and favoured with 'opportunities of acceſs to public Offices and Libra-'ries, from whence a ſtructure truly noble, and wor-'thy of the ſubject might have been raiſed; but 'having more regard to his profit than his honour, 'and the work being very large and tedious, he did 'not allow himſelf time to examine and compare his 'vouchers, nor the taſks of his ſeveral Ammanuenſes '(33)———He had (ſays he elſewhere) a greedy 'appetite to Antiquities, but, like the Oſtrich, he 'ſwallowed whatever came in his way unchewed, and 'it paſſed through him undigeſted. He ſeems to have 'had little Judgment in collecting, and leſs care and 'underſtanding in tranſcribing; and his manner of 'compoſing is ſtill leſs excuſable as it more affects 'other men. His avarice made him undertake bur-'dens too heavy for his ſhoulders, and puſhed him 'beyond his ſpeed. His eye was ſo fixed on his chief 'end, that he overlooked the means of deſerving 'either praiſe or profit. His works (I ſpeak as to 'that before me) ſeem to have been patched up by 'the help of Alphabets, and from whatever occurred, 'which, either by himſelf or his illiterate Ammanu-'enſes, was thought to the preſent purpoſe; extracts 'were crudely huddled together, without any regard 'to truth or probability, or the conſiſtence of one 'part with another: which is the reaſon that in any 'fact, wherein any plurality of perſons is concerned, 'whereby it comes to be related in ſeveral places, it 'is very rare if ſuch relations are not materially diffe-'rent, and ſometimes none true. The margin of his 'book, I own, I have found uſeful, as it directs the 'neareſt way to better information; but his authori-'ties there are in general ſo erroneouſly vouched, 'that they give no evidence to the purpoſes for which 'they are produced; ſo that there is no depending 'upon him, without examining his witneſſes. In 'fine, his diſagreeing fragments of unhewed materi-'als are ſo unartfully diſpoſed, and ſo coarſely laid 'together first tome appeared in print, in 1675, and the second and third in 1676, fol. The first treating of such of the Earls, and their descendants, as had their first advancements before the end of King Henry IIId's reign; and, of all others, who held their honours or baronies by tenure, as antiently. Upon the death of Sir Edward Walker, which happened on the 20th of February, 1676-7, our author was appointed in his room Garter Principal King of Arms (n). His patent for that office passed the Great-Seal April 26, 1677; and he was solemnly created Garter, the 24th of May following, at the College of Arms. The next day he received from his Majesty the honour of knighthood, much against his will, by reason of the smallness of his estate (o). But to return to his works. In 1681, he published "A Short View "of the late Troubles in England; briefly setting forth, their Rise, Growth, and tra- "gical Conclusion. As also, some Parallel thereof with the Barons Wars in the "Time of King Henry III. but chiefly with that in France, called the Holy League, "in the Reigns of Henry III. and Henry IV, late Kings of that Realm. To which is "added, A perfect Narrative of the Treaty at Uxbridge, in ann. 1644." Oxford, fol. And, "The antient Usage in bearing of such Ensigns of Honour as are commonly "called Arms (p)." [N]. And, "" A Catalogue of the Baronets of England, from the first erection of that Dignity, "until the 4th of July, 1681, inclusive." Oxford, 1681, 8vo. There was a second edition of it in the beginning of the year following, wherein the Catalogue of Baronets was continued in the 6th of December. The last thing he published was, "A perfect "Copy of all Summons of the Nobility to the Great Councils and Parliaments of this "Realm, from the XLIX. of King Henry the IIId until these present Times. With "Catalogues of such Noblemen as have been summoned to Parliament in right of their "wives, and of such other Noblemen as derive their Titles of Honour from the Heirs- "Female, from whom they are descended; and of such Noblemens eldest sons as have "been summoned to Parliament by some of their Fathers Titles. 'together, that the whole heap seems to me no better 'than rudis indigestaque moles (34).' i. e. a rude and undigested heap.——Such is the harsh and unmannerly attack of the anonymous letter-writer, upon Mr. Dugdale's book now before us.——It must be owned, that there are many mistakes in the Baronage (and mistakes are indeed hardly avoidable in a work of that nature). But the industrious and learned Author, instead of being reviled, or treated with contempt, ought to be corrected with mildness, and duly esteemed, for having proceeded, at once, so far in a work, wherein very little progress had been made before he took it in hand: all other accounts of the nobility, by Milles, Brooke, &c. being little more than bare catalogues, or at best very lean performances. ——If the letter-writer had pointed out Mr. Dugdale's faults and mistakes (which he had great opportunities of discovering by his place in the Exchequer), he should at least have treated him with decency and good manners. It was the least that was due to the memory of a man, who had published so many useful books: a man whose name will be remembered with veneration and honour, while that of snarling Ch. Hornby will be buried in everlasting oblivion.——— It were greatly to be wished that gentlemen, of skill and leisure, would make a thorough review of so useful a book as the Baronage; and, after having compared it with the records, and our antient historians, &c. give a new edition of it. No greater service could be done to the curious and inquisitive reader, or to any one who is a lover of the English History.——— Mr. Wood informs us (35), that Mr. Dugdale sent to him copies of all the tomes of this work, with an earnest desire that he would peruse, correct, and add to them what he could obtain from records or other authorities: whereupon, spending a whole long vacation in that matter, he drew up at least sixteen sheets of corrections, but more additions; which being sent to the author, he remitted a good part of them into the margin of a copy of large paper of his Baronage.

He made, for his own use, Indexes to most of our English Historians, viz. Matthew Paris, Matthew of Westminster, Roger de Hoveden, Henry of Huntingdon, Ethelward, Ingulphus, Thomas of Walsingham, &c. And also, in twenty-six thin folios, Indexes to the sixty Volumes of Collections from Records, by Sir John Kniveton, in the library of the late Lord Hatton: besides those to Leland's Itinerary, and Collectanea.——Our author was likewise the chief promoter of the Saxon Dictionary by Mr. William Somner, printed at Oxford in 1659 (37).

He gave likewiſe ſeveral books to the Office of Heralds in London, and procured many more for the ſame (q) [P]. At length this moſt induſtrious perſon, contracting a great cold at Blythe-Hall, died of it in his chair, about one o'clock in the afternoon, Feb. 10, 1685-6, in the eighty-firſt year of his age. His body, being conveyed to the parochial church of Shuſtoke abovementioned, was, on the 12th day of the ſame month, depoſited in a ſtone coffin, lying in a little vault, which he had cauſed to be made under the north ſide of the chancel of the church there.  [The general preface to the Monaſticon Anglicanum was drawn up by the learned Sir John Marſham, and is followed by a ſhort view of the firſt inſtitution of the monaſtic life. Great part of the impreſſion of the third volume was accidentally burnt. The firſt volume was reprinted, with large additions, in 1682; and the whole was abridged, in 1695, by James Wright, author of the "Hiſtory of Rutland-"ſhire." Another epitome, by an anonymous writer, was publiſhed in 1718. Great additions were made to the Monaſticon itſelf in "The Hiſtory of the "ancient Abbeys, Monaſteries, Hoſpitals, Cathedral "and Collegiate Churches," by John Stephens, Gent. This work, which contains, in folio, two additional volumes to Sir William Dugdale's Monaſticon, appeared in 1722 and 1723. Mr. Peck promiſed a fourth volume of the Monaſticon, and, in 1735, told the world that it was in great forwardneſs (43). He left behind him, on this ſubject, five curious manuſcript volumes in quarto, now in the Britiſh Muſeum, ſome particulars concerning which may be ſeen in the Anecdotes of Mr. Bowyer, p. 590, 591. and a full enumeration of their contents in Ayſcough's Catalogue, vol. "It is remarkable," ſays Mr. Granger, "that the "publication of the "Monaſticon," was productive "of many law-ſuits, by the revival of old writings; "and that the Puritans were highly offended at it, as "they looked upon it as a large ſtep towards introducing Popery." The teſtimony of Mr. Gough to Sir William Dugdale's "Antiquities of Warwickſhire illuſtrated," is that "it muſt ſtand at the head of all our county "hiſtorians. Sir Greville Verney corrected the map, "and gave many drawings of monuments with his "own hand. Dugdale himſelf had drawn the monu-"ments of the Ferrars family at Badley, ready for "engraving; but the heir of the family refuſing to "contribute any thing towards the charge thereof, "and it not being proper for Sir William to undergo "it totally, they were omitted." Concerning Dr. Thomas, who publiſhed the edition of 1730, Mr. Gough informs us, that he was very careleſs in his accounts, and took very little pains for information. "I have heard," adds Mr. Gough, "an inſtance of "his having an opportunity to call on a gentleman "who had large records and other materials; but, "becauſe he was not at home, though he had left "word he ſoon ſhould be, Thomas contented himſelf "with inſpecting the church. The Hundreds are "very incorrectly copied from Beighton's large Sur-"vey." Dugdale's original edition, with Hollar's plates, was reprinted, by ſubſcription, in 1765, by a bookſeller at Coventry; but in ſo negligent a manner was the publication executed, that ſome of the laſt ſheets were worked off on the coarſeſt paper. The author's grandſon, Richard Geaſt, Eſq. of Blythe-Hall, in the county of Warwick, recovered the plates by a ſuit in Chancery (45).

Concerning the "Hiſtory of imbanking and drain-"ing divers Fens and Marſhes," Mr. Gough acquaints us, that this valuable book being become extremely ſcarce, and a perſon in the fens having publiſhed above, who died the 18th of December, 1681, aged ſeventy-five, after they had been married fifty-nine years (r). Sir William Dugdale's character is ſufficiently manifeſt from what hath been ſaid of him in this article. However, we ſhall add the character given of him by Mr. Wood (s). "Had this indefatigable perſon ſequeſtered himſelf "from worldly troubles, and totally addicted himſelf to his ſtudies, and had minded the "public more than his private concerns, the world might have juſtly enjoyed more of "his lucubrations, and thoſe more true and accurate than ſuch as are already publiſhed, "eſpecially thoſe in his latter days: yet, however, what he hath done is prodigious, "conſidering the great troubles that he had endured for his loyalty, and the cumbrances "of this world that he had run through; and therefore his memory ought to be vene-"rated, and had in everlaſting remembrance, for thoſe things which he hath already "publiſhed, which otherwiſe might have periſhed and been eternally buried in ob-"livion."

liſhed propoſals for reprinting it by ſubſcription, with new plates, the Corporation of Bedford Level, who were particularly intereſted in a ſecond edition, readily undertook one. Application having been made to Richard Geaſt, Eſq. beforementioned, he deſired that it might be conducted entirely at his own expence. Accordingly, it was printed, in 1772, in one volume, folio, under the inſpection of the Corporation's Regiſter, Charles Nalſon Cole, Eſq. of the Inner Temple, from the author's own copy, under the original title, with the addition of three indexes, one of the principal matters, the ſecond of names, and the third of places, making eleven additional ſheets. The original plates, which remained in Mr. Geaſt's poſſeſſion, and did not want to be retouched, were uſed. That gentleman intended to have proceeded with the other parts of his learned anceſtor's works; but the reſtraint laid upon literary property diverted him from venturing on an expence which a period of fourteen years could never be expected to repay (46).

Before Sir William Dugdale printed his "Origines "Juridiciales," he ſhewed the copy to Sir Matthew Hale, who thought that his deduction of the riſe of Parliament Writs for Knights and Burgeſſes would be judged to leſſen the honour of Parliaments; but adviſed him to ſubmit it to Sir Orlando Bridgeman, who found no fault with it (47).

(47) Communicated by Edmund Turnor, jun. Eſq. from a manuſcript belonging to Bennet Langton, Eſq.

Anthony Wood wrote a little tract, which was never printed, containing a ſufficiently-ample ſpecimen of the errors of Dugdale's Baronage. It is preſerved in the Aſhmolean Muſeum (48). Mr. Hornſby's attack on the Baronage, though acute, was very illiberal, and is juſtly animadverted upon in note M. Whatever faults there may be in Dugdale's work, it ſtill ſhould be acknowledged, that it is a performance of great merit, and of deſerved reputation. The price it bears is a ſufficient proof of the eſtimation in which it is held; and every writer, who treats on ſimilar ſubjects, will find himſelf indebted to it in a variety of reſpects. We agree in the wiſh of our predeceſſor, that gentlemen of ſkill and leiſure would make a thorough review of ſo uſeful a book as the Baronage, and give a new edition of it, after having compared it with the Records and our ancient Hiſtorians. It would be ſtill more valuable if it were continued to the preſent time. There is unqueſtionably conſiderable merit in Collins, and in ſome of the additions which have been made to later impreſſions. The article of the houſe of Northumberland in the laſt edition is peculiarly excellent. On the whole, however, there is room for much improvement; and a manly work of the kind we are ſpeaking of, free from the adulatory ſtrain which hath commonly prevailed, would be no ſmall acceſſion to hiſtorical knowledge. As peerages have hitherto been written, one would imagine that ancient and noble families were made up of nothing but virtues.

(48) Granger, ubi ſupra.

Having derived the chief materials for our addition to Dugdale's article from the "Britiſh Topography," we ſhall lay ourſelves under farther obligations to the ſame work, by having recourſe to it for ſome particulars concerning Dodſworth, the principal compiler of the "Monaſticon Anglicanum." Mr. Gough, when he comes to Yorkſhire, thus introduces that eminent Antiquary. "One cannot approach the borders of "this county without paying tribute to the memory "of that indefatigable collector of its antiquities, "Roger Dodſworth, who undertook and executed a "work, which, to the antiquaries of the preſent age, "would have been the ſtone of Tydides. One hun-"dred and twenty-two volumes of his own writing, "beſides original manuſcripts which he had obtained "from ſeveral hands, making altogether one hun-"dred and ſixty-two volumes folio, now lodged in "that grand repoſitory of our ancient muniments the "Bodleian Library, are laſting memorials what this "country owes to him, as the two volumes of the "Monaſticon (which, though publiſhed under his "and Dugdale's names conjointly, were both col-"lected and written totally by him) will immorta-"lize that extenſive induſtry which has laid the "whole kingdom under obligation." General Fairfax, riſing above that diſgraceful averſion to our antiquities with which many of his party were infected, was a zealous patron of Dodſworth, and allowed him a yearly ſalary to preſerve the inſcriptions in churches. Anthony Wood ſays of our Antiquary, that he "was "of wonderful induſtry, but leſs judgement;" that he was "always collecting and tranſcribing, but ne-"ver publiſhed any thing." The laſt circumſtance is not true; and it is juſtly obſerved by Mr Gough, that in the former part of theſe words Wood has drawn his own character. A much higher opinion of Mr. Dodſworth was entertained by Thomas Hearne, who thus ſpeaks of him in a tranſport of antiquarian enthuſiaſm. "I never look upon theſe volumes with-"out the utmoſt ſurprize and wonder; and I cannot "but bleſs God that he was pleaſed, out of his infi-"nite goodneſs and mercy, to raiſe up ſo pious and "diligent a perſon, that ſhould, by his bleſſing, ſo ef-"fectually diſcover and preſerve ſuch a noble treaſure "of antiquities as is contained in theſe volumes: "moſt of them written with his own hand, and the "genealogical tables, and the notes on them, done "with that exquiſite care and judgement, that I can-"not but think otherwiſe of this eminent perſon than "the author of the "Athenæ Oxonienſes." For, it "plainly appears to me, that his judgement and ſa-"gacity were equal to his diligence; and I ſee no "reaſon to doubt, but that if he had lived to write "the Antiquities of Yorkſhire (as he once deſigned) "it would have appeared in a very pleaſing and en-"tertaining method, and in a proper and elegant "ſtyle, and ſet out with all other becoming advan-"tages." Mr. Dodſworth was the eldeſt ſon of Matthew Dodſworth, Regiſtrary of York Cathedral, and Chancellor to Toby Matthews, Archbiſhop of York. He was born on the fourteenth of July, 1585, and was buried at Rufford, in Lancaſhire. His collections were bequeathed, by Lord Fairfax, to the Bodleian Library, and ſent there, in 1673, by Dr. Henry Fairfax, Dean of Norwich, and nephew to his Lordſhip. It happening to be wet weather when they were conveyed to Oxford, Wood, with much difficulty, obtained leave of the Vice-Chancellor to have them brought into the Muniment-Room in the School Tower, and was a month drying them on the leads (49).]

[DUKE

 [DUKE (RICHARD), a divine and a poet, ſeems entitled to ſome notice in this work, as his poems have been honoured with a place in Dr. Johnſon's collection, and a ſhort account has been given of him by that eminent biographer. Who his parents were, and where he was born, we are not able to aſcertain. His grammatical education he received under the famous Dr. Buſby, at Weſtminſter School, into which he was admitted in 1670, and from which he was elected, in 1675, to Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1678 he took the degree of Batchelor of Arts, and that of Maſter in 1682. He became, likewiſe, a Fellow of the College, and it is related that he was for ſome time tutor to the Duke of Richmond. Having entered into holy Orders, among other preferments he was made a Prebendary of Glouceſter, and in this capacity he was choſen a Proctor in Convocation for that Church. He had the additional honour of being Chaplain to Queen Anne. In 1710 he was preſented by Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Biſhop of Wincheſter, to the wealthy living of Witney in Oxfordſhire, which, however, he enjoyed but a few months; for, on the tenth of February, 1710-11, having returned from an entertainment, he was found dead the next morning (a).

(a) Johnſon's Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. p. 263—265. Edition of 1790. Graduati Cantabrigienſes, p. 124.

When Mr. Duke left the Univerſity, being conſcious of his powers, he enliſted himſelf among the wits of the age. He was, in particular, the familiar friend of Otway, and was engaged, among other popular names, in the tranſlations of Ovid and Juvenal. From his writing he appears not to have been ill-qualified for poetical compoſition. "In his Review," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "though unfiniſhed, are ſome vigorous lines. "His poems are not below mediocrity; nor have I found in them much to be praiſed." Upon a peruſal of them, we entirely agree in the judgement which the Doctor has here pronounced [A]. With the wit, Mr. Duke ſeems to have ſhared the diſſoluteneſs, of the times: for, ſome of his compoſitions are ſuch as he muſt have reviewed with deteſtation in his later days (b). This was eſpecially the caſe with regard to two of his poems; the tranſlation of one of the elegies of Ovid, and the firſt of the three ſongs. "Perhaps," obſerves Dr. Johnſon, "like ſome other fooliſh young men, he rather talked "than lived viciouſly, in an age when he that would be thought a wit was afraid to ſay "his prayers; and whatever might have been bad in the firſt part of his life was "ſurely condemned and reformed by his better judgement (c)." It gives us pleaſure to find this candid and judicious remark confirmed by poſitive teſtimony; for, in ſome lines addreſſed to Mr. Waller, upon the verſes which that poet had made on the laſt copy in his book, Mr. Duke begins as follows:

(b) Johnſon, ubi ſupra.

(c) Ibid.

[A] We entirely agree in the judgement which the Doctor has here pronounced.] The "Review" is a political poem, and in its deſign is not unlike the Abſalom and Achitophel of Dryden. Perhaps Mr. Duke left his work unfiniſhed from a reflection upon the compariſon that would have been inſtituted between the two productions. The characters drawn are thoſe of the King (Charles the Second), the Earl of Clarendon, the Duke of York, the Earl of Shafteſbury, Louis the Fourteenth of France, and the Duke of Buckingham. Our poet has diſplayed the virtues of the Duke of York with a very flattering pencil. In his character of the Duke of Buckingham, he ſeems to have had Dryden's Zimri in view, but is not equally conciſe, nor equally ſpirited. The portrait, however, is not without its merit.

In Mr. Duke's verſes to Cælia, the concluding lines have a pleaſing harmony.

"Had I a pen that could at once impart
"Soft Ovid's nature and high Virgil's art,
"Then the immortal Sachariſſa's name
"Should be but ſecond in the liſt of fame;
"Each grove, each ſhade, ſhould with thy praiſe
"be fill'd,
"And the fam'd Penſhurſt to our Windſor
"yield (1)."

(1) Johnſon's Poets, Vol. XI. p. 105.

Of all our Author's original poems, that, on the marriage of George Prince of Denmark and the Lady Anne, is in our opinion the beſt. The verſification is more uniformly correct and harmonious than in moſt of Mr. Duke's other pieces; and the panegyric is conducted in an ingenious and agreeable manner.

In the poem on the death of King Charles the Second, the praiſe of the deceaſed Monarch is carried to the utmoſt height. Perhaps it may not be unamuſing to ſome of our readers to ſee, in a ſtriking inſtance, how much the language of poetry may differ from that of true hiſtory.

"Dead is the king, who all our lives did bleſs!
"Our ſtrength in war, and our delight in peace!
"Was ever Prince like him to mortals given!
"So much the joy of earth, and care of heaven?
"Under the preſſure of unequal fate,
"Of ſo erect a mind and ſoul ſo great!
"So full of meekneſs and ſo void of pride,
"When borne aloft by Fortune's higheſt tide!
"His kindly beams on the ungrateful ſoil
"Of this rebellious, ſtubborn, murmuring iſle
"Hatch'd plenty; eaſe and riches did beſtow,
"And made the land with milk and honey flow!
"Leſs bleſt was Rome when mild Auguſtus ſway'd,
"And the glad world for love, not fear, obey'd.
"Mercy, like heaven's, his chief prerogative!
"His joy to ſave, and glory to forgive!
"Who lives, but felt his influence, and did ſhare
"His boundleſs goodneſs and paternal care?
"And, whilſt with all th' endearing arts he ſtrove
"On every ſubject's heart to ſeal his love,
"What breaſt ſo hard, what heart of human make,
"But, ſoftening, did the kind impreſſion take?
"Belov'd and loving! with ſuch virtues grac'd
"As might on common heads a crown have plac'd!
"How ſkill'd in all the myſteries of ſtate!
"How fitting to ſuſtain an empire's weight!
"How quick to know! how ready to adviſe!
"How timely to prevent! how more than ſenates
"wiſe!
"His words how charming, affable, and ſweet!
"How juſt his cenſure! and how ſharp his wit!
"How did his charming converſation pleaſe
"The bleſt attenders of his hours and eaſe;
"When graciouſly he deign'd to condeſcend,
"Pleas'd to exalt a ſubject to a friend!
"To the moſt low how eaſy of acceſs!
"Willing to hear, and longing to redreſs!
"His mercy knew no bounds of time or place,
"His reign was one continued act of grace!
"Good Titus could, but Charles could never ſay,
"Of all his royal life, "he loſt a day (2)."

" When ſhame for all my fooliſh youth had writ
" Adviſ'd 'twas time the rhyming trade to quit,
" Time to grow wiſe, and be no more a wit——
" The noble fire, that animates thy age,
" Once more inflam'd me with poetic rage (d)."

(d) Johnſon's Poets, Vol. XI. p. 133.

Mr. Duke, in his character as a divine, publiſhed three Sermons in his life-time. The firſt was on the imitation of Chriſt, preached before the Queen in 1703, from 1 John, ii. 6. The ſecond was from Pſalm xxv. 14, and was likewiſe preached before the Queen in 1704. The third was an Aſſize Sermon, on Chriſt's Kingdom, from John xviii. 36. and publiſhed in the ſame year. In 1714, fifteen of his Sermons, on ſeveral occaſions, were printed in one volume, octavo (e).

(e) Cooke's Hiſtorical Regiſter, Vol. II. p. 110.

They are held in good reputation, and are ſpoken of, in ſtrong terms of commendation, by Dr. Henry Felton. That gentleman, in his Diſſertation on reading the Claſſics, ſays, " Mr. Duke may be mentioned under the double capacity of a poet and a divine. " He is a bright example in the ſeveral parts of writing, whether we conſider the Origi- " nals, his Tranſlations, Paraphraſes, or Imitations. But here I can only mention him " as a divine, with this peculiar commendation, that, in his Sermons, beſides livelineſs " of wit, purity, and correctneſs of ſtyle, and juſtneſs of argument, we ſee many fine " alluſions to the Ancients, ſeveral beautiful paſſages handſomely incorporated in the " train of his own thoughts; and, to ſay all in a word, claſſic learning and a Chriſtian " ſpirit (f)."

(f) Diſſertation on reading the Claſſics, and forming a juſt ſtyle, p. 212.

From Otway's poetical Epiſtle to Mr. Duke, it may be collected that the two poets lived together, for a time, in a country retirement (g)]. K.

 [DUNBAR (WILLIAM), an eminent Scottiſh poet, was born, according to Mr. Warton, about the year 1470 (a), but, in Mr. Pinkerton's opinion, five years ſooner. The latter gentleman, from ſeveral circumſtances, has fixed upon 1465 as the moſt probable date, and which perhaps is neareſt to the truth, though the matter cannot now be exactly aſcertained. The place of Dunbar's birth is underſtood to have been Salton, a village on the delightful coaſt of the Forth in East Lothian. This is collected from what Kennedy, a contemporary poet, ſays in one of his Satires; who mentions, likewiſe, his own wealth, and Dunbar's poverty. If we are to credit the ſame author, Dunbar was of the kin of the Earls of March; but of this there is no ſatisfactory evidence. In his youth, he ſeems to have been a travelling noviciate of the Franciſcan order; for, in an addreſs to St. Francis in one of his poems, he expreſſes himſelf as follows:

(a) Warton's Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, Vol. II. p. 257.

" Gif evir my fortoune was to be a freir,
" The dait thairof is paſt full mony a yeir.
" For into every luſty toun and place
" Of all Yngland, from Berwick to Calaice,
" I haif into thy habeit maid gud cheir,
" In Freiris weid full fairly haif I fleichit.
" In it haif I in pulpet gane and preichit,
" In Derntoun Kirk, and eik in Canterberry.
" In it I paſt at Dover our the ferry;
" Throw Picardy, and thair the people teichit (b)."

(b) Liſt of Scotiſh Poets, prefixed to Mr. Pinkerton's " Ancient Scotiſh Poems," never before in print, Vol. I. p. xcii, xciii.

This mode of life not being agreeable to Dunbar's inclinations, he reſigned it, and returned to Scotland, as is ſuppoſed, about 1490, when he was about twenty-five years of age. In his " Thiſtle and Roſe," which was certainly written in 1503, he ſpeaks of himſelf as a poet that had already made many ſongs: and that poem is the compoſition of an experienced writer, and not of a novice in the art. " It is indeed probable that " his tales, " The twa maritt wemen and the Wedo," and " The Freirs of Berwik," " (if the laſt be his), were written before his " Thiſtle and Roſe." However this may have been, Dunbar, after being the author of " The Golden Terge," a poem of the moſt opulent deſcription, and of many ſmall pieces of the higheſt merit, died in old age, about 1530 [A]. In his younger years, our poet ſeems to have had great expectations that his abilities would have recommended him to an eccleſiaſtical benefice; and in his ſmaller Poems he frequently addreſſes the King for that purpoſe; but there is no reaſon to believe that he did it with ſucceſs. Such is often the gratitude of Princes; for "The Thiſtle and Roſe," which was occaſioned by the marriage of James the Fourth, King of Scotland, with Margaret Tudor, eldeſt daughter of Henry the Seventh, King of England, deſerved better treatment at the hands of the young Royal pair. Mr. Pinkerton has looked in vain over many calendars of the characters, &c. of this period, to find Dunbar's name; but ſuſpects that it was never written by a Lawyer (c).

[A] Died in old age, about 1530.] Lord Hailes, in his " Ancient Scottiſh Poems," publiſhed from Lord Hyndford's Manuſcript, in 1770, thinks that Dunbar's " General Satire" was written after 1538, becauſe it mentions " Juges and Lords maid of lait." " His " Lordſhip forgot," ſays Mr. Pinkerton, " that in " 1503 (Acts 1503, cap. 58.), the King transferred " the juriſdiction of the old court of ſeſſion to a " council created by him; ſo that many new Lords " and Judges muſt have been then made." " The " Tidings fra the Seſſion" allude to the old Seſſion, " created 1425, aboliſhed 1503. Dunbar knew no " Queen, ſave Margaret of James IV. But the Mait- " land Manuſcript gives this piece to Sir James Inglis; " in which caſe Lord Hailes is right (1)."

(c) Pinkerton, ubi ſupra, p. xciii, xciv.

Mr. Warton, in characterizing the Scottiſh Poets of this time, obſerves that the writers of that Nation have adorned the period with a degree of ſentiment and ſpirit, a command of phraſeology, and a fertility of imagination, not to be found in any Engliſh Poet ſince Chaucer and Lydgate (d). "He might ſafely have added," ſays Mr. Pinkerton, "not even in Chaucer or Lydgate." Concerning Dunbar, Mr. Warton ſays, that the natural complexion of his genius is of the moral and didactic caſt (e). This remark, however, Mr. Pinkerton thinks, muſt not be taken too ſtrictly. "The "Goldin Terge," he adds, is moral; "and ſo are many of his ſmall pieces: but humour, deſcription, allegory, great poetical genius, and a vaſt wealth of words, all unite to form the complexion of Dunbar's poetry. "He unites in himſelf, and gene- "rally ſurpaſſes, the qualities of the chief old Engliſh Poets; the morals and ſatire of "Langland; Chaucer's humour, poetry, and knowledge of life; the allegory of "Gower; the Deſcription of Lydgate (f). This is a very high character. That our readers may the better be enabled to form ſome judgment upon the ſubject, we ſhall give below an abridged account of Mr. Warton's ſentiments concerning three of Dunbar's principal Poems [B]; the reſult of which will, we doubt not, be a clear conviction

(e) Ibid. p. 279.

[B] Concerning three of Dunbar's principal Poems.] The "Thiſtle and Roſe" is opened with ſome ſtanzas, which are remarkable for their deſcriptive and picturesque beauties. MAY then rebukes the poet, for not riſing early, according to his annual cuſtom, to celebrate the approach of Spring; eſpecially as the Lark had now announced the dawn of day, and his heart in former years had always

——— "glaid and bliſsful bene
"Sangis (2) to mak under the levis Grene."

(2) Songs.

The Poet replies, that the Spring of the preſent year was unpromiſing and ungenial; that it was unattended with the uſual ſong of birds, and ſerenity of ſky; and that ſtorms, and ſhowers, and the loud blaſts of the horn of Lord Eolus, had uſurped her mild dominion, and hitherto prevented him from wandering at leiſure under the vernal branches. This excuſe is rejected by MAY, who with a ſmile of Majeſty commands him to ariſe, and to perform his annual homage to the flowers, the birds, and the ſun. Upon this they both enter a delicious garden, filled with the richeſt colours and odours; when the Sun appears ſuddenly in all his glory, and is thus deſcribed in the luminous language of Lydgate:

"The pourpour Sone, with tendir bemys reid,
"In orient bricht as Angell did uppeir,
"Thorow goldin ſkyis putting up his head
"Qwhois gilt Treſſis ſchone ſo wondir cleir,
"That all the world take comfort far and neir."

Immediately the birds, ſinging together, hail the unuſual appearance of the Sun-ſhine; and then Nature is introduced, iſſuing her interdict, that the progreſs of the Spring ſhould no longer be interrupted, and that Neptune and Eolus ſhould ceaſe from diſturbing the Waters and Air. By this preparation and ſuſpence, Dunbar hath judiciouſly and ingeniouſly contributed to give dignity to the ſubject of the Poem, to awaken curioſity, and to introduce many poetical circumſtances. Immediately Nature commands every Bird, Beaſt, and Flower, to appear in her preſence; and, agreeably to the cuſtom of every May morning, to acknowledge her univerſal ſovereignty. She ſends the Roe to bring the beaſts, the Swallow to collect the birds, and the Yarrow (Achillea or Millefolium) to ſummon the flowers; and they are all aſſembled before her in an inſtant. The Lion advances firſt, whoſe figure is drawn with great force and expreſſion, and with an ingenious and happy alluſion to the Scottiſh Arms. Nature then lifts up the Lion's ſhining claws, and, ſuffering him to reſt on her knee, crowns him with a radiant diadem of precious ſtones, and creates him the King of Beaſts. At the ſame time ſhe enjoins him to exerciſe Juſtice with Mercy, and not to permit his ſubjects, of the ſmalleſt ſize or degree, to be oppreſſed by thoſe of ſuperior ſtrength or dignity. This part of her charge to the Lion, ſhe cloſes with the following beautiful ſtroke, which indicates the moral tenderneſs of the Poet's heart.

"And lat no Bowgle with his buſteous (3) hornis
"The meek pluch Ox (4) oppreſs for all hys pryd,
"Bot in the yok go peciable him beſyd.

(3) Boiſterous, Strong.

(4) Plough.

The Eagle is next crowned King of Fowls; and his talons being ſharped like darts of ſteel, he is ordered to govern great or ſmall, the Wren or the Peacock, with an uniform and equal impartiality. Nature now calls the Flowers; and obſerving the Thiſtle to be ſurrounded with a buſh of ſpears; and on that account qualified for war, ſhe gives him a Crown of Rubies, and ſays, "In Field go forth and "fend the Laif;" that is defend the reſt. Dunbar continues elegantly to picture other parts of the Royal Arms; in ordering the Thiſtle, who is now King of Vegetables, to prefer all Herbs, or Flowers, of rare virtue, and rich odour; nor ever to permit the Nettle to aſſociate with the Fleur-de-Lys, nor any ignoble weed to be ranked in competition with the Lily. In the following ſtanza, where Nature directs the Thiſtle to honour the Roſe above all other Flowers, our Poet with much addreſs inſinuates to King James the Fourth an exhortation to conjugal fidelity, drawn from the high birth, beauty, and amiable accompliſhments, of the Royal Bride. Nature next addreſſes the Roſe, whoſe lineage ſhe exalts above that of the Lily. This was intended to expreſs a preference of the Houſe of Tudor to the Houſe of Valois. The Roſe is then crowned by Nature with clarified gems, the luſtre of which illumines all the land, and is hailed Queen by the Flowers. Laſt of all, her praiſes are ſung by the univerſal chorus of birds, the ſound of which having awakened the Poet from his delightful dream, the fairy ſcene is vaniſhed, and he calls to the muſe to perpetuate in verſe the wonders of the ſplendid viſion.

Mr. Warton concludes his account of the "Thiſtle "and Roſe" with the following reflections. 'Although much fine invention and ſublime fabling are 'diſplayed in the allegorical viſions of our old Poets, 'yet this mode of compoſition, by dealing only in 'imaginary perſonages, and by excluding real characters and human actions, neceſſarily fails in that 'chief conviction that he is entitled to an eminent degree of applauſe. The pieces of Dunbar, which Mr. Pinkerton has printed, would, together with thoſe formerly publiſhed, make a conſiderable volume. A correct edition of the whole is a deſirable object. Mr. Pinkerton

'chief ſource of entertainment which we ſeek in 'antient Poetry, the repreſentation of antient manners. 'Another general obſervation, immediately reſulting 'from the ſubject of the Poem, may be here added, 'which illuſtrates the preſent and future ſtate of the 'Scotch Poetry. The marriage of a Princeſs of Eng-'land with a King of Scotland, from the new Com-'munication and intercourſe opened between the two 'Courts and Kingdoms by ſuch a connection, muſt 'have greatly contributed to poliſh the rude manners 'and to improve the language, literature, and arts, 'of Scotland (5).'

(5) Hiſtory of Engliſh Poetry, Vol. II. p. 258—264.

Mr. Warton next proceeds to the conſideration of Dunbar's "Golden Terge," the deſign of which is to ſhew the gradual and imperceptible influence of love, when too far indulged, over reaſon. The caſt of this Poem is tinctured with the morality and imagery of the "Romaunt of the Roſe," and the "Floure "and Leafe," of Chaucer.

At the dawn of a bright day the Poet walks forth; and deſcribes the effects of the riſing Sun on a vernal landſcape, with its accompaniments, in the manner of Lydgate, but with more ſtrength, diſtinctneſs, and exuberance of ornament. Lulled by the muſic of the birds, and the murmuring of the water, our author falls aſleep on the flowers, and, in a viſion, ſees a ſhip approach, the ſails of which are like the "Bloſ-"ſom upon the Spray," and the maſts of gold, bright as the "Star of Day." She glides ſwiftly through a chriſtal bay, and lands a hundred ladies, clad in rich but looſe attire, in the blooming meadows, among the green ruſhes and reeds. They are cloathed in green robes; their golden treſſes, tied only with glittering threads, flow to the ground; and their ſnowy boſoms are unveiled. In this brillant aſſembly the Poet ſees Nature, Venus, Aurora, May, Flora, Juno, Latona, Proſerpine, Diana, Clio, Minerva, Fortune, and Lucina. Theſe mighty Queens, crowned with diadems, and glittering like the Morning-Star, enter a garden. May, the Queen of mirthful Months, is ſupported between her ſiſters April and June; and, as ſhe walks up and down the garden, the birds begin to ſing, and Nature gives her a gorgeous robe adorned with every colour under Heaven. Then the vege-table tribes do their obeiſance to Nature, in theſe ele-gant verſes:

"And every blome on branche, and eik on bank,
"Opnit, and ſpred thair balmy levis dank
"Full law is inclyneand to their Queen full cleir,
"Whom for their noble nuriſſing they thank."

Immediately another Court, or groupe, appears; over which Cupid the King preſides, and whoſe attendants are Mars, Saturn, Mercury, Janus, Priapus, Eolus, Bacchus the "Gladder of the Table," and Pluto. All theſe are arrayed in green; and, ſinging amorous ditties to the Harp and Lute, invite the ladies to dance. Upon this the Poet quits his ambuſh under the trees, and, preſſing forward to gain a more perfect view of the tempting ſpectacle, is eſpied by Venus, who bids her keen archers arreſt the intruder. In-ſtantly, her attendants, a groupe of fair ladies, drop their green mantles, and, each of them diſcovering a huge bow, they form themſelves in battle-array, and advance againſt the Poet.

"And firſt of all, with bow in hand ay bent,
"Came dame Beauty, richt as ſcho wald me ſchent,
"Syne followit all her demoſals in feir,
"With many divers awfull inſtrument (6):
"Into the praiſs Fair Having (7) with her went;
"Syne (8) Portrator, Pleſance, and luſty Cheir,
"Than came Reſſoun, with ſchield of gold ſo cleir,
"In plait of mail as Mars armipotent,
"Defendit me that noble Chevellier (9)."

(6) Formidable weapons.
(7) Behaviour.
(8) Next.
(9) Warrior.

Beauty is aſſiſted by tender Youth, green Innocence, Modeſty, and Obedience; but their reſiſtance was feeble againſt the golden target of Reaſon. Womanhood then leads on Patience, Diſcretion, Stedfaſtneſs, Benign Look, Mylde Cheir, and Honeſt Buſineſs; but Reaſon bore the Target with ſuch conſtancy, that their ſharp eſſay did the Poet no injury. The attack is renewed by Dignity, Renown, Riches, Nobility, and Honour; who, after diſplaying their high banner, and ſhoot-ing a cloud of arrows, are ſoon obliged to retreat. Venus, perceiving the rout, orders Diſſemblance, or Diſſimulation, to make an attempt to pierce the golden ſhield. Diſſemblance chuſes for her archers Preſence, Fair Calling, and Cheriſhing, who bring back Beauty to the charge; upon which a new and obſtinate con-flict enſues:

"Thik was the ſcholt of grindin arrowis kene,
"But Reſſoun, with the ſchield of gold ſo ſchene,
"Weirly (10) befendit quhoſoeir aſſayit:
"The awfull ſchour he manly did ſuſtene."

(10) Warily.

'At length, Preſence, by whom the Poet under-'ſtands that irreſiſtible incentive accruing to the 'paſſion of love by ſociety, by being often admitted 'to the company of the beloved object, throws a 'magical powder into the eyes of reaſon; who is 'ſuddenly deprived of all his powers, and reels like 'a drunken man. Immediately the Poet receives a 'deadly wound, and is taken priſoner by Beauty; 'who now aſſumes a more engaging air, as the clear 'eye of Reaſon is growing dim by intoxication. 'Diſſimulation then tries all her arts on the Poet: 'Fair Calling ſmiles upon him: Cheriſhing ſooths 'him with ſoft ſpeeches: New Acquaintance embraces 'him awhile, but ſoon takes her leave, and is never 'ſeen afterwards. At laſt Danger delivers him to the 'cuſtody of Grief.' By this time, Eolus blows his bugle, and the leaves are torn with the blaſt, the pageant diſappears in a moment; and nothing remains but the foreſt, the birds, the banks and the brook. In the twinkling of an eye the company return to the ſhip; and, unfurling the ſails, and, ſtemming the Sea with a rapid courſe, celebrate their triumph with a diſcharge of ordnance, which furniſhes a new topic for poetical deſcription. At the cloſe of the Poem, Dunbar breaks out into a laboured encomium on Chaucer, Gower and Lydgate; which ſhews the peculiar diſtinction anciently paid to thoſe fathers of verſe; and the high ideas which then prevailed, even in Scotland, of the improvements introduced by their writings into the Britiſh poetry, language, and literature (11).

(11) Hiſtory of Poetry, ubi ſupra, p. 264—272.

The laſt Poem of Dunbar's, that is particularly conſidered by Mr. Warton, is his "Daunce." This poem has very great comic ſtyle of painting; exhibit-ing a groupe of figures touched with the capricious, but ſpirited pencil of Callot. On the eve of Lent, being a general day of confeſſion, the poet ſees, in a dream, a diſplay of heaven and hell. Mahomet, or the Devil, commands a dance to be performed by a ſelect party of friends, and particularly by thoſe who had never, in the other world, made confeſſion to the prieſt, and conſequently had never received abſolu-tion. Immediately the SEVEN DEADLY SINS appear; and preſent a maſk, or mummery, with the neweſt gambols juſt imported from France. PRIDE, who properly takes place of all the reſt, as by that Sin fell the Angels, is deſcribed in the faſhionable and gallant dreſs of thoſe times. "Several holy Harlots follow, "attended by Monks, who make great diverſion for "the devils. ANGER is drawn with great force, and "his accompaniments are boldly feigned. His hand "is always upon his knife, and he is followed, in "pairs, by boaſters, threateners, and quarrelſome "perſons, all armed for battle, and perpetually "wounding one another." For many illuſtrations of one of Dunbar's larger pieces, entituled, "The Daunce," Mr. Warton acknowledges that he was obliged to the learned and elegant editor of "Ancient Scottiſh Poems," publiſhed in 1770. From the "DAUNCE" it appears, that Dunbar's imagination was not leſs ſuited to ſatirical than to ſublime allegory; and that he was the firſt poet who diſplayed any degree of ſpirit in this way of writing after Pierce Plowman. His "THISTLE AND ROSE," and "GOLDEN TERGE," are generally and juſtly eſteemed to be his capital works. The ſmall pieces publiſhed by Mr. Pinkerton have undoubtedly conſiderable merit; but we acknowledge that they did not ſtrike us ſo powerfully as we expected. Perhaps this might be owing to our not being ſufficiently habituated to the obſolete language of the time. It is obſervable, that the meaſure of the "Daunce" is partly that of "Sir Thopas" in Chaucer; from which it may be collected, that "Sir Thopas" was anciently viewed in the light of a ludicrous compoſition. The pageants and interludes of Dunbar's age muſt certainly have quickened his invention in forming his groteſque groupes; for, the exhibition of moralities was then in high vogue among the Scotch. A morality was played at the marriage of James the Fourth and the Princeſs Margaret; and mummeries, which the North Britons call GYSARTS, and which are compoſed of moral perſonifications, are ſtill known in Scotland. Even till the beginning of the preſent century, eſpecially among the feſtivities of Chriſtmas, itinerant maſkers were admitted into the houſes of the Scotch Nobility (b). It may be added, that Dunbar wrote occaſionally in the way which has been called Macaronic Poetry. Of this ſpecies of compoſition is his "Teſtament of "Maiſter Andro Kennedy," which repreſents the character of an idle diſſolute ſcholar, and ridicules the funeral ceremonies of the Roman Communion.

Almoſt every alternate line is compoſed of the formularies of a Latin will, and ſhreds of the Breviary, mixed with what the French call Latin de Cuiſine. There is humour in the performance, ariſing from theſe burleſque applications. The poets of that time did not ſtartle at the idea of profaneneſs. Dunbar's "Golden Terge," though moral in its general deſign, is a moſt profane parody on the Popiſh Litanies (i).

Since the writing of this article, Thomas Park, Eſq. has favoured us with the opportunity of peruſing the edition of Ancient Scottiſh Poems, publiſhed by Sir David Dalrymple in 1770; and to which Mr. Warton has acknowledged his obligations. The poems of Dunbar in this collection are thirty in number, including the three principal ones, of which an account is given in note B. They ſerve, in general, to juſtify the high character to which Dunbar is entitled as a poet. The notes added to the collection by Sir David Dalrymple are peculiarly valuable; for, they not only explain and illuſtrate the particular expreſſions and phraſes of the pieces in queſtion, but contain ſeveral curious anecdotes, and throw conſiderable light on the manners of the times (k)]. AVARICE is uſhered in by a troop of extortioners, and other miſcreants, who are patroniſed by the magician Warlock, or the demon of the covetous; and who vomit on each other torrents of melted gold. As they are emptied at every diſcharge, the devils repleniſh their throats with freſh ſupplies of the ſame liquified metal. It is not till he has been called twice, that SLOTH joins in the dance: and his companions are ſo ſlow of motion, that they cannot keep up with the reſt, unleſs they are rouſed from their lethargy by being ſometimes warmed with a glimpſe of Hell-fire. LUST, at entering, neighs like a horſe, and is led by IDLENESS. "When his aſſociates mingle in the "dance, their viſages burn red like the turkis-ſtone." In the deſcription of LUST, the poet is very obſcene: but this gave no offence; for, the manners of the age were too indelicate to be ſhocked at any indecency. "I do not mean," ſays Mr. Warton, "that theſe "manners had loſt their delicacy, but that they had "not yet acquired the ſenſibility ariſing from civiliſa-"tion." GLUTTONY brings up the rear; attended with an inſatiable rout, who are inceſſantly calling out for meat and drink; and, although they are drenched by the devils with draughts of melted lead, they ſtill aſk for more. No minſtrels played at this infernal dance. It was a received opinion, that no minſtrel ever went to hell; excepting one who had committed murder, and was admitted to an inheritance in hell by brief of Richt, that is per breve de recto; a circumſtance which ſeems to allude to ſome real fact. The concluding ſtanza is a ſatire on the Highlanders. A mutual antipathy long prevailed between the Scottiſh, Saxons, and the Highlanders; and Dunbar, being a native of Eaſt Lothian, a Saxon county, was under the powerful influence of this antipathy (12).

 [DUNCAN (DANIEL), an eminent phyſician, born at Montauban, in Languedoc, in 1649, was the ſon of Dr. Peter Duncan, profeſſor of phyſic in that city, and grandſon to William Duncan, an Engliſh gentleman, of Scottiſh original, who removed from London to the South of France about the beginning of the laſt century [A]. Having

[A] Who removed from London to the South of France, about the beginning of the laſt century.] The hiſtory of this family, as collected from the Memorabilia of Dr. Peter Duncan, is too curious and intereſting to be omitted. John Andrew Duncan was the ſon of Mark Alexander Duncan, Laird of Airdree, in Fyſeſhire and Maynar (or Mainwarre), in Stirlingſhire, at which laſt place he was born in 1493. In his early youth, when the raſh incruſion was made into England by James the fourth, in 1513, he fled from the ing loſt both his parents, while yet in his cradle, he was indebted, for the care of his infancy and education, to the guardianſhip of his mother's brother, Mr. Daniel Paul, a leading the Univerſity of St. Andrew, with ſeveral of his fellow-ſtudents; and, joining the royal ſtandard, at the head of a few of his father's tenants, was taken priſoner at the battle of Flodden. Being a young man of a gallant appearance, he was treated with indulgence by the Earl of Surrey; and, when carried into Yorkſhire, was ſuffered to reſide at large in the town of Beverley, where he was hoſpitably entertained by Mr. Alexander Burnet, a near relation to his mother. Mr. Burnet, who was a zealous Wickliffite, found his young kinſman eagerly diſpoſed to imbibe his principles. An uncommon ſpirit of enquiry, with a paſſion for expoſing to contempt every abuſe of reaſon and religion, had already diſtinguiſhed his character at St. Andrew's. His converſation with Mr. Burnet raiſed, to a degree of enthuſiaſm, the averſion he had before conceived againſt the abſurdities and antichriſtian tenets of Popery.

When the ſhort conteſt with England was entirely pacified, he returned to Scotland, and abode ſome time at Edinburgh, applying himſelf, with redoubled ardour, to his former ſtudies. From Edinburgh he removed, upon the death of his father, to Airdree *, of which he had not been long in poſſeſſion, when he was hurried thence by the factious broils of noblemen contending for miſrule, during the turbulent minority of James the Fifth. Family-connections, in that country ever were, as they are, in a leſs degree, to this day, of more extenſively-attractive force than in any other in Europe. It was ſome engagement of that ſort that impelled him to join the party that oppoſed the regency of the Duke of Albany. Upon the ſeizure of the Earl of Hume (in 1516), who had drawn him into the Feude, when the utmoſt ſeverity was threatened againſt his followers, Mr. Duncan eſcaped by ſea to Berwick; and thence he was invited ſoon, by more than one motive, to Beverley. His excellent friend, Burnet, rebuked him ſharply for his folly, in abetting the factions of ambitious men, in which the religion, liberty, or valuable rights of his country had no great concern. He exacted his ſolemn promiſe to reſerve his activity for a better cauſe, and to contend for that, only with the weapons of ſober argument, reaſon, and ſcripture. Upon theſe conditions, which appear to have been providentially enforced by his father-in-law, Mr. Duncan obtained his daughter in marriage.

He returned, the year after, into Scotland, upon the final departure of the Duke Regent into France, and paſſed about ten years in the enjoyment of domeſtic tranquillity and learned purſuits at Airdree, and the neighbouring univerſity of St. Andrew, with the profeſſors and principal ſtudents of which he always kept up a friendly intercourſe. The opinions and ſpirit of the reformers, which had begun before the end of the laſt century to be ſecretly infuſed there by the ſons of Engliſh Wickliffites, and German Huſſites, ſent thither for education, were now more openly avowed. Mr. Duncan's houſe, at Airdree, became occaſionally the reſort of all the chief maintainers of the new doctrines. This led him into a particular intimacy with Mr. Patrick Hamilton, the celebrated Abbot of Ferne, the Proto-martyr of the reformation in Scotland. That excellent young man, whoſe high birth, gentle manners, and exalted character for learning and piety, added great credit to the cauſe he ſupported, was inſidiouſly drawn into diſputes at St. Andrew's by the artifices of Beaton, afterwards Cardinal, but then Coadjutor to his uncle the Archbiſhop; and, in 1527, fell a ſacrifice to the malice and bigotry of his perſecutors. The Laird of Airdree, who ſuſpected the event, and had been threatened himſelf, armed and mounted about a ſcore of his tenants and ſervants, intending thus to have entered St. Andrew's by night; whether to attempt the reſcue of his friend, and to carry him off to ſome place of greater ſafety, which is moſt probable, and what he afterwards openly avowed himſelf; or to protect his own perſon from ſeizure, in the execution of ſome other project, of which various inconſiſtent reports and conjectures were raiſed many years after, it is impoſſible clearly to evince. Certain it is that no accuſation, or ſuſpicion of any other deſign, was brought againſt him at the time. His ſecret intention, however, or at leaſt his preparation for ſome act of violence, was evidently betrayed: for, his ſmall party was ſurrounded, and himſelf apprehended, before he reached the town, by a large troop of horſemen, commanded by Patrick Duncanſon, a gentleman of Angus, who had married his ſiſter. This ſeeming attack upon his life or liberty was, from the event, believed to have been concerted, as the readieſt means of preſerving them, by perſons, who reſpecting his virtues, but foreſeeing the danger into which an over-heated zeal was likely to hurry him, engaged his brother-in-law (1) to undertake a commiſſion, which, in other hands, might poſſibly have ended fatally for Duncan. An order for his apprehenſion, ſigned by the Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, was produced, and his immediate flight into England peremptorily urged by his captor, who engaged to aſſiſt him in effecting it, but upon a hard condition, an entire ſurrender of his lands in Fife to his ſiſter's children. To this ſurrender Duncan was brought to ſubmit, upon conſideration of a ſtipulated portion of the value of them. The tranſfer already drawn up for ſignatures was accordingly effected upon the ſpot; and the ſtipulated payment to the diſpoſſeſſed Laird of Airdree was, ſome months after, punctually made by Duncan, through the hands of his wife, who eſcorted thence his ſiſter-in-law, with an infant daughter, to her brother at Beverley. In that town John Andrew Duncan paſſed the laſt twelve years of his life, much beloved and reſpected by all well-wiſhers to the Reformation, eſpecially by the family and friends of his kind father-in-law, who generouſly applauded the unſucceſsful attempt which led him to a neceſſity of ſtripping his poſterity of their lands in Scotland. Happily for his children, Mr. Burnet ſurvived him many years.

His only ſon, Alexander Duncan, was ſent by his grandfather Burnet, to ſtudy phyſic at Aberdeen (2) under a celebrated profeſſor of the ſame name. Some ineffectual attempts were made to redeem the family eſtate by the intervention of his friends, who conſidered the ſale and ſurrender, his father had made merely as a mortgage. Their intereſt with the regency at that time was powerful, and might have ſucceeded in compelling the preſent poſſeſſor, the ſon of Patrick Duncanſon, to liſten to reaſonable terms. But, unluckily, juſt then the recent tragical death of Cardinal Beaton, the old foe to his family, effected by the Leſlies, who had before been much connected with it, revived the mention of his father's attempt twenty years before. The various dark conjectures, utterly groundleſs and abſurd, then newly trumped up and artfully brought into diſcuſſion, were, in ſome degree, injurious to his cauſe. But, beſides theſe, young Alexander's known attachment to the religious principles of his family concurred in rendering it impoſſible to ſerve him.

An end was at length put to theſe vain attempts by the perſuaſion of his mother upon the death of his grandfather, by which he ſucceeded to an inheritance in houſes and land in and near Beverley. Of theſe he ſoon after diſpoſed, and accompanied his mother to London, whither ſhe had been invited upon the death of her father, by her uncle, Mr. William Burnet, an eminent merchant there. He ſucceeded here in his profeſſion according to his wiſh, as well by his own reputation for learning and judgement as the recommendation of Mr. Burnet's numerous friends. He married the only daughter of that gentleman; at whoſe death his circumſtances were affluent. Yet his manner of living being very expenſive, he continued his practice as a phyſician ſtill, with perſevering induſtry and ſucceſs. He ſpared no expence, and beſtowed himſelf great pains in the education of his two ſons, William and Mark. Having loſt his wife, whom he loved moſt tenderly, he ſought to divert his melancholy by travelling. He ſpent ſix or ſeven years in viſiting the principal cities of the Netherlands, France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, taking his ſons with him, and

Through the whole courſe of it, he conſtantly took his ſons with him as attendant pupils (3), an excellent method of inſtruction for the profeſſion, at that time much in uſe, in ſome of the countries he he had lately viſited, and ſtill generally followed and enforced, by law, in Spain to this day.

The active ſpirit of his eldeſt ſon, William, excited by the reputation of Mark Alexander Boyd, a near relation of his family, of great ingenuity and moſt engaging addreſs, whom he had met with in Poictou, with the army of the Prince of Condé, where he then bore the rank of a major of horſe, inclined him to a military life. After oppoſing much this inclination of his ſon, by authority, perſuaſion, and intreaty, the indulgent father at length conſented to his acceptance of a cornetcy of horſe, which Mr. Boyd procured him under the young King of Navarre, afterwards Henry the Fourth. After three years honourable ſervice, at the head of a troop of horſe, which he commanded at the battle of Coutras, he received a bad wound in his left or bridle arm, which occaſioned his quitting, with great regret, the profeſſion of a ſoldier. He retired to Thouloufe, where he met his gallant friend Boyd, who had ſtruck out of that line of ambition, with diſguſt, ſome time before. The ſciences were then, notwithſtanding the rage of civil war, cultivated with peculiar ſucceſs at Thouloufe, as it happened to be juſt at that time the reſort of ſome of the moſt learned men in France, who valued liberty of conſcience, a natural right not then invaded there, though generally diſallowed by all parties, and indeed but little underſtood in the world. The two friends, having both a paſſion and conſiderable talents for literature, proſecuted their ſtudies here with mutual advantage, though in different branches: Boyd in the belles lettres, civil law, and politics; Duncan in natural philoſophy, chemiſtry, and phyſic. The father of the latter recalled him home to London ſome time before the battle of Coutras, informing him that he had other views of advancement for him in England. This order the ſon had entreated him to diſpenſe with his obeying, before the end of the campaign, which promiſed to be a briſk one, and engaged him, in honour, not to be abſent from it. But, early in 1588, a ſecond ſummons, during his father's laſt illneſs, haſtened his return. He arrived but juſt in time to embrace and receive the good man's bleſſing. Dr. Alexander Duncan had, ſome months before his death, ſuffered a ſatirical poem of his to get into print, entituled, "Bina, or the Imperial Sorcereſs," deſcribing, in about a hundred ſtanzas, in Arioſto's manner, a monſter of duplicity, ingratitude, cruelty, and hypocriſy. It had its admirers, and cenſurers: theſe, not penetrating its occult meaning, ſlighted it as a motly and confuſed allegorical piece; while a few only underſtood it to be a ſevere but juſt invective againſt Queen Elizabeth, upon account of the mock trial of Secretary Daviſon, who had been Dr. Duncan's intimate friend. The unmerited diſgrace and ruin of this confidential ſervant of the Queen, which had pitifully been made a cover to her diſſimulation in the affair of the execution of Mary Queen of Stots, greatly damped Mr. William Duncan's deſire of advancing himſelf in his own country; particularly weaning him from all fond eſteem or wiſhes for court-favour, which, though the road to grandeur, and thoſe titles, which ſilly mortals, ignorant how they are obtained, miſcall honours, is not to be acquired and preſerved without a thouſand baſeneſſes to which the generous mind ſorely grieves to ſtoop. Poſſeſſed of a competent fortune, he chearfully turned his back upon all ambitious views. He returned to the ſouth of France, taking with him his younger brother Mark. They repaired immediately to Thouloufe. He found the face of things altered ſadly in that city. The faction of the Ligue was then repoſſeſſed of it, which rendered its reſidence inſecure to zealous Proteſtants. They went and dwelt at Saumur. The great Du Pleſſis Mornay, then Governor of that city, who had before ſhewn great friendſhip to William Duncan, applauding his bravery to the King, and procuring his military advancement, received him now with the moſt cordial civility, as a proof of which, he eſtabliſhed his brother Mark in a Profeſſorſhip of Philoſophy in that Univerſity.

Mark Duncan filled his part of Profeſſor with reputation, and publiſhed ſeveral learned works, among the reſt, a Latin ſyſtem of Logic, much commended by Burgerſdicius, in the preface to his "Inſtitutiones Logicæ," which he frankly confeſſes to have formed entirely upon that model. By the intereſt of the Governor, his generous protector, to whom his logic is dedicated, he became afterwards Regent [Principal] of that Univerſity *.

Mark Duncan, ſtyled de Ceriſantes, ſon of the foregoing, furniſhes an article of conſiderable length in Bayley's Dictionary, with the anecdotes of a life, ſtrangely checquered, through a ſpirit, impatient of reſt, like that of his Scottiſh anceſtor and his uncle William, with a variety of literary, civil, and military, purſuits. Moreri, who has inſerted in his dictionary, from the fictitious memoirs ſaid to be written by the Duke of Guiſe, the calumnies againſt Ceriſantes, which are refuted in a ſatisfactory manner by Bayle, thus begins that article: "Havoit l'eſprit fort beau, "& le corps bien fait." And he cloſes it thus: "A l'egard de ſa Poëſie Latine, elle eſt fort eſtimée "des ſçavans: ſon caractere eſt noble, & elevé; & "quelques unes de ſes odes ont eté jugées eagles aux "plus belles d'Horace." Several detached pieces of his poetry are to be ſeen in printed miſcellaneous collections. Among theſe is a remarkable one, inſcribed, "Carmen gratulatorium in nuptias Caroli R. Aug. "cum Henriettâ Mariâ filiâ Henrici IV. R. Fr." The viſionary bleſſings that were to ariſe from this union to all the world, particularly to his native country, and that of his progenitor, (by their becoming the joint arbiters of that perpetual peace in Europe, which it was the project of Henry to eſtabliſh, and which he has beautifully painted in the moſt lively colouring), only ſhew that a good poet may be a bad prophet. Two of his odes, which have never been publiſhed, and are extant only in manuſcript, in letters to his brother at London, though far inferior to the former, are too elegant not to deſerve preſervation. The one, inſcribed to an anceſtor of the Marquis d'Argenſon, was written upon his quitting the Univerſity of Paris and engaging in a military life.

* The following ſlight inaccuracy is found in the account given of Mr. Mark Duncan in Bayle's Dictionary, where his excellent character is much commended. He is there ſaid to be 'ECOSSOIS DE NATION, gentilhomme de naiſſance, &c.' The original manuſcript whence Bayle copied this paragraph is ſtill extant, in my poſſeſſion, with the firſt words thus corrected, 'Ecoſſois d'origine, Anglois de nation,' &c. But by the memoirs of his family, written very circumſtantially, and with the greateſt exactneſs, from authentic vouchers of his father and grandfather by his nephew, Dr. Peter Duncan, of which this account is a faithful abridgment, it plainly appears that William and his brother Mark were both born in London, their father, Alexander, in Beverley.

Mr. Duncan received the firſt elements of grammar, polite literature, and philoſophy, at Puy Lauren, whither the magiſtracy of Montauban had transferred their univerſity for

For the particulars of the life of this Mark Duncan, of Ceriſantes, ſee the Great General Dictionary, Vol. IV. p. 247—251. The friendſhip of this excentric but really gallant perſon proved unfortunate, as will appear, to Peter Duncan, his firſt conſin, the writer of the memorable manuſcripts, marked No. 1, and No. 2, whence they are extracted.

(4) Nobili, S's Lat. M. but noble in Engliſh, implies a title not inferior to Baron.

To return to Mr. William Duncan.—Upon his brother's marriage into a genteel (4) and wealthy family in Anjou, he chearfully engaged to remit to him from England the value of half of the inheritance left between them by their father, of which Mark was by will intitled only to one third. To execute this generous purpoſe, he went back to London, after an abſence of nine years. The reception he met with from the friends of his family, and their joint-perſuaſions, at his return, made him form a reſolution never to remove himſelf from England more, to which he was the rather determined by his marriage ſoon after with a very amiable woman, the daughter of the Rev. Dr. Herbert, of London, who brought a conſiderable acceſſion to his fortune. Upon this occaſion, he enlarged and fitted up his father's houſe in Weſtminſter with great elegance. Here he enjoyed ſome years an honourable independence, happily allowing his wife's regulations of a decent œconomy to temper his own inclination to exceſſive hoſpitality. All this time he was continually preſſing his brother Mark, whom he dearly loved, by every motion of intereſt and affection to return to his friends in England. But the averſion of his ſiſter-in-law to quit her country and kindred prevailed againſt all his arguments. At length, upon the acceſſion of King James I. having acquired, through the intereſt of his wife's friends and his own, a favourable reception at Court, he never ſought to make the leaſt uſe of it for himſelf; but, it enabled him to make one effort more to bring over his brother to his wiſh. He obtained for Mark a patent from the King, appointing him Phyſician to the Royal Houſehold. The proper inſtrument for this purpoſe was drawn up, and diſpatched to his brother at Saumur, to confirm his aſſurance of the appointment before he ſhould paſs the ſea. This laſt attempt to reſtore that branch of his family to England proved as unſucceſsful as all the reſt, for the reaſons aſſigned in Bayle. But ſo precarious are all our purpoſes in this life, that his own plan of a permanent ſettlement here was, a few years after this, diſconcerted by a domeſtic concern. His wife being of a tender conſtitution, with alarming ſymptoms of a conſumptive habit, was perſuaded, by her friends and phyſicians, to ſeek the benefit of a milder climate, an expedient which in that caſe has been ſeldom found to ſucceed. He removed with her to the South of France. In his route thither, he paſſed through Saumur to viſit his brother. The cordiality of this meeting was unhappily damped by the behaviour of the relations of Mark's wife, who proudly affected to ſlight the advantages he had propoſed as inducements to tranſport their kinſwoman and her children to a foreign country (5). He quitted Saumur with ſome diſguſt, and never viſited that place nor ſaw his brother more, though he ſtill occaſionally kept up an epiſtolary correſpondence, and afterwards conſigned to his care the inſtruction of his only ſon in the ſtudy of phyſic *.

(5) Ad feroces gentes et immite cœlum. L.M.

From Anjou Mr. William Duncan removed to Languedoc, through the ſeveral cities of which he wandered for a while, and ſettled at length at Montauban, the air of which appeared at firſt to produce the moſt ſalutary effects upon the conſtitution of his wife; and the ſociety of its inhabitants was peculiarly agreeable to himſelf. He purchaſed a landed eſtate adjoining to that city, with a large well-built houſe upon it, in a pleaſant ſituation, upon the ſide of the Tarne. His wife enjoyed not long this purchaſe, made ſolely upon her account. She died within two years after their arrival at Montauban, leaving him an only ſon. Inconſolable for the loſs, he lived, ſome time after her death, entirely ſhut up in his new habitation, in utter ſeclufion from all ſociety; till at length he began by degrees to enliven his ſolitude, by erecting at convenient diſtances, to the right and left of it, ſeveral ſmall but remarkably neat tenements, all fronting the river. It was thus he formed to himſelf, in the courſe of about four years, a moſt pleaſing and amicable vicinage. The uſe, rent-free, of theſe little villas, when completed to his fancy, he beſtowed, one by one, upon ſome choſen friends, among his countrymen, for whoſe reception he had built them. They were the ſons of Proteſtant gentlemen, who had fled thither, after being engaged in the unſucceſsful attempt of the Duke of Northumberland to place Lady Jane Grey upon the throne, at the death of Edward VI. A numerous breed of Peacocks had been encouraged to multiply, to a ſurprizing degree, in a grove adjoining to his dairy, upon the ſide of the river; and as they were often ſeen about his gardens, when he made the purchaſe, occaſioned him to give his habitation the name of Peacock-houſe, which name the people of Montauban, transferring to his new-built hamlet, give at this day to a well frequented pleaſant village, ſtanding upon the ſame ſpot; and as by corruption they write it Picquacoz, it may be ſeen ſo ſpelt in ſome maps of Guienne and Languedoc; for, it is ſituated preciſely upon the line that bounds theſe two provinces. The hoſpitable manner, in which he enjoyed, for for a time, to put an end to ſome diſputes of the ſtudents with the citizens. The maſters newly eſtabliſhed there, for the early inſtruction of youth, finding their credit much raiſed by his uncommon proficiency, redoubled their attention to him; ſo that he went from that academy with a diſtinguiſhed character to Montpellier, when removed thither by his guardian, with a view to qualify him for a profeſſion which had been for three generations hereditary in his family.

His ingenuity and application recommended him to the eſteem and friendſhip of his principal inſtructor there, the celebrated Dr. Charles Barbeyrac (uncle to John Barbeyrac, the famous Civilian), whoſe phyſical lectures and practice were in high reputation. Having taken his favourite pupil into his own houſe, the Profeſſor impreſſed and turned to uſe his public and private inſtruction by an efficacious method, admitting him, at every viſit he paid to his patients, to conſult and reaſon with him, upon ocular inſpection, concerning the effect of his preſcriptions. When he had ſtudied eight years under the friendly care of ſo excellent a maſter, and had juſt attained the age of twenty-four, he was admitted to the degree of M. D. in that univerſity.

From Montpellier he went to Paris, where he reſided nearly ſeven years. Here he publiſhed his firſt work, upon the principle of motion in the conſtituent parts of animal bodies, entituled, "Explication nouvelle & mechanique des Actions animales." Paris, 1678.

It was in the year following that he went for the firſt time to London, to diſpoſe of ſome houſes there, the property of which was deſcended to him from his anceſtors. He had, beſides, ſome other motives for the journey; and, among the reſt, to get information relative to the effects of the plague in London in 1665. Poſſeſſed of authentic proofs, in memorials written by his father, that his family had borne a reſpectable rank in Scotland and England, he was deſirous of collecting more recent vouchers of the ſame upon the ſpot. For, in the year 1677, having been, by the favour of the great Colbert, appointed Phyſician General to the army before St. Omer's, commanded by the Duke of Orleans, he had received Letters of Nobleſſe, a right conceded to him in France, which he could evidence to have been, for ſome centuries, the claim of his family in Britain.

Added by Daniel ſon of Peter at the end of his father's Memoranda.

many years, this agreeable neighbourhood, and his liberality to the neceſſitous, the natives as well as his own countrymen, have been long recorded, to his credit. That they were indeed exceſſive, his ſucceſſor found to his loſs; for, they ſo reduced his circumſtances, that, before his diſeaſe, he had diſſipated the greateſt part of his property, and mortgaged almoſt all his eſtate to its full value, reſerving only one ſmall tenement for his habitation, which he had built for his Vigneron, or Bailiff, with about thirty acres of vineyard about it. This his laſt reſidence, a little enlarged, and with ſome degree of that elegance, which he ſtill preſerved, remained in the poſſeſſion of his ſon and grandſon, till the latter left the country, about the end of the laſt century. A few years before his death, which happened in 1644, he was perſuaded, for the ſake of his ſon, to accept of a Profeſſorſhip in the Academy, and to read lectures in Phyſic and Natural Philoſophy.

His only ſon, Peter, from whoſe memorials, drawn up, much more circumſtantially, in pure and intelligible though ſometimes bald and unclaſſical Latin, the ſubſtance of the foregoing account is taken, gave early ſigns of an aſtoniſhing vivacity and pregnancy of genius. The greateſt hopes were formed of his progreſs in learning, which a weak frame of body, rendering him incapable of intenſe application, in his younger years, in ſome degree diſappointed. He was educated at home by his father, till having, about the age of twenty, acquired a more confirmed ſtate of health, he was ſent to Saumur, as well to receive medical inſtruction from his uncle Mark as to form a friendly connection with his three ſons, who were eſteemed very accompliſhed young men. This laſt purpoſe did not ſucceed according to his father's wiſh. The intimacy he contracted with his couſin Ceriſantes, proved the accidental occaſion of much ſorrow to his tender parent. It raiſed in him a paſſionate deſire to engage in a military life, which was conſtantly oppoſed by his father. Having unfortunately accompanied his friend in a trip to Paris, he was hurried into a diſſipated way of life, which his delicate conſtitution could not bear without a dangerous ſhock. His perſon, though ſmall, is ſaid to have been remarkably pleaſing and well-made; his complexion amorous; and his converſation, naturally ſprightly, rendered him a general favourite in all companies, in that of the ladies eſpecially. He returned, in a bodily ſtate exceedingly impaired, to his afflicted parent; who nevertheleſs had the ſatisfaction, before he died, to ſee him married into a reſpectable family at Thoulouſe, and appointed his ſucceſſor in the Profeſſorſhip of Phyſic at Montauban. The Latin Elegy, manifeſtly written with great difficulty, the evening before his death, which had long been daily expected from a ſlow conſumption, though not to be commended as excellent Poetry, is highly valuable as a ſtriking proof of his mind's being moſt happily ſtrengthened, in that extremity of weakneſs, by a truly chriſtian piety. It bears a remarkable inſcription:

Extrema hæc, prope funeratus, effudit P. D.

Auxilio fretus divino, quolibet horæ
  Momento vivam, ceu moriturus ibi.
Securuſque necis, potiorem ducere vitam
  Spero. Haud me fallat ſpes mea fulta Deo!
Juſtitiæ fulmen, conſperſus ſanguine Chriſti,
  Non metuam, felix ſemper amore Dei.
O Deus, O vitæ mihi fons, animæque Redemptor,
  Tecum vivere amem, tecum et obire libens.
Cras ſi morte cadam, Chriſti virtute reſurgam.
  Fido; revicturus non moriturus ero.
O Deus omnipotens, mihi lux cariſſima vitæ,
  O decus, O magnum præſidiumque meum,
O qui ſpem tantam ſeviſti in pectore noſtro,
  Maturam præſta, ter bone, terque potens.

He ſurvived his father about four or five years, and, dying near the age of thirty five, left behind him an infant ſon, Daniel, whoſe birth, fatal to his mother, was followed, within ſix months, by the death of his father in 1649.

Having diſpatched his other buſineſs, he printed, in London, a Latin edition of his "Theory of the Principle of Motion in animal Bodies." His ſtay in London, at this time, was a little more than two years; and he was much diſpoſed to ſettle there entirely. But, in 1681, he was recalled to Paris, being ſent for to a conſultation about the health of his patron Colbert, which was then beginning to decline. He appears to have left England with ſome regret; though, by a curious manuſcript, upon the prevailing abuſes in the eſtabliſhed practice of Phyſicians and Apothecaries in different parts of the world, it is plain that he had conceived a great contempt for the pitiful trade, into which his noble art was then degraded in London.

Soon after his return he produced the firſt part of a new work, entituled, "La "Chymie naturelle, ou Explication chymique & méchanique de la nourriture de l'Ani- "mal." It was much read, but rather raiſed than ſatisfied the curioſity of the learned; to anſwer which he added afterwards two other parts, which were received with a general applauſe. A ſecond edition of the whole was publiſhed at Paris in 1687. In that year likewiſe came out his "Hiſtoire de l'Animal, ou la connoiſſance du Corps, "animé par la Méchanique & par la Chymie." It exhibited, upon a ſmaller ſcale, a more comprehenſive view of all the properties of animal bodies, in a form leſs ſcientific, and with more popular illuſtrations than his former work. Theſe books, written in a pleaſing ſtyle, and beſides a conſiderable fund of erudition, replete with original and accurate reſearches into nature, are ſcarce in England; but are ſtill read with eſteem in France and Holland; and were much commended by contemporary writers, and in all the journals of literature of thoſe times, as appears by the honourable mention made of Dr. Duncan, in Bayle's Dictionary, at the article of Ceriſantes.

He left Paris in 1683, upon the much-lamented death of Colbert, the kind effect of whoſe eſteem he gratefully acknowledged to have experienced, though in a much ſmaller degree than he might have enjoyed, if he could have reſtrained his zeal for Proteſtantiſm, and his avowed abhorrence of Popery. He had ſome property in land adjoining to the city of Montauban, with a handſome houſe upon it, pleaſantly ſituated near the ſkirts of the town. It was with a purpoſe of ſelling theſe, and ſettling finally in England, that he went thither from Paris. But the honourable and friendly reception he met with there determined his ſtay ſome years in his native city. In 1690, the perſecution, which began to rage with great fury againſt Proteſtants, made him ſuddenly relinquiſh all thought of a longer abode in France. Having diſpoſed of his houſe and land for leſs than half their value, he retired firſt to Geneva, intending to return to England through Germany; an intention generally kept in petto, but for many years unexpectedly thwarted by various events. Great numbers of his perſuaſion, encouraged by his liberality in defraying their expences on the road to Geneva, had followed him thither. Unwilling to abandon them in diſtreſs, he ſpent ſeveral months in that city and Berne, whither great numbers had likewiſe taken refuge, in doing them all the ſervice in his power. The harſh and gloomy aſpect which Reformation at that time wore in Geneva, ill agreeing with a temper naturally mild and chearful, and the ſullen treatment he met with from thoſe of his profeſſion, whoſe ignorance and ſelfiſhneſs his conduct and method of practice tended to bring into diſrepute, occaſioned his ſtay there to be very ſhort. He liſtened therefore with pleaſure to the perſuaſion of a chief magiſtrate of Berne, who invited him to a reſidence more ſuited to his mind. He paſſed about eight or nine years at Berne, where to his conſtant practice of phyſic was added the charge of a Profeſſorſhip of Anatomy and Chemiſtry.

In the year 1699, Philip, Landgrave of Heſſe, ſent for him to Caſſel. The Princeſs, who lay dangerouſly ill, was reſtored to life, but recovered ſtrength very ſlowly. Dr. Duncan was entertained for three years, with great reſpect, in the palace of the Landgrave, as his domeſtic phyſician. During his ſtay at that court, he wrote his treatiſe upon the abuſe of hot liquors. The uſe of tea, which had not long been introduced into Germany, and in the houſes only of the moſt opulent, was already at the Landgrave's become improper and immoderate, as well as that of coffee and chocolate. The Princeſs of Heſſe, with a weak habit of body, inclining to a conſumption, had been accuſtomed to drink theſe liquors to exceſs, and extremely hot. He thought fit, therefore, to write ſomething againſt the abuſe of them, eſpecially the moſt common one laſt mentioned. Their prudent uſe, to perſons chiefly of a phlegmatic conſtitution, he allowed. He even recommended them, in that caſe, by his own example, to be taken moderately warm early in the morning, and ſoon after dinner; but never late in the evening, their natural tendency not agreeing with the poſture of a body at reſt. He wrote this treatiſe in a popular ſtyle, as intended for the benefit of all ranks of people; the abuſe he condemned growing daily more and more epidemical. Though he eſteemed it too ſuperficial for publication, he permitted it to be much circulated in manuſcript. It was not till five years after, that he was perſuaded by his friend Dr. Boerhaave to print it, firſt in French, under the the title of "Avis, ſalutaire à tout le monde, contre "l'abus des liqueurs chaudes, & particulierement du Caffé, du Chocolat, & du Thé."

Rotterdam, 1705. He printed it the year following, in Engliſh, at London [ſmall 8vo. ſold by Rhodes in Fleet-ſtreet, and Bell in Cornhill, 1706]. In his dedication of the work to the Landgrave, he pays a judicious compliment to that Prince, as a Philoſopher, who was indebted for the health and vigour of his mind and body to his own prudent conduct; tacitly inſinuating, that, by a due regard to good advice, he approved himſelf wiſer than the Princeſs, whom, though he had reſtored her to health beyond all hope, he had found a moſt refractory patient.

The perſecution of Proteſtants in France continuing to drive great numbers of them from all its provinces into Germany, he defrayed occaſionally the expences of ſome ſmall bodies of theſe poor emigrants, who paſſed through Caſſel in 1702, in their way to Brandenburgh, where encouraging offers of a comfortable maintenance were held out by Frederick, the newly-created King of Pruſſia, to induſtrious manufacturers of every ſort. The praiſes theſe people ſpread of Dr. Duncan's liberality, when they arrived at Berlin, procured him a moſt flattering invitation to that court. He was indeed extremely well received by the reigning Prince; who appointed him diſtributor of his prudent munificence to ſome thouſands of theſe poor artificers, and ſuperintendant of the execution of a plan formed for their eſtabliſhment. This office he diſcharged with great credit and internal ſatisfaction; but with no other advantage to himſelf. Though appointed Profeſſor of Phyſic with a decent ſalary, and Phyſician to the Royal Houſehold, he found his abode at Berlin likely to prove injurious to his health and fortune. His expences there were exceſſive, and increaſing without bounds by the daily applications made to him as diſtributor of the royal bounty, which fell ſhort of their wants. Beſides, the intemperate mode of living at that court was not according to his taſte. It was this laſt reaſon which induced him, in 1703, to remove to the Hague.

In this moſt agreeable reſidence he ſettled about twelve years, a ſhort excurſion to London excepted in 1706, for the purpoſe of inveſting all his moneyed property in the Engliſh funds. He kept at this time a frequent correſpondence with Dr. Boerhaave, at whoſe perſuaſion he publiſhed a Latin edition of his Natural Chemiſtry, with ſome improvements and additional illuſtrations; entituled, "Chymiæ naturalis ſpecimen, quo "planè patet nullum in Chymicis officinis proceſſum fieri, cui ſimilis, aut analogus "in animalis corpore non fiat." Amſtelodami, 1707. He often uſed to ſay, that a ſurpriſing uniformity runs through all the infinitely-varied works of nature: And he would thence infer, that he, who attempts to explain any one of theſe works, would do well to inveſtigate the preciſe analogy his explanation bears to the diſcoveries made by philoſophical experiments in correſpondent works of nature; and that this was the ſureſt means of attaining perfection in all works of art. Whatever of this ſort worthy attention, yet unnoticed before, occurred to theſe reſpectable inquirers after ſalutary truth, they gladly communicated to each other.

He commenced about the ſame time a correſpondence upon ſimilar ſubjects, but not with the like ſatisfaction at firſt with Dr. Richard Mead, who had ſought his acquaintance, and treated him with great civility when laſt in London. Duncan, who had related ſome extraordinary influences of the ſtate of the atmoſphere upon human bodies, which he had obſerved in the courſe of his practice, had been complimented by Mead in Latin, which they both wrote with great eaſe and purity, upon the ingenious reaſonings which accompanied theſe recorded facts. Mead at the ſame time communicated, with much ſerioufneſs, ſome whimſical conjectures of his own, upon the influence of planetary attraction; together with the ſlight outlines of a theory upon the action of the nervous fluid. Duncan, with his peculiar air of grave pleaſantry, extolled the one as a marvellous attempt to extract ſound reaſoning from the ravings of judicial aſtrology, and the other as an acute invention to convert Ariſtotle's occult qualities into medical uſe. Mead, after contending weakly, in two letters, for the reality of both the objects in queſtion (while Duncan ſtill inſiſted that Mead only meant to amuſe him with a comical dream), conſented at length to cloſe the debate, by allowing that little or no ſervice was likely to accrue to the practice of phyſic from either theory; which, however unluckily for the reputation of that excellent man, he would not be perſuaded entirely to relinquiſh.

Their correſpondence after this grew more ſerious and intereſting, and ran chiefly upon the ſubject of contagious diſtempers, and the moſt proper method of preparing patients for a voluntary admiſſion of the infection of the ſmall-pox, by the breath or touch of a diſtempered perſon. It is remarkable that, in Dr. Mead's letters, an imperfect ſeries of which are ſtill preſerved with the copies of a few of Dr. Duncan's anſwers, no mention is made of inoculating or communicating the diſtemper by an inſertion of the virus, a method certainly known to the learned at that time, though not introduced into practice in England before 1721. It was in that year that Dr. Mead was ordered by the Prince of Wales (afterwards George II.) in whoſe family he was then employed, to inoculate ſeven condemned criminals after the Circaſſian and Chineſe method.

Its ſucceſs with them, and afterwards with the royal family, is well known to have firſt gained it credit there. Though Dr. Duncan ventured to pronounce, with a confidence unuſual to him, that the only rational preparation for the reception of a diſtemper which was evidently of the inflammatory kind, was ſuch a regimen, as, without weakening the conſtitution, might clear it of every thing that could contribute to feed the flame; yet, with reſpect to the voluntary admiſſion of a diſeaſe, hitherto ſo often fatal, he expreſſed himſelf always with great heſitation. He was ſtill propoſing freſh matters of enquiry to be clearly aſcertained before the propriety of the practice could be well eſtabliſhed. Experience, which has now confirmed his theory with reſpect to a preparatory regimen, has happily diſpelled, in a great degree, the apprehenſions of ill conſequences which made him ſo cautious of recommending a voluntary infection. Thoſe apprehenſions, therefore, it has been thought proper to ſuppreſs.

From the time of his leaving London in 1681, it appears that Dr. Duncan conſtantly entertained thoughts of fixing there his final abode. He however did not effect this purpoſe till about the end of 1714. In his anſwer to a letter he received from Dr. Mead during Queen Anne's laſt illneſs, he expreſſes an intention to quit the Hague ſome months ſooner; but that unhappily juſt then he had been ſuddenly afflicted with a ſtroke of the palſy. It greatly alarmed his friends. Yet when he had overcome the firſt ſhock, he found no other inconvenient effect from it himſelf till his death, twenty-one years after, but a ſlight convulſive motion of the head, which ſeized him commonly in ſpeaking, but never interrupted the conſtant chearfulneſs of his addreſs. To a patient likely to do well he would ſay, "It is not for your caſe that I ſhake my head, "but my own. You will ſoon ſhake me off, I warrant you."

He had often ſolemnly declared that, if the will of God prolonged his life to the age of ſeventy, he would conſecrate the remainder of it to the gratuitous ſervice of thoſe who ſought his advice. Having attained that age in 1719, he actually dedicated to this generous purpoſe the laſt ſixteen years of his life. Of ſuch patients as could not afford to pay a phyſician he had always a ſufficient number to enable him to accompliſh it to his wiſh, as his liberal contributions to relieve their other wants were well known to accompany his medical advice. To the rich who conſulted him, from whom he as peremptorily refuſed to take a fee, he was wont to ſay, with a ſmile, "The poor are my only "pay-maſters now; they are the beſt I ever had; their payments are placed in a "government-fund that can never fail; my ſecurity is the only KING that can do no "wrong." This alluded to the loſs he ſuſtained, in 1721, of a third part of his property by the South-Sea ſcheme. It produced not the leaſt alteration in his purpoſe, nor any retrenchment of his general beneficence to the poor.

He left behind him a great number of manuſcripts, moſtly phyſical, ſome upon religious ſubjects, and one containing many curious anecdotes of the hiſtory of his own times, from which he appears to have looked through mankind well, the men eſpecially, whom the idolatry of the vulgar exalt above their merits; whoſe amazing littleneſs he uſed to contemplate with more compaſſion than contempt, while ſome of their actions, againſt which party-writers inveigh with a tragical tone, loſe a certain degree of atrociouſneſs in his natural and candid way of accounting for them. Among his phyſical manuſcripts the moſt conſiderable is a Latin Treatiſe upon contagious Diſtempers, to which is prefixed (though ſeemingly intended for a ſeparate work) a very ample Diſſertation upon the plague, which cloſes with a remarkable addreſs to the Legiſlature of theſe kingdoms. This evidently appears to have been written within the year 1679; ſoon after Dr. Duncan firſt came to England. [This Addreſs is dated November 5, 1679.] It contains many judicious reflections upon particular facts obſerved during the dreadful ravages of that diſtemper in London fourteen years before. Theſe facts, well atteſted to him by credible eye-witneſſes, chiefly of his own profeſſion, eſtabliſhed his opinion beyond a doubt, that the plague is communicable by infection; and not, according to the fatally-miſtaken notion of the Turks, a periodical diſtemper, the germs of which being generated in the air of ſome devoted ſpot, will infallibly grow, and, baffling all remedy of man, take their own courſe. The reſult of theſe reflections was imparted to Dr. Mead, in the courſe of his correſpondence with him thirty years after; together with the regulations he had intended to recommend to the Parliament of Great Britain to prevent a communication of the infection by foreign commerce. The light which theſe obſervations threw upon the ſubject was, in 1719, much improved and extended by Dr. Mead, with the univerſal approbation of the public, when the conſternation was ſo general in Europe from the plague at Marſeilles.

The writers of the "Bibliotheque Britannique," for June, 1735, whence, at page 219 and the four following, the ſubſtance of this account is chiefly taken, with the addition only of ſuch circumſtances as have been faithfully collected from letters and other manuſcripts found after Dr. Duncan's death, cloſe the article relating to him, with theſe among other imperfect outlines of his character.—His converſation was eaſy, chearful, chearful, and intereſting, pure from all taint of party-ſcandal or idle raillery. This made his company a bleſſing deſired by all who had a capacity to know its value. As a man, benevolence and ingenuity, as a Chriſtian, a well informed zeal for Proteſtantiſm, diſtinguiſhed his character, in which a ſtriking proof was exhibited, that religion may well be found in the profeſſion of a phyſician, as it muſt indeed naturally gain ſtrength from the ſucceſsful ſtudy of nature. He died at London, April 30, 1735, aged 86. He left behind him an only ſon, the Reverend Doctor Daniel Duncan, author of ſome religious tracts; among the reſt, "Collects upon the principal Articles of the Chriſtian "Faith, according to the Order of the Catechiſm of the Church of England." Printed for S. Birt, 1754. This was originally intended for an appendix to a larger work, completed for the preſs, but never publiſhed, entituled, "The Family Catechiſm, be-"ing a free and comprehenſive Expoſition of the Catechiſm of the Church of England." He correſponded with the writers of the "Candid Diſquiſitions," &c. in which work he was from that circumſtance ſuppoſed to have had ſome ſhare. He died in June, 1761, leaving behind him two ſons, both Clergymen, the younger of whom, John Duncan, D. D. is now living, and Rector of South Warmborough, Hants.]

The editor of the Biographia would think himſelf inexcuſable if he did not add, that Dr. John Duncan ſuſtains the honour of his family, in the reſpectability of his character, in the liberality of his mind, and in his ingenious and valuable publications, both as a Poet and a Divine.

 [DUNCAN (WILLIAM) *, Profeſſor of Philoſophy in the Mariſchal College, Aberdeen, and a learned writer, was born at that borough in the month of July, 1717. His father, William Duncan, was a reſpectable tradeſman in the ſame place; and his mother, Euphemia Kirkwood, was the daughter of a wealthy farmer in Eaſt Lothian, the firſt diſtrict in Scotland where agriculture was much improved. Young Duncan received his grammatical education, partly in the public grammar-ſchool of Aberdeen, and partly at Foveran, about fifteen miles diſtant, where there was a boarding-ſchool, which at that time was greatly frequented on account of the reputation of Mr. George Forbes, the Maſter. In November, 1733, Mr. Duncan entered the Mariſchal College of Aberdeen, and applied himſelf particularly to the ſtudy of the Greek language, under the celebrated Profeſſor, Dr. Thomas Blackwell. After going through the ordinary courſe of philoſophy and mathematics, which continues for three years, he took the degree of Maſter of Arts. This was in April, 1737; and he never took any other degree.

* For the principal materials of this article we are indebted to our excellent and learned friend Dr. Gerard, Profeſſor of Divinity in King's College, Aberdeen.

Mr. Duncan appears to have been originally deſigned for the Chriſtian Miniſtry, and with this view he attended the Theological Lectures of the Profeſſors at Aberdeen for two winters. Not, however, finding in himſelf an inclination to the clerical profeſſion, he quitted his native place, and removed to London in 1739, where he was chiefly employed as an author, and it is not known whether he was ever in any other line. In this capacity various works were publiſhed by him without his name, the exact nature and number of which it is not in our power to aſcertain. It is, in general, underſtood that he tranſlated ſeveral books from the French, and that he engaged in different undertakings which were propoſed to him by the bookſellers. There is reaſon to believe that he had a very conſiderable ſhare in the tranſlation of Horace which goes under the name of Watſon. Dr. Gerard diſtinctly remembers that Mr. Duncan ſent a copy of it, as his own work, to his old ſchool-maſter, Mr. Forbes, who expreſſed upon this occaſion great pride in his former ſcholar, and held up his proficiency as a ſtrong incentive to diligence in the purſuit of claſſical learning.

Without anxiouſly enquiring after every tranſlation, and every compilation, in which Mr. Duncan might be concerned, we ſhall content ourſelves with taking notice of the three principal productions upon which his literary reputation is founded. The firſt, in point of time, was his tranſlation of certain ſelect orations of Cicero. Theſe orations are thoſe which occur in the common dauphin edition, and the work is underſtood to be happily executed. It has gone through ſeveral impreſſions, and is in conſtant uſe as a ſchool-book, the Latin being printed on one ſide, and the Engliſh on the other. A new edition, in this form, has appeared during the preſent year, (1792). Sir Charles Whitworth, in 1777, publiſhed Mr. Duncan's verſion in Engliſh only, for the benefit of ſuch young perſons, of both ſexes, as have not had the benefit of a liberal education. The publication is in two volumes, octavo. In his preface, Sir Charles ſpeaks highly, and we believe juſtly, of Mr. Duncan's merit as a tranſlator, and ranks him in this line with a Leland, a Hampton, and a Melworth. Mr. Duncan accompanied his tranſlation with ſhort but judicious explanatory notes.

In the year 1748, Mr. Robert Dodſley publiſhed that excellent ſchool book, entituled, "The Preceptor;" a book which has gone through ſeven editions, and of which many more will probably be demanded in the courſe of time. That the work might be executed in the beſt manner, Mr. Dodſley called in the aſſiſtance of ſome of the ableſt men of the age, among whom may be reckoned the names of David Fordyce, Dr. John Campbell, and Dr. Samuel Johnſon. The part of logic was aſſigned to Mr. Duncan, and the taſk was diſcharged by him with an ability that excited general approbation. It was the fault of moſt of the former treatiſes on the ſubject to be rendered very dry and unentertaining by the mode in which they were conducted, and eſpecially by the numerous and too often frivolous and unneceſſary diſtinctions, diviſions, and ſub-diviſions, with which they abounded. Senſible of this error, our author adopted a method more agreeable and inviting. He has treated logic like one who was a thotough maſter of it. Diſdaining to copy ſervilely after thoſe who had gone before him, he ſtruck out a plan of his own, and managed it with ſo much perſpicuity and judgment, gave ſo clear and diſtinct a view of the furniture of our minds for the diſcovery of truth, and laid down ſuch excellent rules for the attainment of it, that his work is one of the beſt introductions to the ſtudy of philoſophy and the mathematics in our own or perhaps any other language (a). It may be added, that Mr. Duncan knew how to avail himſelf of his perfect acquaintance with Locke's Eſſay on the human underſtanding. In 1752, the "Elements of Logic" were ſeparately publiſhed in 12mo; ſince which time the work has had a more extenſive ſpread in the univerſities, and in other ſeminaries of education. It has, we believe, in a good meaſure, ſuperſeded Dr. Watts; whoſe logic, however, on account of its greater copiouſneſs, and a certain facility of language and illuſtration, will ſtill continue to be uſeful.

(a) Monthly Review. Vol. VII. p. 467—468.

Mr. Duncan's laſt production was a tranſlation of Cæſar's Commentaries, which appeared in the latter end of the year 1752, in one volume, folio. This work had a double title to a favourable reception from the public, being recommended both by its external and internal merit. It is beautifully printed, and richly adorned with a variety of fine cuts. Theſe are the ſame, a few neceſſary alterations excepted, with thoſe of Dr. Clarke's edition; which, beſides their being ornamental, are of great ſervice towards a due underſtanding of the hiſtory. As to the tranſlation, it is acknowledged to be the beſt that has been given, in our own tongue, of the Commentaries of Cæſar. Mr. Duncan has in a great meaſure caught the ſpirit of the original author, and has preſerved his turn of phraſe and expreſſion as far as the nature of our language would permit. What adds much to the value of the work is, that there is prefixed to it a long diſcourſe concerning the Roman art of war. In this diſcourſe Mr. Duncan gives his readers a clear view of the military cuſtoms of the Romans, and has made a variety of ſagacious and juſt obſervations upon the genius and policy of ancient Rome. The diſcourſe is divided into eight chapters, the firſt of which contains a view of the ceremonies that attended a declaration of war. Under this head, our author takes occaſion to lay before his readers a particular account of the wars between the Romans and the Carthaginians, with the purpoſe of expoſing the pompous narratives that we meet with in hiſtorians of the ſincerity and inviolable juſtice of the former people. After ſhewing, by a detail of facts, that in all the Punic wars the Romans were the aggreſſors, and that, in the two laſt eſpecially, they forced the Carthaginians into them by flagrant acts of injuſtice, he proceeds to explain their preſerving, in ſome meaſure, the reputation of juſtice and equity, notwithſtanding their oppreſſive conduct. What Mr. Duncan has advanced upon the ſubject, being curious and inſtructive, will be inſerted below [A]; and it will, at the ſame time, afford a proper ſpecimen of his talents

[A] Being curious and inſtructive, will be inſerted below.] 'It muſt indeed be owned, ſays he, that it 'required no ſmall art and policy, ſo to involve and 'intangle themſelves with all the nations of the then 'known world, that they could at pleaſure find ſome 'ſpecious pretence of quarrel, when their intereſt 'required them to break with any ſtate. This gave 'a colour of juſtice to all their undertakings, inſpired 'their armies with aſſurance and confidence, inviolably attached to them their old friends, and procured 'them new allies at pleaſure. And, as it ſeems to 'have been one of their maſter-ſtrokes in politics, 'and the principal engine by which they puſhed on 'their conqueſts, it may not be amiſs to give the reader ſome little inſight into their artful conduct in 'this reſpect, that he may the better comprehend the 'motives and tendency of it.

'Although I cannot bring myſelf to think, with 'ſome modern writers of pretended depth and penetration, that Numa Pompilius had a political view 'in the ſeveral religious regulations he eſtabliſhed at 'Rome; yet I am ready enough to allow, that many 'of his inſtitutions were afterwards, by the prudent 'management of the ſenate, converted into maxims 'of ſtate, and rendered very ſerviceable in the adminiſtration of the government. Of this nature particularly were the ceremonies relating to the declaration 'of war. Nothing is of greater conſequence to an 'ambitious republic, which aims at univerſal dominion, and a gradual ſubjection of all nations, than 'to prevent ſuch a general confederacy againſt her 'as might not only put a ſtop to her conqueſts, but 'even threaten her in her turn with deſtruction. 'This the ſenate effected by their ſingular addreſs and 'conduct in the ſeveral wars in which they were engaged: for, they always found means to colour them 'over with ſuch a ſpecious pretence of juſtice as gave 'no umbrage to the neighbouring ſtates, nor begot 'any jealouſy of a power, which ſeemed to have 'nothing in view but the redreſſing its own wrongs 'or thoſe of other nations in alliance with it. That 'ſtrong bent towards religion, and the worſhip of 'the gods, which Numa introduced among the people, and which the ſenate carefully cheriſhed for 'many talents for compoſition. In the ſecond chapter of the diſcourſe, he treats of the manner in which the Romans levied their troops and formed an army; and the third relates to

'many generations, helped greatly to forward this 'perſuaſion. Men were not apt to diſtruſt a religious 'republic, where virtue was held in honour, and 'vice of every kind diſcountenanced. Let me add, 'that, in the early ages of the ſtate, this was more 'than mere pretence. They were really diſtinguiſhed 'by their probity, by a ſteady adherence to juſtice, 'and a faithful obſervance of treaties. Moſt of their 'wars were defenſive, or undertaken for the ſake of 'their allies. And though in after-times, in propor-'tion as their power increaſed, they gave way to the 'dictates of ambition, and became leſs ſcrupulous in 'their conduct: yet as they never departed from thoſe 'outward obſervances, by which the appearance of 'juſtice is maintained; and took care to ſignalize 'themſelves from time to time, by ſuch particular 'inſtances of moderation, as could not fail to make 'a deep impreſſion; their reputation for equity and 'good faith continued ſtill the ſame.

'Obſerve, I beſeech you, the different ſentiments 'entertained of the Romans and Carthaginians at the 'time of the rupture between the two ſtates. The 'Romans, though they had gradually ſubjected all 'the nations of Italy, and raiſed themſelves to a very 'formidable pitch of greatneſs, were yet ſo far from 'being conſidered as an ambitious republic, againſt 'which it was neceſſary for other ſtates to be upon 'their guard, that the fame of their virtue and juſtice 'ſeems at this time to have been at the higheſt; in-'ſomuch that foreign nations, inſtead of dreading 'their power, courted their alliance and amity. It 'was otherwiſe with the Carthaginians. They had 'been leſs careful to conceal their ambition, or cover 'their breach of treaties under a pretence of injuries. 'Hence their deſigns became ſuſpected, all their 'actions were viewed in the worſt light, and the 'general prejudice againſt them was ſo ſtrong, that 'every thing laid to their charge by their enemies 'found a ready belief. By this means it happened 'that though, in the interval between the firſt and 'ſecond Punic wars, the Romans acted without the 'leaſt regard to juſtice and the faith of treaties, yet 'very little notice was taken of the complaints of the 'Carthaginians: and when, in conſequence of re-'peated inſults and provocations, they were at laſt 'obliged to have recourſe to arms, the whole blame 'of the war, though ſo manifeſtly flowing from the 'injurious behaviour of the Romans, was nevertheleſs 'charged upon the perfidy of the Carthaginians.

'After the entire conqueſt of Italy, and the re-'duction of the greateſt part of Sicily in the firſt 'Punic war, it required a more refined policy in the 'Romans to extend the limits of their empire, and at 'the ſame time keep up the reputation of their in-'tegrity. They were not immediately ſurrounded 'with thoſe nations, which it was their intereſt to 'attack; and therefore could not eaſily provoke them 'to ſuch acts of hoſtility as might juſtify a declara-'tion of war. And ſhould they, upon ſlight pre-'tences, tranſport an army out of their own territories, 'to fall upon a diſtant prince; the deſign of conqueſt 'would be viſible, and beget a general alarm. Be-'ſides, their power was become ſo very formidable, 'that foreign ſtates did not care to contend with 'them, and therefore induſtriouſly avoided giving 'them any juſt ground of complaint. In this ſitua-'tion they took upon themſelves the title of patrons 'and protectors of all nations; and, by contracting 'alliances with weaker ſtates, found means to fall 'upon the ſtronger at pleaſure, without ſeeming 'themſelves to have any particular intereſt in the 'quarrel. It was upon this principle that they at-'tached themſelves to the Saguntines and Ætolians, 'which afterwards furniſhed them with ſuch a plau-'ſible colour for the Carthaginian and Macedonian 'wars. To know the full reach and value of this 'policy, we need only reflect, that though the ſecond 'Punic war was unexceptionably juſt on the part of 'the Carthaginians: yet the Romans, by diverting the 'attention of the public from the uſurpation of Sar-'dinia, and fixing it upon the fate of Saguntum, 'threw the whole odium of that war upon their ad-'verſaries, whilſt themſelves were conſidered as a 'humane, generous people, actuated merely by a 'concern for their allies.

'And here it is particularly deſerving of our notice, 'that, amongſt the many wars in which they were 'engaged after the concluſion of that with Hannibal, 'we hardly meet with any that can be deemed per-'ſonal. It was always, at leaſt in appearance, to 'ſupport the cauſe of ſome of their allies, or prevent 'their being cruſhed by a powerful neighbour. One 'would be apt to think, that they had it not ſo much 'in view to aggrandize themſelves, as to prevent the 'growth of any dangerous power, from which weaker 'ſtates might be expoſed to ſuffer. Upon the con-'cluſion of the firſt Macedonian war, they proclaimed 'liberty to all the ſtates of Greece. This action, ſo 'magnificent in appearance, was in reality a refined 'ſtroke of policy. The Greeks were a warlike peo-'ple, well diſciplined, and capable of bringing great 'armies into the field. Had they ſuſpected the Ro-'mans of a deſign upon their liberties, and united 'in their own defence, they muſt have been invin-'cible. But this ſeeming grant of freedom effectually 'lulled them aſleep; and, by the artful conduct of the 'Romans, gave birth to infinite diviſions among them, 'which, ending commonly in an appeal to Rome, 'furniſhed the ſenate with frequent opportunities of 'taking part in their quarrels. Thus they inſenſibly 'grew to be rulers and dictators over them, and by 'ſlow imperceptible ſteps accompliſhed their ſub-'jection.

'Their ambaſſadors to foreign princes, and ſuch 'as had not yet felt the weight of their power, com-'monly delivered themſelves in ſuch a haughty magiſ-'terial way as could not fail to draw upon them 'ſome indignity or ill treatment, and thereby furniſh 'a ſure pretence of war, when the intereſt of the 'commonwealth rendered ſuch a ſtep neceſſary. If a 'people at any time had given them umbrage, and 'afterwards, repenting of their raſhneſs, ſurrendered 'up the principal offenders, they would often 'refuſe to puniſh them, chuſing rather to conſider 'the whole nation as guilty, and reſerve to themſelves 'an uſeful vengeance. When they ſaw two nations 'engaged in war, although they were not in alliance, 'nor had any conteſt with either of them, they would 'nevertheleſs appear upon the ſtage of action, and 'affected always to ſide with the weakeſt. It was an 'ancient cuſtom, ſays Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, 'for the Romans to grant ſuccour to all who came to 'implore it. If princes of the ſame blood were at 'variance for the crown, they ſeldom failed to make 'themſelves parties in the diſpute; and, if one of them 'was a minor, declared in his favour, proclaiming 'themſelves his guardians, in quality of protectors of 'the world. When ſubjects, oppreſſed and tyranniſed 'over by their ſovereigns, were provoked to renounce 'their allegiance, they immediately indulged them with 'the title of ally, declaring themſelves the profeſſed 'enemies of tyranny and lawleſs power.

'Theſe are the arts and policies by which the 'Romans ſo entangled themſelves with all nations, 'that they could with pleaſure engage in a war with 'any ſtate, and colour it over with ſuch an appear-'ance of juſtice, as not only prevented any general 'confederacy againſt them, but even warmly engaged 'their allies in the ſupport of their uſurpations. Nor 'were they leſs politic in the choice of their wars, 'and in the manner of conducting and bringing them 'to a period. For, as their power was very formidable, 'and they had contrived to draw many nations over 'to their intereſt; whatever ſtate took up arms againſt 'them found it impoſſible to make any long reſiſt-'ance, and was in the end forced to accept of ſuch 'conditions of peace as they thought fit to propoſe. 'For this reaſon war was ſeldom declared againſt 'them; but themſelves always made it, at a ſeaſon, 'with a people, and in ſuch a manner as beſt ſuited to their arms and diſcipline, pointing out their ſuperiority in theſe reſpects over other nations. The inſtitutions and maxims of conduct which chiefly contributed to exalt the courage of the Romans, and animate their bravery, are conſidered in the fourth chapter; and the fifth gives the whole detail of the marching of an army. Here is particularly diſplayed the fine march of Hamilcar againſt Spendius, than which perhaps the whole art of war furniſhes nothing more complete in its kind. The three remaining chapters are devoted to encampments, battles, and the attack and defence of places (b). Mr. Duncan's "Tranſlation of Cæſar" is now printed in octavo, for the uſe of common readers.

'their

(b) Monthly Review, Vol. VII. p. 81—94.

Previouſly to our author's publication of this work, he had been appointed profeſſor of philoſophy in the Mariſchal College, Aberdeen. The royal preſentation which conferred this office upon him was ſigned by the King, at Hanover, on the eighteenth of May, 1752. Mr. Duncan, however, remained in London till the Summer of 1753, and was not admitted to his Profeſſorſhip till the twenty-firſt of Auguſt in that year.

'their intereſt. If they were oppoſed by ſeveral enemies at the ſame time, they granted a truce to the weakeſt, who thought themſelves happy in obtaining it; conſidering it as a great advantage, that their ruin was at leaſt ſuſpended. They never engaged in far-diſtant wars, till they had firſt made an alliance with ſome power contiguous to the enemy they invaded, who might unite his troops to the army they ſent; and as this was never conſiderable with regard to numbers, they always had another in that province which lay neareſt the enemy, and a third in Rome, ever ready to march at a minute's warning. In this manner they hazarded but a ſmall part of their forces at once, and found it eaſy to repair any loſs they might ſuſtain, whilſt their enemy was often ruined by a ſingle battle. It was this conſideration that inſpired Hannibal with the reſolution of attacking them in Italy itſelf, the center of their dominions. He was ſenſible that a blow, ſtruck there, muſt effectually weaken them; whereas diſtant defeats, ſo long as the capital remained unmoleſted, and was at liberty to ſend a freſh ſupply of troops to recruit the army, were, properly ſpeaking, little other than ſo many leſſons of prudence to their generals, who ſoon found themſelves in a condition to renew the war, with greater forces, and more circumſpection. Accordingly we find, that, when the ſame Hannibal afterwards offered his ſervice to Antiochus, in his intended war againſt the Romans, there was no principle he inculcated more earneſtly than the neceſſity of ſending an army into Italy, and cutting them off from thoſe continual reſources, by which in any other method of attack they found themſelves invincible.

'But nothing gives us a greater idea of the addreſs and policy of this people, than the manner in which they terminated their wars, when they had at laſt brought them to the point they deſired. They ſent the garriſons out of the ſtrong-holds; had the horſes and elephants delivered up to them; and, if their enemies were powerful at ſea, obliged them to burn their ſhips, and ſometimes remove higher up in the country. If the prince they had overcome was poſſeſſed of numerous armies, and ſurrounded with warlike nations, one of the articles of the treaty was, that he ſhould not make war with any of the allies of the Romans, but ſubmit his differences to arbitration. And as they never refuſed their alliance to any people who bordered on a powerful prince, this condition, inſerted in a treaty of peace, cut him off from all opportunity of making war, or employing his troops, and thereby deprived him of a military power for the time to come; nay, they even bereaved their very allies of this force. The inſtant any conteſt broke out amongſt them, they ſent ambaſſadors, who obliged them to conclude a peace. It was in this manner they terminated the wars between Attalus and Pruſias: and whoever is in the leaſt acquainted with their hiſtory muſt be ſenſible, that they all along adhered to this policy. The reſult was, that they alone were poſſeſſed of warlike and veteran armies, whilſt thoſe of other nations degenerated into a raw, unpractiſed rabble. When any ſtate compoſed too formidable a body from its ſituation or union, they never failed to divide it. The republic of Achaia was formed by an aſſociation of free cities. The ſenate declared, that every city ſhould be governed by its own laws, independent on the general authority. Macedonia was ſurrounded with inacceſſible mountains. The ſenate divided it into four parts; declared thoſe free; prohibited them every kind of alliance among themſelves by marriage; carried off all the nobles into Italy; and by that means reduced this power to nothing.

'Theſe cuſtoms of the Romans were not certain particular incidents which happened by chance; but ſo many invariable principles, from which, in a long courſe of years, they never deviated. The maxims which they put in practice againſt the greateſt monarchs were exactly the ſame with thoſe they had employed in their infant ſtate againſt the little cities which ſtood round them. They made Eumenes and Maſiniſſa contribute to the ſubjection of Philip and Antiochus, as they had before employed the Latins and Hernici to ſubdue the Volſcians and the Tuſcans. They obliged the Carthaginians, and the Kings of Aſia, to ſurrender their fleets to them, in like manner as they had forced the citizens of Antium to give up their little veſſels. And indeed it is ſurpriſing to conſider, that, during the courſe of that long and mighty proſperity which attended the Roman arms, and in which it is ſo uſual for mankind to forget themſelves, the ſenate continued to act all along with the ſame depth of judgment and the ſame ſteady views to the public intereſt. They were not dazzled by their good fortune, nor moved to precipitate their enterprizes before the proper ſeaſon. Obſerve, I intreat you, the wiſdom and policy of their conduct. After the defeat of Antiochus, they were poſſeſſed of Africa, Aſia, and Greece, without having a ſingle city in thoſe countries that could be called immediately their own. They ſeemed to conquer with no other view but to beſtow: but then they obtained ſo complete a ſovereignty, that, whenever they engaged in war with any prince, they oppreſſed him, as it were, with the weight of the whole univerſe. The time proper for ſeizing upon the conquered countries was not yet come. Had they, after the ſecond Punic war, or that with Antiochus, poſſeſſed themſelves of lands in Africa and in Aſia, they could never have preſerved conqueſts ſo ſlightly eſtabliſhed. It was the intereſt of the ſenate to wait till all nations were accuſtomed to obey as free and as confederate, and to let them blend and loſe themſelves inſenſibly in the Roman commonwealth, before they ſhould attempt reducing them to the condition of ſubjects. After overcoming a nation, they contented themſelves with weakening it, and impoſing ſuch conditions as conſumed it inſenſibly. If it recovered, they depreſſed it ſtill more, and it became ſubject, without a poſſibility of dating the æra of its ſubjection. This was indeed a ſlow way of conquering, but founded in the deepeſt policy. Rome, by a ſteady adherence to theſe maxims, gradually increaſed in ſtrength; and, having at length got the better of all oppoſition, ſecurely took poſſeſſion of the ſovereignty of the univerſe (1).'

There

There were three Profeſſors of Philoſophy in the Mariſchal College, who had each of them formerly carried on a regular courſe of it in all its branches. But, in conſequence of a new arrangement, the duties had recently been divided, and a ſeparate branch was aſſigned to each of the three Profeſſors. Mr. Duncan would have preferred morals and logic; but Dr. Gerard (who, though preſented at the ſame time, had a priority of choice, by virtue of immediate admiſſion to the Profeſſorſhip,) had fixed upon theſe departments. Natural and experimental philoſophy was allotted to Mr. Duncan. Before his removal from London, he had come under an engagement for a tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives; but the duties of his Profeſſorſhip, together with an indifferent ſtate of health, occaſioned his having made only a ſmall progreſs in the work at the period of his deceaſe. There is no doubt of his having been fully equal to the execution of the deſign. Nevertheleſs, there is the leſs occaſion to regret his not having completed it, as a very improved edition of the old verſion was publiſhed, in 1758, under the reviſion of the learned and amiable Mr. Samuel Dyer, the friend of Dr. Johnſon; and as a new tranſlation has been given by the Langhornes. Dr. Blackwell dying when only the ſecond volume of the Court of Auguſtus was finiſhed, he requeſted Mr. Duncan to carry on the undertaking, and directed all the materials for it to be put into his hands; but, finding not a ſingle ſheet of copy, and nothing but ſcraps and ſeparate papers, and references to books, he declined the taſk, and ſatisfied himſelf with ſending theſe fragments to the Bookſeller, who had become proprietor of the work, and who ſtood engaged for the publication of the third volume.

Whilſt Mr. Duncan reſided in the metropolis, he was in the habits of intimacy with ſeveral of the learned men who flouriſhed at that time; and, among others, George Lewis Scot and Dr. Armſtrong were his particular friends. We have been aſſured, by a Gentleman who knew him in London, that he was held in much eſteem on account of his private as well as his literary character. The ſedentary life he had led, before he came into the College at Aberdeen, had a good deal affected his conſtitution, and particularly his nerves; in conſequence of which he was ſubject to an occaſional depreſſion of ſpirits. By this he was unfitted for great exertions, but not for his ordinary employment, or for enjoying the company of his friends. He died a Batchelor, on the firſt of May, 1760, in the forty-third year of his age. Mr. Duncan cannot ſo much be ſaid to have poſſeſſed genius as good ſenſe and taſte; and his parts were rather ſolid than ſhining. His temper was ſocial, his manners eaſy and agreeable, and his converſation entertaining, and often lively. In his inſtructions as a Profeſſor he was diligent, and very accurate. His conduct was irreproachable, and he was regular in his attendance on the various inſtitutions of public worſhip. Soon after his ſettlement in the Mariſchal College, he was admitted an Elder of the Conſiſtory or Church Seſſion of Aberdeen, and continued to officiate as ſuch till his death. He had ſeveral ſiſters, who bore reſpectable characters; and a younger brother, John, a Merchant in Aberdeen, who has been three times elected chief Magiſtrate of that Borough, and has diſcharged the duties of the office for ſix years with credit to himſelf, and much to the ſatisfaction of his fellow-citizens. For ſome time paſt he has declined reſuming ſo public a ſtation, though he has conſtantly been a member of the Town Council, as often as the eſtabliſhed rules permitted his being choſen.] K.

 [DUNCOMBE (WILLIAM), an ingenious poetical and miſcellaneous writer, youngeſt ſon of John Duncombe [A], Eſq. of Stocks, in the pariſh of Aldbury, Hertfordſhire,

[A] The Duncombes of Barley End, in the pariſh of Ivingho, Bucks, originally Saxon, were divided into ſeveral branches in the reigns of King Henry VIII. and King Edward VI. The name is ſaid to be derived from the Saxon words Duno, "a hill," or "a hilly plain," and Combe, "a valley between hills," or "a valley encompaſſed with trees." And this exactly anſwers the ſituation of Barley End (1), where the eldeſt branch of the family had reſided for ſome centuries. The firſt mentioned in the college of arms is William Duncombe, of Great Brickhill, Bucks, who died 1533. His elder brother Thomas, of Barley End, who died 1531, left a ſon, William, from whom deſcended a numerous progeny. His grandſon, William, had ſeven ſons. From the eldeſt of them, Thomas, born in 1582, deſcends Rebecca (now the relict of the Rev. Edward Lucy), the preſent heireſs of that family. William, the ſecond of thoſe ſons, born in 1585, was grandfather to Sir Charles Duncombe, Knt. (Lord Mayor of London in 1709, and Member of Parliament for Downton, Wilts,) and great grandfather to Anthony, created Lord Feverſham in 1747; and to Thomas Brown, Eſq; who took the name of Duncombe, and was ſettled at Duncombe-park, (once Helmſley-caſtle *,) in Yorkſhire; and Robert, the third ſon, of Stocks (2), was great-grandfather to our author. John, his father, of Stocks, who was born in 1645, and died in 1728, was one of the receivers for Catharine, the Queen Dowager of Charles II. and alſo receiver general of his Majeſty's land revenue for the counties of Bucks, Bedford, Suffolk, and Cambridge, (in which laſt place he was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon (John) and grandſon (Arnold), who held it till their reſpective deaths). He married Hannah, above-mentioned, youngeſt daughter of John Allen, Eſq; of Gretton, in Northamptonſhire, by whom he had eight ſons, of whom only the eldeſt, John, born fordſhire, and Hannah, his wife, was born at his father's houſe in Hatton-Garden, London, Jan. 9, 1689-90, and owed his Chriſtian name to the Revolution principles of his father and family. On the ſame principles, his father, in 1693, put his life into the Tontine, or annuities increaſing by ſurvivorſhip, ſubſcribing 100 l. on it, for which 10 l. per annum was paid immediately, and from which, in the courſe of his long life, our author received ſome thouſands. He was educated in two private ſeminaries, viz. at Cheney, in Bucks; and afterwards at Pinner, near Harrow on the Hill, Middleſex, under the tuition of Mr. Thomas Goodwin [B]. In December, 1706, Mr. Duncombe was entered as a clerk in the Navy-office, and was advanced to a higher ſalary in January, 1707-8. So early as the year 1715, we find a tranſlation by him of the Twenty-ninth Ode of the Firſt Book of Horace, in the collection commonly known by the name of The Wits Horace. About this time, being acquainted with Mr. Jabez Hughes, Mr. Duncombe was by him introduced to his brother John, author of the "Siege of Damaſcus," and alſo to his ſiſter (afterwards Mrs. Duncombe), who was a woman of excellent ſenſe and temper, and, being ſkilled in thorough baſs, uſed to accompany her brother John on his violin or flute. Our author's tranſlation of the Carmen Seculare of Horace was printed in folio in 1721, and was collected, in 1731, in "Concanen's Miſcellany," entituled, The Flower-piece. This was followed, in 1722, by a tranſlation of the tragedy of "Athaliah, the maſterpiece," as Meſſrs. d'Olivet and Voltaire juſtly ſtyle it, of "Racine," which was publiſhed by ſubſcription, and has gone through three editions [C]. Having contracted an intimacy at the Navy-office with Mr. Henry Needler [D], a gentleman endued with a like taſte, our author, by ſupplying him with proper books, enabled him to gratify his ardent thirſt for knowledge; and, on his early death in 1718, haſtened by his intenſe application, diſcharged the debt of friendſhip by collecting and publiſhing his "Original Poems, Tranſlations, Eſſays, and Letters," in one vol. 8vo, in 1724, of which there have been alſo three editions. On December 3, 1725, Mr. Duncombe quitted his place at the Navy-office, and ſpent the remainder of a long, a virtuous, and a happy, life among his friends and his books in a literary leiſure. Having a ſhare in the "Whitehall Evening Poſt," ſeveral of his fugitive pieces appeared occaſionally in that paper; in particular, a tranſlation of Buchanan's "Verſes on Valentine's Day (a)," "Verſes to Euryalus (Mr. John Carleton) on his coming of age (b);" "The Choice of Hercules," from Xenophon (c), (for which there was ſuch a demand that the paper was in a few days out of print); and a "Defence of ſome paſſages in Paradiſe Loſt," from the hyper-criticiſm of M. de Voltaire (d). About the ſame time numberleſs errors, in a new edition of Chillingworth, were pointed out by him (e), and tranſlations of the "Letters between Archbiſhop Fenelon [E] and M. de la Motte (f)," and of the "Adventures of Meleſickton [F]," and other fables from Fenelon, were pub-

in 1680, and the youngeſt, William, the ſubject of this article,, arrived at years of maturity. Our author's eldeſt brother, a gentleman of ſingular integrity and benevolence, who died June 30, 1746, was twice married; firſt, to Elizabeth, one of the daughters of William Lowndes, Eſq. (commonly called Ways-and-Means Lowndes), Secretary of the Treaſury; by whom he had a daughter, Elizabeth, (who died unmarried in 1777,) and two ſons, who both died of the ſmall-pox at the age of 30; the younger, Lewis, at Merton College, Oxford, where, and at Weſtminſter-ſchool, he was eminently diſtinguiſhed for his genius and application: ſecondly, to Elizabeth, daughter and heireſs of Nehemiah Arnold, Eſq. of Weſtminſter, by whom he had a ſon, Arnold, who died unmarried in 1774, aged 50, juſt after he had rebuilt his family ſeat at Stocks, and two daughters, Clara, married in 1768, to William Hayton, Eſq. of Ivingho, and Martha, who died unmarried in 1772. Other branches of this family were the Duncombes of Broughton and Battleſden, Bedfordſhire, both now extinct, (of which latter was the Right Honourable Sir John Duncombe (3), Privy Counſellor, 1667, and Chancellor and Under-Treaſurer of the Exchequer, 1672, whoſe granddaughter, in whom that line ended, married the firſt Earl of Deloraine, and was grandmother to the preſent Earl,) and of Weſton, Surrey, of which Thomas, now rector of Shere, is the fourth in ſucceſſion who has held that living and advowſon. Of this family was Sir Francis, of Tangley, Surrey, Bart.; ſo created Feb. 4, 1661, who died in 1670, leaving a ſon, Sir William, who died without iſſue in 1706. The Surrey family (as appears by their monumental inſcriptions, &c.) ſpelt their name Duncumb.

liſhed in the London Journal. In the lottery of 1725, a ticket, which Mr. Duncombe had in partnerſhip with Miſs Elizabeth Hughes, ſiſter of John Hughes, Eſq; author of "The Siege of Damaſcus," was drawn a prize of 1000 l. a circumſtance peculiarly fortunate, as it probably haſtened his marriage with that amiable lady, which took place Sept. 1, 1726; on which he removed to her mother's houſe in Red-Lion-ſtreet, Holborn.

In 1728, a letter by Mr. Duncombe, ſigned Philopropos, was printed in the London Journal of March 30, containing ſome animadverſions on the "Beggar's Opera," then exhibiting with great applauſe at Lincoln's Inn Theatre, ſhewing its pernicious conſequences to the practice of morality and Chriſtian virtue. And the ſame popular entertainment having been ſoon after moſt ſeaſonably condemned in a ſermon preached at Lincoln's Inn Chapel by Dr. Herring (afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury), of whom Mr. Duncombe was a conſtant auditor, in a ſubſequent letter on the ſame ſubject in the London Journal of April 20, ſubſcribed Benevolus, he paid a juſt compliment to the "clear reaſoning, good ſenſe, and manly rhetoric, the judicious criticiſm, as well as the Chriſtian oratory," there diſplayed. This introduced him to the acquaintance and friendſhip of that excellent Divine, which continued without interruption till his Grace's death in March, 1757; this favour being gratefully acknowledged by him, "as one of the moſt generous and diſintereſted offers of friendſhip which he ever received from any one ſince he was acquainted with the world [G]." In Auguſt of the ſame year, our author publiſhed a pamphlet (without a name) entituled "Remarks on M. Tindal's Tranſlation of M. de Rapin Thoyras's Hiſtory of England, in a letter to S. T. [Sigiſmund Trafford,] Eſq. [H]"

A leaſehold eſtate, held under the Duke of Portland in Frith-ſtreet, Soho, having devolved to him as next in remainder under the will of Lady Stampe [I], his aunt, having taken down the old buildings, he let part of the ground on a building-leaſe, and on the remainder he built two houſes for himſelf, into one of which he removed with his family in 1730. This involved him in a law-ſuit with the late Lord Bateman, then poſſeſſor of the houſe called Monmouth-houſe (as being built for the Duke of Monmouth), in Soho-ſquare, (ſince taken down,) for darkening his windows, in which his Lordſhip was non-ſuited, on the old law maxim, A terra uſque ad aſtra.

In the ſummer of 1732, Mr. Duncombe's tragedy of "Lucius Junius Brutus" was read and approved by the author's friend, Mr. Mills, ſenior, and by him introduced to the theatrical triumvirate, Booth, Cibber, and Wilks, who alſo approved it, and promiſed it ſhould be performed. Booth regretted he could not act in it; and Wilks undertook the part of Titus; unfortunately he died in September following; and the revolt of the players, with the confuſion that enſued, prevented its being brought on the ſtage till two years after. In January, 1732-3, the tragedy of the "Earl of Eſſex" being commanded by their Majeſties to be acted for the benefit of Mrs. Porter, when ſhe appeared on the ſtage for the firſt time after her misfortune of a broken leg, our author, at her requeſt, drew up an epilogue for her, from minutes of her own writing, with which ſhe was much pleaſed, and ſaid, it fully expreſſed her ſentiments. However, it was not ſpoken. The Manager probably did not reliſh it on a double account: 1ſt, becauſe there was no obſcenity in it; and, 2dly, as it frankly owned the decay of the ſtage. Mrs. Porter apologized for her not ſpeaking it, in a very genteel and grateful letter; and Mr. Southerne ſaid, "he was ſorry, on her account, it was not ſpoken, as he was ſure it would have done her credit."

In 1734, Mr. Duncombe, unadviſedly, conſented to Mr. Fleetwood's propoſal of bringing Brutus on the ſtage at Drury-lane in November, when the town was empty, the parliament not ſitting, and Farinelli in full ſong and feather at the Hay-Market. The conſequence was natural and obvious. "The quavering Italian eunuch (to uſe our author's

[H] Sigiſmund Trafford, Eſq.] The concluding paragraph of this pamphlet is as follows: "Mr. Dryden's elegant verſion of Father Maimbourg's hiſtory of the League is, with regard to ſtyle and language, a much better model for any one, who will oblige the public with an accurate tranſlation of Rapin's Hiſtory, than Sir Roger L'Eſtrange's tranſlation of Joſephus or of "Quevedo's Viſions." And Dr. Herring, in the letter above cited, ſays, "I have read over your criticiſms on Tindal's tranſlation, and think them exceedingly juſt and neceſſary. Such haſty mercenary tranſlators really put an affront upon the public, and ſeem to take for granted that men have neither taſte nor judgment. The inaccuracies of ſtyle, the lowneſs of expreſſion, and the many omiſſions in this tranſlation, are prodigiouſly offenſive, &c."

She was firſt married to Sir John Tyrrel, Bart. of Springfield-Hall, Eſſex; and, ſecondly, to Sir Thomas Stampe, Knt. Lord Mayor of London in 1692, whom alſo ſhe ſurvived, and died without iſſue in 1712. She had a brother, John, a friend and companion of the wits of King Charles II. (two of whoſe letters are printed in "Letters of Eminent Perſons,") who died unmarried at Dublin in 1720, aged 75; and two elder ſiſters, viz. Bridget, married to George Fulford, Eſq; of Fulford, Devonſhire, (from whom deſcend the preſent family of that name); and Mary, married to John Wright, Eſq. of Knightſbridge, Eſſex, Attorney General of Jamaica in 1685.

own words) proved too powerful for the rigid Roman conſul [K]." Yet it was acted ſix nights with applauſe; and there was ſcarcely a dry eye in the boxes during the laſt ſcene between Brutus and Titus. It was acted there again in February following, and at the ſame time was printed in 8vo, with a Dedication to Lord Chief Juſtice Hardwicke, a friend to law, liberty, and his country. A ſecond edition, in 12mo, with a tranſlation of M. de Voltaire's "Eſſay on Tragedy" prefixed, was publiſhed in 1747. In April, 1735, Mr. Duncombe publiſhed, by ſubſcription, in two volumes 12mo, the "Poems," &c. of his deceaſed brother-in-law, John Hughes, Eſq; which were received by his friends and the public with the eſteem due to ſo elegant a genius. In January, 1735-6, our author's domeſtic happineſs received a ſevere ſhock by the death of his wife, which happened at Spring Grove, in Middleſex, the ſeat of his firſt couſin, Mrs. Ofley [L]. In 1737, he collected and publiſhed, in one volume 8vo, the "Miſcellanies in Verſe and Proſe" of Mr. Jabez Hughes, for the benefit of his widow. The dedication (in her name) to the Dutcheſs of Bedford, was drawn up by the Rev. Mr. Copping, Dean of Clogher. In 1743, on the death of his learned friend, Mr. Samuel Say [M], a Diſſenting Miniſter in Weſtminſter, Mr. Duncombe undertook, for the benefit of his widow and daughter, to reviſe and prepare for the preſs ſome of his poems, and two proſe eſſays, which were accordingly publiſhed in one volume 4to, in 1745, and have been deſervedly admired by the beſt judges. In 1744, the "Siege of Damaſcus [N]," and ſome other moral plays, having been acted by ſeveral perſons of diſtinction for their amuſement, the revival of ſo elegant and improving a diverſion induced Mr. Duncombe to publiſh "An Oration on the uſefulneſs of Dramatic Interludes in the Education of Youth," tranſlated from the Latin of M. Werenfels, by whom it was ſpoken before the Maſters and Scholars of the Univerſity of Baſil. On the breaking-out of the rebellion in 1745, thinking that, "when a houſe is on fire, every man ſhould lend a helping hand to quench it (g)," our author endeavoured to ſecond his honoured friend, the Archbiſhop of York, by reprinting "A Sermon" (now known to have been written by Dr. Arbuthnot), ſuppoſed to be "preached to the People at the Mercat-Croſs of Edinburgh,

[K] Too powerful for the rigid Roman conſul.] See a letter on this ſubject to the late Rev. Dr. John Sharp in "Letters by Eminent Perſons," vol. II. Mr. David Erſkine Baker, in his "Companion to the Play-houſe," firſt edition, aſſerts that this tragedy "was not acted," and is "only" a tranſlation of the Brutus of Voltaire; whereas, if he had read it, he would have ſeen not only that it was acted, but alſo the names of the actors, and would have found that there is ſcarcely a ſcene without variations from Voltaire. Tullia (or Lucia) dies at the end of the IVth act in the French play. In the Engliſh there is a pathetic ſcene between her and Titus, in the Vth act, entirely new. Mr. Pope, on hearing the contempt with which the prologue (which he thought "a good one") had been treated by Mr. Theophilus Cibber, ſaid "he thought of players as he always thought of players, and of the ſon as he thought of the father."

[L] The ſeat of his firſt couſin, Mrs. Ofley.] Second daughter to John Wright, Eſq. (mentioned in note I.) She and her eldeſt ſiſter, Sarah, (afterwards married, firſt to Elias Deritt, Eſq. Deputy of the Great Wardrobe, and, ſecondly, to Count Gyllenberg, Ambaſſador from Sweden, and afterwards Prime Miniſter in that country,) accompanied the ſecond Duke and Dutcheſs of Albemarle to his Grace's Government of Jamaica (where he died) in 1687. During the voyage, Mrs. Mary Wright uſed to call the famous Dr. Hans Sloane, 'Sloany my Crony,' and had ſo little opinion of his ſkill, that ſhe preferred the advice of the ſhip's ſurgeon. After her return, ſhe was ſo inſtrumental in promoting the Dutcheſs's marriage with Ralph Duke of Montagu, that, in return for her good offices, his Grace ſettled on her an annuity of 800 l. for life, one moiety charged on the Great Wardrobe, the other on Montagu-houſe. She then married John Ofley, Eſq. and built a houſe at the S. E. corner of Bloomſbury-ſquare (ſince rebuilt), which in thoſe days was called 'Little Montagu-houſe." She afterwards retired to the villa abovementioned on Smallbury Green, in the pariſh of Heſton, (on her death purchaſed and rebuilt by the late Eliſha Biſcoe, Eſq. and now the ſeat of Sir Joſeph Banks, Bart. Preſ. R.S.) where ſhe died in 1753, full of years and good-works, at the age of 90. Her ſiſter Sarah, Counteſs Gyllenberg, by her firſt huſband had a daughter, who accompanying her to Stockholm, was by the Queen of Sweden created a Counteſs by the ſame title. She married Baron Sparre, the Swediſh Envoy in England, and one of Charles XII's officers, by whom ſhe had one daughter, the Hon. Amelia Meleſina Sparre, who died in 1778, at Thirſke in Yorkſhire. A younger ſiſter of Mrs. Ofley, Bridget, married Sir James Brooke, Bart. of Ellinthorpe in Yorkſhire, by whom ſhe had two ſons, Sir Job and Montagu, both now dead, and the title extinct.

[M] On the death of his learned friend, Mr. Samuel Say.] This gentleman, who had been an old friend of Mr. Hughes and Dr. Iſaac Watts, they having been all fellow-ſtudents together in logic and philoſophy at Mr. Thomas Rowe's Academy, ſucceeded to Dr. Calamy's congregation in Weſtminſter in 1733. (Two or three of his letters are in thoſe "of Eminent Perſons.") 'I never converſed,' ſays Mr. Duncombe, 'with a perſon of more learning or modeſty. He was an 'excellent critic, and had a fine talent for poetry. But 'it was his misfortune to have ſo penetrating a judg-'ment, that he could never be ſatisfied with his own 'performances, nor think them correct enough (4).' The Critical Eſſays (abovementioned) were written at the deſire of Mr. Richardſon, the painter. The one is "on the Harmony, Variety, and Power of number" in general; the other "on thoſe of Paradiſe Loſt" in particular. Mr. Say's character of Mrs. Bendyſh, (grand daughter of Oliver Cromwell,) publiſhed in the Appendix to the beforementioned Letters, has been much admired. His daughter is married to Mr. Toms, a Diſſenting Miniſter at Hadleigh, in Suffolk. Mr. Say's father, Mr. Giles Say, Miniſter of St. Michael's in Southamptonſhire, was one of the ejected Miniſters in 1662; as was alſo Mr. Hughes's grandfather. (See Dr. Calamy's account of the ejected Miniſters, and Dr. Gibbons's Memoirs of Dr. Watts.

[N] In 1744, the Siege of Damaſcus.] In the winter of 1742, this tragedy was firſt acted by ſome of the young nobility of Weſtminſter-School, for ſeveral nights, at the Little Theatre in the Hay-Market. The late Dutcheſs of Queenſbury was the chief promoter of it, furniſhing the wardrobe, and dreſſing the characters. It was afterwards acted for twelve nights ſucceſſively by Mr. Rich's Company at Covent-Garden Theatre, Mrs. Cibber performing Eudocia and Quin Caled. Then the late Duke of Bedford, and ſome of his friends, acted it at Bedford Houſe, the Duke performing Caled; the Earl of Sandwich, Abudah; Mr. Gower (now the Marquis of Stafford) Phocyas; Miſs Gower (afterwards Lady John Sackville) Eudocia, &c. They alſo performed it ſeven times, in the ſummer of 1743, at Woburn-Abbey.

on the Subject of the Union in 1706," and to the Sermon prefixed a preface, without his name, ſetting forth the advantages which have, in fact, accrued to the kingdom of Scotland by its union with England. About the ſame time he alſo printed, with a preface, a tract, entituled, "The Complicated Guilt of the Rebellion," which had been written by Mr. Hughes in the year 1716, but was then ſuppreſſed, as the inſurrection it related to was ſoon after quelled: this tract was loyally and reaſonably judged by by Mr. Duncombe to be equally applicable to the tranſactions of 1745. In the ſummer of 1749, being with his relation, Mr. Brooke, at York, Mr. Duncombe was accidentally inſtrumental to the detection of Archibald Bower, by tranſmitting to Archbiſhop Herring an account of that adventurer's eſcape from the inquiſition, taken by memory from his own mouth, which being publiſhed the year following by Mr. Barron, a diſſenting Miniſter, was diſavowed by Bower; though, when called upon, the miſtakes which he was able to ſpecify, were found to be few and trifling. This was the firſt impeachment of his integrity, and expoſed him to the attacks of that Ithuriel (b) who had before detected Lauder. To the periodical publication, called "The World," Mr. Duncombe contributed one paper, N° 84, "Proſperity and Adverſity, an Allegory." In 1753, he commenced an acquaintance, which ſoon ripened into a friendſhip, with John Earl of Orrery (ſoon after Earl of Corke): this connexion was productive of much pleaſure and emolument to them both, and in ſome degree alſo to the public, his Lordſhip's "Letters to Mr. Duncombe from Italy" having ſince appeared in print. In 1754, Mr. Duncombe drew up "Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Notion of a "God," with ſome occaſional notes; to which he annexed a tranſlation, from Cicero, De Natura Deorum, of the arguments of Q. Lucilius Balbus, the Stoic, in proof of the being, and of the wiſdom, power, and goodneſs, of God. Theſe were read and approved by the Archbiſhop, and others of the author's friends, but were not publiſhed till 1763, when he allowed the late Dr. Dodd to inſert them in the "Chriſtian's Magazine." They have ſince been collected in the Appendix to Archbiſhop Herring's Letters. Horace having always been Mr. Duncombe's favourite author, he had amuſed himſelf for more than thirty years, at different times, with tranſlating ſeveral of his odes, but without any intention of publiſhing them, or of giving a verſion of the whole to the world, till his ſon offered his aſſiſtance for completing the work; and undertook ſome of the Odes and Satires, all the Epodes, and the firſt book of Epiſtles, and added ſeveral imitations from Sanadon, Dacier, &c. Mr. Duncombe compiled notes to the whole, and publiſhed one volume 8vo, in 1757, and the ſecond in 1759. Another edition, in four volumes, 12mo, with ſeveral additional imitations, appeared in 1764. On the death of his excellent, great, and good, friend, Archbiſhop Herring, our author, as a token of his gratitude and affection, collected, in one volume 8vo, the "Seven Sermons on "public occaſions," which his Grace had ſeparately printed in his life-time, and prefixed to them ſome memoirs of his life. This was his laſt publication. With a conſtitution naturally weak and tender, by conſtant regularity, and an habitual ſweetneſs and evenneſs of temper, his life was prolonged to the advanced age of ſeventy nine; when, without any previous painful illneſs, he gradually ceaſed to live. His deceaſe happened on February 13, 1769. He died eſteemed, beloved, and regretted, by all who knew him. He was interred near the remains of his wife, in the burying place of his family, in Aldbury Church, Hertfordſhire, and left one ſon, to whom we are principally indebted for this article, and of whom we ſhall treat in our next.  [Since this article was printed, the Editor, by favour of Anthony Highmore, Eſq. has had an opportunity of peruſing Mr. William Duncombe's "Lucius Junius "Brutus," which is become extremely ſcarce. It has been read with much ſatisfaction. Some of the ſpeeches may perhaps be deemed rather too long and too declamatory for the preſent taſte; but, in general, the work is far from being deſtitute of tragic energy and ſpirit. Titus's character is finely imagined, and well ſuſtained. The laſt act is particularly intereſting, and would afford much ſcope for admirable repreſentation. It was Mr. Duncombe's misfortune that his play appeared when dramatic action was in a very feeble ſtate.

It is not unſuitable to the ſubject before us, to recite a few remarks which the preſent writer has had occaſion to make in another place. They are as follows: "Dra- "matic Poetry did not greatly flouriſh in the reigns of the firſt Princes of the Brunſ- "wick Line. The Cato of Addiſon had introduced a falſe taſte with regard to tragic "compoſition. Young, indeed, in his "Revenge," and his "Buſiris," the latter of "which is very bombaſtic, wrote with a vigour that was his own, and which was not "the reſult of imitation. But the greater part of thoſe who attempted tragedy, ſe- "duced by the poetical excellences of Cato, and with the aſtoniſhing applauſe it had "met with, unwiſely conſidered it as a model of perfection. Hence a cold and decla- "matory manner became the faſhion. Our tragedies abounded with juſt, and ſome- "times noble, moral ſentiments, and with fine ſpeeches in favour of liberty and the " rights of mankind; but they were deſtitute of intereſt, animation, and pathos." Not " even Thomſon is to be exempted, in general, from this cenſure, though in his " Tancred and Sigiſmunda" he became nearer than uſual to the human heart. From " amongſt the numerous tragedies of the time, there are few indeed which could be " ſingled out as having riſen to any extraordinary dramatic excellence. During the " latter part of the reign of King George the Second, a different taſte began to pre- " vail. The folly of the declamatory and merely ſentimental tragedy was diſcerned; " and our writers aimed to diſtinguiſh themſelves by greater buſtle and variety, by " being more ſtriking, vehement, and pathetic. But ſtill no ſingle author can be " mentioned who redeemed the character of the age, and who deſerved to be ranked " with Otway, or even with Rowe. We are ſpeaking of the higher kind of tragic " compoſition; for, with regard to the tragedy of Low Life, Lillo attained to the ut- " moſt height of tenderneſs and pathos (i)."] K.

 [DUNCOMBE (JOHN)*, the only child of William Duncombe, Eſq. by Miſs Elizabeth Hughes, was born Sept. 29, 1729, and was privately baptized by Dr. Herring, then preacher at Lincoln's Inn. Like his father, he was educated in two private ſchools, firſt at Rumford in Eſſex, under his relation the Rev. Mr. Philip Fletcher, afterwards Dean (his eldeſt brother being Biſhop) of Kildare; of whom and his family ſome particulars, by Mr. John Duncombe, may be ſeen in Nichols's Collection of Poems, vol. VI. p. 243; and, ſecondly, under the Rev. Mr. Wyatt, at Felſted, a larger ſeminary in the ſame county, as the abilities of the young ſcholar ſeemed to require a higher ſcope for learning than the firſt could afford. At this ſchool he was ſtimulated by emulation to an exertion of his talents; and, by a cloſe application, he became the firſt ſcholar as well as captain of the ſchool, and gained the higheſt reputation; and, by the ſweetneſs of his temper and manners, and by a diſpoſition to friendſhip, he acquired and preſerved the love of all his companions, and alſo the eſteem of his maſter and family. His early fondneſs for the claſſicks, his cloſe application to acquire knowledge, and great proficiency in the Greek and Latin languages, gained him high reputation, and gave unſpeakable delight to his fond father, who being alſo a very good ſcholar, aſſiſted his ſtudies when at home; and he daily enriched his mind, making a rapid progreſs in thoſe purſuits, which it was ſoon determined ſhould lead him to the clerical profeſſion; for which his inclination, virtuous turn of mind, and unqueſtionable abilities, concurred to render him peculiarly qualified. Archbiſhop Herring, whoſe long and particular friendſhip for Mr. Duncombe's father is already mentioned in the preceding article, having baptiſed and promiſed him his patronage, recommended the College where his Grace had received his own education. Mr. Duncombe was, accordingly, admitted Penſioner of Bene't, or Corpus Chriſti College, at Cambridge, on July 1, 1745; Dr. Green, afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln, being then Maſter; of whom Mr. Duncombe afterwards publiſhed ſome Memoirs in the Gentleman's Magazine (a). By the ſame recommendation he was placed under the tuition of the late Reverend Henry Heaton, B. D. afterwards one of his Grace's Chaplains and Prebendary of Ely, &c. Mr. John Duncombe at ſixteen years of age began his academical courſe of ſtudy, which his taſte, erudition, and urbanity, moſt happily rendered delightful to him; where he alſo enjoyed the ſociety and friendſhip of ſome valuable young men, with whom the affection of youth became matured by age, and ſubſiſted through life, ſupported by a correſpondence, literary and confidential. At the univerſity, he continued to riſe in reputation as a ſcholar and a poet, and was always irreproachable in his moral character. He had the happineſs of forming ſome connections there with men of genius and virtue, which laſted through life; but the firſt and ſtrongeſt attachment, in which he moſt delighted, and which reflected honour on his own merit, was the uninterrupted friendſhip, and conſtant correſpondence, which continued to the laſt, with Mr. Greene, a very reſpectable clergyman of the Dioceſe of Norwich, a man whoſe character for learning and abilities, goodneſs and virtue, have juſtly gained him the eſteem and love of all who have the happineſs of his acquaintance, whoſe teſtimony (b) is real praiſe, who acknowledged the worth of his valuable friend, " and loved his amiable and benevolent ſpirit." In 1750, Mr. Duncombe was with full reputation choſen Fellow of Bene't College, and took his degrees in Arts; and, entering into orders in 1753, was ordained at Kew chapel, in 1753, by Dr. Thomas, Biſhop of Peterborough; was appointed Chaplain to the Earl of Corke in 1754; and, by the recommendation of Archbiſhop Herring, was nominated to the Curacy of Sundridge, in Kent, where he principally reſided, and was much approved and beloved. In 1757, two months only before his Grace's death, the Archbiſhop collated Mr. Duncombe to the united rectories of St. Andrew's and St. Mary Bredman's, in the city of Canterbury, which vacated his Fellowſhip. On that occaſion, in a letter to Mr. Duncombe, ſen. the Archbiſhop ſaid, "That it was a good thing to begin with;" adding, " your ſon will have an opportunity there of ſhewing his talents." The death of the good Prelate, which ſoon followed ſo valuable a proof of his eſteem, ſeemed to check all riſing hopes for the preſent of farther promotion in the church; but, excluſively of all intereſted conſiderations, the amiable friend, the confidential adviſer, the condeſcending and agreeable companion, and entertaining as well as reſpectable correſpondent, were all ſincerely deplored both by the father and ſon, in the loſs of ſo benevolent a character, who had the will and the power to encourage and reward the merit he had foſtered and brought into notice with the indulgence of an adopted relationſhip.

In 1758 and 1759, Mr. Duncombe was aſſiſtant preacher at St. Anne's, Soho, in which pariſh his father then lived, Dr. Squire being rector, who was ſoon after Biſhop of St. David's: he profeſſed great friendſhip for Mr. Duncombe, who was extremely acceptable to a very reſpectable congregation and neighbourhood. His learning and cultivated underſtanding, with a peculiar elegance of ſtyle, and a happy delivery, pathetic without affectation, and forcible without enthuſiaſm, rendered his diſcourſes inſtructive and pleaſing, procuring him a deſerved reputation.

April 20, 1761, Mr. Duncombe married Suſanna, daughter of Joſeph Highmore, Eſq. of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, who was known to the world, not only by his pencil, but by his other extenſive knowledge, and literary purſuits (c). To this lady he had been long attached, his and her parents having lived very many years in great friendſhip and intimacy together; their children were conſequently playmates, and, having a ſimilarity of taſte, became early correſpondents, and naturally lovers. They were married at St. Anne's church, by the Biſhop of St. David's; and ſoon fixed their abode, much to their ſatisfaction, in a prebendal houſe within the precincts of the Cathedral of Canterbury.

(c) See his life, by Mr. Duncombe, in Gent. Mag. vol. L. p. 176; and an affectionate tribute to his memory, in the ſame vol. p. 144

He was ſoon after nominated among the juſtices for the county, and accepted that office; in which, as in the clerical character, he ardently deſired to perform his duty; and in the city, and afterwards at Herne, was a very diligent, uſeful, humane, and able, magiſtrate; giving up time and deep application to qualify himſelf for the important buſineſs he had undertaken, endeavouring always to be juſt and impartial in his deciſions, prudent and conciliating in his advice, and merciful on all occaſions to all the ſons of men, and all the daughters of affliction. The duties of this important office he performed ſeveral years, with great application to obſerve the laws of his country, to do juſtice, preſerve equity, and always remember mercy; for, no one in that department was more open to the poor and friendleſs, having the temper and inclination to propoſe and to act for the ſervice and relief of the diſtreſſed; with ſteadineſs to perſevere with judgment, where truth and right preponderated.

In 1763, Mr. Duncombe was preſented by John Serae, Eſq. of Tring Grove, Hertfordſhire, to the vicarage of Weſt Thurrock in Eſſex, which he held till 1769, by diſpenſation, being Chaplain to Biſhop Squire, which benefice he poſſeſſed confidentially for a minor, through the intereſt of Arnold Duncombe of Stockes, John Duncombe's firſt couſin. In 1766, one of the Six Preacherſhips in the Cathedral becoming vacant, Mr. John Duncombe was recommended for it; and his Grace, Archbiſhop Secker, appointed him to ſucceed to that reputable and eaſy piece of preferment tenable with every other.

In 1770, on the death of Sir John Head, Maſter of St. John's Hoſpital, Canterbury, and St. Nicholas, Harbledow; he applied for the Maſterſhip, which was readily granted by the Honourable and Reverend Frederick Cornwallis, then Archbiſhop, who was well acquainted with ſome of Mr. Duncombe's family. He employed much time and attention to inſpect into the ſtate and property of the paupers to whom he became guardian, endeavouring, as long as health co-operated with his pious inclination, to diffuſe comfort, and to diſpenſe juſtice, through the ſmall communities entruſted to his charge. He examined into the ſtate of the Hoſpitals, and endeavoured to do his duty in the office he had undertaken, with an attention and aſſiduity that accompanied his indefatigable deſire of being ſerviceable to all, and particularly to the loweſt of his fellow-creatures, wherever he had opportunity; which had been his principal inducement for becoming an acting magiſtrate. As there was no emolument, but much trouble annexed to the Maſterſhip, his Grace kindly conſidered that circumſtance; and the Eſſex living having been honourably reſigned to the gentleman for whom it had been held, he was preſented, in September 1773, to the vicarage of Herne, about ſix miles from Canterbury; the Archbiſhop alſo enabling him to hold the two livings, by granting him one of his own chaplainſhips. It was remarkable that three Archbiſhops in ſucceſſion had beſtowed favours on him enow to bear teſtimony to his merit, though inadequate to the expectations with which he had entered the miniſterial function under the auſpices of his firſt able and affectionate patron. Yet no diſappointments ever abated the ardour of his attachment to the profeſſion of his choice. He always chearfully purſued his duty, and felt as ſtrong a zeal to inſtruct his unlearned pariſhioners in a village as ever inſpired his eloquence in the Cathedral: in both and in all the churches, where he was called to exerciſe his abilities, he acquired that general popula-fity which ſeldom fails to accompany the preacher whoſe heart is in earneſt, and whoſe underſtanding and cultivated mind enable him to expreſs that heart, and to enforce the doctrines of truth and righteouſneſs, with elegance, energy, and perſpicuity.

During the Archbiſhop's firſt viſitation in his dioceſe, 1774, he conſecrated St. Andrew's church, then juſt built, inſtead of the old one, which was neceſſarily taken down; for which ceremony Mr. Duncombe had officially ſome communications with his Grace, who was extremely eaſy of acceſs to him. The ſermon preached by Mr. Duncombe on the occaſion gave ſuch general ſatisfaction, that he was deſired to publiſh it.

Mr. Duncombe was ſuddenly taken ill, in the night, June 21, 1785; a ſuffocation rapidly coming on: but a ſurgeon being called, he was almoſt inſtantly relieved, by bleeding—a good ſleep enſued, but he awoke in the morning almoſt ſpeechleſs; a paralytic ſtroke, on the organs of articulation only, ſeemed to have taken place; medical aſſiſtance was applied; he partly recovered articulation; but great debility was perceivable, and he could no longer write as uſual: however, by ſlow degrees, he regained ſtrength, beyond the expectation of his diſtreſſed friends; and appeared, after the ſummer paſſed at Herne, to be quite reſtored to health and ſpirits, and purſued every avocation as before the ſtroke, and with the ſame power of mind. But thoſe who where moſt conſtantly with him, and watched with the tender eye of affection, never loſt the alarm, never reſted without apprehenſion, and perceived, by ſome ſudden ſtarts, and nervous complaints, that all was not ſound within. In January following he coughed much, two or three days, but without any dangerous ſyſtem, till, on the night of the 18th, a ſuffocation, as before, came on: aſſiſtance was immediately procured, but not with the former ſucceſs; the diſorder increaſed, and loſs of life enſued. His gentle ſpirit, as he had lived, departed, eaſy to himſelf in his exit; diſtreſsful alone to all that knew him, to thoſe moſt who knew him beſt—His family, his friends, the ſervants, and the poor, all, by their affliction, ſpoke his real worth. His temper never changed by any deprivation of the world's enjoyments, nor by any bodily ſuffering; no peeviſhneſs, no complaints, eſcaped; though, it is obſerved, that a great alteration often attends ſuch diſorders, and warps the temper naturally good. But he ſilently uſed his piety to the laudable purpoſe of regulating, not only his actions, but his words: yet this was diſcovered rather from obſervation than from his own profeſſion, as he was remarkably modeſt and humble on religious topics; and, for fear of oſtentation on that ſubject, might rather err on the oppoſite ſide from an awful timidity, which might not always give a juſt idea of his unaffected zeal and real faith. His friendſhip, where profeſſed, was ardent; he had a ſpirit in a friend's cauſe, that rarely appeared on other occaſions. He was amiable, affectionate, and tender, as a huſband and father; kind and indulgent, as a maſter; and a protector and advocate to the poor; benevolent to all, as far as his fortune could afford.

He left the amiable partner of his domeſtic comforts, and an only daughter, to lament his loſs.

As Mr. Duncombe had many leiſure hours, he paſſed much time in literary employments, though many were very chearfully given to ſociety. A liſt of his publications is ſubjoined.

A poem "On the death of Frederick Prince of Wales," 1751, printed in the Cambridge verſes on that event.

He publiſhed in 1754 "Horace, b. II. ſat. vii. imitated," and inſcribed to R. O. Cambridge, by Sir Nicholas Nemo, 4to.* This is printed in his Horace.

Prefixed to Jeffery's Miſcellanies, 4to, 1754, is a poem to Mr. Duncombe; and in the preface to that volume is the following paragraph: "His couſin (i. e. Mr. Lewis Duncombe's) Mr. John Duncombe, a zealous and ſucceſsful ſolicitor of my intereſt, like his father, my friend before named, has obliged me with a tranſlation of the concluſion of Vaniere's fifth book, which places the author's filial piety in a very ſtriking light. The ſame gentleman's tranſlation of the 15th book, upon fiſhes, is a very good one, and cannot be overlooked whenever ſeveral hands may undertake the whole of that long and languid production, as a late writer has ſtyled it." His book on fiſhes has not been printed, and the original we believe is in the collection of Mr. Reed.

In vol. IV. of Dodſley's Poems, firſt publiſhed 1754, "An Ode to Health."

In vol. VI. publiſhed 1758, is "An Ode to the Genius of Italy;" occaſioned by the Earl of Corke's going abroad.

He firſt publiſhed "* The Feminead," 1754, which paſſed through two editions, and has been reprinted both in the Poetical Calendar, and in Pearch's Collection.

Four Odes appeared, 1753; viz. "The Prophecy of Neptune;" "On the Death of "the Prince of Wales;" "* Ode preſented to the Duke of Newcaſtle;" and one "* To the Hon. James Yorke," afterwards biſhop of St. David's, and now biſhop of Ely.

Between the year 1753 and 1756, came out ſeparately, "* An Evening Contempla- "tion in a College," being a Parody on Gray's Elegy; reprinted in "The Repoſitory," Other detached poems of Mr. Duncombe's are, "* Verſes to the Author of Clariſſa," publiſhed publiſhed in that work; "* Verſes on the Campaign, 1759," (addreſſed to Sylvanus Urban, and originally printed in the volume for that year); "* To Colonel Clive, on "his arrival in England;" "* On the Loſs of the Ramilies, Captain Taylor, 1760;" "Surry Triumphant, or the Kentiſh mens Defeat, 1773," 4to; a parody on Chevy-Chace; which, for its genuine ſtrokes of humour, elegant poetry, and happy imitation, acquired the author much applauſe. This has been tranſlated into "Nichols's "Select Collections of Poems, 1782," where may be found, alſo, a poem of his on "Stocks Houſe;" a tranſlation of an elegant epitaph, by Biſhop Lowth; and an elegiac "Epitaph at the Grave of Mr. Highmore." Thoſe pieces marked with a ſtar are in The Poetical Calendar, vol. VII. together with a Prologue ſpoken at the Charter-houſe, 1752; a Poem on Mr. Garrick; and Tranſlations from Voltaire. And in vol. X. "The Middleſex Garden;" "Kenſington Gardens;" "Farewel to Hope;" "On a Lady's ſending the Author a Ribbon for his Watch;" "On Captain Corn-"wallis's Monument;" "Prologue to Amalaſont;" "Epigrams."

He publiſhed three Sermons; one "On the Thankſgiving, Nov. 29, 1759," preached at St. Anne's, Weſtminſter, and publiſhed at the requeſt of the pariſhioners; another, "preached at the Conſecration of the Pariſh-Church of St. Andrew, Canter-"bury," July 4, 1774 (d); and one, "On a General Faſt, Feb. 27, 1778," alſo preached at St. Andrew's, Canterbury (e); and ſo well approved, that by the particular deſire of the pariſh it appeared in print under the title of "The Civil War, between "the Iſraelites and Benjamites, illuſtrated and applied."

(d) Gent. Mag. vol. XLIV. p. 431.

(e) Ibid. XLVIII. 131.

He publiſhed, with his father, in 1766, a tranſlation of Horace, in 8vo; and, in 1767, another edition, with many enlargements and corrections, in 4 vols. 12mo.

He tranſlated the Huetiana," in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1771.

In 1774, he tranſlated "Batteley's Antiquitates Rutupinæ (f)."

(f) Ibid. p. 128.

He wrote "The Hiſtorical Account of Dr. Dodd's Life," 8vo. 1777; and was the tranſlator of "Sherlock's Letters of an Engliſh Traveller," 1ſt edition, 4to. The 2d edition, 8vo, was tranſlated by Mr. Sherlock himſelf.

In 1778, he publiſhed "an Elegy, written in Canterbury Cathedral (g)."

(g) Ibid. XLIV. 133.

In 1784, he publiſhed Select Works of the Emperor Julian," 2 vols. 8vo.

In 1784, he was principally the author of "The Hiſtory and Antiquities of Reculver "and Herne," which forms the XVIIIth Number of the Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica (b); to which work he alſo contributed, in 1785, the XXXth number, containing, "The Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Three Archiepiſcopal Hoſpitals in and near Canterbury (i)," which he dedicated to the preſent Archbiſhop.

(b) Ibid. LIV. 39.

(i) Ibid. LIV. 615.

He was the Editor of ſeveral other works; all of which were elucidated by his critical knowledge and explanatory notes; viz. 1. "Letters from Several Eminent Perſons, "deceaſed, including the Correſpondence of John Hughes, Eſq. and ſeveral of his "Friends; publiſhed from the Originals, with Notes." Of theſe there have been two editions; the laſt in three volumes. 2. "Letters from Italy; by the late Right Hon. "John Earl of Corke and Orrery, with Notes," 1773. Theſe have gone through two editions. 3. "Letters from the late Archbiſhop Herring, to William Duncombe, Eſq. "deceaſed; from the year 1728 to 1757, with Notes and an Appendix, 1777."

He was alſo the author of a Letter ſigned "RUSTICUS," in "The World," vol. I. N° 36; of ſeveral Letters in "The Connoiſſeur," being the "Gentleman of Cam-"bridge, A. B." mentioned in the laſt number. And in the Gentleman's Magazine, his communications in biography, poetry, and criticiſm, during the laſt twenty years of his life, were frequent and valuable. Many of them are without a name; but his miſcellaneous contributions were uſually diſtinguiſhed by the ſignature of CRITO (k)].

 [DUNS (JOHN), ſurnamed SCOTUS, an eminent Scholaſtic Divine, who flouriſhed in the latter end of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth century, was born at Dunſtance, in the pariſh of Emildun, near Alnwick in Northumberland. Some writers have contended that he was a Scotſman, and that the place of his birth was Duns, a village eight miles from England. Others again have aſſerted that he was an Iriſhman. The matter is of no great conſequence; but it is probable that he was a native of South Britain; for he is treated as an Engliſhman by all the early authors who ſpeak of him; and, in a copy of one of his manuſcripts, written nearly at the time in which he lived, his name, country, and the place where he was born, are given as ſtated above (a). When a youth, he joined himſelf to the Minorite Friers of Newcaſtle; and, being ſent by them to Oxford, he was admitted into Merton College, of which, in due time, he became fellow. Here, beſides the eminence he acquired in ſcholaſtic theology, he is ſaid to have been very eminent for his knowledge in the civil and canon law, and to have been well ſkilled in logic, natural philoſophy, metaphyſics, mathematics, and aſtronomy. Upon the removal of William Varron from Oxford to Paris, in 1301, Duns Scotus was chosen to supply his place in the Theological Chair; which office he sustained with such prodigious reputation, that more than thirty-thousand scholars came to the University to be his hearers. This number, though confidently asserted by several writers, we admit, with great hesitation. After John Duns had lectured three years at Oxford, he was called, in 1304, to Paris, where he was honoured with the degrees, first of Bachelor, and then of Doctor in Divinity. At a meeting of the Monks of his order at Tholouse, in 1307, he was created Regent; and about the same time he was placed at the head of the Theological Schools at Paris. Here he is affirmed to have first broached the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, and to have supported his position by two hundred arguments. Absurd and ridiculous as his reasons must have been, he did not want admirers. Such was his reputation, that the members of the University of Paris ran violently into the opinion; instituted the Feast of the immaculate Conception; and issued an edict, that no one, who did not embrace the same opinion, should be admitted to Academical Degrees. In the year 1308, Duns Scotus was ordered by Gonsalvo, the General of the Minorites, to remove to Cologn, on the road to which he was met in solemn pomp, and conducted thither by the whole body of the citizens. Not long after his arrival in this city, he was seized with an apoplexy, which carried him off, on the eighth of November, 1308, in the forty-third, or, as others say, in the thirty-fourth, year of his age (b). There is a melancholy story related concerning the mode of his death; which is, that when he fell down of his apoplexy he was immediately interred as dead; but that, afterwards coming to his senses, he languished in a most miserable manner in his coffin, beating his head and hands against its sides, till he died in good earnest. This story, though generally treated as a fable, is hinted at by Mr. Wharton, who says, "Apoplexiâ correptus, et festinato nimis, ut volunt, funere elatus (c)." The fact, whether true or not, gave occasion to the following epitaph:

John Duns was at first a follower of Thomas Aquinas; but, differing from his master on the question concerning the efficacy of divine grace, he formed a distinct sect, which separation produced the denominations of the Thomists and Scotists, who were engaged for centuries in eager and trifling disputes. The names of the two sects still subsist in some of the Roman Catholic schools. On account of Duns Scotus's acuteness in disputation, he was called THE MOST SUBTILE DOCTOR; but his ingenuity was wholly employed in embarrassing, with new fictions of abstraction, and with other scholastic chimeras, subjects already sufficiently perplexed (e). He was the author of a vast number of works, several of which have been separately published. A list of them may be seen in Henry Wharton's Appendix to Cave's "Historia Literaria." In 1474, the English Franciscans printed an impression of the larger part of John Duns's writings. At length, the whole of them (some few still remaining in manuscript excepted) were collected together by Luke Wadding, illustrated with notes, and published at Lyons in 1639, in twelve tomes, folio (f). Scotus and his annotator are now equally neglected. Mackenzie has given an account of the subjects upon which John Duns has treated; whence it appears how absurd were many of the questions that called forth the exertions of his talents (g). But such was the spirit of the times. In a better age, genius and abilities like his might have been of lasting benefit to posterity.

It may not be unamusing to recite an example of the extravagant praises that have been bestowed upon Duns Scotus by his followers. "He was so consummate a philosopher, that he could have been the inventor of philosophy, if it had not before existed. His knowledge of all the mysteries of Religion was so profound and perfect, that it was rather intuitive certainty than belief. He described the divine nature as if he had seen God;—the attributes of celestial spirits, as if he had been an angel;—the felicities of a future state, as if he had enjoyed them;—and the ways of providence, as if he had penetrated into all its secrets. He wrote so many books, that one man is hardly able to read them; and no one man is able to understand them. He would have written more, if he had composed with less care and accuracy. Such was our immortal Scotus, the most ingenious, acute, and subtile, of the sons of men (h).]

DUPPA (a) (BRIAN), ſucceſſively Biſhop of Chicheſter, Saliſbury, and Wincheſter, in the XVIIth century, was born at Lewiſham in Kent [A], March 10, 1588-9 (b). He was educated at Weſtminſter-ſchool in the quality of a King's ſcholar; and learned Hebrew of Dr. Lancelot Andrews, then Dean of that church. Thence he was elected ſtudent of Chriſt Church, Oxon, in May, 1605 (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 6, 1609 (d). In 1612 he was elected Fellow of All-Souls College (e); and, the 28th of May, 1614, took the degree of Maſter of Arts (f). Afterwards he went into Holy Orders; and travelled abroad, particularly into France and Spain (g). In 1619, he was unanimouſly elected one of the Proctors to that Univerſity; in which office he acquitted himſelf well, being an excellent ſcholar, and a genteel and diſcreet perſon (h). On the 1ſt of July, 1625, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor in Divinity (i); at which time he was Chaplain to the Prince Palatine. He was alſo Chaplain to Lionel Cranfield, Earl of Dorſet, by whoſe intereſt and recommendation to the King he was appointed Dean of Chriſt's Church, in Oxford, June 30, 1629, and inſtalled the 28th of November following (k). To this church and college he was a great benefactor [B]. In 1632 and 1633, he was Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford (l), which office he diſcharged with great moderation and prudence. Being conſtituted, in 1634, Chancellor of the church of Sarum, he was collated thereto the 19th of June (m). Soon after he was made Chaplain to King Charles I, and appointed, in 1638 (n), Tutor to Charles Prince of Wales, and afterwards to his brother the Duke of York (o): which proved his future happineſs, being then accounted a moſt excellent man. On the 19th of May, 1638, he was preſented to the rectory of Petworth in Suſſex (p); and, about the ſame time, nominated to the biſhoprick of Chicheſter. He had reſtitution of the temporalities the 12th of June (q), and was conſecrated the 17th of the ſame month (r). In the year 1641, he was tranſlated to the See of Saliſbury, but received no benefit from it, on account of the enſuing confuſions (s). Upon the ſuppreſſion of Epiſcopacy, he went and waited on the King and Prince at Oxford, where he continued ſome time. After the ſurrendering of that city, he attended his Majeſty (with whom he was a great favourite) in other places; particularly during his impriſonment in the Iſle of Wight (*) [C]: and is ſaid, by ſome, to have aſſiſted him in compoſing his "Pourtraicture" (t) [D]. It is certain, the King intruſted him with matters of the greateſt moment and concern, eſpecially in ſupplying the vacant biſhopricks; and he was continued in the ſame truſt under King Charles II. during the uſurpation (u). After the barbarous death of his moſt gracious maſter, our worthy Biſhop retired to Richmond, in Surrey, where he ſpent moſt of his time in great devotion and ſolitude till the reſtoration of his royal pupil King Charles II. Then his paſt ſervices and ſuffering were not forgotten. For he was tranſlated to the rich biſhoprick of Wincheſter [E], to which he was elected September 10, 1660, and confirmed the 4th of October following. He was alſo made Lord Almoner (w). In the beginning of the ſame year, before his tranſlation, he was appointed one of the Viſitors of the Univerſity of Oxford, to put out thoſe, who had been thruſt into the places of the ejected Maſters and Fellows, during the times of confuſion (x). About the year 1661, he began an hoſpital at Richmond, which he tolerably well endowed [F]. He had deſigned ſome other works of piety and charity, but was prevented vented by death: for, he enjoyed his new dignity little more than a year and a half. He died at Richmond, March 26, 1662, aged ſeventy-three years and ſixteen days (y). A few hours before he expired, King Charles II. honoured him with a viſit, and kneeling down by the bed-ſide begged his bleſſing, which the Biſhop, with one hand on his Majeſty's head, and the other lifted up to heaven, gave with a moſt paſſionate zeal (z). After his body had lain ſome time in ſtate at York-houſe in the Strand, it was decently conveyed thence, the 24th of April following, to the abbey-church of Weſtminſter, where it was buried on the north ſide of King Edward the Confeſſor's chapel (a). Soon after a large marble-ſtone was laid over his grave; and a monument, with an inſcription, erected to his memory [G]. By his will, he bequeathed ſeveral ſums to charitable uſes [H]. He died as he lived, honoured and beloved by all that knew him, being a perſon of ſuch exemplary piety, eminent candour, humility, and meekneſs; and of ſo clear a character, that he left not the leaſt ſpot upon his life or function (b). Moreover, he was a man of excellent parts, a very good preacher, and an ornament to his profeſſion, not only by the qualifications of his mind, but alſo by the comelineſs of his perſon, and gracefulneſs to his deportment, which rendered him worthy the ſervice of a Court, and every way fit to ſtand before Princes (c). He wrote a few things; of which we ſhall give an account in the note [I].

 [It is aukwardly expreſſed in the text, that Dr. Duppa's being appointed tutor to Charles Prince of Wales, and afterwards to his brother the Duke of York, proved his future happineſs. The appointment contributed more to his promotion than to his felicity. It cannot be ſaid that he was happy in his royal pupils; ſince Charles became a profligate character, and the Duke of York a bigoted Papiſt. Fortunately for the good Prelate, he did not live to ſee theſe evils in their full magnitude; for, in that caſe, he would have ſincerely lamented that his inſtructions had not produced a better effect.

It is not improbable that Biſhop Duppa might be of ſome aſſiſtance to King Charles the Firſt in the compoſition of the " Eikon Baſilike." This was natural enough from the connection he had with that unfortunate Monarch, and the eſteem in which he was held by him.

Irreligious as Charles the Second was, he muſt, when he kneeled down at Duppa's bed-ſide, have had a ſtrong feeling of what he owed to his old and venerable tutor. The zeal and devotion, with which the Biſhop beſtowed his bleſſing upon him, muſt have been very affecting, and ought to have made a laſting impreſſion upon his mind. It would be no bad ſubject for a picture.

The manner in which Burnet hath ſpoken of Dr. Duppa is a proof of the haſty way in which that hiſtorian

torian ſometimes wrote. As he did not come to reſide in London till more than ten years after Duppa's deceaſe, it is not probable that he could perſonally know much of that Prelate's character. Burnet, in ſaying that Duppa was no way fit for the poſt of King's tutor, ſeems to have been guilty of a raſh aſſertion. Granger, on the contrary, declares, that Duppa was in all reſpects well qualified for that important office. Nor was there any juſt reaſon for Burnet's aſſerting, that the Biſhop did not make the uſe of the great wealth which flowed in upon him that was expected. That he was a liberal and beneficent man is apparent from all his conduct. When he lived in retirement at Richmond during the Uſurpation, and was deprived of his epiſcopal revenues, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by being hoſpitable, generous, and charitable, to a degree beyond his fortune. 'It is 'certain,' ſays Mr. Granger, 'that he remitted no 'leſs than thirty thouſand pounds to his tenants, and 'that he left ſixteen thouſand pounds to be expended 'in acts of charity and munificence.' The ſums ſpecified in Note [H] amount to no more than ſix thouſand three hundred and ſeventy pounds. What enabled biſhop Duppa to exerciſe ſo great a degree of beneficence were the fines which were repaid to him for the renewal of leaſes, or granting freſh ones, after the Reſtoration. By theſe he is ſaid to have received fifty thouſand pounds. Though Dr. Burnet was blamable in what he ſays concerning our Prelate, it is not true, as is aſſerted in Note [H], that Burnet ſeldom or never ſpeaks well of any of his Order. Inſtances to the contrary appear in his writings, though perhaps they are not ſo frequent as might be wiſhed. When Dr. Duppa was biſhop of Chicheſter, he publiſhed "Jonſonius Verbius," which is a Collection of Verſes in praiſe of Ben Jonſon and his works, by above thirty different hands (14). This ſhews that the biſhop was a reader and admirer of our Poets, and is a preſumptive evidence that he was a man of taſte.]

DUREL (JOHN), a learned Divine in the XVIIth century, who wrote ſeveral pieces in vindication of the Church of England, was born at St. Helier's [A] in the Iſle of Jerſey, in the year 1625 (a). About the end of the year 1640, he was entered a Student of Merton-college in Oxford; but, when that city came to be garriſoned for King Charles I. and the ſeat of the Muſes was turned into a ſeat of war, Mr. Durel, after a ſtay of two years there, retired into France: and, having ſtudied for ſome time at Caen in Normandy, took the degree of Maſter of Arts, in the Sylvanian college of that place, on the 8th of July 1664 (b). Then he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, and aſſiduouſly purſued it above two years, at Saumur, under the famous Moſes Amyrault (c) Divinity Reader in that Proteſtant univerſity. In the year 1647 he returned into his native country, and continued there for ſome time among his relations (d). But, after the reduction of that iſland by the Parliament-forces in 1651, having been concerned in the defence of it for the King (e), he was forced to withdraw, or rather was expelled thence. Whereupon he withdrew to Paris, and received Epiſcopal Ordination in the chapel of Sir Richard Browne, Knt. then his Majeſty's (f) Reſident in France, from the hands of Thomas, Biſhop of Galloway, tranſlated after the King's Reſtoration to Orkney [B]. Not finding any employment in or about Paris, he came to St. Malo's; and had no ſooner acquainted his friends with the condition he was in, but the Reformed Church of Caen invited him very kindly, by an expreſs, to come and be one of their Miniſters, in the abſence of the moſt learned Samuel Bochart [C], who was going into Sweden. Not long after, the Landgrave of Heſſe having written to the Miniſters of Paris, to ſend him a Miniſter to preach in French at his Highneſs's Court, he was by them recommended to that Prince, of whom likewiſe he received a very kind invitation by ſeveral letters (g). But not thinking fit to accept of either of thoſe places [D], he choſe to be Chaplain to the Duke de la Force, father to the Princeſs of Turenne; in which ſtation he continued above eight years (h). Upon the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he came over to England, and was very inſtrumental in ſetting up the new Epiſcopal French church at the Savoy in London [E], wherein he Wood, Camden, and many other writers, but St. Helier.

[B] And received Epiſcopal Ordination——from the hands of Thomas, Biſhop of Galloway, &c.] Being a native of Jerſey, ordained in France, and by a Scotch Biſhop, that made a certain writer (2) doubt, whether he was Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Preſbyter, a Preſbyter of the Church of England, as he ſtyles himſelf in his "Vindication, &c." But that author ſhewed therein both his ignorance and malice: for, the inhabitants of Jerſey being true and faithful members of the Church of England, any one of them that had received Epiſcopal ordination might juſtly call himſelf a Preſbyter of the Church of England.

[E] And was very inſtrumental in ſetting up the new Epiſcopal French church at the Savoy in London.] We have a full account, in one of his books (4), of the origin and foundation of that Epiſcopal Church, which we ſhall give in his own words. Thither the French, who 'lived in thoſe parts, did uſually reſort, to ſave 'themſelves the labour and toil of going up ſo great 'a way into the city. This they found ſo commodi-'ous, that, after the Duke was dead, they reſolved to 'ſet up a French church about the Strand, and wholly to he officiated first on Sunday, 14 July, 1661, and continued to officiate there for some years after, with great liking and applause (i). In April 1663, he was made Prebendary of North Aulton in the cathedral church of Salisbury, being then Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty (k); and, the 11th of February following, succeeded Dr. Hawles in a canonry of Windsor (l). On the 1st of July 1668, he was installed into the fourth prebend of Durham (m), and had a rich donative conferred on him (n). The 28th of February, 1669-70, he was actually created Doctor of Divinity (o), by virtue of the Chancellor's letters [F]. In 1677 King Charles II. gave him the deanery of Windsor, vacant by the death of Dr. Bruno Ryves, into which he was installed July 27 (p). He had also the great living of Witney in Oxfordshire conferred on him (q). All which preferments he obtained, partly through his own qualifications, being not only a good Scholar, but also 'a perfect Courtier, skilful in the arts of getting into the favour of 'great men;' and partly through his great interest with King Charles II, to whom he was personally known both in Jersey and France (r). Mr. Wood thinks (s), that, had he lived some years longer, he would undoubtedly have been promoted to a bishopric. He published several things [G]; and, among the rest, 1. 'to leave going to that of the city, except such men 'as continued to pay their usual stipend (as some there 'were that did) towards the maintenance of their 'ministers, and others sometimes upon occasion. 'But this notwithstanding, those of London so highly 'resented the erecting of that new church, that ever 'since they endeavoured by all means possible to pull 'it down. Their last assault against it was after the 'Restoration of King Charles II, when they made 'their addresses to his Majesty, to have the French 'congregation at Westminster (for so it was called, as 'being within the liberties thereof) broken, and for-'bidden ever to assemble any more; giving for reason 'of this their humble petition, that the said congre-'gation was not established by any lawful authority, 'and that by their privilege all those of the French 'language, wheresoever they lived, in either of the 'cities of London or Westminster, have but one only 'place where they are permitted to assemble for the 'publick worship of God in their own tongue. They 'of Westminster, to keep up their congregation, pre-'sented their humble suit to his Majesty, that he 'would be pleased to consider what trouble and toil 'it would be for them, especially such as had great 'families and young children, to go every Sunday to 'church at such a distance. The King, all things 'considered, found out a way to grant them both 'their requests; by breaking the French congrega-'tion of Westminster, according to the desire of those 'of the Walloons congregation of London, as being 'established indeed without any lawful authority; and 'by setting up a new church under the immediate 'jurisdiction of the Bishop of London, wherein 'divine service should be performed in French, ac-'cording to the book of Common-prayer; his Ma-'jesty being pleased to provide for the maintenance 'of a minister, to be therein a constant preacher; 'and leaving it to every one's liberty to join with 'those of the old Walloons congregation of London, 'or to become members of the new French church 'of Westminster, which was likewise permitted by 'his Majesty's letter to add to that Minister, for whom 'his Majesty was to provide, as many others as by 'them should be thought convenient, provided the 'said ministers be presented to the Bishop of London 'for the time being, to be by him instituted.'

[H] A view of the Government and public worship of God in the Reformed Churches, &c.] In this book, the learned Author puts the Controversy between the established Church of England and the Dissenters upon its right foot. For, the Presbyterians having given out, 'That the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas 'were as much averse to the Government and publick 'Worship of God in the Church of England as them-'selves,' he shews, in Sect. 1, the conformity of the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas with the Reformed Church of England in these particulars; because, those Churches that follow the Confession of Augsburg, have the same Ceremonies with the Church of England; have subordination of Pastors, and, in some, Bishops and Archbishops, both name and thing; set Forms of Prayers; Holy-days, and Fast-days; magnificent Churches, Organs, Surplice, Church-Ornaments, Cross in Baptism, receiving the Communion kneeling, &c. All which he confirms by quotations from authentic writers, and by letters sent to him by the Ministers of most of the Reformed Congregations in the several parts of France. In Sect II. he maintains, that in those things, in which some Reformed Churches beyond the Seas differ from the Reformed Church of England, they do not pretend she should rather conform to them, than they to her, and that they never desired the abolition of our Church-government, or of our Book of Common-prayer, but that they approve of both, and wish we may ever enjoy the benefit of both in peace and quietness.—— At the end, there is an Appendix, containing, among other things, the Preface to the "Agenda," or Form of Prayer used in the Churches of Poland and Lithuania; and a letter of Dr. Peter Du Moulin, wherein he informs our author, that in 1651, Archbishop Usher told him, David Blondel had concluded his "Apologia pro Hieronymi sententia," (i. e. his book in favour of Presbytery) with words to this purpose: 'By all that we have said to assert the rights of the 'Presbytery, we do not intend to invalidate the 'antient and Apostolical Constitution of Episcopal 'Preeminence. Mr. Wood gives the followiug character of him: 'He was a perſon of unbiaſſed and fixed principles, 'untainted and ſteady loyalty, as conſtantly adhering to the ſinking cauſe and intereſt of 'his Sovereign in the worſt of times; who dared with an unſhaken and undaunted re-'ſolution to ſtand up and maintain the honour and dignity of the Engliſh Church, when 'ſhe was in her loweſt and deplorable condition.  [DURELL (DAVID), a learned Divine, and Biblical Critic, of the Church of England, was a native of the Iſland of Jerſey (a). From this circumſtance it may reaſonably be conjectured that he was a relation, perhaps a deſcendant, of Dr. John Durel, of whom an account is given in the preceding article. That the Durells were a very reſpectable family in Jerſey is evident from there being ſeveral perſons of the name who received conſiderable promotions both in that Iſland and in England during the reign of King George the Second. From Dr. David Durell's age at the time of his deceaſe, it appears that he was born in 1728. After going through a proper courſe of Grammatical Education, he was matriculated at the Univerſity of Oxford, and became a Member of Pembroke College, where, on the 20th of June, 1753, he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts (b). After this, he was choſen a Fellow of Hertford College, and was admitted principal of the ſame, in the year 1757, in the room of Dr. William Sharp, who reſigned that office, and was afterwards Regius Profeſſor of Greek in the Univerſity, and Rector of Eaſt-Hampſtead in Berks (c). On the 23d of April, 1760, Mr. Durell took the Degree of Bachelor in Divinity, and that of Doctor on the 14th of January, 1764 (d). Previouſly to the taking his laſt Degree, he publiſhed, in 1763, his firſt learned work, entituled, "The Hebrew Text of the Parallel Prophecies of Jacob and "Moſes, relating to the Twelve Tribes; with a Tranſlation and Notes: and the "various Lections of near Forty MSS. work our author exhibited a valuable and decisive proof of his skill in Oriental Literature, and of his capacity and judgment in elucidating the sacred Scriptures. In 1767, he was made a Prebendary of Canterbury, in the room of Dr. Potter, who had resigned (e). The only remaining preferment, which Dr. Durell appears to have been possessed of, was the Vicarage of Tysehurst in Sussex (f). In 1772, he gave a farther evidence of his great proficiency in Biblical learning, by publishing "Critical Remarks "on the Books of Job, Psalms, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles." Quarto. Oxford, printed at the Clarendon Press. In the Preface to this performance, the author pleads for a new translation of the Bible. 'In the mean time,' says he, 'hoping this very 'desirable period may not be far distant, I have thought it my duty to lay before the 'public some part of the materials which have laid by me for a considerable time. My 'motive for so doing is, that they may be duly weighed in the interval; in order, that, 'if they meet with approbation, they may be serviceable on that occasion, and that 'others, blessed with greater abilities and advantages, may hereby be induced to pur-'sue the same course.' Dr. Durell, having concluded that we have, on some accounts, advantages superior, in the present day, for the purpose of a new translation, to what were enjoyed in the beginning of the last age, adds as follows: "Is it pretended that the times will not bear a new version? I answer by another question. Is the temper of the people of these days totally different from that of their ancestors, at the distance of six generations? On the introduction of the present version into our Churches in the year 1611, we read of no tumult, clamour, nor discontent. The same pacific disposition prevailed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when more than one new translation received the Royal sanction. The godly, the learned, the ingenious, would doubtless rejoice; the gay, the thoughtless, the voluptuous, would still continue unconcerned and unaffected; but the Caviller, the Sceptic, and the Deist, would hereby find the sharpest and most trusty arrows of their quiver blunted; and the illiterate vulgar, who always depart reluctantly from old institutions, would soon be reconciled; when, instead of an invasion of their property, they experienced that the old debased coin was only called in, in order that they might be paid in new, of true sterling value. The minds of the people cannot be hereby unsettled. All the leading articles of religion will remain undisturbed. If there be any foundation for this plea, it seems to me (with due deference to Government may I be understood to hint it) to be derived from the legislature itself; which, in its acts of perpetual duration, does not appear to allow sufficiently for the mutability of human affairs, or the changes incident to time: whereas were it enacted, that these acts should all be revised at the distance of half a century, many of the inconveniences complained of would no longer exist; and the almost sacred veneration the people have for things, which not their merit, but antiquity alone, has consecrated, would gradually subside, and leave no traces in their minds. But may not the eagerness for reformation carry matters to too great a length? Innovations, it is confessed, are often dangerous; and the spirit of zealots the most uncontroulable of any other: but, in this case, the bounds would be clear and distinct; and there would be no cause to fear, when the commission expressly set forth the limits of its extent, that cool and discreet subjects would overleap them. But to give the argument its full force; would the innovator herewith rest satisfied? Would he not desire, after this, a revisal of the Liturgy, with the thirty-nine articles; and proceed from ecclesiastical to civil matters? These are not necessary, perhaps not probable, consequences; but, allowing they were, what nobler objection could the Parliament, could the Convocation, have under their contemplation, than the petitions of serious well-disposed men, presented, at proper intervals, with becoming humility? praying,—that means might be devised, the most efficacious for quieting their conscientious scruples, and setting them forward in the way of religious improvement (g)." In the body of the work, Dr. Durell, besides his criticisms on particular passages, has introduced some general observations on the books to which his Remarks are confined. What he has advanced with relation to the design of the book of Job, and the time in which it was written, is so candid and judicious, that we shall insert it below [A]. For the same reason, we shall add what he has said concerning Solomon's

[A] We shall insert it below.] 'Whether such a 'personage as Job ever existed is a matter of very 'doubtful disputation. The affirmative side of the 'question appears probable, when we find him ranked 'by Ezekiel with Noah and Daniel, and referred to 'by St. James. But, on the other hand, the silence of 'Moses, and all succeeding historians, concerning 'him, is apt to induce the contrary opinion. The 'prophet might, perhaps, chuse to mention Job pre-'ferably to Abraham, or any other righteous man, 'because the book had lately been published, and, 'particularly, because Job is there represented as 'having obtained his deliverance (as the two others 'had done, one from the flood, the other from the 'den of lions) by his righteousness. This suited the 'prophet's argument; and the instance would equally 'serve his purpose, whether the character were real 'or fictitious. The same holds likewise in regard to 'St. James; who, wanting to recommend patience by 'an example, would naturally refer his countrymen 'to this book. But, had there ever been such a per-'son as Job, from the age to which he lived (140 'years), we may probably fix his æra to the time of 'Abraham; and as he is said to have been an Idu-'mæan, (or an inhabitant of Arabia Deserta, which 'bordered upon Canaan), it might be expected that 'there would have been some intercourse between 'these great and good men; that Abraham, in his 'journeys to Egypt, would have taken an opportunity 'of doing him honour, as he did to Melchisedec; or 'that Job would gladly have embraced any oppor-'tunity of making himself known to the Father of the Faithful.

Solomon's Song [B]. Our author intended to publiſh ſome remarks on the prophetic writings; but this deſign he was prevented from accompliſhing, by his comparatively premature death, which happened when he was only forty-ſeven years of age. He died at his College, on the 19th of October, 1775, and was buried at St. Peter's in the Eaſt, Oxford, where there is an inſcription on his grave-ſtone, with his arms. By his laſt will, he bequeathed twenty pounds a year, ariſing from money by him lent for the building of Oxford Market; one half of which ſum is given to the principal of Hertford College; the other, to the two Senior Fellows. If there happens to be but one Senior Fellow, then, two thirds are allotted to the principal, and the remaining third to the Fellow, for Commons (b). From all that we have heard concerning Dr. Durell's character, we underſtand him to have been a gentleman of eminent piety and goodneſs.]

'Faithful. The ſame may be ſaid in regard to the 'ſucceeding patriarchs, if he be ſuppoſed to have 'lived later. But, if we bring him down to the 'time of Moſes (which is the lateſt period that can 'be aſſigned), it will appear ſtill more extraordinary 'that he, who lived in ſight of Mount Sinai, ſhould 'have continued to walk ſtill by the light of Nature 'only, when he muſt have had ſenſible demonſtra-'tion of God's revelation of his will, and might 'have put himſelf under the more immediate direc-'tion of Jehovah. Beſides, what would make Job's 'character ſtill more extraordinary is, that he ſhould 'always have retained his integrity amidſt the con-'tagion of bad example; for, the wild Arabs, from 'the days of Iſhmael to theſe days, have uniformly 'been rovers and free-booters, as was predicted of 'them, Gent. xvi. 12. Whereas, if we ſuppoſe this 'poem to be merely of the dramatic kind (the 'eſſential requiſites of which it has), it would anſwer 'the author's purpoſe beſt to create a ſubject, that 'hiſtoric truth might not embarraſs him in any cir-'cumſtance conducing to the end he propoſed.

'Now, if we ſuppoſe the author to have been a 'Jew, and that he wrote his book with a deſign of 'comforting his captive brethren, the book will be 'found perfectly conſiſtent with this hypotheſis; 'which is to ſhew, that temporal evils are not always 'intended by Providence as puniſhments for paſt 'crimes, but alſo for trials of virtue, and for the 'benefit of inſtructive example to others; and that 'patience and ſubmiſſion to the will of Heaven is both 'the indeſpenſable duty of perſons under affliction, 'and the moſt probable means of procuring them 'deliverance and reſtoration. This exactly quadrates 'with the caſe of the Jews. They were carried to 'Babylon, not merely for the puniſhment of their 'idolatries and wickedneſs, but alſo that they might 'be tried in the furnace of affliction, which thoroughly purified them from idolatrous practices at leaſt; and 'with this farther view likewiſe, that the moſt con-'ſpicuous part of the then known world might be 'more acquainted with their hiſtory and their ſacred 'books, which contained both the paſt diſpenſations 'of God's particular providence, and his future de-'ſigns with reſpect to mankind. They were alſo 'taught by their prophets to look for a reſtoration 'after a ſtated period, and exhorted to wait patiently 'and quietly till the change ſhould come.

'It is ſurpriſing, that the name of the author of ſo 'excellent a compoſition ſhould always have been 'concealed from the world. What his motives for 'ſuch concealment were, or who he was, it would 'be loſt time to enquire, as it is now perhaps im-'poſſible to diſcover. That he wrote about the time 'of the captivity appears to me clearly from the 'many Chaldee words, and Chaldee termination of 'Hebrew words throughout the book; but a ſtill 'more forcible argument is, the frequent indirect 'alluſion to the Pentateuch, and other books of the 'Jewiſh Canon, whereby the author inadvertently 'betrays himſelf.' Of theſe texts Dr. Durell has added a liſt, collected by a late ingenious clergyman, together with ſome remarks and claſſical illuſtrations by the ſame hand, and concludes with 'thinking it 'clear that the author of this book was a Jew, and 'that he lived after the time of Moſes, and before 'the return of the Jews from their captivity (1).'

[B] We ſhall add what he has ſaid concerning Solomon's Song.] 'This poem ſeems to be of a mixed 'nature, between the dramatic and the paſtoral. The 'unities of time, place, and characters, are not ſo 'ſtrictly obſerved as in later compoſitions of either 'kind. There are traces of ſeven different days, 'during which interval the marriage-feſtival laſted 'among the Jews; ſee Gen. xxxix. 27. Judg. xiv. '12. The ſcene ſometimes repreſents the country, 'ſometimes the city, &c. and Solomon appears, at 'times, in his own real character, preſently after in 'that of a ſhepherd, then re-aſſumes his own again. 'The Dramatis Perſonæ, beſides the bridegroom and 'bride, are the watchmen, or ſuch perſons as are 'occaſionally met with on the road, and a chorus of 'maidens, attendants on the bride. The language is 'ſometimes lofty and ſpirited, ſometimes only ſuit-'able to ſhepherds. Many of the words, occurring 'in no other place, cannot have their preciſe ſenſe 'eaſily aſcertained; neither can we always ſee the 'juſtice of all the compariſons, which probably pro-'ceeds from our ignorance, not only of the terms, but 'of the manners, and other circumſtances.

'This poem is generally conſidered as an Epitha-'lamium, compoſed by Solomon, on his marriage 'with the daughter of Pharaoh, the King of Egypt; 'and this appears to me the only point of view in 'which it ought to be conſidered. In reſpect to the 'myſtical ſenſe which it is ſuppoſed to contain, I muſt 'frankly acknowledge, that I cannot perceive the 'leaſt foundation for it. This notion, I ſuppoſe, 'was originally derived from the Targum, and adopted 'ſoon after by ſome of the Fathers, who, with more 'piety than judgment, thought, that, as St. Paul 'compares the union of Chriſt with his Church to 'a marriage, this poem ought alſo to be interpreted 'with reference to the ſame ſubject. But how is it 'conſiſtent with this idea, that neither the name of 'God, nor of Chriſt, ever occurs in it? that there 'is not one religious or moral ſentiment to be found? 'that it is not once either quoted, or moſt diſtantly 'alluded to, in any part of the ſacred writings? on 'which account, perhaps, it is not directed to be 'read in our churches. We find, alſo, that thoſe, 'who attempt to trace the allegory in every part, are 'ſoon loſt in an inextricable labyrinth.

'But I ſeem already to hear it objected, That it is 'great preſumption to venture to diſſent from an 'opinion which has been eſtabliſhed near twenty cen-'turies, and has been abetted by great, good, and 'learned, men, during all that long interval, and 'that this novel opinion may tend to weaken the 'foundation of the Church of Chriſt. To this I 'reply, That mere length of time is but a ſandy 'foundation for the baſis of truth to reſt upon; that 'all it can, in reaſon, pretend to, is, to teach us cau-'tion before we quit eſtabliſhed opinions; but, ſurely, 'it ought not to preclude us from making due en-'quiries, and uſing our rational powers, or, upon due 'conviction of former errors, from publicly detecting 'them. In regard to any ſuppoſed inconvenience ac-'cruing to the Chriſtian religion, I really ſee none; 'on the contrary, as it is ſo well eſtabliſhed on the 'ſure word of prophecy, which thrones, principalities, 'and powers, cannot prevail againſt, it appears to me 'more for the intereſts of religion to quit an un-'tenable poſt, than to expoſe it to the aſſault of ene-'mies, who muſt inevitably ſoon become maſters of 'it (2).'

DYER

DYER (Sir JAMES), an eminent Lawyer, a worthy Patriot, and Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He was the ſecond ſon of Richard Dyer, of Wymaulton in Somerſetſhire, Eſq. in which county this worthy perſon was born, at his father's ſeat of Roundhill (a), in the beginning of the XVIth century, as there is good reaſon to believe, in 1511 (b). He received part of his education at Broadgate-Hall, in the Univerſity of Oxford (c), where he was entered a Gentleman-Commoner; and removed thence without taking a degree, as being intended for the ſtudy of the Law, to the Middle-Temple, London. In that learned ſociety he very ſoon became remarkable, as well for the quickneſs of his parts as for his extreme diligence in his profeſſion; and, after having continued for ſome time in the degree of Barriſter, he was elected ſummer reader of that houſe, in the ſixth year of the reign of King Edward VI (d). He was, by the King's writ, bearing date the 19th of May, 1552, called to the degree of a Serjeant at Law (e), and was alſo Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, in the parliament which met the firſt of March the ſame year (f). On the 19th of October, 1553, he was, together with William Standford, made one of the Queen's Serjeants at Law (g). In this ſtation, he aſſiſted, with the gentleman before-mentioned, at the trial of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Knight, at the Guildhall of London, for high-treaſon, April 17, 1554 (h), at which time his colleague, Serjeant Standford, behaved with great warmth and bitterneſs againſt the priſoner; but Serjeant Dyer took very little or no ſhare in that proſecution, which certainly does honour to his memory, as that proſecution did none at all to the crown, or to thoſe who managed it (i). On the 8th of May, 1556, being then a Knight, and Recorder of Cambridge, as well as one of the Queen's Serjeants, he was conſtituted one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas (k), and muſt therefore be the perſon mentioned by the Reverend Mr. Strype (l), though he is ſtrangely miſtaken as to his title [A]. April the 23d, 1557, he was removed to the King's Bench (m), and ſat as a Puiſne Judge there during the remainder of Queen Mary's reign. In the beginning of that of Queen Elizabeth, viz. November the 18th, 1559, he was again made one of the Judges of the Common Pleas, but he did not long continue in that ſtation; for, Sir Anthony Brown, who preſided in that court, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, being inflexible in his adherence to the Romiſh Communion, it was not thought proper to leave him any longer in ſo high an office (n), though, in all other reſpects, he was a moſt worthy perſon; neither indeed did himſelf deſire it, but rather choſe to ſerve in a leſs diſtinguiſhed place; and, therefore, on the 22d of January following, the Queen was pleaſed to conſtitute and appoint Sir James Dyer, Knight, Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas (o); and, the very ſame day, Sir Anthony Brown was made one of the Judges of the ſame Court, in the room of Sir James Dyer (p). In this high office, few have ſerved with greater reputation during their lives, or left a greater character behind them, either in point of probity or ſufficiency (q). In 1572, he aſſiſted at the trial of Thomas Duke of Norfolk; and, upon the Duke's deſiring to have counſel allowed him, alleging it was no more than had been granted to Humphry Stafford in the reign of Henry VII, Sir James Dyer anſwered that it was true, but that it was no point of law, viz. whether he was legally taken out of ſanctuary or not; but that, as to point of fact, he neither had, nor could have, counſel, as the law ſtood (r). He continued in his office without the leaſt diminution, either of his own reputation or the Queen's favour, twenty-four years, which is longer than any who ſat, either before or after (s). At length, full of years, and in the juſt eſteem of all good men, he paid his laſt debt to nature, at Stowton in Huntingdonſhire, where he had purchaſed an eſtate, March 24, 1581, in the ſeventieth year of his age, and was buried in the pariſh-church there, on the ninth of April following (t). Of his family we ſhall give the reader ſome account in the notes [B]. He was the author

[A] Is ſtrangely miſtaken as to his title.] It may be eaſily conceived, that ſo wiſe a man, and ſo great a lawyer, as Sir James Dyer, ſhould perfectly underſtand the conſtitution of the Church; and, without entering at all into the violences of parties, be willing to lay hold of any opportunity of doing a thing which he thought right in itſelf, whatever turn things might take, or which Church ſoever prevailed. We are, therefore, obliged to Mr. Strype, for ſetting down, and thereby preſerving, the memorial of the juſt and pious act done, by this learned and upright lawyer, though he ſeems, through ſome miſtake, to be willing to attribute it to another of the ſame name. But as there was no ſuch perſon, and as all the circumſtances of this fact perfectly agree with our Chief Juſtice's character and ſituation, there can be no doubt that he was the man. The ſtory, as related by Mr. Strype, runs thus (1). "I ſhall inſert into this hiſtory one "particular matter, which, how little ſoever it may "be thought, yet, becauſe of the ſtrangeneſs and "rarity of it may deſerve to be recorded. It was the "deappropriation of an impropriation, in the dioceſe "of Bath and Wells; which was reſtored back to the "Church, by Dyer, Lord Chief Juſtice, in the reign "of King Philip and Queen Mary; and by James "Dyer, and his heirs for ever, made preſentative, or "preſentable, lawfully, and by royal authority. It "was the church of Staplegrove juxta Taunton. "And James Dyer, Knight, and Capital Juſticiar "of the Bench, preſented Chr. Dyrling thereunto, "Sept 17, 1575, void by the death of Walter Gar-"diner."

He left behind him alſo, ſome other writings, relative to his profeſſion, of all which, the reader will meet with a more full account, at the bottom of the page [C]. By theſe, in conjunction with the ſervices he rendered his country upon the bench, he came fully up to the character which Camden has given him, of being ever diſtinguiſhed by an equal and calm diſpoſition, which rendered him in all caſes, a moſt upright Judge, as his penetration made him a fit interpreter of the laws. [C] At the bottom of the page.] The firſt edition of our author's Reports was printed in 1601, again in 1606, in 4to. in 1621, in folio, in 1672, in folio; but the beſt edition is in 1688, and bears the following title, literally tranſlated from the French.

"Reports of ſeveral ſelect matters and reſolutions, "of the reverend judges and ſages of the law, touching and concerning many principal points, debated "by them in the ſeveral reigns of the moſt high and "potent Princes, the Kings Henry the Eighth and "Edward the Sixth, and the Queens Mary and Elizabeth, collected and reported by that moſt reverend Judge, Sir James Dyer, Knight, heretofore "Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of "Queen Elizabeth; to which are now added, many "thouſand references to other books of the Common "Law, as well antient and modern, beſides a great "number of caſes that were never before printed, "with three tables, the firſt, containing the principal "matters in the ſaid book; the ſecond, the names "of all the caſes reported therein; and, the third, "the names of the new caſes added in the margin."

That learned and worthy Judge, Sir Edward Coke, gives us the following ſhort and clear account of the progreſs of Reports, and of the characters of their authors, to his own time (4). "Right profitable alſo, "are the antient books of the Common Laws yet extant, as Glanvil, Bracton, Britton, Fleta, Ingham, "and Novæ Narrationes, and thoſe alſo of later times, "as the old Tenures, old Natura Brevium, Littleton, "Doctor and Student, Perkins, Fitzh.  [In the Latin inſcription to a print of Sir James Dyer, mentioned by Mr. Granger, he is ſaid to have been conſtituted Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, in the firſt year of Queen Elizabeth (6). But this is a manifeſt miſtake; for he was only a ſhort time one of the Puiſne Juſtices of that Bench, during Queen Mary's reign. The dates of his promotions are, in general, accurately given in the preceding article. We are only doubtful whether our predeceſſor be well founded in ſaying, that Sir James Dyer was again made one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas in November, 1559. We ſhould apprehend that it was in 1558; but we cannot be poſitive on this ſubject. If Dr. Campbell be right, and conſequently Sir James was not appointed Chief Juſtice till January the 22d, 1559-60, it is then evident that he preſided in the Court of Common-Pleas only ſomething more than twenty-two years, and not twenty-four years, as is generally aſſerted. That no one had ſitten ſo long at the Head of that Court either before or after, might be true when the article was written, but is not ſo at preſent; for Sir John Willes was promoted to be Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas on the twenty-ninth of January, 1737, and held the office till his death, which happened on the fifteenth of December, 1761 (7)].  [DYER (JOHN), an ingenious poet, was born in the year 1700, and was the ſecond ſon of Robert Dyer, Eſq. a ſolicitor of great capacity and note, at Aberglaſney, in Carmarthenſhire, South Wales. The principal and finiſhing part of his grammatical education he received at Weſtminſter-School, under the care of Dr. Freind. From this ſchool he returned to his father, who deſigned him for his own profeſſion; which, however, was diſagreeable to young Dyer's inclination. He had been, from his childhood, fond of drawing, and, as he grew up, his attachment increaſed to the arts of deſign. By the ſpeedy deceaſe of his father, he was left at liberty to purſue the bent of his mind, and reſolved to turn painter, for which purpoſe he became a pupil to Mr. Richardſon, "an artiſt," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "then of high reputation, but now better "known by his books than his pictures." Mr. Dyer, having ſtudied awhile under his maſter, commenced itinerant painter, and, in that capacity, wandered about South Wales, and the Engliſh counties adjacent (a). What ſucceſs he met with in his profeſſion we are not able to ſay. If, in this reſpect, he did not greatly diſtinguiſh himſelf, he ſoon obtained reputation as a poet by the publication of "Grongar Hill," which, in its preſent form, firſt appeared in 1727. This poem, which can be no ſtranger to our poetical readers, has, in general, been much admired, and has been the ſubject of various critical remarks. Dr. Johnſon eſteems it to be the happieſt of Mr. Dyer's productions. "It is not indeed," adds the Doctor, "very accurately writ-"ten; but the ſcenes which it diſplays are ſo pleaſing, the images which they raiſe ſo "welcome to the mind, and the reflections of the writer ſo conſonant to the general "ſenſe or experience of mankind, that, when it is once read, it will be read again (b)." The happineſs with which the author, in this poem, has introduced pertinent moral reflections, is applauded by Dr. Warton. The Doctor, after having produced a fine inſtance of the kind from Virgil, ſubjoins as follows: "Of Engliſh Poets, perhaps, "none have excelled the ingenious Mr. Dyer in this oblique inſtruction, into which he "frequently ſteals imperceptibly in his little deſcriptive poem, entituled, "Grongar "Hill," where he diſpoſes every object ſo as it may give occaſion for ſome obſerva-"tion on human life. Denham himſelf is not ſuperior to Mr. Dyer in this particular. "After painting a landſcape very extenſive and diverſified, he adds:

"Thus is Nature's veſture wrought,
"To inſtruct our wandering thought;
"Thus ſhe dreſſes green and gay,
"To diſperſe our cares away.

"Another view from his favourite ſpot gives him an opportunity for ſliding into the "following moralites:

"How cloſe and ſmall the hedges lie!
"What ſtreaks of meadows croſs the eye!
"A ſtep methinks may croſs the ſtream,
"So little diſtant dangers ſeem;
"So we miſtake the Future's face,
"Ey'd through Hope's deluding glaſs.
"As yon ſummit's ſoft and fair
"Clad in colours of the air,
"Which to thoſe who journey near,
"Barren, and brown, and rough, appear,
"Still we tread the ſame coarſe way,
"The preſent 's ſtill a cloudy day.

"The unexpected inſertion of ſuch reflections, imparts to us the ſame pleaſure that "we feel, when in wandering through a wilderneſs or grove, we ſuddenly behold in "the turning of the walk, a ſtatue of ſome VIRTUE or MUSE (c)."

Notwithſtanding the general merit of the "Grongar Hill," Mr. Dyer, by failing in the accuracy of ſome few of his pictureſque delineations, has laid himſelf open to the criticiſm of an exquiſite judge upon the ſubject. We mean Mr. Gilpin, who, in his "Obſervations on the River Wye, and ſeveral parts of South Wales," when he comes to his deſcription of the Vale of Towy, makes the ſubſequent remarks. "This "is the ſcene, which Dyer celebrated, in his poem of "Grongar-Hill." Dyer was "bred a painter; and had here a pictureſque ſubject: but he does not give us ſo good "a landſcape as might have been expected. We have no where a complete formed "diſtance, though it is the great idea ſuggeſted by ſuch a vale as this: no where "any touches of that beautiful obſcurity, which melts a variety of objects into "one rich whole. Here and there we have a few accidental ſtrokes, which belong to "diſtance; though ſeldom maſterly; as where he deſcribes the beautiful form which "removed

" removed cultivation takes, or a diſtant ſpire by ſun-ſet. I call them accidental; be" cauſe they are not employed in producing a landſcape; nor do they in fact unite
" in any ſuch idea; but are rather introductory to ſome moral ſentiment; which,
" however good in itſelf, is here forced and miſtimed. Dinevawr-Caſtle alſo is " taken notice of by Dyer in his "Grongar-Hill;" and ſeems intended as an object
" at a diſtance. But bis diſtances, I obſerved, are all in confuſion; and indeed it is " not eaſy to ſeparate them from his fore-grounds. The landſcape he gives us, in which " the Caſtle of Dinevawr makes a part, is ſeen from the brow of a diſtant hill. The " firſt object, that meets his eye, is a wood. It is juſt beneath him; and he eaſily
" diſtinguiſhes the ſeveral trees of which it is compoſed:

" The gloomy pine, the poplar blue,
" The yellow beech, the ſable yew,
" The ſlender fir, that taper grows,
" The ſturdy Oak, with broad-ſpread boughs.

" This is perfectly right. Objects ſo near the eye ſhould be diſtinctly marked. What " next ſtrikes him is a purple-grove; that is, I preſume, a grove which has gained its " purple-hue from diſtance. This is, no doubt, very juſt colouring; though it is here,
" I think, introduced rather too early in the landſcape. The blue and purple tints be" long chiefly to the moſt removed objects; which ſeem not here to be intended.
" Thus far, however, I ſhould not greatly cavil. The next object he ſurveys is a " level lawn, from which a hill, crowned with a caſtle, which is meant, I am informed,
" for that of Dinevawr, ariſes. Here his great want of keeping appears. His caſtle,
" inſtead of being marked with ſtill fainter colours than the purple-grove, is touched
" with all the ſtrength of a fore ground, you ſee the very ivy creeping upon its walls.
" Tranſgreſſions of this kind are common in deſcriptive poetry. Innumerable in-" ſtances might be collected from much better poems than "Grongar Hill." But " I mention only the inaccuracies of an author, who, as a painter, ſhould at leaſt have
" obſerved the moſt obvious principles of his art. With how much pictureſque beauty
" does Milton introduce a diſtant caſtle:

" Towers and battlements he ſees
" Boſomed high in tufted trees.

" Here we have all the indiſtinct colouring which obſcures a diſtant object. We do " not ſee the iron-grated window, the port-cullis, the ditch, or the rampart. We can
" diſtinguiſh a caſtle from a tree; and a tour from a battlement (d)."

(d) Obſervations on the River Wye, and ſeveral parts of South Wales, p. 101—104. Second Edition.

Beſides the incidental obſervations and ſtrictures that have been paſſed upon the "Grongar Hill," Mr. Scott, the poet of Amwell, has made it the ſubject of a diſtinct eſſay, in which he has copiouſly pointed out both its beauties and its blemiſhes. Some of his remarks are, perhaps, too faſtidious. On the whole, however, he concludes, that if Dyer had written nothing but the "Gronger Hill," which he ſays is the ſmalleſt proof of his ablilities, it would have obtained for him the name of a poet. Mr. Scott objects not only to this poem, but alſo to Milton's "L'Allegro" & "Il Penſeroſo," that the verſification, as being an irregular mixture of iambic and trochaic lines, is rather diſpleaſing to a nice ear. But other readers may be of opinion, that this defect, if it be one, is amply compenſated for by the additional ſtrength and variety which are hence given to theſe beautiful productions; and that the exactneſs of the iambic meaſure of eight ſyllables is more accommodated to pieces of a lighter nature. Mr. Scott has informed us of a circumſtance which before had been entirely overlooked. It is, that "Grongar Hill" was originally written, and even printed, as an irregular ode. There is a miſcellany-volume of poems, publiſhed by Richard Savage, in the year 1726, in which it appears in that form, very incorrect, and with the initial lines as follow:

" FANCY, nymph that loves to lie
" On the lonely eminence,
" Darting notice through the eye,
" Forming thought and feaſting ſenſe;
" Thou that muſt lend imagination wings
" And ſtamp diſtinction on all worldly things;
" Come, and, with thy various hues,
" Paint and adorn thy ſiſter muſe (e)."

(e) Scott's Critical Eſſays, p. 97—112.

Mr. Dyer, being probably unſatisfied with the progreſs he had hitherto made in the art which he profeſſed, determined, like other painters, on travelling to Italy for improvement. Here, beſides applying to the uſual ſtudy of the remains of antiquity, and the works of the great maſters, he frequently ſpent whole days in the country about Rome and Florence, ſketching the pictureſque proſpects that ſurrounded him with facility and ſpirit. While he improved himſelf as a painter, perhaps he ſtill more improved himſelf as a poet: for, he laid up a ſtore of images, which enabled him, after his return to England, to give to the world his ſecond principal poem, "The "Ruins of Rome." It was publiſhed in 1740 (f). Dr. Johnſon's praiſe of this poem is given with a very ſcanty, and, we muſt add, with a very unjuſt, hand. The idea of the "Ruins of Rome," he ſays, ſtrikes more, but pleaſes leſs, than "Grongar "Hill," and the title raiſes greater expectation than the performance gratifies. It is acknowledged, however, by the Doctor, that ſome paſſages are conceived with the mind of a poet; of which he condeſcends only to produce a ſingle inſtance, conſiſting of little more than two lines (g). But it may juſtly be aſſerted of the poem, that it has great merit, and that it abounds with beautiful ſentiments, and with noble images and deſcriptions [A].

When

[A] And that it abounds with beautiful ſentiments, and with noble images and deſcriptions.] Mr. Scott, in the fifth of his "Critical Eſſays," has conſidered the poem at large, and, in general, has diſplayed, with much judgment, wherein it excels, and wherein it may be thought to be defective. As it would carry us too far out of our way to purſue this gentleman in his detail, we ſhall content ourſelves with producing a few of the paſſages pointed out by him, and with which we have always been delighted in our repeated peruſal of the "Ruins of Rome." The poetical power which can bear the reader to "Thebes, to Athens, when it will and where," has perhaps ſeldom been more ſtrongly exemplified than in the following paſſage.

Fallen, fallen, a ſilent heap; her heroes all
Sunk in their urns; behold the pride of pomp,
The throne of nations fallen; obſcur'd in duſt;
Even yet majeſtical: the ſolemn ſcene
Elates the ſoul, while now the riſing ſun
Flames on the ruins in the purer air—
Tow'ring aloft upon the glittering plain,
Like broken rocks, a vaſt circumference;
Rent palaces, cruſh'd columns, rifled moles,
Fanes roll'd on fanes, and tombs on buried tombs.

The introduction of a pilgrim hearing the noiſe of the falling towers is a beautiful circumſtance, and affects us much more forcibly than a ſimple aſſertion that they often fell. So fine an image has extorted praiſe even from Dr. Johnſon.

——————————— The pilgrim oft
At dead of night, 'mid his oriſon, hears
Aghaſt the voice of time, diſparting towers,
Tumbling all precipitate down daſh'd,
Rattling around, loud-thundering to the moon;
While murmurs ſooth each awful interval
Of ever-falling waters; ſhrouded Nile (1),
Eridanus, and Tiber with his twins,
And palmy Euphrates; they with dropping locks,
Hang o'er their urns, and mournfully among
The plaintive-echoing ruins pour their ſtreams.

"Among the many ſubjects which Dyer has de-"ſcribed with the mind of a poet, the following," ſays Dr. Scott, "is not the leaſt conſpicuous. The "energetic expreſſion 'breathing forth darkneſs,' had "it been found in Shakeſpeare, or ſome other popular "author, would never have been ſufficiently ap-"plauded:"

——————————— I raiſe
The toilſome ſtep up the proud Palatin,
Through ſpiry cypreſs groves, and tow'ring pine,
Waving aloft o'er the big ruin's brows,
On numerous arches rear'd: and, frequent ſtopp'd,
The ſunk ground ſtartles me with dreadful chaſm,
Breathing forth darkneſs from the vaſt profound
Of iſles and halls within the mountain's womb.

The common ſewers of Rome, which, in the hands of an ordinary writer would have been made ridiculous either with bombaſt or meanneſs, our author has deſcribed with a dignity that is ſuited to their extenſive plan and enormous magnitude. No place but Rome could have produced ſuch a ſcene as the following, and Mr. Dyer has given it with great force to the reader:

Hence over airy plains, by chryſtal founts,
That weave their glitt'ring waves with tuneful lapſe,
Among the fleeky pebbles, Agate clear,
Cerulean Ophite, and the flow'ry vein
Of orient jaſper, pleas'd I move along,
And baſes boſs'd, and huge inſcriptive ſtones,
And intermingling vines; and figur'd nymphs,
Floras and Chloes of delicious mould,
Chearing the darkneſs; and deep empty tombs,
And dells, and mould'ring ſhrines, with old Decay,
Ruſtic and green and wide embow'ring ſhades,
Shot from the crooked clefts of nodding towers:
A ſolemn wilderneſs!

The poet then conducts his readers through ſcenes, where

——————————— On each hand
Hiſtoric urns and breathing ſtatues riſe,
And ſpeaking buſts!

From which he takes occaſion to introduce ſome ſhort and forcible deſcriptions of character:

——————————— The ſpirit-ſtirring form
Of Cæſar, raptur'd with the charm of rule
And boundleſs fame; impatient for exploits,
His eager eyes upcaſt, he ſoars in thought
Above all height.———
——— Deſponding Brutus, dubious of the right,
In evil days, of faith and public weal,
Solicitous and ſad.———————
——— Tully's graceful attitude; uprais'd
With outſtretch'd arm he waves in act to ſpeak
Before the ſilent maſters of the world.——

We ſhould not forgive ourſelves were we to omit the following ſentimental lines, ſo ſweetly deſcriptive of the Author's turn of mind.

——————— There is a mood,
(I ſing not to the vacant and the young)
There is a kindly mood of melancholy,
That wings the ſoul, and points her to the ſkies:
When tribulation clothes the child of man,
When age deſcends with ſorrow to the grave,
'Tis ſweetly-ſoothing ſympathy to pain,
A gently-waking call to health and eaſe.
How muſical! when all-devouring time,
Here ſitting on his throne of ruins hoar,
While winds and tempeſts ſweep his various lyre,
How ſweet thy diapaſon, Melancholy!

When Mr. Dyer came back to his own country, it was in a ſtate of bad health, the foundation of which, as we have been credibly informed, was laid in travelling through the Campagna of Italy. Hence he was, in ſome meaſure, diſqualified for a town-life, which he did not naturally reliſh: nor could he ſubmit to the aſſiduity required in his profeſſion. To all this it may be added, that his talent was rather for ſketching than finiſhing. He determined, therefore, to ſit down contentedly in the country with his little fortune, painting occaſionally a portrait or a landſcape, as his fancy dictated. His mind being of a ſerious turn, and his character and conduct having always been irreproachable, he was adviſed by his friends to enter into holy orders; in obtaining which, it is preſumed, there could be found no difficulty; ſince, though he had not gone through a completely regular education, his abilities could not be called in queſtion. He was ordained by Dr. John Thomas, Biſhop of Lincoln. About the ſame time, Mr. Dyer married a lady of the name of Enſor, "whoſe grandmother," he ſays, "was a "Shakeſpeare, deſcended from a brother of every body's Shakeſpeare." The progreſs of his eccleſiaſtical preferment was ſlow, and for a long time ſlender. His firſt patron was a Mr. Harper, who gave him the vicarage of Catthorp in Leiceſterſhire, of the value of eighty pounds a year. This living he quitted, in 1751, for Belchford in Lincolnſhire, to which he was preſented by the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, at the recommendation of Daniel Wray, Eſq. one of the deputy-tellers of the Exchequer, and a friend to Virtue and the Muſes. Belchford was worth only ſeventy-five pounds; but Mr. Dyer's condition now began to mend; for, in 1752, there was added to Belchford the living of Coningſby, in the ſame county, of a hundred and twenty pounds a year. For this preferment he was indebted to Sir John Heathcote (b). In the ſame year, the univerſity of Cambridge conferred upon him the degree of Bachelor of Laws, by virtue of the royal mandate (i). Through the continuance of Sir John Heathcote's favour, our author obtained, in 1755, without any ſolicitation on his part, from the Chancellor, Kirkby on Bane, being a hundred and ten pounds in annual value. "I was glad of "this," ſays he, in a letter to Mr. Duncombe, "on account of its nearneſs to me, "though I think myſelf a loſer by the exchange (of Belchford for Kirkby), through "the expences of the ſeal, diſpenſations, journeys, &c. and the charge of an old houſe, "half of which I am going to pull down." The houſe at Coningſby, which is a very good one, owes much of its improvement to Mr. Dyer. His ſtudy had a handſome window to the church-yard, which he ſtopped up, and opened a leſs, that gave him a full view of the fine church and caſtle of Tatterſhall, and of the road leading to that place. This was gaining every advantage of proſpect which the low ſituation of Coningſby could afford. He improved, likewiſe, the garden belonging to the houſe. In 1757, he was again in mortar, being engaged in re-building a large barn, which a late wind had blown down at Coningſby, and in gathering materials for the re-building above half the parſonage-houſe of the other living. "Theſe," he ſays, "ſome years "ago, I ſhould have called trifles: but the evil days are come; and the lighteſt thing, "even the graſshopper, is a burden upon the ſhoulders of the old and ſickly (k)." When we reflect that Mr. Dyer had a family, and that his preferments, taken together, were not very conſiderable, it may, perhaps, be ſuſpected that his liberality, with reſpect to his parſonage-houſes, overſtepped the bounds of prudence. But it will not be deemed ſurpriſing that generoſity ſhould be the character of a poet.

Early in 1757, our author publiſhed his largeſt work, "The Fleece." It was finiſhed under ſome diſadvantages, which he himſelf mentions in a letter to Mr. Duncombe. "It is," he ſays, "now precipitated to the preſs, with ſuch faults, as muſt be im-"puted to the air of a fenny country, where I have been, for the moſt part, above "theſe five years, without health, without books, and without proper converſa-"tion (l)." Dr. Johnſon has related a ludicrous ſtory concerning the publication of "The Fleece." "Dodſley, the bookſeller, was one day mentioning it to a critical "viſitor, with more expectation of ſucceſs than the other could eaſily admit. In the

One paſſage more, which will fully juſtify the character of Dyer as a poet, ſhall conclude our extracts from the "Ruins of Rome."

Suffice it now th' Eſquiliam mount to reach
With weary wing, and ſeek the ſacred reſts
Of Maro's humble tenement; a low
Plain wall remains; a little ſun-gilt heap,
Groteſque and wild; the gourd and olive brown
Weave the light roof; the gourd and olive fan
Their amorous foliage, mingling with the vine,
Who drops her purple cluſters through the green.
Here let me lie, with pleaſing fancy ſooth'd;
Here flow'd his fountain; here his laurel grew;
Here oft the meek good man, the lofty bard,
Fram'd the celeſtial ſong; or ſocial walk'd
With Horace and the ruler of the world:
Happy Auguſtus! who, ſo well inſpir'd,
Could'ſt throw thy pomps and royalties aſide,
Attentive to the wiſe, the great of ſoul,
And dignify thy mind. Thrice glorious days,
Auſpicious to the Muſes! Then rever'd,
Then hallow'd, was the fount, or ſecret ſhade,
Or open mountain, or whatever ſcene
The poet choſe to tune th' ennobling rhyme,
Melodious: even the ragged ſons of war,
Ev'n the rude hinds rever'd the poet's name.
But now—another age, alas! is ours.——
Yet will the Muſe a little longer ſoar,
Unleſs the clouds of care weigh down her wing,
Since Nature's ſtores are ſhut with cruel hand,
And each aggrieves his brother; ſince in vain
The thirſty pilgrim at the fountain aſks
Th' o'erflowing wave. Enough--the plaint diſdain (2).

" converſation the author's age was aſked; and, being repreſented as advanced in life, " He will, ſaid the critic, be buried in woollen."

" Of The Fleece," adds Dr. Johnſon, " which never became popular, and is now " univerſally neglected, I can ſay but little that is likely to recall it to attention. The " woolcomber and the poet appear to be ſuch diſcordant natures, that an attempt to " bring them together is to couple the ſerpent with the fowl. When Dyer, whoſe mind " was not unpoetical, has done his utmoſt, by intereſting his reader in our native " commodity, by interſperſing rural imagery and incidental digreſſions, by cloathing " ſmall images in great words, and, by all the writer's arts of deluſion, the meanneſs " naturally adhering, and the irreverence habitually annexed to trade and manufacture, " ſink him under inſuperable oppreſſion; and the diſguſt which blank verſe, encum- " bering and encumbered, ſuperadds to an unpleaſing ſubject, ſoon repels the reader, " however willing to be pleaſed. Let me, however, honeſtly report whatever may " counterbalance this weight of cenſure. I have been told that Akenſide, who, upon " a poetical queſtion has a right to be heard, ſaid, " That he would regulate his " opinion of the reigning taſte by the fate of Dyer's 'Fleece;' for, if that were ill- " received, he ſhould not think it any longer reaſonable to expect fame from excel- " lence (m)." That there is ſome degree of truth in part of Dr. Johnſon's remarks cannot be denied; but, on the whole, his cenſure is as unjuſt as it is ſevere. The Doctor evidently appears to have been ſtrongly influenced by his antipathy to blank verſe, which, whatever may be ſaid againſt it (and we are not amongſt its moſt partial admirers), is well adapted to poems of length and dignity. That " The Fleece" is not very popular is acknowledged; and, in conſequence of the humble but unavoidable detail ariſing from certain parts of the ſubject, there are many paſſages which are far leſs ſtriking than others. Indeed, it is extremely difficult to render a didactic poem univerſally intereſting. It belonged to Virgil alone to be capable of doing this in the completeſt manner. Nevertheleſs, " The Fleece," taking it altogether, is a valuable production; and there are ſo many inſtances of poetical beauty in it, that we truſt it will not be ſo totally condemned to oblivion as Dr. Johnſon has repreſented. As it makes a part of the Doctor's collection of Engliſh Poets, it will of courſe be read by young people as they riſe up in the world; and ſome, we doubt not, will have taſte and diſcernment enough to peruſe it a ſecond time. So far as authority goes, the teſtimony to its merit, by ſuch a man as Akenſide, is calculated to awaken curioſity; and Mr. Scott has obſerved, that the " Ruins of Rome," and " The Fleece," however neglected by ſuperficial readers or degraded by injudicious critics, juſtly entitle Mr. Dyer to the higheſt praiſe (n). We have yet another poet to produce, in oppoſition to Dr. Johnſon; and, that is, the admirable tranſlator of Æſchylus. In reference to the ludicrous ſtory before related, Mr. Potter expreſſes himſelf as follows: 'Is this held up 'for wit? Is it intended as a ſarcaſm on Dyer? Is it not an inſult to the underſtanding 'of the reader? Let me ſtop a moment to ſpeak of this writer?' 'Dyer,' ſays Dr. Johnſon, 'is not a poet of bulk and dignity ſufficient to require an elaborate criti- 'ciſm.' 'Does Dr. Johnſon eſtimate poetical merit, as Rubens did feminine beauty, 'by the ſtone? Well then might he recommend Blackmore to us. If " The Fleece" be 'now univerſally neglected, let me join my teſtimony to that of Akenſide, that ſuch 'neglect is a reproach to the reigning taſte: the poem is truly claſſical. To ſay that 'Dyer's Mind was not unpoetical is parſimonious praiſe. He had a benevolent heart, a 'vigorous imagination, and a chaſtiſed judgment; his ſtyle is compact and nervous; 'his numbers have harmony, ſpirit, and force.

[B] By a periodical critic.] We refer to the ſixteenth volume of the " Monthly Review," where Mr. Dyer is commended for the choice of his ſubject, and for the united fancy and judgment with which he has conducted the work. Of this many examples are produced; beſides which the critic recommends, in a particular manner, Mr. Dyer's " Deſcription of a " Calm; of Perſia; of Tobol; and of Patagonia." It is added, that ſcarcely any Poet, ancient and modern, has ſurpaſſed the author of the " Fleece" in river-painting. The Reviewer farther obſerves, that our Poet has artfully varied his diction; the two firſt books having a mixture of the paſtoral; the third being rural, but elegant; and the fourth daring and ſublime (3). We ſhall gratify our poetical readers by inſerting a few paſſages from " The Fleece." Mr. Dyer, after mentioning the climates chiefly favourable to wool, breaks out into the following encomium on the moiſture of our own.

Mr. Dyer did not long ſurvive the publication of this poem. A conſumptive diſorder, with which he had long ſtruggled, carried him off in 1758, at the age of fifty-eight years. Mr. Gough, who viſited Coningſby in 1782, could find no memorial erected to him in the church. Mrs. Dyer, upon her huſband's deceaſe, retired to her friends in Caernarvonſhire. They had four children living in 1756, three girls and a boy; of whom the boy was the youngeſt (o). Sarah, one of the daughters, died ſingle. The ſon, a youth of the moſt amiable diſpoſition, who inherited his father's truly claſſical taſte, and who was heir to the eſtate of an uncle of three or four hundred pounds a year in Suffolk, devoted the principal part of his time to travelling; and, in April, 1782, died in London, at the age of thirty-two, when he was preparing to ſet out on a tour to Italy. His fortune was divided between two ſurviving ſiſters: one of them married to Mr. Alderman Hewitt, of Coventry; and the other, Elizabeth, to the Reverend John Gaunt, of Birmingham (p). Our author had ſeveral brothers, one of whom was the Reverend Thomas Dyer, who lived at Marybone. He was Yeoman of his Majeſty's Almonry, had a numerous family, and was living in 1776 (q).

Our poet appears to have been a gentleman of a very amiable and reſpectable character. "He was," ſays his brother, in a letter to the writer of this article, "an honeſt, humane, and good, man." His poems, ſeveral of which had been printed in different miſcellanies, were publiſhed together, in one volume, octavo, in 1761. They now, as we have already ſeen, make a part of Dr. Johnſon's collection. His ſmaller pieces are few in number. With one of them, which is a pleaſing delineation of the author's mind, our account of him ſhall be concluded.

Rich queen of miſts and vapours! Theſe thy ſons
With their cool arms compreſs; and twiſt their nerves
For deeds of excellence and high renown.
Thus form'd, our Edwards, Henrys, Churchills, Blakes,
Our Lockes, our Newtons, and our Miltons, roſe.

Our author's exhortation to the Shepherd, to take particular care of new-fallen lambs, is beautifully pathetic:

Ah, gentle ſhepherd, thine the lot to tend,
Of all that feel diſtreſs, the moſt aſſail'd,
Feeble, defenceleſs: lenient be thy care:
But ſpread around thy tendereſt diligence
In flowery ſpring-time, when the new-dropt lamb,
Tott'ring with weakneſs by his mother's ſide,
Feels the freſh world about him; and each thorn,
Hillock, or furrow, trips his feeble feet:
O guard his meek ſweet innocence from all
Th' innumerous ills, that ruſh around his life.
Mark the quick kite, with beak and talons prone,
Circling the ſkies to ſnatch him from the plain:
Obſerve the lurking crows: beware the brake,
There the ſly fox the careleſs minute waits:
Nor truſt thy neighbour's dog, nor earth, nor ſky:
Thy boſom to a thouſand cares divide.

Eurus oft flings his hail: the tardy fields
Pay not the promis'd food; and oft the dam
O'er her weak twins with empty udder mourns,
Or fails to guard, when the bold bird of prey
Alights, and hops in many turns around,
And tires her alſo turning: to her aid
Be nimble, and the weakeſt, in thine arms,
Gently convey to the warm cote, and oft,
Between the lark's note and the nightingale's,
His hungry bleating ſtill, with tepid milk:
In this ſoft office may thy children join,
And charitable habits learn in ſport:
Nor yield him to himſelf, ere vernal airs
Sprinkle thy little croft with daiſy flowers:
Nor yet forget him: life has riſing hills:
Various as Æther is the paſtoral care.

From the many fine paſſages that occur in the fourth book, we ſhall only ſelect a few lines, deſcriptive of a calm:

——————— With eaſy courſe
The veſſels glide; unleſs their ſpeed be ſtopp'd
By dead calms, that oft lie on thoſe ſmooth ſeas
While every zephyr ſleeps: then the ſhrouds drop;
The downy feather, on the cordage hung,
Moves not; the flat ſea ſhines like yellow gold
Fus'd in the fire; or like the marble floor
Of ſome old temple wide. But where ſo wide,
In old or later time, its marble floor
Did ever temple boaſt as this, which here
Spreads its white level many a league around!
At ſolemn diſtances its pillars riſe,
Sofal's blue rocks, Mozambic's palmy ſteeps,
And lofty Madagaſcar's glitt'ring ſhores (4).

Alas!

Alas! what a folly, what wealth and domain
We heap up in ſin and in ſorrow!
Immenſe is the toil, yet the labour how vain!
Is not life to be over to-morrow?

Then glide on, my moments, the few that I have,
Smooth-ſhaded, and quiet, and even;
While gently the body deſcends to the grave,
And the ſpirit ariſes to heaven (r).]

 [EACHARD (JOHN), Maſter of Catharine-Hall, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and author of ſeveral ingenious works, was deſcended from a good family in the county of Suffolk, and born about the year 1636 (a). Having been carefully inſtructed in grammar and claſſical literature, he was ſent to Catharine-Hall, in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was admitted on the 10th of May, 1653. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1656, was elected fellow of his college in 1658, and, in 1660, became Maſter of Arts (b). We meet with no farther particulars about him till the year 1670, when he publiſhed, but without his name, "The Grounds and Occaſions of the Contempt of the Clergy and Religion enquired into [A]. (a) New and Gen. Dict. 8vo. Vol. V. p. 53. edit. 1784. Account of the life and writings of Dr. John Eachard, prefixed to the edition of his works publiſhed by T. Davies in 1774, p. 4, 5.

(b) Davies's Account, ut ſupra.

[A] The Grounds and Occaſions of the Contempt of the Clergy, &c.] This piece, though written upon a very grave ſubject, abounds with wit and humour; but towards the beginning the author makes a declaration of his attachment to the church: 'I muſt moſt 'heartily profeſs, that for my own part I did never 'think, ſince at all I underſtood the excellency and 'perfection of a church, but that ours now lately 'reſtored, as formerly eſtabliſhed, does far outgo, as 'to all Chriſtian ends and purpoſes, either the pomp 'and bravery of Rome herſelf, or the beſt of free 'ſpiritual ſtates (1).' He alſo ſays, that he was 'an honeſt and hearty well-wiſher, that the beſt of 'our clergy might for ever continue as they are, 'rich and learned: and that the reſt might be very 'uſeful, and well eſteemed of in their profeſſion.' He afterwards proceeded to give it as his opinion, that whatever had heretofore, or did then, 'leſſen 'the value of our clergy, or render it in any degree 'leſs ſerviceable to the world than might reaſonably 'be hoped, it might be eaſily referred to two very plain 'things; the ignorance of ſome, and the poverty of 'others of the clergy (2).' This leads him to an inquiry into the education of the clergy; he thinks that too much time is ſpent, before they are ſent to the Univerſity, in attaining the Latin and Greek languages, and that more attention ſhould be paid to Engliſh literature. 'Suppoſe,' ſays he, 'ſome part 'of time was allotted them for the reading of ſome 'innocent Engliſh authors; where they need not go 'every line ſo unwillingly to a tormenting dictionary; 'and whereby they might come in a ſhort time to 'apprehend common ſenſe, and to begin to judge 'what is true; for, you ſhall have lads that are arch 'knaves at the nominative caſe, and that have a notable 'quick eye at ſpying out the verb, who, for want of 'reading ſuch common and familiar books, ſhall 'underſtand no more of what is plain and eaſy than 'a well-educated dog or horſe. Or ſuppoſe they were 'taught (as they might much eaſier be than what 'is commonly offered to them) the principles of arithmetic, geometry, and ſuch alluring parts of learning: As theſe things undoubtedly would be much 'more uſeful, ſo much more delightful to them, than 'to be tormented with a tedious ſtory how Phaëton 'broke his neck; or how many nuts and apples 'Tityrus had for his ſupper (3).' He afterwards ſays, 'I am not ſenſible, that I have ſaid any thing in 'diſparagement of thoſe two famous tongues, the 'Greek and Latin, there is much reaſon to value 'them before others; becauſe the beſt of human 'learning has been delivered unto us in thoſe languages. But he that worſhips them, purely out of 'honour to Rome and Athens, having little or no 'reſpect to the uſefulneſs and excellency of the books 'themſelves (as many do) it is a ſign he has a great 'eſteem and reverence of antiquity, but I think him 'by no means comparable for happineſs to him who 'catches frogs or hunts butterflies (4).'

Among the cauſes which brought diſreſpect on the clergy, Dr. Eachard ſtates 'the inconſiderate ſending of 'all kinds of lads to the univerſities, let their parts 'be never ſo low and pitiful, and the inſtructions and 'have lain under never ſo mean and contemptible, they 'the purpoſes of their friends never ſo ſhort to maintain them there. If they have but the commendation 'of ſome lamentable and pitiful conſtruing-maſter, it 'paſſes for ſufficient evidence that they will prove perſons very eminent in the church. That is to ſay, if a 'lad has but a luſty and well-bearing memory, (this 'being the uſual and almoſt only thing whereby they 'judge of their abilities,) if he can ſing over very tunably three or four ſtanzas of Lilly's poetry, be very 'quick and ready to tell what's Latin for all the inſtruments belonging to his father's ſhop; if preſently, upon the firſt ſcanning, he know a ſpondee 'from a dactyl, and can fit a few of thoſe ſame without any ſenſe to his fingers ends; if, laſtly, he can ſay 'perfectly by heart his Academic Catechiſm, in pure 'and paſſing Latin, i.e. What is his name? Where went 'he to ſchool? and what author is he beſt and chiefly ſkilled 'in? A forward boy, cries the ſchool-maſter, a very 'pregnant child! ten thouſand pities, but he ſhould 'be a ſchólar; he proves a brave clergyman, I'll 'warrant you. Away to the univerſity he muſt needs 'go; then for a little logic, a little ethics, and, God 'knows, a very little of every thing elſe, and the next 'time you meet him is in the pulpit (5).'

'And, as many ſuch diſmal things are ſent forth 'thus with very ſmall tackling, ſo not a few are predeſtinated thither by their friends, from the foreſight of a good benefice. If there be rich paſture, 'profitable cuſtoms, and that Henry the Eighth has 'taken out no toll, the holy land is a very good land, 'and affords abundance of milk and honey: far be it 'from their conſciences the conſidering whether the 'lad is likely to be ſerviceable to the church, or to 'make wiſer and better any of his pariſhioners (6).'

" to R. L." This piece had a very rapid ſale, and paſſed through many editions. It was attacked by an anonymous writer, the following year, in " An Anſwer to a Let-" ter of Enquiry into the Grounds," &c. and by Barnabas Oley, and ſeveral others; and particularly by the famous Dr. John Owen, in a preface to ſome ſermons of W. Bridge. Eachard replied to the firſt of his anſwerers [B], in a piece, entituled, " Some " Obſervations upon the Anſwer [C] to an Enquiry into the Grounds and Occaſions " of the Contempt of the Clergy: with ſome Additions. In a ſecond Letter to R. L." In 1671, he publiſhed, " Mr. Hobbes's State of Nature conſidered: in a Dialogue " between Philautus and Timothy [D]. To which are added, Five Letters from the Author

Our facetious author alſo obſerves, that 'it is a 'common faſhion of a great many, to compliment 'and invite inferior people's children to the univer-'ſity, and there pretend to make ſuch an all-bounti-'ful proviſion for them, as they ſhall not fail of com-'ing to a very eminent degree of learning: but, when 'they come there, they ſhall ſave a ſervant's wages. 'They took therefore heretofore a very good method 'to prevent Sizers over-heating their brains: bed-'making, chamber-ſweeping, and water-fetching, 'were doubtleſs great preſervatives againſt too much 'vain philoſophy. Now, certainly, ſuch pretend-'ed favours and kindneſſes as theſe are the moſt 'downright diſcourteſies in the world. For, it is ten 'times more happy, both for a lad and the church, 'to be a corn-cutter, or a tooth-drawer, or make or 'mend ſhoes, to be of any inferior profeſſion, than to 'be invited to and promiſed the conveniences of a 'learned education, and to have his name only ſtand 'airing upon the college tables, and his chief buſineſs (7) Ibid. p. 15, 16. 'ſhall be to buy eggs and butter (7).'

Speaking of the poverty of the clergy, Dr. Eachard ſays, 'Where the miniſter is pinched, as to the tole-'rable convenences of this life, the chief of his care 'and time muſt be ſpent not in an impertinent con-'ſidering what texts of ſcripture will be moſt uſeful 'for his pariſh, what inſtructions moſt ſeaſonable, 'and what authors beſt to be conſulted: but the 'chief of his thoughts and his main buſineſs muſt be 'to ſtudy how to live that week; where he ſhall have 'bread for his family: whoſe ſow has lately pigged; 'whence will come the next rejoicing gooſe, or the 'next cheerful baſket of apples; how far to lammas, 'or offerings; when ſhall we have another chriſten-'ing and cakes; and who is likely to marry or die. 'Theſe are very ſeaſonable conſiderations, and wor-'thy of a man's thoughts. For, a family cannot be 'maintained by texts and contexts: and the child, that 'lies crying in the cradle, will not be ſatisfied with-'out a little milk, and perhaps ſugar, though there 'be a ſmall German ſyſtem in the houſe.

'But, ſuppoſe he does get into a little hole over the 'oven, with a lock to it, called his ſtudy, towards 'the latter end of the week (for, you muſt know, Sir, 'there are very few texts of ſcripture that can be 'divided, at ſooneſt, before Friday night; and ſome 'there be that will never be divided but upon Sun-'day morning, and that not very early, but either a 'little before they go or in going to church); I ſay, 'ſuppoſe the gentleman gets thus into his ſtudy: one 'may very near gueſs, what is his firſt thought when 'he comes there, viz. that the laſt kilderkin of drink 'is near departed; and that he has but one poor 'ſingle groat in the houſe, and there is judgment and 'execution ready to come out againſt it for milk and 'eggs. Now, Sir, can any man think that one, thus 'racked and tortured, can be ſeriouſly intent half an 'hour to contrive any thing that might be of real ad-'vantage to his people? Beſides, perhaps that week 'he has met with ſome diſmal croſſes and undoing 'misfortunes. There was a ſcurvy-conditioned mole 'that broke into his paſture, and ploughed up the 'beſt part of his glebe: and, a little after that, came 'a couple of ſpightful ill-favoured crows, and 'trampled down the little remaining graſs: another 'day, having but four chickens, ſweep comes the 'kite, and carries away the fatteſt and hopefulleſt of 'all the brood. Then, after all this, came the jack-'daws and ſtarlings, (idle birds that they are!) and 'they ſcattered and carried away from his thin-thatched 'houſe forty or fifty of the beſt ſtraws. And, to make 'him completely unhappy, after all theſe afflictions, 'another day, that he had a pair of breeches on, com-'ing over a perverſe ſtile, he ſuffered very much in 'careleſsly lifting over his leg. Now, what pariſh 'can be ſo inconſiderate and unreaſonable as to look 'for any thing from one, whoſe fancy is thus checked, 'and whoſe underſtanding is thus ruffled and diſordered. 'They may as ſoon expect comfort and conſolation 'from him that lies racked with the gout and ſtone, 'as from a divine thus broken and ſhattered in his 'fortunes (8).' (8) Ibid. p. 77, 78, 79.

Dr. Eachard has alſo given, in the courſe of his letter, a variety of inſtances of abſurdity in preaching, as one of the cauſes of contempt of the clergy; and it has been aſſerted, that " he took the inſtances of ab-" ſurdity and nonſenſe, in this letter, from his father's " ſermons (9)." But this charge againſt Eachard, which is very diſhonourable to him, ſhould not be admitted without proof; and no evidence of it is produced. It is, indeed, very improbable; for, the inſtances of abſurdity, exhibited in Eachard's piece, appear evidently to be taken from different preachers. (9) New and Gen. Biog. Dict. edit. 1784.

Dr. Eachard has certainly attacked the abſurd mode of preaching which was practiſed by ſome Divines, both Churchmen and Diſſenters, with much reaſon, as well as wit and humour; but, when he has occaſion to ſpeak of the Diſſenters, it is generally with very little candour; and he was evidently no friend to religious liberty.

[B] Replied to the firſt of his anſwerers.] Dean Swift ſays, 'When Dr. Eachard writ his book about the 'contempt of the clergy, numbers of thoſe anſwerers 'immediately ſtarted up, whoſe memory if he had not 'kept alive by replies, it would now be utterly un-'known that he were ever anſwered at all (10).' (10) Swift's Works, Vol. I. p. 9. 24mo. edit.

[C] Some obſervations upon the Anſwer.] In this piece are ſome facetious remarks on Mr. Hobbes and his followers. In one place he ſays, 'It was very 'well for this nation, that Mr. Hobbes was born at 'laſt; and half a dozen of us, of willingneſs and 'parts, to underſtand him, otherwiſe the world had 'continued in a brave blind condition.'—'Whereas 'heretofore it was a work of many years ſtudy and 'ſerioufneſs, that could entitle one but to be ſuſpected 'of Atheiſm; now he that has but ſeen Mr. Hobbes's 'boots, and can make but a mouſe-trap, is as fully 'privileged as if he could pluck up the earth by the 'roots or make a man (11).' (11) Works, Vol. I. p. 295.

[D] Mr. Hobbes's State of Nature conſidered, &c.] This publication was dedicated by our author to Archbiſhop Sheldon; and, by way of apology to that prelate for the ludicrous manner in which he had treated Hobbes, he ſays, 'Since Mr. Hobbes, by affected 'garbs of ſpeech, by a ſtarched mathematical method, 'by counterfeit appearances of novelty and ſingula-'rity, by magiſterial haughtineſs, confidence, and 'the like, had cheated ſome people into a vaſt opi-'nion of himſelf, and into a belief of things very 'dangerous and falſe, I did preſume, with your 'grace's pardon, to think his writings ſo fond and 'extravagant, as not to merit being oppoſed in good 'earneſt; and thereupon I was very loth to give 'them too much reſpect, and add undue weight to 'them by a ſolemn and ſerious confutation.'

It appears to have been ſoon after the publication of this piece, that Mr. Eachard was introduced to archbiſhop Sheldon, and it happened that Anthony Wood was alſo introduced to that prelate on the ſame day. It was on the 11th of February, 1671-2; and Wood has thus mentioned it in his Diary: 'Sunday, Sir 'Leol. Jenkyns took with him in the morning, over 'the Author of "The Grounds and Occaſions of the Contempt of the Clergy." In theſe letters he animadverted, with his uſual facetiouſneſs, on ſeveral of the anſwerers of his firſt performance. He ſoon after publiſhed ſome farther remarks on the writings of Hobbes, in "A ſecond Dialogue between Philautus and Timothy [E]." On the death of Dr. John Lightfoot, in 1675, Mr. Eachard was choſen, in his room, Maſter of Catharine-Hall; and, in the year following, he was created Doctor of Divinity, by royal mandamus (c). It does not appear, that he produced any literary works after being raiſed to this ſtation; but, it is ſaid, that he executed the truſt repoſed in him of Maſter of his College, with the utmoſt care and fidelity, and to the general ſatisfaction of the whole Univerſity (d). He was extremely deſirous to have rebuilt the greateſt part if not the whole of Catharine-Hall, which had fallen into decay: but he died before he could accompliſh that deſign. He contributed, however, largely towards it himſelf; and was very aſſiduous in procuring donations for it from his learned or wealthy friends. He died on the 7th of July, 1697, and was interred in the chapel of Catharine-Hall, the following inſcription being placed upon his tomb:

'the water to Lambeth, A. Wood, and after prayers 'he conducted him up to the dining-room, where 'archbiſhop Sheldon received him, and gave him his 'bleſſing. There then dined, among the company, 'Joh. Eachard, the author of The Contempt of the 'Clergy, who ſat at the lower end of the table. 'between the archbiſhop's two chaplains, Samuel 'Parker and Thomas Tomkins, being the firſt time 'that the ſaid Echard was introduced into the ſaid 'archbiſhop's company. After dinner, the Arch-'biſhop went into his withdrawing room, and Eachard, 'with the chaplains, and Ralph Snow, to their lodg-'ings, to drink and ſmoke. Sir L. Jenkyns took 'then Anthony Wood by the hand, and conducted him 'into the withdrawing-room to the archbiſhop (12).' From this paſſage, Archbiſhop Sheldon has been charged, by the right reverend commentator on Pope's Works, with a want of diſcernment and taſte, in preferring the company of Wood to that of Eachard. But no ſuch inference can fairly be drawn from this paſſage of Wood. Archbiſhop Sheldon might have a juſt ſenſe of the merit of Eachard; and yet, as this prelate 'was a friend and patron of the univerſity of 'Oxford, he might think himſelf under a neceſſity to 'pay a little compliment to the man, who was em-'ployed in writing the hiſtory of that learned ſociety, 'and to encourage him in the proſecution of that un-'dertaking; and ſurely ſome marks of civility were 'due to a writer, who, by indefatigable induſtry, had 'almoſt accompliſhed a very laborious as well as uſe-'ful work (13).'

[E] A ſecond Dialogue, &c.] It has been obſerved, that, 'in this as well as the former dialogue, he has 'employed all the powers of his wit to expoſe the falſe 'reaſoning and ſpecious ſophiſtry of the philoſopher 'of Malmeſbury. And ſurely the graveſt reader can-'not help being highly diverted with the happy ſtrokes 'of fine humour and keen raillery, with which he has 'attacked, and entirely confuted, the abſurd and dog-'matical lectures of this inveterate enemy of true re-'legion and ſound morals. All the ſerious and ſyſte-'matical books, written by the moſt eminent and 'learned of our divines, could never have rendered 'the philoſophy of Hobbes ſo contemptible as the in-'comparable dialogues of Eachard, which contain the 'moſt judicious arguments, united with the moſt 'ſpirited ſatire and the livelieſt mirth (14).'

(14) Life prefixed to Davies's Edition of his Works, p. 6, 7.

Dryden, in his life of Lucian, prefixed to the tranſlation of his works publiſhed in 1711, has alſo the following paſſage relative to our author's dialogues: 'The way which Lucian choſe of delivering theſe 'profitable and pleaſing truths was that of dialogue. 'A choice worthy of the author, happily followed by 'Eraſmus, and Fontenelle particularly, to whom I may 'juſtly add a triumvir of our own, the reverend, in-'genious, and learned, Dr. Eachard, who, by uſing 'the ſame method, and the ſame ingredients of rail-'lery and reaſon, has more baffled the philoſopher of 'Malmeſbury, than thoſe who aſſaulted him with 'blunt heavy arguments drawn from orthodox divi-'nity: for, Hobbes foreſaw where thoſe ſtrokes would 'fall, and leapt aſide before they could deſcend; but 'he could not avoid thoſe nimble paſſes which were 'made on him by a wit more active than his own, 'and which were within his body before he could 'provide for his defence (5)."]

Dr. Eachard's pieces, excepting his ſecond Dialogue on the Writings of Hobbes, have been ſeveral times printed together in one volume, 8vo. but the moſt complete edition, and which contains that Dialogue, is that publiſhed by T. Davies, in 1774, in three volumes, 12mo.

Though Dr. Eachard's works abound with wit and humour, he is ſaid to have failed remarkably, when he attempted to write in a ſerious manner. Mr. Baker, of St. John's College, Cambridge, in a blank leaf of his copy of Eachard's "Letter to R. L." obſerves, that he went to St. Mary's with great expectation to hear him preach, but was never more diſappointed (f). And Dean Swift ſays, "I have known men happy "enough at ridicule, who, upon grave ſubjects, were perfectly ſtupid; of which "Dr. Eachard, of Cambridge, who writ "The Contempt of the Clergy," was a "great inſtance (g)." It is remarked by Mr. Granger, that the works of Dr. Eachard had been evidently ſtudied by Swift (h).

In the catalogue of the printed books in the Britiſh Muſeum, a piece is attributed to Dr. Eachard, which was publiſhed in 1673, in 12mo. under the following title: "A "free and impartial Enquiry into the Cauſes of that very great Eſteem and Honour "that the Nonconforming Preachers are generally in with their Followers. In a Let-"ter to his honoured Friend, H. M. By a Lover of the Church of England and "unfeigned Piety." But, upon an inſpection of the piece, we are convinced, that it was not written by Dr. Eachard. It has not his wit, nor is it in any reſpect in his manner.] T.

 [ECHARD (LAURENCE), a Clergyman, and author of ſeveral hiſtorical and other works, was nearly related to Dr. John Eachard [A], of whom an account has been given in the preceding article. He was born at Caſſam, near Beccles, in Suffolk, about the year 1671, and was the ſon of a Clergyman, who, by the death of an elder brother, became poſſeſſed of a good eſtate in that county (a). Having paſſed through a courſe of grammar-learning, he was ſent to Chriſt's College, Cambridge, and, in 1691, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Maſter in 1695 (b). He afterwards entered into holy orders, and was preſented to the livings of Welton and Elkinton, in Lincolnſhire, where he ſpent above twenty years of his life; and, during that time, he publiſhed a variety of works.

One of his firſt publications was, "The Roman Hiſtory, from the building of the "City to the perfect Settlement of the Empire by Auguſtus Cæſar." This was extremely well received, ſo that the fourth edition, in one volume 8vo, was publiſhed in 1699. He alſo publiſhed "The Hiſtory, from the Settlement of the Empire, by Au-"guſtus Cæſar, to the Removal of the Imperial Seat of Conſtantine the Great." This was ſaid, in the title, to be "for the uſe of his Highneſs the Duke of Gloucester," to whom it was dedicated; and the ſecond edition, in 8vo. was printed in 1699. Two continuations of this work, one of which was reviſed by Mr. Echard, were afterwards publiſhed in three volumes, 8vo.

In 1702, our author publiſhed, in folio, with a dedication to Queen Anne [B], "A "General Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, from the Nativity of our bleſſed Saviour to the firſt "Eſtabliſh-

This Work was ſo well received, that the ſixth edition of it was publiſhed, in two volumes, 8vo. in 1722. Dean Prideaux ſays, that " the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Mr. Laurence Echard is the beſt of its kind in the " Engliſh tongue (c)."

(c) Connection of the Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, Vol. II. Part II. p. 658.

In 1707, when he was become Prebendary of Lincoln, and Chaplain to the Biſhop of that Dioceſe, he publiſhed, in one volume, folio, " The Hiſtory of England: from " the firſt Entrance of Julius Cæſar and the Romans to the End of the Reign of " King James the Firſt." He dedicated this work to the Duke of Ormond; and obſerves, in the dedication, that he was excited to engage in the undertaking by that nobleman. In his preface, he gives ſome account of the materials and authors from which his work was collected. He particularly enumerates the Roman, Saxon, Engliſh, and Monkiſh Hiſtorians; together with Hall, Grafton, Polydore Vergil, Holinſhed, Stow, Speed, Baker, Brady, and Tyrrell; and, among the writers of particular lives and reigns, he mentions Barnes, Howard, Goodwin, Camden, Bacon, Herbert, and Habington. " From all theſe ſeveral writers," ſays he, " and many others, " I have collected and formed this preſent hiſtory; always taking the liberty either to " copy or to imitate any parts of them, if I found them really conducing to the uſe- " fulneſs or the ornament of my work. And, from all theſe, I have compiled an " hiſtory as full, comprehenſive, and complete, as I could bring into the compaſs of " the propoſed ſize and bigneſs. And, that nothing might be wanting, I have all " the way enriched it with the beſt and wiſeſt ſayings of great men, that I could find " in larger volumes, and likewiſe with ſuch ſhort moral reflections [C], and ſuch pro- " per characters of men, as might give life as well as add inſtruction to the hiſtory."

In 1712, Mr. Echard was inſtalled Archdeacon of Stowe; and, in 1718, he publiſhed the ſecond and third volumes [D] of his Hiſtory of England, which brings it down to the Revolution. To theſe volumes he prefixed a dedication to King George the Firſt. The ſame year, Dr. Edmund Calamy publiſhed, in 8vo, " A Letter to Mr. " Archdeacon Echard, upon occaſion of his Hiſtory of England: wherein the true " Principles of the Revolution are defended, the Whigs and Diſſenters vindicated, ſe- " veral Perſons of Diſtinction cleared from Aſperſions, and a Number of Hiſtorical " Miſtakes rectified." In this piece the author has made a variety of juſt remarks on

' bitants are fixed upon your Majeſty, looking out ' for protection and aſſiſtance, as from a deliverer ' ſent from heaven to break their chains, to diſſipate ' their fears, and to ſecure to them the bleſſings both ' of peace and liberty. Theſe are noble acts, the ' completing of which Providence ſeems to have re- ' ſerved for your Majeſty's reign, to render it glorious ' and triumphant. But your Majeſty's tender and af- ' fectionate care for the church of God, and thoſe ' freſh endeavours to deſtroy its greateſt enemies, ' vice and immorality, raiſe your Majeſty's fame to ' the full height, and cauſe it to triumph above all ' the glories of this world.'

[C] Short moral reflections.] Mr. Echard's moral reflections were not always ſhort, and ſometimes ſeemed not very neceſſary. In the Introduction to his account of the reign of King Charles the Firſt, he ſays, that ' to give a clear and comprehenſive account ' of ſuch a remarkable and melancholy reign, it is ' highly requiſite to trace the main ſteps, and lay ' open the chief ſprings of thoſe actions and events, ' that at length not only proved uncommon, but even ' prodigious, and beyond the reach of the moſt pene- ' trating foreſight.'—' In order to compaſs a work of ' ſuch ſurprizing variety, it may be very proper, firſt ' to take a tranſient and impartial view of human ' nature in general, as it has been uſually diſcovered, ' and experimentally found in all ages of the world: ' to conſider that great and extenſive maſs, with all its ' numerous frailties, corruptions, and deviations from ' the dignity of its firſt creation; and to look upon ' the majority of men of all nations, as men, not as ' ſaints, much leſs as angels (2).' Theſe introductory obſervations are followed by a variety of others on human nature, and on the characters and paſſions of men.

(2) Hiſt. of Eng. Vol. II. p. 1.

[D] The ſecond and third volumes, &c.] In the preface to his ſecond volume, he ſays, " Above two " hundred writers, of all ſorts, have been uſed in this " volume; which, for the ſmall number of years, " contains more ſurprizing variety than the hiſtory of " any other nation known to this part of the world." He then gives the names of many of the authors whom he had made uſe of; and adds, ' The trouble I had in ' collecting, ranging, and digeſting theſe materials, ' though great, and not eaſy to be judged of, was ' ſtill ſhort of what I met with from my ſedulous ap- ' plication to living aſſiſtants. For, at my firſt enter- ' ing upon this volume, I was infinitely deſirous to ' receive the beſt advice and inſtructions, and to ob- ' tain any publiſhed memoirs, letters, records, and ' other papers, that were likely to improve and en- ' rich the work. Accordingly I did, as much as I ' could with decency, get into the acquaintance of ' thoſe in London and the two univerſities, beſides ' others, that appeared moſt capable of aſſiſting me; ' and, ſo far as I durſt, or could meet with oppor- ' tunity, I applied myſelf to men of all ranks and ' parties; ſometimes to argue and debate upon par- ' ticular points and difficulties, other times to get a ' ſight of uncommon books and manuſcripts, and at ' all times to acquire new lights and ſupports for the ' clearing and eſtabliſhing the truth. To arrive at ' which, I made no ſcruple as to their opinions and ' perſuaſions, but endeavoured to enter into the con- ' verſation of all that were ſenſible and knowing in ' my buſineſs; without conſidering what notions they ' taught, or what profeſſions they made, either as to ' religion or politics.'

In the preface to his third volume, he ſays, ' Be- ' ſides the uſe of all printed tracts, ſuch as annals, ' collections, memoirs, letters, trials, pamphlets, ' ſpeeches, gazettes, &c. I had, as in the laſt volume, ' the advantage of ſeveral manuſcripts and private ac- ' counts, from perſons of unqueſtioned knowledge ' and credit, which have ſerved much to enrich and ' enlighten the work.'

the misrepresentations in Echard's History [E]; though, he acknowledges it to be, in several respects, a work of considerable merit. "When I became your reader," says he, "I was ready to make all the candid allowances you can desire. According to "your own motion, I perused your work in order as it was written; and not by leaps, "and starts, and distant parcels. And, now I have gone through the whole, am so "little inclined to detract from you, that I can freely say a great deal in your com- "mendation. The clearness of your method, and the perspicuity of your language, "are two very great excellences, which I admire. I am singularly pleased with the "refreshing divisions of your matter, and the chronological distinction of the several "parts of your history. I neither make any objections against the form of it as irre- "gular or disproportionate, nor the general method as intricate and confused, nor the "colouring as weak and unaffecting, nor the style as mean, flat, and insipid; which "are the things about which you appear peculiarly concerned. And yet I thought a "public animadversion both proper and necessary, and can meet with none of your "readers, how different soever in their sentiments, views, and principles, but what "herein agree (d)." Dr. Calamy also speaks of the "smooth and polite way" in which Mr. Echard's History is written; and says, that it has several beauties above many that had gone before him. But he adds, that he reckons his first volume to be by much the best of the three (e).

(d) Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard, p. 7.

(e) Ibid. p. 8. 10.

Mr. Echard's History of England was at first, in general, well received, and passed through several editions; but it appears to have greatly sunk in reputation after the publication of Tindal's Translation of Rapin. Echard related facts with perspicuity, though often with great partiality. He frequently vindicates or palliates the most unjust and oppressive measures of government, especially during the reigns of the Stuarts; nor does he ever do justice to the efforts of those who exerted themselves in support of the rights of the people. His observations are also often injudicious; but his work is rendered somewhat the more entertaining by short characters of the most eminent literary men in the different periods of his history.

An epigram was printed in the first volume of the Collection of Poems published by Dodsley, on the histories of Echard and Burnet, which may not improperly be inserted here, as the design of it is to give an idea of both those historiographers. It is as follows:

"Gil's history appears to me
"Political anatomy,
"A case of skeletons well done,
"And malefactors every one.
"His sharp and strong incision pen
"Historically cuts up men,
"And does with lucid skill impart
"Their inward ails of head and heart.
"Laurence proceeds another way,
"And well-dress'd figures does display:
"His characters are all in flesh,
"Their hands are fair, their faces fresh;
"And from his sweet'ning art derive
"A better scent than when alive;
"He wax-work made to please the sons,
"Whose fathers were Gil's skeletons."

[E] Remarks on the misrepresentations, &c.] Dr. Calamy particularly takes notice of his misrepresentations relative to the Nonconformists, and the unjust and rigorous proceedings against them during the reigns of the Stuarts. He also charges him with inconsistency, in pretending to approve the Revolution, and at the same time condemning those principles upon which it was grounded. He likewise accuses him of deficiencies and redundancies. One of his redundancies was "a long and very incredible story "about Cromwell's conference and contract with the "devil, on the very morning of the memorable day "of the fight at Worcester." After relating this story at some length, which is given on the pretended testimony of an officer named Lindsey, Echard gravely says, "How far Lindsey is to be be- "lieved, and how far the story is to be accounted in- "credible, is left to the reader's faith and judgment, "and not to any determination of our own (3)."

(3) Hist. of Eng. Vol. II. p. 713. edit. 1718.

Dr. Calamy also very justly objects to Mr. Echard's method of citing his authorities. He says, 'I neither 'admire many of the authors which you cite, nor 'your way of citing them: and I have some reason to 'think I am not singular in either. Many of the 'authors that are cited by you have so little credit 'in the world as to be far from giving sufficient 'warrant to justify your inserting things, from them, 'into an history that should give an account to pos- 'terity of past transactions. And your way of citing 'them is liable to very great objections. You mention 'a number of names in your margin, at the begin- 'ning of a section: but as to the particulars produced, 'there is no distinction between what you had from 'one, and from another. So that if your reader is 'desirous to know your authority for any particular 'that occurs, he may still be to seek for it, and not 'find it without a great deal of pains in searching.

'Nay, I cannot perceive there is any certain way 'of distinguishing what is purely your own, from 'what you produce authors for. This is a method 'that looks suspicious: and though perhaps your 'taking it might be some ease to yourself, yet it 'naturally adds to the trouble of your readers, who 'many times must look into all your authors, before 'they can be fully satisfied where you had a passage 'which they inquire after, and whether, your author 'is fairly cited, or misrepresented (4).'

(4) Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard, p. 118, 119.

Besides Dr. Calamy, our author's History was also attacked by Mr. Oldmixon, in his "Critical History "of England," and in his "History of England," "during the Reigns of the Stuarts."

This is very well as a jeu d' eſprit; but it does not give a very accurate idea of Echard's Hiſtory. For, though Echard often gave a very favourable account of perſons who had been repreſented in an unfavourable light by Burnet, particularly of ſuch as had been active in promoting the deſpotic views of the Stuarts; yet he was frequently guilty of groſs injuſtice to very illuſtrious characters, as was remarkably the caſe with reſpect to Hampden, Lord Ruſſell, and Algernon Sidney.

In 1719, Mr. Echard publiſhed, in a thin volume, 8vo, "Maxims and Diſcourſes, "moral and divine: taken from the Works of Archbiſhop Tillotſon, and methodized "and connected." This publication was inſcribed by him, in a very humble ſtyle, "To the moſt excellent, moſt pious, and beneficent Lady, Caſſandra, Counteſs of Car-"narvon, illuſtrious in her Family and Fortune, and more ſo in her Merits and "Virtues."

Mr. Echard was preſented by King George I. to the livings of Rendleſham, Sudborn, and Alford, in Suffolk; at which places he lived about eight years; but in a continual ill ſtate of health. Finding himſelf grow worſe, and being adviſed to go to Scarborough for the benefit of the waters, he ſet out, and got as far as Lincoln; but, declining very faſt, he was unable to proceed farther. Soon after his arrival at Lincoln, going out to take the air, he died in his chariot, on the 16th of Auguſt, 1730, and was interred in the chancel of St. Mary Magdalen's church, but without any monument or memorial of him (f). He was a member of the Society of Antiquaries. He married two wives; firſt, Jane, daughter to the Reverend Mr. Potter, of Yorkſhire; and, ſecondly, a daughter of Mr. Robert Wooley, a gentleman of Lincolnſhire: but he had no children by either of them (g).

Beſides the works already mentioned, Mr. Echard was alſo the author of "A Hiſtory "of the Revolution, in 1688," in one volume, 8vo, and of "The Gazetteer's or "Newſman's Interpreter, being a Geographical Index of all the conſiderable Cities, "&c. in Europe," &c. of which the eleventh edition, in 12mo, was publiſhed in 1716. He likewiſe publiſhed a tranſlation of three Comedies of Plautus, being the Amphitryon, Epidicus, and Rudens. Of this the ſecond edition was publiſhed in 1716. Thomas Cooke, in the notes to his tranſlation of the Amphitryon, ſays, that "Echard is "very injudicious, and groſsly low and vulgar (b)." This charge is too well grounded. Mr. Echard had alſo ſome ſhare in a tranſlation of Terence. In the tranſlations both of Plautus and Terence, he made the characters ſpeak ſuch language as is uſed in common Engliſh farces, which, though diſguſting to readers of a good taſte, probably rendered his tranſlations the more acceptable to readers of the lower order. The ninth edition of the tranſlation of Terence, which is ſaid to be "by Mr. Lawrence "Echard, and others," was publiſhed in 12mo in 1741.] T.

EDMONDES (a), EDMONDS, or EDMUNDS, (Sir THOMAS), Knt. memorable for his embaſſies at ſeveral Courts, was born at Plymouth in Devonſhire (b), about the year 1563 (c). He was the fifth and youngeſt ſon of Thomas Edmondes, Head-cuſtomer of that port, and of Fowye in Cornwall, by Joan his wife, daughter of Antony Delabare, of Shirbourn in Dorſetſhire, Eſq. who was third ſon of Henry Edmondes, of New Sarum, Gent. [A], by Juliana his wife, daughter of William Brandon, of the ſame place (d). Where he had his education is not known. But we are informed, that he was introduced to Court by his name-ſake, Sir Thomas Edmonds [B], Comptroller of the Queen's Houſehold (e): and, being initiated into public buſineſs, under that moſt accompliſhed Stateſman, Sir Francis Walſingham, Secretary of State (f), he was, undoubtedly through his recommendation, employed by Queen Elizabeth in ſeveral embaſſies. In 1592, that wiſe and diſcerning Princeſs, appointed him her Reſident at the Court of France, or rather Agent for her affairs in relation to King Henry IV. with a ſalary of twenty ſhillings a day (g) [C]. And, on the 17th of May, 1596, made [A] Who was third ſon of Henry Edmondes, of New Sarum, Gent.] Sir Thomas Edmondes, as the Rev. Mr. Birch obſerves (1), was deſcended of a good family, different branches of which ſettled in ſeveral counties; but the books in the Heralds Office are ſo defective in his pedigree, that it is not to be traced higher than his grand-father, Henry Edmondes of New Sarum, abovementioned; who had three ſons Laurence, Henry, and Thomas, and three daughters.

But Mr. Prince aſſures us (3), that they had different coats of arms, and conſequently were of two diſtinct families.

[C] With a ſalary of twenty ſhillings a day.] But this allowance was ſo ill-paid, or ſo inſufficient for his ſubſiſtence, that he was obliged to repreſent, in moſt pathetic terms, his diſtreſs to the Lord-Treaſurer, in a letter dated 21 Dec. 1593. Wherein, after repreſenting how much he was indebted to one Mr. Smyth's charity and pity, who had not only lent him, but alſo given him extraordinary credit for money; he adds, 'It is to many known the poor life I do here lead, 'under the burden of this heavy expence, far above 'my power to bear, proteſting to your Lordſhip, in 'the faith of a Chriſtian, ſuch to be my preſent miſery, 'as I have not the means wherewith to put a good 'garment on my back, to appear in honeſt company; 'my made him a grant of the office of Secretary to her Majeſty for the French tongue, 'in conſideration of his faithful and acceptable ſervice heretofore done (b).' Towards the end of that year he returned to England, when Sir Anthony Mildmay was ſent Embaſſador to King Henry; but he went back again to France in the beginning of May following, and in leſs than a month returned to London (i) [D]. In October, 1597, he was diſpatched again as Agent for her Majeſty to the King of France (k); and returned to England about the beginning of May, 1598, where his ſtay was extremely ſhort, for he was at Paris in the July following (l). But, upon Sir Henry Neville being appointed Embaſſador to the French Court, he was recalled, to his great ſatisfaction, and arrived at London in June, 1599 (m). Sir Henry Neville gave him a very great character (n), and recommended him to the Queen in the ſtrongeſt terms [E]. Before the end of that year, namely, about December the 26th, he was ſent to Archduke Albert, Governor of the Netherlands, with a letter of credence, and inſtructions to treat of a peace. The Archduke received him with great reſpect; but not being willing to ſend Commiſſioners to England, as the Queen deſired, Mr. Edmondes went to Paris, and, having obtained of King Henry IV. Boulogne for the place of treaty, he returned to England, and arrived at Court on Sunday morning, February 17 (o). The 11th of March following, he embarked again for Bruſſels (p); and, on the 22d, had an audience of the Archduke, whom having prevailed upon to treat with the Queen, he returned home, April 9, 1600, and was received by her Majeſty with great favour, and highly commended for his ſufficiency in his negotiation (q). Soon after, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners for the treaty of Boulogne, together with Sir Henry Neville, the Queen's Embaſſador in France, John Herbert, Eſq. her Majeſty's ſecond Secretary, and Robert Beale, Eſq. Secretary to the Council in the North; their commiſſion being dated the 10th of May, 1600. The two laſt, with Mr. Edmondes, left London the 12th of that month, and arrived at Boulogne the 16th, as Sir Henry Neville did the ſame day from Paris. But, after the Commiſſioners had been above three months upon the place, they parted, July the 28th, without ever aſſembling, by reaſon of a diſpute about precedency between England and Spain (r). Mr. Edmondes, not long after his return, was appointed one of the Clerks of the Privy Council: and, in the end of June, 1601, was ſent to the French King, to complain of the many acts of injuſtice committed by his ſubjects againſt the Engliſh merchants. He ſoon after returned to England; but, towards the end of Auguſt, went again, and waited upon King Henry IV. then at Calais; to whom he propoſed ſome meaſures, both for the relief of Oſtend, then beſieged by the Spaniards, and for an offenſive alliance againſt Spain (s). After his return to England, he was appointed one of the Commiſſioners, for ſettling, with the two French Embaſſadors, the depredations between England and France, and preventing them for the future (t). The 20th of May, 1603, he was knighted by King James I; and, upon the concluſion of the peace with Spain, on the 18th of Auguſt, 1604, was appointed Embaſſador to the Archduke at Bruſſels (u). He ſet out for that place the 19th of April, 1605 (w); having firſt obtained a reverſionary grant of the office of Clerk of the Crown (x). And, though abſent, was choſen one of the repreſentatives for the Burgh of Wilton, in the parliament which was to have met at Weſtminſter, Nov. 5, 1605, but was prevented by the diſcovery of the Gunpowder-plot (y) [F]. During his embaſſy, he promoted, to the utmoſt of his power, an accommodation between the King of Spain and the States-General of the United Provinces (z) [G]. He was recalled in 1609, and came back to England about the end

Mr. Birch obſerves upon that occaſion, That complaints of Queen Elizabeth's parſimony were not at all unuſual among her Miniſters, both at home and abroad. And it is remarkable, that the Lord-Treaſurer himſelf, in a letter ſtill extant in the paper-office, written in the critical year 1588, while the Spaniſh Armada was expected againſt England, excuſes himſelf to Sir Edward Stafford, then Embaſſador in France, for not writing to him oftner, on account of her Majeſty's unwillingneſs to be at the expence of meſſengers (6).

[G] During his embaſſy, he promoted an accommodation between the King of Spain and the States-General.] It appears from ſome of his diſpatches, that Prince Maurice was extremely averſe to an accommodation; and uſed all the efforts imaginable, to perſuade Henry IV, to prevent the ſucceſs of the treaty about the truce. And, while it was negociating, he was of a very craving humour; for, not ſatisfied with the large treatments granted by the States, not contented with the end of Auguſt, or the beginning of September (a). In April, 1610, he was employed as one of the Aſſiſtant-Commiſſioners, to conclude a defenſive league with the Crown of France (b): and, having been deſigned, ever ſince the year 1608, to be ſent Embaſſador into that kingdom [H], he was diſpatched thither in all haſte, in May, 1610, upon the news of the execrable murder of King Henry IV. in order to learn the ſtate of affairs there (c). He arrived at Paris, May the 24th, where he was very civilly received [I], and, on the 27th of June, had his audience of Mary de Medicis, Queen Regent; the young King [Lewis XIII.] being preſent (d). In November following, he cauſed an Italian to be apprehended at Paris, for having ill deſigns againſt his maſter, King James I (e) [K]. There being, in 1613, a competition between him and the Spaniſh Embaſſador, about precedency (f), we are told, that he went to Rome privately, and fetched a certificate out of the Pope's Ceremonial, ſhewing that the King of England is to precede the King of Caſtile (g). He was employed, the ſame year, in treating of a marriage between Henry Prince of Wales, and the Princeſs Chriſtine, ſiſter of Lewis XIII, King of France; but the death of that Prince, on the 6th of November, 1612, put an end to this negotiation (h). And yet, on the ninth day of the ſame month, orders were ſent him, to propoſe a marriage between the ſaid Princeſs and our Prince Charles: however, he had more diſcretion than to open ſuch an affair ſo ſoon after the brother's death (i) [L]. About the end of December, 1613, Sir Thomas deſired leave to return to England, but was denied till he ſhould have received the final reſolution of the Court of France, about the treaty of marriage; which having obtained, he came to England towards the end of January, 1613-14. Though the Privy Council ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this match, becauſe they had not ſooner been made acquainted with ſo important an affair; yet, ſo zealous was the King for it, that he ſent Sir Thomas again to Paris, with inſtructions, dated July 20, 1614, for bringing it to a concluſion. But, after all, it appeared that the Court of France were not ſincere in this affair, and only propoſed it to amuſe the Proteſtants in general (k). In 1616, Sir Thomas aſſiſted at the conference at Loudun, between the Proteſtants and the oppoſite party; and, by his journey to Rochelle, diſpoſed the Proteſtants to accept of the terms offered them, and was of great uſe in ſettling the pacification (l). About the end of October, in the ſame year, he was ordered to England; not to quit his charge, but, after he ſhould have kiſſed the King's hand, and received ſuch honour as his Majeſty was reſolved to confer upon him, in acknowledgment of his long, painful, and faithful, ſervices, then to go and reſume his charge; and continue in France, till the affairs of that kingdom, which then hung in a ſlippery and uncertain ſtate, ſhould be better eſtabliſhed. Accordingly, he came over to England in December; and, on the 21ſt of that month, was made Comptroller of the King's Houſehold; and, the next day, ſworn a Privy-

the reſtitution from the Archdukes of all the Prince of Orange's land in Burgundy, and the Netherlands; he farther demanded ſatisfaction for certain pretenſions, grounded upon grants to his father from the States of Brabant and Flanders, which carried with them no ſhow of equity (10). In his conduct he appeared to have been of a very warm temper; apt to fly out upon contradiction, and to embrace haſty reſolutions, from which he was afterwards obliged to recede, in a manner that did him no credit (11).

[H] And, having been deſigned, ever ſince the year 1608, to be ſent Embaſſador into that kingdom.] His abilities, integrity, and faithfulneſs in his maſter's and country's ſervice, were ſuch a terror to the French Court, that they endeavoured to prevent his coming, and to have another appointed. For, Mr. de Puiſieux, one of their Prime-Miniſters, takes notice in a letter to their Embaſſador in England, that they would get nothing by having him in the room of Sir George Carew, ſince Sir Thomas Edmondes underſtood them too well. 'If he ſhould be ſent,' adds Mr. de Puiſieux, 'it is only with a deſign to make a fuller diſ'covery of our affairs. We cannot nor ought to 'oppoſe openly the appointment of him; but who'ever can underhand divert this ſtroke would, in my 'opinion, do a good ſervice.' And Secretary de Villeroy, in a letter to the abovementioned Embaſſador, has theſe words: 'Let me know, —whether 'there is a means of procuring Sir Thomas Edmondes 'to be employed elſewhere; which would be a great 'relief to the Queen.———However, I am not 'of opinion that you ſhould make this propoſal; for, 'if it does not ſucceed, it will only ſerve to exaſpe'rate this little man, who has ſpirit and courage 'enough (12).'

[I] Where he was very civilly received.] Though his perſon was not very agreeable to the French Court, as is manifeſt from the laſt note, yet his coming at that juncture was well taken. 'For, the next day af'ter his arrival, he was viſited by the Maſter of the 'Ceremonies, from the young King and the Queen 'Regent, to bid him welcome, and to make their 'acknowledgments to King James for that kind of'fice of ſending thither his Embaſſador. Sir Thomas 'was the firſt in the performance of his office to the 'new King, for which he received many congratula'tions, and was viſited with great affection by all the 'foreign Miniſters at Paris, eſpecially thoſe who were 'profeſſed friends to Great Britain (13).'

[L] However, he had more diſcretion than to open ſuch an affair ſo ſoon.] And, when he excuſed himſelf to our Court for that omiſſion, King James approved of his conduct in that point; as appears from a letter of his Majeſty, dated December 11, to Sir Thomas, wherein are theſe words: —— 'Wee do 'very weall allow of your carriage thairin, as fully 'agreeing with our meaning in our former direction, 'thogh peradventure ſum words thairin might cauſe it 'to be miſtaken. For, it had been a very blunt thing 'in us, that you, our Miniſter, ſhould, ſo ſoone after 'ſuch irreparable loſſe receaved by us, have be'gunne to talk of mariage, the moſt contrary thing 'that could be to death and funeralls. But becauſe 'we doubted not, that that motione would be re'newed againe unto you, if not by Villeroy, at leaſt 'by the Duke of Buillon, our meaning was thairfor, 'that you ſhould intertayn the motione (15).'

Counſellor. He returned to the Court of France in April, 1617; but took his leave of it towards the latter end of the ſame year. And, on the 19th of January, 1617-18, was advanced to the place of Treaſurer of the Houſehold (m): which was all the preferment he enjoyed, though he deſerved the poſt of Secretary of State that he had been recommended for (n), and which none was better qualified to diſcharge. He was elected one of the Burgeſſes for the Univerſity of Oxford, in the firſt parliament of King Charles I. which met June 18, 1625, and was alſo returned for the ſame in the next parliament, which aſſembled at Weſtminſter the 26th of February following; but, his election being declared void (o), he was choſen for another place. Some of the ſpeeches, which he made in parliament, are printed [M]. On the 11th of June, 1629, he was commiſſioned to go Embaſſador to the French Court, on purpoſe to carry King Charles's ratification, and to receive Lewis the Thirteenth's oath, for the performance of the treaty of peace, then newly concluded between England and France: which he did in September following (p). And, with this honourable commiſſion, he concluded all his foreign employments. Having, after this, enjoyed a creditable and peaceful retreat for about ten years, he departed this life, September 20, 1639 (q). His Lady was Magdalen, one of the daughters and co-heirs of Sir John Wood, Knight, Clerk of the Signet, by whom he had one ſon, and three daughters [N]. She died at Paris, December 31, 1614, with a character amiable and exemplary in all reſpects. Sir Thomas had with her the manor of Albins, in the pariſhes of Stapleford-Abbot, and Naveſtoke in Eſſex, where Inigo Jones built for him a manſion-houſe, delightfully ſituated in a park, now the ſeat of the Abdy family (r). As to his perſon, Sir Thomas was ſmall of ſtature (s), but great in underſtanding. He was a man of uncommon ſagacity, and indefatigable induſtry, in his employments abroad; always attentive to the motions of the Courts where he reſided, and punctual and exact in reporting them to his own [O]: of a firm and unſhaken reſolution in the diſcharge of his duty, beyond the influence of terror, flattery, or corruption. The French Court, in particular, dreaded his experience and abilities, as hath been ſhewn above; and the Popiſh and Spaniſh party there could ſcarcely diſguiſe their hatred of ſo zealous a ſupporter of the Proteſtant intereſt in that kingdom. His letters and papers, in twelve volumes in folio, were once in the poſſeſſion of Secretary Thurloe, and afterwards of the Lord Chancellor Somers [P]. The ſtyle of them is clear, ſtrong, and maſculine, and entirely free from the pedantry and puerilities, which infected the moſt applauded writers of that age, namely, Lord Bacon, Sir Henry Wotton, Dr. Donne, &c. (t).

[M] Some of the Speeches, which he made in parliament, are printed.] The firſt was on the 22d of March, 1627, when he ſpoke to this effect: 'The King congratulating this preſent Parliament, he prays for a bleſſed ſupply; he aſſures us of his gracious inclination towards us, and of the conſequence of this meeting; doth intimate how much the ſafety of ourſelves and confederates abroad depends upon the good ſucceſs thereof; and he wiſheth a general oblivion of things that are paſt, leſt they cauſe diſtractions anew, without a primary and free ſupply to his Majeſty (16).' The ſecond was January the 28th 1628, being as follows: I am ſorry this houſe hath given occaſion of ſo many meſſages about tunnage and poundage, after his Majeſty hath given us a full ſatisfaction. You may perceive his Majeſty is ſenſible of the neglect of his buſineſs; we, that know this, ſhould not diſcharge our duties to you, if we ſhould not perſuade you to that courſe, which ſhould procure his Majeſties good opinion of you. Yourſelves are witneſſes how induſtrious his Majeſty was to procure you gracious Laws in his father's time, and, ſince that, what enlargement he hath made of our Liberties (*), and yet, ſtill we give him cauſe to repent him of the good he hath done. Conſider how dangerous it is to alienate his Majeſties heart from Parliaments (17).' David Lloyd tells us (18), alluding in all likelihood to theſe ſpeeches, that Sir Thomas angered the faction againſt the Court, with his principles, that the King was to be truſted: that the revenue was to be ſettled: that the Proteſtant cauſe was to be maintained: that jealouſies were to be removed, and things paſt were to be forgotten.——— Beſides theſe two ſpeeches, there are ſeveral letters of his publiſhed, in the three Volumes of Memorials of Affairs of State (19).

[P] His letters and papers, &c.] Several of them, together with abſtracts from the reſt, were publiſhed by the Rev. Mr. Thomas Birch, F. R. S. in a book intituled, "An Hiſtorical View of the Negotiations "between the Courts of England, France, and "Bruſſels, from the year 1592 to 1617. Extracted "chiefly from the MS. State-papers of Sir Thomas "Edmondes, Kt. Embaſſador in France, &c. and of "Anthony Bacon, Eſq. Brother to the Lord Chan"cellor Bacon. London 1749. 8vo. M.

 [Though Dr. Birch's "Hiſtorical View" is the principal ſource of information concerning Sir Thomas Edmondes's abilities, negotiations, and character, ſome farther confirmation of his eminence in theſe reſpects may be deduced from more recent publications. Several extracts of letters, written by him in the early part of his political life, and during his reſidence in France, occur in Birch's "Memoirs of "the Reign of Queen Elizabeth." The letters taken notice of in that work were addreſſed partly to the Lord

Lord Treaſurer Burleigh, and partly to the Earl of Eſſex; and it appears from them how diligent Mr. Edmondes was in communicating every ſpecies of intelligence. A jealouſy and diſlike ſubſiſted between him and the intriguing Antonio Perez, of whom mention is made in the additions to Lord Bacon's article (25). Though Mr. Edmondes correſponded with the Earl of Eſſex, it was underſtood that he was more attached to Secretary Cecil than to that nobleman. This gave great offence to the Earl's party. One of Eſſex's agents (a Monſ. Combes) ſtyles Mr. Edmondes "a mere JUDAS; and more corrupt than any "Jeſuit; and affirms, that he had ſaid, that the "Earl would ſpoil every thing, and ruin himſelf, as "being much more proper for throwing a court into "diſorder than contributing to its order; and never "was nor would be long without being involved in "ſome trouble at court (26)." It was in 1598 that this charge was brought againſt Mr. Edmondes; before which time there is reaſon to believe that he had ceaſed to correſpond with the Earl of Eſſex: for, the laſt letter to him of which we have an account was dated on the 31ſt of December, 1595 (27). It will be no impeachment of Mr. Edmondes's wiſdom that he dropped his connection with a nobleman of ſo impetuous a character, eſpecially as he has never been accuſed of behaving with ingratitude to the Earl, which was the caſe with ſome of his Lordſhip's friends.

In Mr. Lodge's "Illuſtrations of Britiſh Hiſtory," publiſhed in 1791, we find a number of Sir Thomas Edmondes's letters, all of which were written to the Earl of Shrewſbury. They chiefly relate to the affairs of France, Spain, and the Low Countries. Some few of them, however, which Sir Thomas wrote from London, or its vicinity, contain the domeſtic news of the time. We learn from one of them, that James the Firſt, upon his acceſſion to the throne of England, had much ſquabbling with his Queen, about the appointment of her Majeſty's houſehold. The lady was very reſtive in the affair. "I underſtand," ſays Sir Thomas; "that the King is "verie ill ſatisfied with the Duke of Lenox for not "having more effectually employed himſelf to diſ"ſwade the Queene from ſome courſes which ſhe hath "taken, which doe verie muche diſcontente the Kinge; "namelie, for conferringe the place of her Chamber"leyn (to the which Sir George Carew was recom"mended) on one Mr. Kennedy, a Scottiſhe gentell"man, of whom the King hath very ill conceipt, "and, as it is ſaid, uſed theſe wourdes againſt him; "that if he ſhould fynd that ſhe doe bring him thither "to attend her in that place, that he woulde breake "the ſtaffe of his Chamberleynſhipp on his hedd, and "ſo diſmiſſe him; but we underſtand, that, upon a "comandement ſince ſent unto him for his returne, "he is gone backe into Scotland. It is ſayd, that "the Kinge taketh the like offence at the coming of "dyvers others that be in her companie; and, there"fore, the Duke of Lenox was yeſternight ſent back "in poſt unto her concerning all thoſe particulars. It "is ſaid that ſhe hath hitherto refuſed to admitt my "Ladye of Kildare, and the Ladye Walſingham, to "be of her privye chamber; and hath onlie as yett "ſworne my Ladye of Bedfourd to that place (28)." Our predeceſſor aſſerts, in the text, upon Sir Thomas Edmondes's being made Treaſurer of the Houſehold, that this was all the preferment he enjoyed. But, we are informed by Mr. Lodge, that in 1620 he was appointed Clerk of the Crown in the Court of King's Bench (29)]. K.

EDWARDS (THOMAS), a famous Preſbyterian writer in the XVIIth century, and a bitter enemy to the Independents, who then bore ſway in this kingdom, was educated in Trinity College, in Cambridge [A], where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in the year 1605, and that of Maſter in 1609 (a). He was incorporated Maſter of Arts at Oxford, July 14, 1623 (b). Where and what his preferments were, we do not find: but we learn from himſelf (c), that, though he conformed, yet he was always a Puritan in his heart [B]. He exerciſed his miniſtry, chiefly as a Lecturer, at Hertford, and at ſeveral places in and about London (d); and was ſometimes brought into trouble for oppoſing the received doctrines, or not complying duly with the eſtabliſhed Church [C]. But he did not take any degree in that College (2), nor, as it ſeems, in the Univerſity; and conſequently could not be the ſame with our author. [C] And was ſometimes brought into trouble, &c.] He gives us the following relation of it. 'Many years 'ago when I was perſecuted by ſome Prelates and 'their creatures, in no poſſibility nor capacity by my 'principles and practices of preferment, I preached 'againſt, and upon all occaſions declared myſelf againſt, 'the Browniſts, Separatiſts, Antinomians, and all er'rors in that way, as well as againſt Popiſh Innova'tions and Arminian Tenets. There are many who 'were my Auditors in thoſe times can and will wit'neſs what I have preached at London and at Hart'ford againſt thoſe errors, when I have in the ſame 'places preached ſuch ſermons againſt the prevailing 'opinions, innovations, and corruptions of the Pre'lates, that many thought I ſhould never have preached 'again, and indeed was not without many ſufferings 'and troubles, being put out of places, ſtopped from 'coming into others, and at laſt letters miſſive with 'an attachment ſent out to bring me into the High'Commiſſion-Court. But, when the independent party began to appear, and eſpecially to be uppermoſt, he became as furious againſt them as he had been againſt the Royaliſts; and oppoſed them with great virulence, both by writing and acting. [D] When the long Parliament declared againſt King Charles I. our author embarked himſelf—— in the ſame ſhip with them.] He declares this himſelf, in the firſt part of his Gangræna, in the epiſtle dedicatory to the Lords and Commons aſſembled in Parliament (6). 'All my actions from the beginning 'of your ſitting, my ſermons, prayers, praiſes, diſcourſes, actings for you, ſpeak otherwiſe [i. e. than 'ſaucineſs and diſreſpect]. I am one who out of 'choiſe and judgement have embarked myſelfe, with 'wife, children, eſtate, and all thats dear to me, in 'the ſame ſhip with you, to ſinke and periſh, or to 'come ſafe to land with you, and that in the moſt 'doubtfull and difficult times, not only early in the 'firſt beginning of the war and troubles, in a malignant 'place among courtiers and thoſe who were ſervants 'and had relations to the King, Queen, and their 'children, pleading your cauſe, juſtifying your wars, 'ſatisfying many that ſcrupled: but when your affairs were at loweſt, and the chance of war againſt 'you, and ſome of the grandees and favourites of 'theſe times were packing up and ready to be gone, 'I was then higheſt and moſt zealous for you, preaching, praying, ſtirring up the people to ſtand for you, 'by going out in perſon, lending of money, in the 'later going before them by example; and as I have 'been your honours moſt devoted ſervant, ſo am I 'ſtill yours, and you cannot eaſily loſe me.'——

[E] Antapologia, &c.] This is 'Humbly ſubmitted' (by the author) 'to the Honourable Houſes 'of Parliament.' And, in the Preface, he ſays (7), 'That he had drawn up that anſwer, for their ſakes 'in ſpeciall who were apt to be troubled with many 'doubts and feares about the conſtitution and government of the viſible church, and the way of worſhip 'and Communion in it: and, as to undeceive them in 'the Apologiſts, the Apologie, and their church-way, 'ſo to ſatisfie his readers in their ſcruples and doubts 'about Preſbyterie.'——A little after, he adds, —— 'This Antapologia I here recommend to 'you for a true glaſſe to behold the faces of Preſbyterie and Independencie in, with the beauty, order, 'ſtrength of the one, and the deformity, diſorder and 'weakneſſe of the other: and good reader, I have 'ſome reaſon to beleeve and hope, that if you will 'indeed reade and conſider, looke impartially and 'throughly into this glaſſe, you may be either changed 'into the image of it, or at leaſt ſo ſtumbled at independencie, as to be kept from falling into it.'—— The book which this Antapologia anſwereth, was 'An Apologeticall Narration of ſome Miniſters (8), 'formerly in exile, now members of the Aſſembly of 'Divines.' 'Tis inſerted in the Antapologia, and anſwered there paragraph by paragraph. In one place (9), our author pleads ſtrongly for the lawfulneſs of ſet-forms of prayer preſcribed. 'I muſt tell you,' ſays he, 'this great controverſie upon it is raiſed only 'by yourſelves (10), and the Browniſts, there being 'no divines, nor no Reformed churches that I know 'of, but doe allow the lawful uſe of ſet-formes of 'prayer, compoſed and framed by others (as by ſynods and aſſemblies) and doe make uſe of ſuch ſometimes, as the churches of France and Holland in the 'adminiſtration of Sacraments uſually doe, and thoſe 'who practice them not ſo much, yet at leaſt hold 'them lawfull. And I challenge you in all your reading to name one divine of note and orthodox that 'ever held ſet-formes of prayer preſcribed unlawfull, 'excepting only Independents.' In another place (11) he lays down many reaſons againſt an univerſal toleration.

That the 'Scriptures are unſufficient and uncertain, there is no 'certainty to build any doctrine upon them, they are

That the 'holy writings and ſayings of Moſes and the Prophets, 'of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, and the proper names, 'perſons, and things, contained therein, are allegories, 'and theſe allegories are the myſtery and ſpiritual 'meaning of them. (15) Ib. p. 19. 'is the word of God (15). That God hath a hand 'in, and is the Author of the ſinfulneſſe of his people; 'that he is the Author not of thoſe actions alone, in 'and with which ſin is, but of the very pravity, ataxy, 'anomy, irregularity, and ſinfulneſſe itſelf which is in 'them. That all lyes come forth from out of the 'mouth of God. That no man was caſt into hell for 'any ſin, but only becauſe God would have it ſo. 'That the ſoul dies with the body, and all things 'ſhall have an end, but God only ſhall remaine for 'ever (16). Every creature in the firſt eſtate of crea-(16) Ib. p. 20, & 110. 'That by Chriſts death, all the ſins of all the men in 'the world, Turks, Pagans as well as Chriſtians, com-'mitted againſt the morall law and firſt covenant, are 'actually pardoned and forgiven, and this is the ever-'laſting Goſpel. That no man ſhall periſh or go to 'hell for any ſin, but unbelief only (18). That the (18) Ib. p. 22. 'leaſt truth is of more worth than Jeſus Chriſt him-'ſelf (19). That there is a perfect way in this life, (19) Page 23. 'not by Word, Sacraments, Prayer, and other ordi-'nances, but by the experience of the Spiritin a man's 'ſelf. That a man baptized with the Holy Ghoſt 'knows all things, even as God knows all things; 'which point is a deep myſtery and great ocean, 'where there is no caſting anchor, nor ſounding the 'bottome. That if a man by the Spirit knew himſelf 'to be in the ſtate of grace, though he did commit 'murther or drunkenneſſe, God did ſee no ſin in him. 'There is no free-will in man either to good or evil, 'either in his naturall or glorified eſtate (20). That (20) Ib. p. 24. 'the morall law is of no uſe at all to believers, that 'tis no rule for believers to walk by, nor to examine 'their lives by, and that Chriſtians are freed from the 'mandatory power of the law. Neither faith, nor 'repentance, nor humiliation, nor ſelf-denial, nor uſe 'of ordinances, nor doing as one would be done to, 'are duties required of Chriſtians, or ſuch things as 'they muſt exerciſe themſelves in, or they can have 'no part in Chriſt. That the doctrine of repentance 'is a ſoul-deſtroying doctrine. That 'tis as poſſible 'for Chriſt himſelfe to ſin, as for a child of God to 'ſin. That God doth not chaſtiſe any of his children 'for ſin; and, let believers ſin as faſt as they can, there 'is a fountain open for them to waſh in (21). That (21) Ib. p. 25. 'God's children are not to aſk the pardon and for-'giveneſſe of their ſins, they need not, they ought 'not, and 'tis no leſſe than blaſphemy for a childe of 'God to aſke pardon of ſins, 'tis infidelity to aſke 'pardon of ſins, and David's aſking forgiveneſſe of 'ſin was his weakneſſe. That the ſoul of a man is 'mortall as the ſoul of a beaſt, and dies with the body '(22). There is no reſurrection at all of the bodies (22) Ib. p. 26. 'of men after this life, nor heaven, nor hell, nor de-'vils, after this life (23). That in points of Religion, (23) Ib. p. 27. 'where wicked men are, or to pray with any of the 'wicked (27). That there are Revelations and 'Viſions in theſe times; yea to ſome they are more 'ordinary, and ſhall be to the people of God generally 'within a while. That the gift of miracles is not 'ceaſed in theſe times, but that ſome of the ſectaries 'have wrought miracles. 'Tis ordinary for Chriſtians 'now in theſe dayes, with Paul to be wrapt up to the 'third Heavens, and to hear words unutterable, and 'they cannot well have aſſurance of being Chriſtians, 'that have not found and had experience of this (28). 'All the earth is the ſaints, and there ought to be a 'community of goods, and the ſaints ſhould ſhare in 'the lands and eſtates of gentlemen and rich men. 'That 'tis lawfull for a man to put away his wife up- 'on indiſpoſition, unfitneſſe, contrariety of mind, &c. 'Tis unlawful for Chriſtians to fight, and take up 'arms for their laws and civil liberties. That uſing 'of ſet formes of prayer preſcribed is Idolatry (29). 'That 'tis not lawful for a Chriſtian to be a Magiſ- 'trate, but upon turning Chriſtian he ſhould lay down 'his Magiſtracy (30). That God hath a bodily ſhape 'and proportion (31). The ſouls of the ſaints de- 'parted now in Heaven are on earth every where 'preſent with their friends, and with all the affairs of 'this world, ſeeing and knowing them; and do now 'with Chriſt govern and rule the kingdoms of the 'Earth, and all the affairs here below (32). That 'there is no need of univerſities, that univerſities are 'of the devill; that human learning is fleſh oppoſed 'to the ſpirit, and that if men be anointed with the 'ſpirit, and accepted amongſt the ſaints, they are ſuf- 'ficiently qualified (33). That all ſhall be ſaved at 'laſt, both all men and devils: and ſhall ſee, feel, 'and poſſeſs, bleſſedneſs, to their everlaſting ſalvation 'and comfort (34). That Chriſt ſhed his bloud for 'kine and horſes, and all other creatures, as well as for 'men, &c. (35).' Theſe, and many more, are ſome of the blaſphemies and horrid impieties, advanced and maintained in theſe unhappy kingdoms, during thoſe lawleſs diſtracted times, when every one did what ſeemed right in his own eyes. And no wonder; if we do but obſerve, what ſort of creatures ſet up for the great reformers of religion and inſtructors of mankind; namely (to uſe our author's words) 'ſwarms of illiterate mechanicks, as ſmiths, 'taylors, ſhoemakers, pedlars, weavers, women- 'preachers, &c. (36).' And, by name, 'one Heath 'the collar-maker of Watton, one Rice the tinker 'of Aſton, one Field the bodies-maker of Hertford, 'one Crew the taylor of Stevenage,' all in Hertford- ſhire: and the like in other counties (37).

He quotes his authorities and vouchers all along; and affirms, that the 'truth of the maine ſubſtance 'and matter of whatever he relates, both for opinions 'and matters of fact, is plainly demonſtrated; by his 'quoting books known to hundreds, by naming per- 'ſons known for witneſſes, by relating things common 'in the times, and theſe ſet by the errors in the mar- 'gents, or joyned to the matter, ſo manifeſt that he 'that runs may read it (38).' Nay, he makes this 'declaration. —— 'I can ſay of it, that of all the 'particulars in this kind that I have related in theſe 'three books [of Gangræna], beſides many matters 'of fact in Antapologia, (which in all amount to ſome 'thouſands,) I do not know of any one particular re- 'lated by me, excepting one, that I have reaſon to 'ſuſpect was not true, and yet that was written me in 'a letter by a reverend and godly Minſter, and was 'the voice of the country (39).'

But it muſt be remembered, that among the errors above-mentioned, our author places many doctrines maintained by the Arminians, (and not taken notice of by me,) which, though condemned by the Synod of Dort, time hath ſhewn to be moſt plain and unqueſtionable truths.

It is not only by ſuch quotations out of the books of independent writers, as are ſet down above, that Mr. Edwards ſhews his great inveteracy againſt that whole party. But he doth it likewiſe by cenſuring their actions; and diſplaying, their inſolences, pride, and arrogance; their covetouſneſs, and ambition: their ſubtilties, and hypocriſy; their tumults and riots even in the moſt ſacred places (40); their libertiniſm and atheiſm; their inceſts, and other uncleanneſſes: their looſeneſs, immorality, and drunkenneſs; their deceitfulneſs, lying, and ſlandering; their horrible affronts to authority (41); their contempt of all that is ſacred and ſerious, witneſs their baptizing of a horſe, &c. (42).——He likewiſe endeavours to expoſe them to the utmoſt, by relating ſome of their abſurd and nonſenſical ſayings: as for inſtance —— 'Chriſt judges not by the eye, or eare, he regards 'not mens prayers or duties; if they have Chriſt in 'their heart, though they do not read and pray, and 'trade in duties, Chriſt judges them according to their 'heart (43).'—— 'I rejoyce that Chriſt is be- 'ginning to ſet up houſe-keeping, and his ſaints ſhall 'not want while Chriſt have one penny; come buy 'without money, gold tried and white raiment, and 'anoint thine eies with eie-ſalve that thou maieſt ſee' (44)——One, preaching on John 20. 17. 'Touch 'me not, I am not yet aſcended; collected from thoſe 'words theſe three tranſcendent points: Firſt, That 'laymen, weavers, tinkers, and coblers, being gifted, 'might be preachers. Secondly, learning was not 'any means or help to underſtand the meaning of the 'Scriptures. Thirdly, that any chamber, barne, or 'ſtable, or other place, was as holy as the church; 'and that there was no holineſs in the temple, for 'God deſtroyed it; nor in any church (45).'—— But, when he comes to ſpeak of a toleration, (which the independents were then making ſtrong intereſt for, in order to work themſelves into all places of truſt or profit,) he loſes all patience. 'This land, ſaith he, 'is become already in many places a chaos, a babel, 'another Amſterdam, yea worſe, we are beyond that, 'and in the highway to Munſter; but, if a general to- 'leration ſhould be granted, ſo much written and 'ſtood for, England would quickly become a Sodom, 'an Egypt, Babylon, yea, worſe than all theſe (46). '—A toleration is the grand deſigne of the devil, his 'maſter-peece, and chief engine he works by at this 'time to uphold his tottering kingdome; it is the 'moſt compendious, ready, ſure, way to deſtroy all 'religion, lay all waſte, and bring in all evil; it is 'a moſt tranſcendent, catholique, and fundamentall, 'evill, for this kingdom, of any that can be imagined. 'As originall ſin is the moſt fundamentall ſin, all ſin; 'having the ſeed and ſpawn of all in it, ſo a tolera- 'tion hath all errors in it, and all evils—— (47). 'Independency is become a compound of many er- 'rors, as Antinomianiſm, Browniſm, Anabaptiſm, Li- 'bertiniſm; and, if independency could once get a to- 'leration, we ſhould then ſee it ſpeak out to purpoſe. 'And as Independency is in this ſenſe all error, being 'the great cauſe of them, ſo many errors are for In- 'dependency, that is the love of errors cauſes many 'to become Independents—— (48)' ——One remarkable particular in theſe books muſt not paſs without obſervation: and it is, that, as early as the year 1646, the Independents had formed deſigns againſt the life of King Charles I. and reſolved to cauſe him to be beheaded (49).——Finally, we learn thence, that at firſt 'the Independents would 'preach freely, aſking nothing (50).' But they have ſince altered their minds; and maintain, as firmly as the Miniſters of the Eſtabliſhed Church, that they who preach the goſpel muſt live of the goſpel.

 [It is difficult to account for the motive which could induce our learned predecessor to give an article of this Mr. Edwards. If it was candour, it was candour carried to an excess. In himself, Mr. Thomas Edwards ill-deserved a place in the Biographia. The account of him, however, is not altogether without its utility; since it serves to display the wretched absurdities that prevailed amongst the sectaries of the time, and the equal absurdities which, on the other hand, were maintained by Edwards. He not only had all the narrow principles of the most bigoted Presbyterians of that age, but super-induced upon them an additional malignity, arising from the violence of his own temper. For, that his temper was violent in a very high degree, is plain from all that he says of himself in the notes. His bitterness against the doctrine of Toleration rose almost to madness. If he had been possessed of power; he would have been as great a persecutor as any that is recorded in the History of the Church of Rome. From no one's having thought it worth his while to record the time or place of his death, it may be conjectured that he fell into contempt with all parties.] K.
